In general McLin provides a compendium of detail on the defense questions of 1957 to 1963, which is complete down to the tactical roles of various items of military hardware. For the defense specialist this detail is desirable. What is unfortunate for the generalist is that the author does not satisfactorily analyze these questions within the broader context of Canadian politics. There is almost no consideration given to the role of public opinion or interest group politics in defense decision-making, and the interplay between the parties is inadequately developed. McLin has written about a controversial topic in a turbulent period of Canadian politics,, but in failing to analyze important factors in the policy process his book fails to capture the spirit of the controversy.

For the specialist and generalist alike the book includes a useful discussion of the extent to which Canadian defense decisions and weapons procurement can be dependent on very minor alterations in U.S. policy. This discussion is of interest to students of alliance politics, for its points out the political liabilities for nations which become linked in a "special relationship" with the United States with respect to defense and security matters.

Rosenbluth's The Canadian Economy and Disarmament is a study of defense problems and policy written from the perspective of the economist rather than the political analyst. Essentially a replication of studies done of other national economies, this book attempts to project the likely effects of disarmament on the Canadian economy, and to suggest alternatives which will make the adjustment process palatable both economically and socially. Special concern is given to the structure of Canadian defense expenditure and to the effects on research and development which occur with reductions in defense expenditure.

From the perspective of the political scientist concerned with public policy, this book presents important data about the relationship between the defense establishment and society. Rosenbluth uses input-output analysis to show which elements in society are primarily reliant on defense production, as well as those which are linked secondarily through the production process. One could easily posit hypotheses from these data as to the location and intensity of future political opposition to cutbacks in defense spending, let alone to complete disarmament. Also revealed in Rosenbluth's statistics are the close economic ties between Canada and the United States with respect to weapons procurement. The existence of these ties is likely to make collaboration with the United States a prerequisite for major Canadian defense decisions, if such decisions are to be implemented with a minimum of international and domestic friction.

For students of the Canadian economy the book commands a more general attention than the title indicates. The economic adjustments from disarmament are similar to adjustments caused by more normal circumstances such as automation or trade liberalization, and thus the author's findings are applicable to situations other than a disarming economy. For example Rosenbluth includes a brief discussion of factor mobility and presents a convincing argument that the demand for labor should be geographically mobile as well as labor itself. The author also suggests policies for bringing about adjustments to demand changes, which at the same time would maintain the growth in aggregate demand that is essential in making these adjustments possible.

As an analysis of public policy, Rosenbluth's work presents a challenging approach to political scientists. Economists are perhaps more willing than political scientists to make use of less than realistic assumptions in the course of theory-building and analysis, particularly if such assumptions promote useful investigation. Rosenbluth's assumption of disarmament is clearly unrealistic but he escapes the charge of being academic because of the practical "contingency plan" aura the book projects. Possibly political analysis could become more versatile if political scientists were more willing to follow similar research techniques. For example, a politically-oriented study of the effects of disarmament might reveal strengths and weaknesses of various occupational groups in the society, which would undoubtedly affect the pattern of economic adjustments to disarmament policies. Such a study would be a useful complement to Rosenbluth's analysis. In the long run, economic criteria are not the most important considerations in building armies and defense industries, and it is unlikely that they would be the major considerations governing the dissolution of defense establishments.

In his conclusion McLin has referred to the desire of Canadian leaders to achieve some measure of distinctiveness in Canadian defense policy. Fact is, Rosenbluth's book points to what could be the most distinctive contribution of all. The likelihood of Canada's disarming is indeed remote, but what can be said is that Canada, more than any other Western nation, is in a position to seriously consider this step.

GILBERT R. WINHAM

McMaster University

Imperial Japan's Higher Civil Service Examinations, By Robert M. Spaulding, Jr. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1967. Pp. xiv, 416. $10.00.)

For all the wonders of Japan's hundred-year "leap forward" in economic strength, no one would deny that political modernization has had a large part in the "miracle" of post-feudal Japan. Much attention has been paid to the changing nature of the top political leadership, but relatively little to the operations of government at the levels below the top. In some ways, the Japanese success in maintaining an efficient and unbroken flow of governmental services, such as tax collection, police protection, and the operation of courts, despite the tremendous disruptions of the shift from feudalism and isolation during the past century, is even more impressive than the mixed quality of top political leadership during this period. Certainly the development of an extremely strong and modernized civil bureaucracy has been an outstanding achievement and gives Japan today one of the most important foundation stones on which its spectacular economic success has been firmly based.

Professor Spaulding has contributed greatly to our understanding of this whole aspect of modern Japanese government by his meticulous study of the development of the examination system for higher civil service posts between 1884 and 1943. A major merit of his work is that he does not shy away from the complexities of the subject. Past treatments have tended to be great oversimplifications, merging original intentions, early beginnings, and ultimate outcomes into a vague whole. Professor Spaulding shows how complicated, diverse, and sometimes contradictory the system actually was, as is the case with all complex institutions developed over time in response to specific needs.

While this is the greatest merit of this book, it also might be called its greatest weakness, because the less knowledgeable reader can, become easily lost in the mass of detail. The author, however, works manfully to avoid this danger by putting his materials whenever possible into excellent tabular form. There are no less than 12 diagramatic figures, 61 statistical tables, and 10 appendices, all of which will help make this book an indispensable starting point and reference aid for anyone studying this aspect of Japanese government and history.

Professor Spaulding shows clearly that the nineteenth century Japanese, although they were familiar with the concept of civil service examinations from their borrowing of Chinese government institutions more than a millennium earlier and although they used German models for their new system, actually developed it in response to specific needs. They started off with the creation of special schools to produce the type of higher government servants they required. In the military field, as in other countries, this became the major source or recruitment, and the Tokyo Imperial University and subsequent Imperial Universities were designed primarily to produce top civil administrators for government. The adoption of the first examination system in 1884 was only a temporary measure to expand the judiciary in preparation for the elimination of extraterritoriality. The expanded system of 1887 was merely designed to supplement the inadequate flow of Tokyo University graduates into administrative posts, and, after six years of little use, it took on importance only in 1893 when it became evident that Tokyo graduates alone outnumbered the number of openings and thus would have to be subjected to examinations along with other applicants. Finally from 1918 to 1923 the system was standardized into the tripartite diplomatic, general administrative, and judicial system that has become familiar to students of modern Japan and has now for several decades produced not only the great bulk of Japanese governmental leadership below the top decision-making posts, but also a surprisingly large number of the top decision makers as well.

Professor Spaulding has done such an excellent job of sorting out an extremely tangled body of material that it is unfair to blame him for not having taken on other even more difficult tasks. But one would hope that in further studies he would try to evaluate the results of the examination system more deeply. He does deal at great length with the long wrangles in Japan over discrimination against the students of private law schools (as opposed to the national ones), the narrow legalistic training of all candidates for the examinations, and the balance between the examination route to government office and the "free appointment" system for the top political leaders and the "screening" system for teachers in government schools and other "technical personnel" below the high administrative posts. One would wish, however, that some day he would try to evaluate more fully the examination system in terms of its recruitment of real talent from a broad spectrum of Japanese society and the efficiency of its products in government service. On both scores it probably rates high, but at present such an estimate is little more than a guess.

Professor Spaulding does show, through very conclusive statistics, how the products of the civil service examination system did take over the great bulk of high administrative posts from vice-ministers down to bureau and section chiefs. He also points out how the Japanese dropped the prolonged, unsalaried training period for the successful examination candidate which was an important part of the German system but constituted a serious economic barrier to high government posts for the less wealthy. He also argues that the Japanese examination system was really just the capstone of a pyramical system of scholastic examinations, which was broadly open to all Japanese. He gives a few statistics to show the broadening scope of this system, such as the drop of the percentage of upper class (shizoku origin) law school students at Tokyo University from 82 per cent in the late 1880's to 50 per cent in 1895. He does not try, however, to develop these themes in detail or to evaluate the ultimate performance in government of the products of the examination system. These comments are not criticisms of an excellent book which opens up a whole new subject for serious study. They are merely offered as encouragement for more.

Edwin O. Reischauer

Harvard University

Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Economics. By Friedrich A. Hayek. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1967. Pp. x, 356. $6.50.)

The title of this collection of F. A. Havek's latest writings is apt: it consists of essays or studies and they are about philosophy, politics, and economics. Some twenty-five essays, about equally divided among these three areas, testify to the extraordinary range of Professor Hayek's concerns, his vast erudition, and skill at conveying his messages. It would be a very rare political scientist who could not find at least one of these essays interesting and relevant to his own interests. Conversely, it would require a rather strange political scientist who would find all or even many of the studies germane to his own concerns. This reviewer is no exception as the remainder of the review will make clear. I should add that some of Hayek's points, especially in the philosophy section were not particularly meaningful to me so I intend to avoid discussion of them. Others, more learned in matters philosophic, will have to provide their own guidance among these eight chapters on such diverse topics as "explanation," "kinds of rationalism," and the "legal and political philosophy of David Hume."

While several of the essays in this volume are published for the first time relatively little is said that would disconfirm Hayek's observation that most of our basic ideas are formed early in life and only painfully revised in subsequent years. Hayek's philosophical commitments have been known for a long time because he has taken extreme and often unpopular but always articulate positions on science, political life and economic policies. These essays only restate those basic views in different contexts and on different occasions. This is not to say that Hayek has not learned; he has as he generously admits that Karl Popper taught him how to modify his views on "scientism." Hayek no longer views the physical and social sciences as quite so distinct because he has learned to observe what each does rather than what each claims it is doing. Attention to the processes of scientific inquiry suggest a much smaller gap than does comparison of the outputs, especially as they are ideally stated. Still, social scientists are well advised not to imitate their more esteemed colleagues in the physical sciences. This seems like eminently sound advice for political scientists and particularly so now that the battle over behavioralism is over and political behavioralists feel sufficiently secure that they need not continue arguing methodology from a defensive posture.

Professor Hayek's political and economi values have remained more constant and havundoubtedly been anathema to the liberal es establishment of American social science. Per haps they should have been so, but times dechange and as "new" issues arise and experi ence accumulates we may find it necessary to review our own values and perhaps even admi to finding the highly individualistic philosophy of a Havek somewhat more informed and rele vant than previously was the case. The growth of central planning and our widespread ex perience with some of the less admirable conse quences of bureaucracy and controls, etc. of the past three or four decades serves to remine us of Hayek's basic insights into social, political, and economic organization. While the intellectual and polemical debates over "planning" versus "laissez faire" have waned greatly the search for appropriate and optima practical solutions to make political and economic choices continues in the real world ofdaily affairs. We now have had several decades of hard experience with various and diverse forms of public planning under a variety of conditions to compare with many more decades of private planning. The character of the current debate and the search is, therefore, quite different from earlier days when Hayek and his colleagues were first attempting to understand and predict the behavior of collectivist institutions for making social choices. The polemics of an earlier day provide little solid advice on operating various institutions especially in newly-developing nations although they may have served to educate socialists somewhat and perhaps even delayed the onrush of socialism. In any case, while some of Havek's most dire predictions about socialism inevitably leading to totalitarianism have vet to be realized, if they ever will, many of his less dire assertions have been amply realized. Thus, Hayek had warned us on the shortcomings of complete planning and particularly of public bureaucracy. Ironically, many present-day radicals make similar observations and complaints about contemporary society. The quest for greater individualism and free choice, in all walks of life, through greater decentralization of power appears a major theme not only in Hayek's writings but those of today's selfproclaimed radicals. Few radicals demand socialism anymore even if their heroes may be Mao, Castro, or Ho. Several socialist countries are experimenting on a vast scale with decentralized decision-making through the use of markets and a more freely operating price mechanism as well as adapting some typical capitalist inducements or motivations to achieve more efficient production and distribution. Perhaps, Hayek was right in dedicating The Road to Serfdom "To the Socialists of All Parties."

One of the more interesting chapters in Hayek's collection concerns The Road to Serfdom and its reception in Britain and the United States. Written some twelve years after the original publication date (1944) this essay constitutes an instructive chapter in the sociology of ideas. Hayek claims that the book received a most serious reception in Britain but a somewhat hysterical one in the United States. The author suggests that Europeans having had experience with socialism were open to his analysis but that many influential Americans were naive idealists with glittering hopes for public planning. One might add that those Americans who welcomed Hayek's book were not exactly playing it "cool" themselves. In any event, planning today assumes countless institutional forms and what is most needed is not further polemics but hard-headed analyses of the functioning and consequences of specific choice processes in all their great variability and social settings. Such inquiries are no longer likely to sound like The Road to Serfdom. More likely they will resemble the far more descriptive and dispassionate analyses of a Bergson, Nove, Stolper, Montias, or Hacket.

Although the positions taken by Professor Hayek on science, socialism, and economic policies have not been notably popular among academics his stature as a scholar is unassailable; he is a remarkable man. Oscar Lange, if I am not mistaken, is reputed to have said that a statue of von Mises ought to be erected in Moscow or Warsaw for his contribution to the socialist understanding of the economic problem of allocation. I would add Havek not only for his technical contributions but his pleas for human liberty. He has served mankind well. As this volume amply conveys his high esteem for economic liberty and political freedom so too it reinforces his stature as a concerned philosopher.

WILLIAM C. MITCHELL

University of Oregon

International Political Communication. By W. Phillips Davison. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1965, Pp. xii, 404. $7.50.)

"Librarians faced with the necessity of classifying a book with 'Communication' in its title," the author wryly observes, "are tempted to hide it instead." Unlike any such bewildered librarian, Professor Davison insists on clarity and relevance, and he maintains both admirably throughout his substantial, thoughtful and fact-filled book.

The author defines "communication" as "the whole process by which meaning is transferred" (his emphasis). The plural "communications," is then to "refer to the messages themselves." This process and these messages are then to be studied in the bulk of the book as "a tool of foreign policy."

The reader is to learn how they are used, and how they could be used more effectively, to advance national policy goals, and particularly the foreign policy goals of the United States.

For this task, a formidable array of professional experience and competence has been brought together. Professor Davison himself has had a rich experience in the practices, as well as in the study, of international communication, through his service with the United States government, the RAND Corporation, and a number of leading universities. In addition, this book has benefitted from the work of a 1962-63 study group of the Council on Foreign Relations which included not only several leading educators and businessmen but also such specialists in journalism, communications research or international relations as Lester Market, Philip E. Mosely, Ithiel de Sola Pool, Leo Rosten, Hans Speier, Shepard Stone and Ralph K. White. Another dozen of specialists read parts of the manuscript, or contributed ideas which, says the author, were "incorporated without explicit citations."

The resulting book is, within the limits of its size and objectives, the most thorough, authoritative and up-to-date treatment of its subject than we have. Its large array of information is organized with sensitivity and good judgment. In order to know what one can do with communications, Mr. Davison insists, one must first know how and through what channels they are flowing, and what effects they are likely to have in the context of the existing memories and predispositions of the audiences which they reach. "People," he reminds us, "have an almost unlimited capacity to ignore information they find unwelcome or irrelevant."

Accordingly, the first part of the book deals with the international network of communication channels, the impact of communications on individuals and organizations, and the respective political roles of communication in democracies, Communist states, and developing nations. Only after drawing the attention of his readers so thoroughly to what is likely to happen in the world in any case—that is, to the autonomous probabilities and predispositions of individuals and nations—does the author proceed in the second part of the book to discuss the deliberate use of communications to implement national policy. Here he first analyses the general structure of international communication programs, and then discusses in separate chapters "Communist International Communication" and the foreign information and cultural activities of the United States. The last two chapters of the book are then increasingly prescriptive: One deals with the problem of "focussing" or coordinating American Communication programs while the other examines the roles of the United States government in international communication. together with possible ways for making these more effective.

A book which covers such a broad field and summarizes so much knowledge and experience for the general reader, cannot avoid including a great deal of matters that will be quite familiar to specialists. Yet, even these familiar topics are treated with lucidity, and often with impressive humanity and wisdom. The policy recommendations range widely, from a call for a new form of area-wide reports on United States information activities (to supplement the present more narrowly segmented reports on an agency basis) to such shrewd and philosophic point as the observation that "the most important tool for explaining the United States to peoples from other countries is 'the big ear' "-a dramatic highlight for the author's persistent concern for keeping the flow of international communications free and keeping it a two-way process.

Here at the end, perhaps the book points bevond its own limits toward a task of communication research that is yet to be done. Messages are not only means to influence recipients and tools to promote policies which are supposed to be given. What we tell others also tends to be fed back into our own memories and to shape the premises of our own decisions tomorrow. Those who use communications to manipulate other people often end up having manipulated themselves, for today's manipulative message is often tomorrow's decision premise of the actor who first uttered it. Causation in the communication process moves not in straight lines but in feedback loops. The words "tool," "use." "effect," "impact," and the like, so frequent in Professor Davison's book, eventually will have to be supplemented by another set of words stressing the continuous process of orientation and reorientation, perception and misperception, goal pursuit and goal change, which are going on in each actor in world politicswhether it be a nation, a people, a government, an interest group, or an individual statesman. It is one more indication of the merits of Mr. Davison's book that the momentum of its argument may well tend to move future research and policy analysis somewhat more in this direction.

KARL W. DEUTSCH

Harvard University

International Regions and the International System: A Study in Political Ecology. By BRUCE M. RUSSETT. (Chicago: Rand, McNally & Company, 1967. Pp. xvi, 252. $8.50.)

In its opening pages, this book holds out promise of being a very model of proper modern scholarship in the social sciences. For one thing, Professor Russett promises to deal with important topics: "relations between political systems and their social and physical environment." "the formation and decomposition of coalitions among nations," and "the conditions of peaceful change in the [international] system." (vii) Furthermore, the work is based on a formidable array of data, much of which were collected for the same nations over time. And the author demonstrates, as he has in previous work, a clear mastery of many complex and varied tools of the social sciences. In light of these favorable portents, it is most surprising to find that the book itself is, in two respects, a remarkably narrow work. For almost the entire study rests upon but one theoretical proposition, and the bulk of the analysis is performed with but a single statistical technique.

The dominant proposition—actually of such broad import that it might be termed a paradigm-is that reliance upon social and economic variables is the way to explain political phenomena. At the beginning of his book. Russett alludes to economic and social "determinants" of politics. (vii) In an intriguing compound sentence he goes on to state that "International relations is truly an interdisciplinary study, and any attempt to explain its political aspects must depend heavily on social and economic variables." (viii) Few would challenge the first part of that sentence, but the second part is a good deal more questionable. Certainly some environmental variables will be part of any sound theoretical study of politics. But how many, and which ones? And what is the relative potency of the environment and such political variables as the structure of political relations, the nature of coalitions, the dynamics of political-decision-making, and the like? In what ways does political action alter the environment? In the presentation of his research, Russett clearly judges these questions to be of secondary importance. By far the greater part of the text is devoted to categorizing nations on the basis of religion, culture, urbanization, gross national product, trade, and other social and economic characteristics. Political behavior is assumed to flow more or less directly from this non-political milieu. Such an assumption holds up rather well for some after-the-fact predictions. Both Albania and Mainland China, for example, do not cluster well with the other communist states on the basis of ecological factors. But the assumption may be cast in some doubt by the recent behavior of two other communist mavericks, Romania and Czechoslovakia, which Russett claims are unambiguous members of the "core group" of communist states. (171)

Heavy reliance upon factor analysis is, in a sense, the methodological counterpart of Russett's basic ecological paradigm. Factor analysis, in Russett's hands (or rather computer), is an extension of correlational techniques for the purpose of grouping ecological variables into a smaller number of general factors. But the theoretical-contributions of factor analysis can be only as great as the theoretical importance of the variables which are analyzed. Briefly, the dilemma of the factor analyst-theoretician is this: he must begin with some good theory before he can generate more theory from factor analysis. Russett proceeds as if his ecological perspective does in fact provide such theory. But until that theory is confirmed, a work, such as International Regions, which relies heavily on factor analysis, must be considered essentially a pre-theoretical sorting out of possibly interesting and relevant theoretical variables.

Problems associated with Russett's single theoretical perspective and single statistical technique are quite clearly illustrated in his treatment of U. N. roll-call votes. Consistent with his attraction to the ecological paradigm, Russett studies voting, a political act, in order to measure attitudes, a non-political ecological phenomenon. Despite the obvious conceptual difficulties involved, he says this is necessary simply because elite and mass attitudes are so hard to get at directly. But it does not follow from this why one should decide to pick out U. N. roll-call votes as the means for studying attitudes. This is especially so since votes would seem better measures of other interesting phenomena, such as international concordance and conflict, and the public stances of governments on the issues considered in the General Assembly.

Another difficulty with the analysis of voting is the technique used by Russett to render

U. N. roll-calls susceptible to factor analysis. Since nations regularly select one of three voting options, Russett has found it necessary to assign an artibrary number to each of these positions. The numbers he has selected are 0 for a "No" vote, 1 for an "Abstain," and 2 for a "Yes" vote. These numbers are then correlated and factor analyzed. For Russett's 0, 1, 2 coding to be valid, the three voting positions must comprise a single dimension in such a way that "Abstain" is a moderate position, spaced equidistantly between "Yes" and "No." Contrary to this requirement, we know that some nations, as a matter of fact, abstain because they feel that a given resolution does not go far enough; others abstain because they feel even considering the resolution is improper. From what we do know about the reasons for voting, we can say that some countries, for a variety of reasons, adopt a common and distinct voting position of "Abstain," just as others, for a variety of reasons adopt, the common and distinct positions of "Yes" and "No." Voting positions are, in other words, nominal categories. They are not ordinal, and they are certainly not interval, as Russett's coding makes them out to be. And finally, his coding scheme results in treating any pair of agreeing votes the same, irrespective of whether the agreement appears as part of a large majority, or as part of a tiny minority. It has been plausibly argued that votes are especially important for political analysis when they are very closely divided; from this point of view we might wish to know how the agreement patterns differ as votes approach a nearly even division. Alternatively, it is interesting to note which states remain "foul-weather friends" and vote together even when they are opposed by a large majority. But these are concerns of one who views voting as a political phenomenon, rather than, as Russett, the registering of psychological predispositions. Russett's only acknowledgement of variations in vote distributions is his exclusion of those roll-calls in which 90% or more of the members cast the same votes since distributions of this sort cause serious distortion in correlation coefficients.

But however much one chooses to agree or disagree with Russett's arguments, it must be admitted that a brief review cannot do full justice to a book which tackles so many important questions and analyzes such massive amounts of data. At the very least, one should not be surprised if this book, as the author himself suggests, "stimulates work which makes it obsolete." (viii)

MICHAEL K. O'LEARY

Syracuse University

Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad Abduh and Rashid Rida. By Malcolm H. Kerr. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966. Pp. vii, 249. $6.95.)

Modern Islamic reformism has been generated partly from within but mainly as a response to the Western assault, in both its intellectual and political dimensions, against the Muslim world. Modernism was born when Muslims for the first time asked the question: "why have the Europeans made so much progress while the peoples of the East remain backward?" "What is the secret behind the progress of the West and the cause for the backwardness of the East?" The impulse behind these and similar questions was the fear that the political ascendancy of the West, with its intellectual advances and pervasive influences of material civilization, would gradually erode the traditional bases for faith in God and menace Islamic existence.

In response to this challenge, three broad groups of reformists have evolved in modern Islam. (1) The revivalists, a strongly conservative group, advocate return to the purity and literalism of the Shari'a (Islamic Divine Law) as a means of strengthening Islam and uniting the Muslims. (2) The secularists, a Westerneducated group, call for the separation of church and state and for the adoption of Western science and civilization. (3) The modernists who maintain that Islam is not opposed to progress, rather it is compatible with it, and consequently a reformulation of Islamic doctrines in terms of modern thought is not only possible but desirable. Their concern is essentially how to relate the past to the present and the future in a positive and meaningful way-how to become modern and remain Muslim at the same time. The dominant figure in this group is Muhammad Abduh, an Egyptian theologian of impressive intellectual ability, whose political and legal theories and those of his disciple, Muhammad Rashid Rida, an Egyptian of Syrian origin, are the subject of the volume under review.

Islamic Reform, by Dr. Malcolm H. Kerr, Chairman of the Political Science Department at the University of California at Los Angeles, is purported to be a study of the political and legal theories of the two Egyptian reformers. Yet, the author devotes half of the book to an exposition of the classical Islamic theories of the Caliphate (Islamic State) and canonical jurisprudence (fiqh). His justification seems to be that such an extensive analysis is important or necessary because "many modern reformists such as Rashid Rida, under the influence of Muhammad Abduh, proclaimed it their objective to make these doctrines to serve as . . . a basis" for determining the processes of politics in the modern age. (p. 12) In view of the fact that classical Islamic theories have been adequately expounded by Gibb, Gardet, Khadduri, Laoust and Tyan, to whom the author readily acknowledges his debt, the need for such a lengthy "introduction" becomes questionable. However, he does examine these doctrines with a fresh emphasis and the negative purpose "to show that they were not suitable as a basis for determining, with any precision at least, the processes or substance of medieval Muslim politics."

Analysis of classical Islamic theories on their formal level reveals that traditional jurisprudence, like the traditional doctrine of the Caliphate, "was closely tied to its theological foundations." This umbilical relationship between theology on the one hand and constitutional theory and jurisprudence on the other, hastened, in the judgment of the author, the obsolescence of the theory of the Caliphate and restricted the positive evolution of Islamic Law. Even ijma' (consensus of the community) ijtihad (personal opinion) and istislah (public) interest), these promising and dynamic legal sources were also prevented by Muslim jurists from becoming wide-open doors for innovations and adaptations. Istislah, which Dr. Kerr regards as a principle of tremendous potential for positive reform, was subordinated by the jurists to Koranic considerations and restricted as an independent source of the Law. Only a fourteenth century radical champion of istislah, Naim ad-Din Taufi, asserted that every public interest is a necessity and must therefore take precedence over everything else, including the religious texts (p. 97). As Dr. Kerr later indicates, even the modern reformers have hesitated to go that far.

After outlining "some of the fundamental elements in the idealist tradition of Muslim legal and constitutional theory, and having tried to show that these elements were outgrowths of a conservative theology," the author then turns his attention to consider how this tradition was reformulated in late 19th and early 20th centuries by Abduh and Rida. Although Abduh is the most important figure, less space is devoted to him than to his disciple, simply because so much has been already said about him that the author admits he can add nothing more.

Abduh's dominant position in Islamic modernism derives from the fact that he is the first Muslim thinker to attempt a separation of religious issues from the political conflict of the time, so that, in Gibb's words, "they were no longer interdependent and each was set free to develop along its own appropriate lines." He knew that Islam's fate in the face of modern secularism depended on its revitalization as a system of beliefs rather than a political order. Consequently, the two most important components of his program were: (1) the reformulation of Islamic doctrine in the light of modern thought, and (2) the reformation of Muslim higher education. Yet, according to Dr. Kerr, Adbuh's reformist theology was not "thoroughly naturalist as it purported to be," and since Rida's legal and constitutional doctrines were based on this theology, they were bound to fail. "The shakiness of this basis," says our author, "underlay the incoherence of Rida's ideology, and thus appears to have contributed something to its failure as a political program." (p. 103)

The central point in Abduh's reformist theology is the assertion that the theory of natural law (and for that matter, the law of causality) is identical with the theory of divine voluntarism in the orthodox Ash'arite theology which dominated the Muslim mind since the beginning of the 10th century. His difficulty stems from the fact that a thoroughgoing naturalism would completely negate the cardinal Islamic dogma that God's constant intervention sustains this world. Less than that would not satisfy modern scientific thought. Rida accepted Abduh's reformist theology by insisting on the naturalism of Islamic legal and constitutional doctrines, "without consistently interpreting their processes in the ways that naturalism would demand." (p. 106) Rida was fighting a losing battle. When he wrote his treatise on the Caliphate in 1922, the Turkish Grand National Assembly had stripped the Ottoman Caliphate of all its temporal powers (in 1924 it was completely abolished by Mustafa Kemal). This must have conditioned his decision to revive the classical constitutional and legal doctrines and base them on Abduh's shaky naturalism. He was bound to end up in fundamentalism, and Dr. Kerr's final epitaph that Rida's "intellectual career symbolizes in some ways the political failure of the whole Islamic modernist movement," is well deserved.

But in the final analysis, how does one judge the success or failure of an intellectual career? Is Plato a failure simply because his ideal regime is unrealizable? True to the Islamic ideal with its postulate that temporal life must have spiritual significance, Abduh and Rida dreamed of a reformation whereby the true spirit of Islam would infuse public life in all of its aspects thus leading to a revitalization of the Muslim nation with a culture and a way of life that is genuinely its own. Pragmatically, they have not been successful; but no serious person would ridicule their spiritual concern!

Dr. Kerr's training in modern political science and his intimate knowledge of the Middle East qualify him to address himself to the subject of Islamic modernism. His book is a welcome addition to a new kind of political literature on Islam and the Middle East. There are a few typographical errors that could have been avoided. Strangely enough, they abound in the text more than in the English transliterations of the Arabic.

FAUZI M. NAJJAR Michigan State University

NOTES

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

The Nature of Political Inquiry. Вт FRED M. FROноск. (Homewood, Illinois: The Dorsey Press, 1967. Pp. vii, 218. $5.00.)

The purpose of this book is to provide "a quick, wide scan of some landscape too often overlooked in contemporary political science, with a particular emphasis on values in political investigation." The landscape surveyed includes the epistemological premises of logical positivism and metaphysics; the nature of functional and causal explanations; the characteristics of scientific social analysis; the role of values in political behavior and political analysis. The terrain is wide and in places treacherous. But there are tried and trustworthy guides—Brecht, Hempel, Kuhn, Mannheim, Merton, Nagel, Polanyi, Strauss, Familiar landmarks soon come into view: the scientific enterprise rests on epistemological premises which cannot themselves be validated through scientific method; value-statements cannot ultimately be verified through scientific method, yet values are an aspect of all social behavior including political behavior; scientific method presumes the value of objective neutrality, yet at any given time most scientific analysis is directed by a dominant paradigm which is defended by partisan adherents; although scientific knowledge is explicit and publicly accessible, the actual process of scientific inquiry involves tacit and intuitive elements which defy scientific analysis; total exclusion of value premises from political inquiry is impossible, but within the domain of empirical political phenomena, including the processes by which values are formed and applied, scientific method yields valid findings. Many other points are touched upon in Frohock's survey, but these are among the central tenets of the argument.

How should the argument be described? For want of a more elegant term I would call it sensible positivism; it is positivism shorn of its claim to a monopoly of truth, shorn of its epistemological arrogance. But if logical positivism is arrogant, it is also philosophically coherent; sensible positivism is appealingly modest—but is it a coherent doctrine? On the evidence of this book the answer must be a reluctant no. The answer is reluctant because sensible positivism is surely the prevailing epistemological faith among political analysts who share an empirical orientation. Although one may quarrel with some of Frohock's specific interpretations, his basic conclusions are widely accepted by the community of practicing political scientists. Yet these conclusions do not comprise a distinctive solution to basic epistemological problems.

An explicit purpose of Frohock's survey is to show how concern with fundamental problems in the philosophy of science can guide the selection and formulation of subjects for empirical research. We must ask, then, what redirection of effort is required if we take seriously the tenets of sensible positivism. Apparently, not much, For Frohock, the very model of a modern sensible positivist seems to be David Easton. Easton's strictures in The Political System on the connection between empirical theory and normative premises are quoted approvingly, and his work on the political socialization of children is cited as distinctly appropriate for enlightened research. Other subjects are also recommended-including the effects of political symbols and the impact of irrational forces on political behavior. Actually, however, I cannot see that any major current strand of empirical research falls outside the pale by the suggested standards. Studies of community formation, decision-making and the policy process, political participation and compliance—these are as much concerned with values and the place of values in political behavior as studies of political socialization.

Nor am I entirely convinced—and this is more serious—of the implications Frohock draws concerning the additional kinds of empirical research that should be included on our agenda. He calls for greater attention to work by psychologists on early learning experiences and by ethologists on the biological bases of human behavior, which has perhaps not had sufficient impact in political analysis. This is fair enough. But two comments seem in order. First, why must we traverse such arduous terrain in order to decide that the origins of political cognition and the process of political socialization are appropriate subjects for further study? And second, why does our philosophic sojourn necessarily lead us to place greater emphasis on political psychology and less emphasis, say, on political economy? Frohock is familiar with recent efforts to apply economic analysis to the study of politics. But aside from some interesting comments on the concept of rationality he does not examine the claims of this important school of analysis. Yet his philosophic arguments hardly disqualify economic types of analysis as a useful approach to political phenomena. Frohock defines politics as prescriptive behavior that is "public, comprehensive, categorical, and/or legitimate." He gives no reason why such behavior cannot be studied within the framework of economic models. In other words, a major alternative type of analysis, neglected by Frohock, is also consistent with sensible positivism. It is thus difficult to accept as decisive the recommendations said to derive from his philosophic inquiry.—EDWIN FOGELMAN, University of Minnesota.

Marxism: A Re-Examination. By IRVING M. ZEIT-LIN. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand and Co., 1967. Pp. v. 170. $1.95.)

Sidney Hook once wrote that conflicting doctrinal interpretations of Marx "were ways of making history, innocently paraded as methods of reading it." This astute observation has wide and continuing application but a special poignancy in the attempt of some East European scholars to emphasize the humanist foundations of Marxist thought in order to build a more just socialist society and preclude the revival of Stalinism. This attempt has gained force from the rediscovery of Karl Marx's Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts, written by him in 1844, when he was 26 years of age, and first published in 1932, which form the point of departure for Professor Zeitlin's reevaluation of Marx.

In these early writings, Professor Zeitlin points out, Marx was deeply concerned with "alienation" which, under the capitalist mode of production, did not develop the worker's mental or physical energies, left him unfulfilled, and with a feeling of misery rather than well-being. "Communism" which will abolish private property and human self-alienation, wrote Marx, "is humanism." While, says Professor Zeitlin, Marx later abandoned the term "alienation" in favor of more precise, scientific and politically effective terms, such as "exploitation" and "commodity-fetishism," he insists that Marx "was moved in all his work by humanistic values." (Author's emphasis.)

Many Western scholars, of whom Daniel Bell is typical, have argued that it is "myth-making" to read the conception of alienation back as the central theme of Marx because the historical Marx moved from concern with the individual worker's incapacity to express himself in his work to the doctrine of surplus value, seen as exploitation of the workers en masse so that for Marx "the only social reality is not Man, nor the individual but economic classes."

The curious thing to me is that although these positions, tenaciously held and seriously debated, seem irreconcilable, the conflict is more apparent than real, more Talmudic than substantive. It is true that Marx, to distinguish himself from the utopian socialists with their appeals to humanity, reason and justice, insisted that conceptions of justice derived from the existing economic order, that it was not a question of what the proletariat ought to do but what, in view of its being, it will be compelled to do as "capitalist production creates with the necessity of a natural process the negation of itself." Accordingly, he sought to eliminate from manifestoes and programs all references to abstract justice and rights of man as "ideological nonsense" which would only encourage hypocrisy and confusion of thought.

On the other hand, it is impossible to read Marx's writing, early and late, without being impressed with his passionate indignation as the cruelties and barbarities inflicted by capitalism in his day on men individually and collectively and his implicit and explicit affirmations that only under communism would men be truly human, free, and equal. Thus, for example, in Das Kapital he wrote that capitalist manufacture "converts the labourer into a crippled monstrosity" by reducing his work to detailed manipulation just as in certain places "they butcher a whole beast for the sake of his hide or his tallow." He set forth a searing condemnation of the labor of children of nine or ten years "dragged from their squalid beds at two, three, or four o'clock in the morning and compelled to work for a bare subsistence until ten, eleven, or twelve at night, their limbs wearing away, their frames dwindling, their faces whitening, and their humanity absolutely sinking into a stonelike torpor, utterly horrible to contemplate." As for communism, in his Critique of the Gotha Program in 1875, Marx specifically envisioned that it would come with "the all-around development of the individual" and end "the enslaving subordination of the individual to the division of labor." How, in fact, can it truly be maintained that communism, conceived of as a stateless, classless society, built upon voluntary cooperation and complete freedom, and proclaiming the principle of equality, "from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs," (however utopian) is bereft of humanist concern with the individual? I believe, then, that Professor Zeitlin is essentially right when he maintains that Marx did not abandon the concept of alienation but "sharpened and concretized it as an objective process in the world of work."

What I find far less convincing is Professor Zeitlin's attempt, on the bases of Marx's analyses of events of his time and journalistic writings, to reformulate and denigrate Marx's economic determinism. While it is true that in these writings, Marx did not, as Zeitlin says, automatically assume that political events were always effects of economic causes, and attempted to treat such relationships empirically, there is no evidence to suggest that he considered conflicting data anything other than aberrant or transient conditions which did not undermine or make it necessary for him to recast his general theoretical formulations. It is dubious, too, whether Marx-so passionately convinced of the validity of his theories-would have shared Professor Zeitlin's notion that "his conception of society, and the historical change it underwent, was to be regarded above all as a 'guide to study."

For the rest, Professor Zeitlin undertakes to analyze which of Marx's theories have stood the tests of time and experience and to erect on this basis a guide for the analysis of structure and change in whole societies. While I, for one, would quarrel (if space permitted) with some of his specific findings, I can only applaud his conclusions that "non-dogmatic Marxism will continue to provide insights into the workings of social systems, and enlighten social research generally." I think, however, it would be well to recognize that the continuing importance and appeal of Marx lie not in the soundness of his specific theories which in fundamentals, such as the materialist conception of history, the increasing misery of the proletariat, the nature and role of class struggle, have proved simplistic but because Marxism still raises certain challenging questions, including the comparative abilities of capitalist and socialist economies to maintain high rates of economic growth, create conditions for full and meaningful employment, eliminate poverty, and build free and equal societies.-Samuel Hendel, The City University of New York.

Politics and Social Science. By W. J. M. Macken-ZIE. (Baltimore: Penguin Books, 1967. pp. 392, $1.95.)

Politics and Social Science, by W. J. M. Mackenzie, is a book in which an effort is made to interpret "political science to the social scientist, and social science to the student of politics." Mackenzie is a British political scientist and is writing for a predominantly British audience. The scope of the book, however, is sufficiently broad for political scientists on either side of the Atlantic. Indeed, the breadth of the book is, itself, one of its major problems, for it purports to present a "complete survey of the incredible diversity of modern political science."

The book is broken into five parts, each dealing with a major area of social or political science: traditional political science, political science in the universities, contemporary theory, politics "without states": and a concluding part on "men and their states." In part one Mackenzie summarizes briefly political science as it has been in the past dealing primarily with the classic writers on politics. Part two introduces the reader to the history and role of political science in the university. This includes proper noting of the teaching and research roles of political scientists, and the impact of American political science on that of England and the world. This part also introduces the reader to behavioral science, although he (rightly I think) avoids the traditionalist/behavioralist controversy in the United States with the hope that "we can avoid this sort of nonsense in Britain."

Part three, which is the first of the two most significant sections of the book, deals with contemporary theory. Mackenzie summarizes the role of theory, especially of "over-arching" or "general" theory, in its traditional context, then moves to a discussion of Easton's "systems theory," and "Parsonian" theory. The "partial" theories of information, games, and welfare economics, are also summarized. Part four is an attempt to deal with empirical study in political and social science, centering on social biology, small groups, tribal societies, community power, organizations, and linguistic analysis.

Although the purpose of the book is admirable, its execution leaves a good bit to be desired. First, with respect to contemporary theory, important as Parsons and Easton are, they are not the only examples of efforts at formulating general theory. Moreover, even though there are distinct differences between Parsons and Easton—as Mackenzie correctly points out—they, along with theorists such as Almond, represent the same "school" in the philosophy of science, namely, functionalism. Thus, using Easton and Parson does not, it would seem, present the reader with very broad scope in contemporary efforts in theory building.

One gains a similar reaction from reading the chapter on "partial" theories. Important as information theory, games theory, and the theories of welfare economics are, they are somewhat less illustrative of major trends in political science than are other empirically-related theory building efforts. On the positive side, however, Mackenzie does make a distinct effort in these chapters to relate the theories he discusses to the study of politics. In this sense he is partially fulfilling his purpose of instructing the discipline.

In part four, "politics without states," Mackenzie seeks to introduce the reader, and perhaps the discipline of political science, to what he considers to be important sources of political data. What results is a very uneven presentation of what seems to be a "hodge-podge" of data collection techniques and orientations. A prime example of the problem is his chapter on small groups, based largely on Verba's summary of the literature in Small Groups and Political Behavior, Inexplicably, the one area in political science which has attempted to make extensive use of small group concepts, (both in technique and theory)-studies of judicial behavior-is nearly ignored. Such pioneers in small group research, such as Moreno. Bales, and Borgatta, are given scant notice, Most importantly, however, Mackenzie does not specifically address himself to the question of how a political scientist can utilize small group theory and technique. I presume he assumes that it should be self-evident from his presentation. That such assumptions of self-evidence are risky was amply illustrated to this reviewer when, after reading a methodological discussion of small group research. another member of the discipline commented that "even if (small group methods) were more widely known (by political scientist), it is unlikely that there would be any interest in using them." The fact that, apart from the judicial behavior articles, only one work (Wayne L. Francis, 56, pp. 953-960), using "legitimate" (Moreno's sociometric choice tests) small group methods, has appeared in the pages of this journal since 1960, also illustrates the apparent inability of political scientists to apply small group techniques. Mackenzie quite rightly emphasizes the study of "communications," "leadership," "group norms," and the like, in small group study, but nowhere is this explicitly related to why these should be studied in small political groups. Moreover, some sections, such as the one on "research problems and methods," are so uneven that the points attempted are hardly made at all.

Finally, on the positive side, it should be said that there is room in the discipline, for such a book as Mackenzie's. Even though the integration of the social sciences has been slowly progressing, political science still tends to be somewhat parochial, although, as Mackenzie notes, this may be more true of American than of British political science. In any event, at least some political scientists do need instruction in what can be gained from other disciplines in the social and behavioral sciences. As a last note, it should be said that the foregoing criticisms may themselves be indicative of the somewhat parochial character of American political science. As Mackenzie points out, the distinctions between political science on the one hand, and social anthropology, social psychology, and sociology, on the other, have not been as distinct in Britain as in the United States. Hence, for a British audience, some of the points he puts forth may be more self-evident than they are for an American audience.—Thomas Wm. Madron, Western Kentucky University.

Political Theory and The Rights of Man. Edited By D. Raphael. (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1967. Pp. viii, 151. $5.75.)

This book is a symposium of ten essays which arose out of a section of the Sixth World Congress of the International Political Science Association held at Geneva in September of 1964. The subject chosen then for discussion was that of human rights, and the programme was divided into two parts: one on natural rights in Hobbes and Locke, and the other on modern conceptions of human rights as formulated in the Universal Declaration of 1948. Five of the essays included in the volume are revisions of papers presented at the Congress, the remaining five were written later, four of them specially for this collection and designed to carry further the original discussion by way of rebuttal and elaboration.

For the most part the collection reflects the original two-part symposium. The first three essays are by C. B. Macpherson, Raymond Polin, and J. W. Chapman, all discussions of the rights of man in Hobbes and Locke. Macpherson sums up his well-known views as presented in his book The Political Theory of Possessive Individualism (1962) by way of asking the question whether the concepts of natural rights as found in Hobbes or Locke can be of any use in formulating a concept of human rights today. He believes that they cannot. An acceptable concept of natural rights must, Macpherson believes, meet two requirements: (a) it must provide a certain minimum equality, at least as an equal access to the means of convenient living, and (b) it must include rights of recipience as well as rights of action, that is, there must be an obligation to respect each man's rights. Hobbes's doctrine allows for equality but does not establish rights of recipience; Locke provides for rights of recipience but his natural rights «are extremely unequal in consequence of his arguments for the right of unlimited accumulation. The reason both Hobbes and Locke fail to meet -our present day requirements for a theory of rights lies, in Macpherson's view, in their postu-Tate that there is a permanent conflict between the interests of separate individuals. But this assumption of natural contentiousness reflects their implicit conception of bourgeois man in a developing capitalist society. Given their place in history, Hobbes and Locke could not have been expected to see things otherwise. From our standpoint, however, we can see that a society of abundance rather than an economy of scarcity is possible, and so the postulate of necessary conflict among men is increasingly wide of the mark. A concept of human rights satisfying the two requisites of an acceptable notion is gradually becoming more realistic and workable.

Polin gives a careful and reasoned discussion of Hobbes and Locke, but his concern is primarily expository. He does not join issue with Macpherson or examine the use of their doctrines for today, although he does remark that for Locke the doctrine of natural rights is identical with that of liberalism, and that to condemn Locke is perhaps to condemn liberalism and the view of human rights expressed by it. But Chapman in his essay questions Macpherson's interpretation of liberalism. Macpherson, he believes, confuses liberalism with utilitarianism, and therefore regards a liberal society as one that maximizes satisfactions at the expense of justice and freedom. Chapman argues to the contrary that Locke's contract doctrine gives priority to justice and freedom, and that he may be interpreted to hold that inequalities are justified only when everyone directly participating in or affected by them may be reasonably presumed to be advantaged. When Locke allows for what Macpherson calls unlimited accumulation he does so subject to the restriction that all must gain, and this shows that he does not countenance a utilitarian theory of justice. Locke does not permit that the gains for some may be so great that they outweigh corresponding losses to others. Chapman maintains that when Locke's doctrine is properly elaborated the principles of justice, the criteria of economic rationality, and the values of liberty may be seen to be theoretically consistent. This alternative conception of liberalism offers, in Chapman's opinion, a plausible basis for human rights at the present time; it is not a morally defective or incoherent doctrine. Macpherson has failed to distinguish between the utilitarian and the contractarian elements in the liberal tradition, and to note the continuing value of the latter.

All but two of the remaining essays in the volume constitute a debate between Maurice Cranston, D. D. Raphael, and Bernard Mayo on the question of the appropriate definition and formulation of human rights in the modern world. Cranston starts off the discussion by maintaining that the philosophically viable concept of human rights has been obscured and muddied by including under it specific claims of another type. It is a mistake, he believes, to conflate social and economic rights, such as the right to old-age pensions. unemployment insurance, and medical services, with traditional human rights such as the right to life, liberty, and a fair trial. The philosophical objection to this is that the new theory of human rights is not coherent, and a confused concept of human rights mitigates against the establishment of what are truly human rights. The Universal Declaration of 1948 is faulty in this respect. Cranston proposes three tests for authentic rights: it should be practicable to secure them by legislation, they should be genuinely universal as moral rights, and they should be of paramount importance. The rights to life, liberty, and a fair trial meet these tests; infringing them is never permissible, since certain freedoms should never be violated. Cranston grants that the so-called economic and social rights may be moral rights of some men in certain societies. But this is a matter of extending democracy as social and economic conditions allow. It is not a question of universal rights, and the case for extension is to be argued on other grounds.

Raphael's first paper contains a valuable discussion of the concept of a right on the basis of which he agrees that there is a genuine difference between the rights of liberty on the one hand and political, economic, and social rights on the other. In one case a man has rights simply as a member of the human race, in the other as a member of a particular society. But he disagrees with Cranston in thinking that both sorts of rights may reasonably be included in an international declaration the main purpose of which is to encourage states to grant these rights to their own citizens.

Readers of this journal concerned with political theory will find these essays a useful discussion of the problem of human rights.—John Rawls, Harvard University.

A Theory of Political Integration. By CLAUDE AKE. (Homewood, Illinois: The Dorsey Press, Inc., 1967. Pp. ix, 164. $5.00.)

Political integration is defined in terms of some of its measures: "A political system is integrated to the extent that the minimal units (individual political actors) develop in the course of political interaction, a pool of commonly accepted norms regarding political behavior and a commitment to the political behavior patterns legitimized by these norms." (P. 3) Seven indicators, each described as scores, are proposed: legitimacy, extraconstitutional behavior, political violence, secessionist demand, alignment pattern, bureaucratic ethos, and authority. How these seven scores are to be validly and reliably obtained across diverse political systems is left to others. Suggestions of some phenomena to be examined in measuring political integration are offered, and in the cases of legitimacy and bureaucratic ethos, "attitude survey research" is recommended.

The problem of political integration is defined a "... one of developing a political culture and o inducing commitment to it." (P. 1) This problem is expanded in the second chapter largely in the context of engineering political integration in the new states.

Following are four chapters which scan some of the relevant and related literature in classical social theory (Marx, Weber, Durkeim, etc.) and contemporary writing on charismatic leadership (Wallerstein, Apter, Runciman and Horowitz), or elite-mass relationships (largely Shils) and on the role of unipartyism (the scholarly writings of Ashford, Coleman and Rosenberg, and the rhetoric osme single party leaders).

Ake then attempts to pull everything together in the last chapter in a section subtitled "A General Theory." The interaction between the major variables, the basic structure of the theory, is presented first. This theory can be restated: political integration is a function of a mature political culture which is a result of the broadening and intensifying of 'social communications,' which in turn is a function of social mobilization, defined as removing physical barriers between people and increasing the flow of good and services between different parts of the country. This is a statement of process, a causal net, apparently a set of linear relationships starting with social mobilization which can presumably be manipulated.

There remains an obvious difficulty with thisformulation. Too much social mobilization too quickly can lead to political instability. The problem is to maintain a minimum of political stability while political integration develops. There is also the question of "societal change." "Societal change" is cast in structural-functional language. The links between "Political Integration, Societal Change and Political Stability" (the title of this chapter), are not clearly established; but perhaps all that was intended was to express that a theory of political integration must be a process theory.

All this is not new. Major questions remain, such as under what conditions can social mobilization and thus political integration take placewithout creating political instability? Ake focuses on only one set of conditions, the political leadership factor: "Our theory is that the political system undertaking social mobilization maximizes its capacity for carrying out the process and remaining stable despite the potentially disruptive short-run effects of social mobilization if it is authoritarian [the government is large, concentrated and easily mobilized and willing to use powerl, paternal [dominated by a political class willing and ■able to lead], 'identific' [mutual identity between the political class and the governed], and consensual [the solidarity of the political class and no threatening counter-elite]. Ake states that if any one of these "either-or" characteristics of the deadership of a political system is lacking, and if there are no "functionally compensating factors," then the chances of political stability in the face of social mobilization are decreased.

This theory is then briefly tested against "historical experience," the highlights of five cases—the United States (the Federalists), the Soviet Union (Stalinist period), Yugoslavia (Tito), Cuba (Castro), and Nigeria.

Scientists can rely on either of two standards to discipline their verbal theorizing: structured data or formalized statement. This is a verbal statenent of theory, drawn in large part from the literature on political integration. If the relationships between the variables were formalized, perhaps with differential or different equations, account sould have been taken of the process of interacion between the variables over time and precise expression given to the points of interaction where political instability (dis-equilibrium or decay) vould occur. If these relationships were scrutinized with systematic data, then measures, not uggestions of them, would have been provided and perhaps some of the conventional ideas on political integration would have been modified to oring together what is happening in the world vith what political scientists are currently thinkng.—Henry Teune, University of Pennsylvania.

The Political and Social Ideas of St. Augustine.
By Herbert A. Denne. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1966, Pp. xix, 356, $2.45.)

St. Augustine was not—as Professor Deane says—a "system builder," and not even primarily a heologian. He was an exhorter of and spokesman or the Western church. Thus, most of his writings rere occasional pieces, sermons, and polemics—ather than finished treatises. The great single works—such as The City of God, Confessions, and On Freedom of the Will are a small part of he whole corpus of his writing. For the student of colitical thought they offer, furthermore, not only limited sampling of Augustine's thought, but an adirect route to his social and political ideas.

One announced purpose of this book is to bring better in a single volume most of the important assages in which Augustine discusses human nature, society, and the state. This purpose seems a seful one. And the passages—numerous and hany of them quoted at length—help to complete and balance the perspective that students of political thought are likely to gain by reading, typially, parts of The City of God and commentaries pon Augustine. In particular, the wide range of quotations provides a counterpart or complement to the mystical and other-earthly aspects of Augustine's thought by illustrating many of the subtleties and tensions in his thought as well as providing some glimpses of his practicality and shrewdness.

The author also discusses Augustine's views of social and political life. These views he characterizes as a "pessimistic realism" about man and society and a "profound awareness of the inevitable limitations of a coercive political order." In broad tendency, this interpretation of Augustine is a familiar one. Its elements are to be found, for example, in Marsiglio of Padua, in Martin Luther, and, recently, in the neo-orthodoxy of Reinhold Niebuhr (Cf., Christian Realism and Political Problems.) The author's contribution does not lie, then, in presenting a novel interpretation of Augustine. He attempts to "organize the material" and "elucidate the general point of view," that supports this particular interpretation. To the author's credit, he does not attempt to import more organization or system into Augustine's thought than he believes there to be. He does not get entrapped by the layers of glosses upon Augustine. And he does not attempt to read into Augustine the wisdom of other or more recent theologians.

The book is primarily intended, the author states, to fill a student need. Scholars and teachers will probably find little that is new to them. Chapter Five—"War and Relations Among States" is of contemporary interest, in this age of "power politics" and "Christian Realism." Chapter Six, "Church, State, and Heresy," is also valuable, showing the complexity of Augustinian doctrine on these subjects.

The author's treatment of Augustine raises a perplexing issue of who is best suited to interpret the political theory of a religious figure: the political scientist or the theologian. Professor Deane attempts an organized and substantially independent treatment of Augustine's political theory. While he goes at length into Augustine's theology, he also separated politics and theology, which is appropriate for him to do as a political scientist. At the same time, Augustine's "political theory" loses that quality of being suffused with theology and dominated by a theological perspective that it has when expcunded by a theologian-for instance, Reinhold Niebuhr. Is the political theory, as a consequence, interpreted more faithfully, or less so? In fairness, it seems an open question, Fr. Figgis's familiar account of Augustine provides a good example of the ways in which theological persuasion can blur political concepts. On the other hand, Professor Deane seems in danger of unduly secularizing Augustine's treatment of politics. He is caught and fascinated, for instance, by the similarities between St. Augustine and Thomas Hobbes, (Hobbes, and not Luther?). Yet are they alike? For Hobbes, there is neither sin nor redemption. And for him, pessimism and realism are not the ground for resignation but for a progressive, secular order than Augustine would have condemned. The political theory of a great church figure is, at best, likely to be treacherous ground for most political scientists, even when negotiated (as here) without major mishap.

Unfortunately, Augustine's lack of system is matched to an extent by a lack of system and economical exposition on the part of the author. The text is wordy. The exposition detours at many points, is hard to follow, and seldom ends with a definite conclusion or summation. Since the present book is a paperback reissue of an earlier edition, an opportunity for editing was lost.—David G. Smith, Swarthmore College.

Private Politics: A Study of Five Political Outlooks. By A. F. Davies. (Carlton: Melbourne University Press 1966. Pp ix, 267. $13.50.)

This book, like Robert Lane's Political Ideology, is based on information gathered through lengthy psychoanalytical interviews. The similarity, however, ends there, for Davies is interested in the internal "thought system" of individuals as they develop outlooks concerning politics. To obtain his information he interviewed five "second drawer politicos" in Australia. This focus is a crucial flaw in the usefulness of the work for political scientists. There is virtually nothing here about the linkage between this "thought system" and the political system in general (or any subsystem in specific), yet this question of linkage is precisely the problem that troubles so many studies of personality and politics.

In all fairness it should be pointed out that the author did not attempt to discuss the questions of linkage; he is not being criticized for a poor job, or even for doing the wrong job. The point is that the author's focus makes the book more useful in psychology than political science. It is more a work of politics in personality than of personality in politics. A political scientist might well ask himself if a book titled Private Religion: A Stude of Five Outlooks might not contain as much ir formation relevant to the general political system

The book is based on interviews with a part organizer, a town planner, a state MP, a publi servant, and a union lawyer. The total time sper interviewing each respondent varied from twelv to thirty hours and was spread over three to fou months. The interviewing was conducted some time after the 1956 Suez crisis (no question sampled reeactions to the event), and the study wa first published as a multilithed edition in 1961 This explains why the book does not draw from Lane and more recent works. The author find that political theories (or "thought systems" abou politics) are integrally tied to personality. Their development is a creative process (similar to the process that led to the theories of the great politi cal writers, though surely a more crude one) guided by the need of the individual to cope with and build armor against his personal world.

How should material gathered from intensive and lengthy interviews be presented? The author chooses to present each respondent's views in a separate chapter, with one concluding chapter Each chapter begins with a section of almost "raw" data from the interviews, followed by a discussion section. After examining this book I am convinced that an author must be responsible for reorganizing and editing material gathered in such studies. There is, however, a dilemma. In a psychological study, the flavor and tone of the responses can be quite important; one risks losing this in any editing.

A glance at this book reveals that it is somewhat out of date, has problems of organization, and does little to really unite the study of psychology and politics. We certainly have not adequately tapped the fund of knowledge in our sister discipline of psychology, but we are not likely to do so fruitfully unless we focus on the connecting links. I wish I could end by saying that a fine index allows the reader to draw these connections for himself through careful digging, but I cannot. There is no index.—Karl Braithwaite, Duke University.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Every Second Year: Congressional Behavior and the Two-Year Term. By Charles O. Jones. (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1967. Pp. ix, 118. $6.00, cloth; $2.25, paper.)

One of the standard proposals for altering the American Congress, the four-year term for Members of the House enjoyed a brief revival during the first three months of 1966. This time there was no lack of interest in the idea, nor were Representatives slow to see its advantages to them. The proposal faltered not so much on its substantive merits as on its controversial (and previously unexamined) political consequences—particularly if the terms were to run concurrently with the Presidential term.

One product of the debate is Charles O. Jones'

study, prepared for the Brookings Institution. This brief, tightly written volume presents a thorough review of the pros and cons, along with an inquiry into the possible electoral and policy consequences of longer House terms. Jones has been mindful of the political dimensions of the issue and has avoided the temptations of viewing it through the lenses of a priori standards.

Jones concludes from his examination that no change should now be made in the Congressional term. He appears to believe (as does the reviewer) that, while the four-year term raises fundamental political issues, on other grounds it fails to qualify as a truly fundamental reform. The adverse effects of the present two-year term, as he demonstrates, are by no means obvious. Where effects can be identified at all, they may be welcomed by some and deplored by others. As Jones wisely observes, "One man's problem may be another man's principle." (p. 99) Finally, technical -drawbacks plague some four-year-term proposals -particularly former Representative Frank Chelf's staggered-term version.

Jones' study represents precisely the kind of evaluative, policy-oriented inquiry which should rank high on the agenda of contemporary political science. Political evaluation need not imply a reversion to polemicism or the delineation of academic prejudices—vices which have plagued much traditional writing about Congress. The problems of conventional reformist writing was not, however, that it was reformist; but that its premises were too often unexamined (or unstated) and its arguments too often unresearched. Policy science, as we understand it, must be explicit, systematic, and empirically grounded.

Jones has met these criteria, and in doing so has endered a valuable service to political scientists and citizens interested in the future of our national legislature. He has enumerated the probems to which the four-year term is presumably addressed, inquired into the actual effects of ength-of-term on legislative performance, and dentified alternative values which are brought nto play.

On very many matters, however, empirical mowledge simply fails as yet to permit confident specification of the "problems" of Congress, much ess speculation upon the effects of proposed shanges. Jones has acknowledged this dilemma and has struggled valiantly to cope with it.

For example, longer terms are advocated by some to attract more "qualified" candidates. Yet, so Jones points out, little is known about historial changes in the "qualifications" of Congressmen much less unsuccessful contenders). Others argue plausibly that longer terms will reduce spiralling ampaign costs, but here again knowledge is far rom adequate. Still others maintain that the constant campaigning necessitated by brief terms promotes parochialism and errand-boyism, at the expense of lawmaking. Only recently have we gleaned some insights into the role perceptions and work habits of legislators, but much remains to be learned. Despite decades of careful and often productive research, the knowledge gap remains embarrassingly wide.

Thus, many of Jones' conclusions reveal a necessary tentativeness. Among the new data introduced in the study are results of roundtable conferences of Members. While useful for identifying some of the Members' attitudes and providing interesting quotes, this research technique demands a biased sample and thus yields few findings concerning the distribution of attitudes within the House. A mail questionnaire designed to compensate for this drawback revealed that "... [A]s of 1966, there was very little enthusiasm for a change" (p. 107): none of the various four-year-term proposals was supported by even a simple majority of the sample.

The author and the Brookings Institution have reminded political scientists of the increasingly relevant function of political evaluation and criticism. They have also reminded us, and equally usefully, of the unfinished empirical tasks which confront the discipline.—ROGER H. DAVIDSON, University of California, Santa Barbara.

Contracting For Atoms. By HAROLD ORLANS. (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1967. Pp. xvii, 242. $6.00.)

The research and development contract may one day be recognized as having social implications as significant as that legal structure we know as the corporation. Some critics have suggested it as one way in which private business has preempted governmental decision-making. Others have suggested that the effect is just the reverse. Defenders have argued that the R & D contract is a way to maintain the vigor of private enterprise in our technological society, and others have suggested that it is the only way for government to remain flexible and responsive to social needs in a technological age. Polemical evidence is available to support each of these positions; what is needed is clarification of the sort that Orlans provides.

Given the labyrinthine nature of our technological society, and the struggling state of social science theory, case studies such as Contracting For Atoms are of great value to political science. Orlans' study of AEC policy consists of a detailed inquiry into the activities of an agency that is little more than an administrator of R & D contracts. It is an agency with a $2.5 billion budget in which only 7000 of 120,000 people working in its facilities are directly on its payroll. The AEC, among other things, sponsors basic research, makes weapons, promotes and governs the nuclear industry, develops new technologies, and does substantially all of this through contracts with "private" industry, universities, and non-profits. This study documents the erosion of that distinction between public and private which Don Price has discussed in more general terms.

As Orlans states it, "The contract is, of course, legally necessary to define the conditions under which public funds may be paid to private persons for a designated purpose, but the document itself is more useful in the event of litigation than in the practical course of day-to-day relations between contractor and government personnel. In a 'hands off' buyer-seller relationship, all of the terms that are necessary to the satisfactory completion of a contractual obligation may, perhaps, be put down on paper . . . But the most significant aspects of research, development, and managerial contracts are precisely those that cannot be satisfactorily reduced to writing. For they involve the quality of effort made to reach not a precise target but goals that must be continually readjusted by mutual agreement; and-beyond gross and obvious limits-the balance of initiative and responsibility, of freedom and control, that should lie in public and private hands is also a shifting one that must be worked out individually for each major contract." (p. 128)

Due in large part to the role universities and university scientists played in the birth of the nuclear age, nearly two-thirds of AEC funds go to universities or non-profits for research or for operating federally owned laboratories. Given the nature of the R & D contract it is not surprising that the AEC has continued to use the same contractors. Two decades after its creation, however, AEC policies are increasingly being questioned. One important reason for this is that the AEC is exhausting its original mission. Another reason is the growing private nuclear industry, interested in the ever-larger profits which loom on the horizon. Orlans investigates in detail the conflicting pressures that have developed with respect to AEC policies.

The first section of the study is concerned with the policy issues faced by the AEC. Of major importance are questions concerning: the choice of operating contractors, the interaction of public and private sectors, the relationship of universities to big science facilities, the role of the AEC's multi-program laboratories, and the growing problems of contract administration as AEC activities and budgets stabilize. These questions are of central concern to the major interest groups which Orlans then investigates. The interest groups are: The Commission, The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, The Department of Defense, The Scientists, and Industry. In examining the roles and political styles of those interest groups, the author trace the policy-making process with skill and precision

For those interested in the development and operations of a social system and the rules it designto achieve effective accommodations among rathe divergent political interests, this study has greavalue. For those, like this reviewer, who are im pressed with the difficulty of making effective po icy within the discrete functional segments c technological society, the book is of even greate worth. The problem which faces those making num clear policy is not their inability to accommodat immediate political interests, but the question c how nuclear policy relates to broader public policy issues. Nuclear policy originally evolved around set of technical skills and essentially technical goals. The fundamental question is what happen when these goals are achieved and/or decline i. importance? As Orlans sees it, one specific question in this connection has to do with the futurrole of the major AEC laboratories. They can probably not be dismantled. Should they be fo cused on new social problems? If so, if at all, how can it be done? Another question has to do wit' the role of the AEC in the support of high energy physics. In some senses support for the latter ha been the activity which has filled the vacuum lef by the achievement of other missions. This partic ular development has major implications for the broader questions of how basic research supporshould be allocated and organized. Several or these issues are lucidly presented in the latter parof the study.

At a time when many political scientists are showing a growing concern for policy-oriented studies, this book provides a particularly able ex ample of one type of work which enhances this new perspective.—Don E. Kash, Purdue University.

The American Far Right: A Case Study of Bills James Hargis and Christian Crusade. By John H. Redekop. (Grand Rapids: William B. Eerd mans, 1968. Pp. 232. $4.50.)

A major weakness of the social movement caller "the extreme right" is its inability to persuade se rious men to take its ideas seriously. This reviewe can recall few instances in which the ideologies philosophies or programmatic pronouncements o individuals connected to the John Birch Society We, The People or the various Christian Crusade have been treated as anything but political lunacy by observers not committed to the goals of thesorganizations.

In The American Far Right, John H. Redeko; very nearly accomplishes that which may actuall; be impossible: the analysis of the ideas of Bill; James Hargis as if they emanated from a minwhich had mastered the processes of logica-thought or was, at the very least, sensitive to a complex reality. But Hargis' commitment to a peculiarly American version of Christian fundamentalism, untarnished (unlike Billy Graham) by any other intellectual or emotional experience, makes most of his political ideas and opinions sound as mean-spirited and simple-minded, if more traditionally based, as those of Ayn Rand.

As Professor Redekop makes most clear, by the use of extensive quotations, Hargis' vision of a "Christian Conservative" America is not distinguished by any notable respect for facts, logic or —surprising in a persistent traditionalist—history. So, the leader of the Christian Crusade, (legally, Christian Echoes Ministry, Inc.) indicts himself by such fatuities as: "with all United Nations Internationalists, the thought of religion is repugnant"; "it does not make the slightest difference what nine political experts who are called Supreme Justices [sic] say"; "The FCC is actually a gang of federal outlaws, operating with impunity inside the invisible machinery of the Kennedy dictatorship."

While presenting literally hundreds of similar insults to the intelligence, called from who-knows-how-many thousands in his files, Professor Redekop is able to keep his balance almost completely, as he traces the sources of "Hargisism" to Christian fundamentalism, militant Americanism and to various of the troubles of our time, and places his subject in the Christian, conservative and extremist traditions in America.

Men of Hargis' views would have felt very much at home in the nineteenth century, fighting reform even then, but confident in the backing of a huge portion of the population. As the values and expectations of Americans have changed, Hargis has not. The dialectic of "propertarianism," buttressed by a supportive Protestantism, no longer serves so well as before. But the old songs are still sung by some, though with a new pessimism.

In the end, unfortunately, the author fails to justify his conclusion that ". . . Hargis is a believer with an understandable creed fighting a very real foe ... [carrying] on the battle in good faith." I do not doubt that he is a believer and that his foe (Communism) is very real but one can wonder whether the overheated and over-propagandized domestic crusade is evidence of good faith or a "good thing." (Since he is an ardent pro-capitalist, perhaps one ought not object to the Crusade's purchase of a $44,000 home, complete with servants, and two new autos, the cheaper one a Lincoln, for the traveling evangelist.) More important, and explicit in other portions of Redekop's analysis, is that Hargis does not, and perhaps cannot, distinguish between empirical reality and his personal, but hardly exclusive, fantasies. Hargis' Manichean and conspiritorial world-view leaves no room for any awareness of the conditions and causes, secular or theological, which motivate men to beliefs or behavior displeasing to him and, he will surely insist, to his God.

The author has done his homework well, intelligently interpolating material from diverse sources, and he deserves much credit for his willingness to peruse reams of the dullest polemics imaginable without public protest. Although his own lack of sympathy with Hargis' crusade and the ideas which motivate it is apparent, the utter fairness of Redekop's analysis must be commended.

The volume would have been more valuable had the author attempted to explain Hargis' relative success at a "trade" whose practitioners are never in short supply. In addition, the reader may wonder just what kind of people are so clearly, if willingly, victimized when Hargis passes the hat, and whether his audiences are loyal over time or replenishing.

Although The American Far Right (an exaggerated title) is not quite definitive in its analysis of Hargis, I would not suggest that anyone else undertake the task. Although the sources of and stimuli to radical right behavior warrant continued examination, the intellectual quality of the beliefs of the leaders of the movement do not merit the skilled effort so heroically expended by Professor Redekop. To the left of Galbraith and Moynihan are Harrington and Marcuse; to the right of Friedman and Burnham is a swamp.—ROBERT A. SCHOENBERGER, The University of Michigan.

Trial Courts in Urban Politics: State Court Policy Impact and Functions in a Local Political System. By Kenneth M. Dolbeare. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 1967. pp. xi, 137. $6.95.)

Basing his study on a functional analysis of the operation and policy-related outputs of the trial courts of a county of over 1,000,000 residents near New York City, encompassing varied governmental structures, and reflecting the pressures of rapid urbanization, Professor Dolbeare argues "that trial courts are significant in various ways so that their analysis is vital to full understanding of the judicial process and to an accurate conception of a local political system" (page 8). He demonstrates that the impact of trial court decisionsunlike those found at the appellate level-is "narrow, specialized, . . . distinctively individualistic" (page 104) and, oftentimes, final. These decisions are conditioned by the recruitment process—here. a judgeship is a reward for loyal party serviceand by the role conceptions held by trial court judges as well as by rules governing access to the courts and by the substantive law with its bias toward private property. The decisions influence the political process interstitially by providing a delaying or veto role, denying particular policy alternatives but not compelling positive plans of action. Courts, however, have substantial impact in the field of zoning and land use, areas of grave urban concern where progressive programs are needed. "The problems of the cities require dramatic and innovative responses in which the general interest is projected into the future, but these are just the kinds of public action which are likely to receive the coldest response when challenged in court by those whose economic interests are best served by the status quo" (pages 127-128).

The courts staffed by dominant community interests, are most likely to be used by those who are more politically isolated in this system. These are suburban homeowners and businessmen, motivated by the drives of status-seeking and the desire to maximize private profit. Dolbeare calls this "the little man's means of veto and assertion of property rights within the local community" (page 118). These litigants find solace in the easily accessible trial courts whose judges are sympathetic to their aims and for whom the substantive law is favorable. Therefore, these courts perform an "economic rights" function by which the discredited doctrine of substantive due process is effectively enforced at this level against local decision-makers.

Another major function which the courts perform is that of insuring procedural fairness in the political process. Although this benefits minorities—for example, Dolbeare found this to be an asset to the developing county Democratic Party, some benefit more than others and these beneficiaries are most often defenders of the economic status quo who are asserting "minority" claims within the political process. A third function of the trial courts is to referee the allocation of powers among other governmental structures—E. "natural" function of the courts in the American political context.

The fact that urban trial courts are defenders of the status quo in areas where forward-looking policies are needed augers poorly for evaluation of the courts as instruments of change. Their import for urban politics suggests that urban decision-makers must circumvent the courts, perhaps by relying on other levels of government to help solve their problems, thereby minimizing the role of this level of courts while also forfeiting a measure of urban autonomy. Likewise, the relative independence of the courts in most fields makes their relationship with appellate courts essentially non-hierarchial and "voluntary" in nature thus precluding here a possible source of restraining influence.

Dolbeare's effort to integrate court structure and functions into a working concept of the local political system is theoretically refreshing in a field where there is a relatively small, but growing, body of research. His methodological contribution lies in careful and creative application and extension of tried methods. His research was extensive, covering a sixteen-year period, and utilizing many data sources—especially the outputs of the trial courts in question. His analysis is rigorous; his interpretations apply the empirical findings to the larger questions at hand.

Dolbeare may, however, be criticized on several points. First, it is unclear if the conclusions drawn here from an essentially suburban-oriented political culture are also applicable for the center-city portions of large urban areas as Dolbeare suggests. He attempts to meet this by stating that he has isolated general functions which are probably similar in form but perhaps not in substance; however, at some point, substance defines form. Likewise, attempts to apply the findings deduced here to a larger political system can be brought into question on similar grounds; at what point are these data reflective of a specialized political culture, distinctive political rules, and the vagaries of a specific recruitment process.

Overall, the book is a worthwhile addition to work on judicial process and its relations with urban politics. Its focus probably makes it of greater interest to a student of judicial politics than to a student of urban affairs; however, it is to be commended as a scholarly endeavor of significant importance.—IRVIN H. BROMALL, Ohio University.

The Democrats And Labor In Rhode Island, 1952–1962: Changes In the Old Alliance. By JAY S. GOODMAN. (Providence: Brown University Press, 1967. Pp. xi, 154. $5.00.)

Readers who pick up this volume expecting either a systematic case study or a detailed historical account of relations between a political party and an interest group will be disappointed with the results of Jay S. Goodman's treatment of the Democratic party and organized labor in Rhode Island between 1952 and 1962.

Goodman's objective is to test or rather to argue the hypothesis that the relationship between the Democratic party and organized labor in Rhode Island has undergone a fundamental change in the direction of lessened labor influence. Three corollary propositions are: (1) major elements in the party have come to feel that they can achieve their goals without depending upon labor's support; (2) organized labor has become dissatisfied with the prospects of obtaining what it wants through the party; (3) labor has sought to establish its independence from the old, automatic alliance (pp. 12–13).

The author's major source of data—besides the public record—are interviews with 27 labor executive board members, 15 rank-and-file Democratic state legislators, 15 "labor" legislators (those who "obtained a livelihood from blue-collar work, held union office, or listed membership in a union"). 7. legislative leaders, 3 labor executives and 2 former Governors of Rhode Island. Goodman examines the "perceptions" of these respondents by asking basically similar fixed-alternative questions about labor's political activities, the "effectiveness" of these activities, the "satisfactoriness" of the relationship between Democrats and labor within the party, and any changes over the decade in the latter three areas. He accepts "expressed dissatisfaction," "perceived conflict," and, more generally, differences in perceptions of "political reality" between labor and party members as evidence supporting his hypothesis.

Goodman proceeds in straightforward fashion (1) to summarize, year-by-year, the public record, and (2) to summarize his interviews—sometimes in tabular form, more often in narrative style—with the various participants. In his final chapter, he concludes that his hypothesis and its corollaries have been supported by the data, adds a few more years to his account of Rhode Island politics, and then speculates about labor-Democratic party relations on the national level.

There are many difficulties with this effort. Perhaps the most important is the absence of a theoretical or operational definition of "influence." All the reader has before him are statements by some (and by no means all) respondents that labor's "influence" was greater before 1958 than after. (Of course, Goodman assumes that some respondents' perceptions are more accurate than others, and thus is able to dismiss contradictory evidence.) One does not even know, however, if all respondents interpreted "influence" in the same way.

Goodman does not clearly define the dimensions of the "relationship" between the Democratic party and organized labor which are significant in terms of labor's "influence." One result of this is that the chapters presenting the interview data are rather disjointed affairs in which responses about labor's electioneering activities are put side-by-side with data about perceptions of labor-party relations in Rhode Island and no effort is made to connect the two in a meaningful way.

This lack of theoretical clarity seems strange in light of Goodman's promising discussion of aspects of Truman's group theory (especially the variables related to a group's "external influence"), Eldersveld's "stratarchy," and Dahl and Lindblom's "bargaining process." Unfortunately, the "framework" of which these are parts disappeared entirely after page 12.

Goodman presents his interviews in sufficient detail, although he has the bothersome habit of presenting only raw figures in his tables and then using percentages in the text. Moreover, his data is suspect because he never confronts the problem of recall. Why should a labor leader or a state legislator interviewed in 1965 accurately recall what hapened in 1962, much less a decade before that?

Despite all this, Goodman's book makes a substantial contribution to the study of state politics. He has some of the best material to be found on the relationship in a state legislature between the rank-and-file on the one hand and the party leadership (including the Governor) and interest groups on the other. His data support the notion that a legislative role predominates over an interest group role. Chapter IV should be read closely by all students of the legislative process.—Vernon M. Goetcheus, Columbia College.

Knowledge and Power: Essays on Science and Government. Ed. by Sanford A. Lakoff. (New York: The Free Press, 1966. Pp. x, 502. $10.95.)

Just during the last fifteen years, as a result primarily of social and political pressures and not of basic intellectual innovations, there has emerged in the United States a new specialty in the field of political science, the study of the politics of science. Like all other specialized sciences and disciplines, this one has no absolute beginning to its history: did not Plato and Aristotle discuss the problem of the social and political role of the "wise" man, the proto-scientists? Or, to mention only one more among a multitude of precursors, more recently, in the 1930's, did not the British "scientific humanist," J. D. Bernal, discuss "Science as Power"? The political role of knowledge and science has always been important enough to have received some attention from political scientists and their prototypes.

But the history of the politics of science presents a notable turning-point with the publication in 1954 of Government and Science by Don Price, to whom the anthology under review is most appropriately dedicated. His was the first book devoted entirely, seriously, and systematically to the analysis of the politics of science. It was the first book in the field by a trained, professional political scientist. And it was the first book that tried to be primarily scientific rather than ideological.

Since 1954, rather slowly for a few years, and more rapidly since Sputnik, the field has been taking on the full set of characteristics of an academic specialty. Price has set up and directed the productive efforts of the Science and Public Policy Seminar at Harvard. A variety of somewhat similar academic efforts have been started elsewhere: at last count, there were at least forty different colleges and universities where anything from a course to a program in the politics of science was offered. [Like much else of contemporary social and political science, this field has been predominantly an American development. Recently, when the Committee of Experts of the O.E.C.D. gave their evaluation of science policy in the United States, they explicitly stated that here, as nowhere else, their views could be almost entirely based on the existing American science policy studies.]

In addition to courses and programs, this field now has its full-time specialists and "authorities." Price, of course, is pre-eminent, and his second book, The Scientific Estate (1965), is an important contribution to general political science. Sanford Lakoff, the editor of the volume under review, was trained by Price and is now a mature full-time worker in this vineyard. So also is Robert Gilpin, who has written American Scientists and Nuclear Weapons Policy (1962), co-edited (with Christopher Wright) the valuable collection of essays, Scientists and National Policy Making (1964), and whose new book France in the Age of the Scientific State, is just published (1968). Some other professional specialists in the field are Bruce L. R. Smith (The Rand Corporation, 1966), Eugene B. Skolnikoff (Science, Technology, and American Foreign Policy, 1967), and Harold Orlans (Contracting for Atoms, 1967). Besides the academic specialists, there have been major efforts by such civil servants and scientists as James L. McCamy (Science and Public Administration, 1960) and Alvin Weinberg (Reflections on Big Science, 1967). Beyond books, there have been important contributions in one or more essays by professional political scientists like Robert Wood, Wallace Sayre, Warner Schilling, and Bernard Brodie and by others such as Albert Wohlstetter, Harvey Brooks, Robert Kreidler, and McGeorge Bundy. Finally, the field has been most fortunate in having a brilliant journalist specializing in it, Daniel S. Greenberg of SCIENCE, whose weekly reports are indispensable, and whose recent book The Politics of Pure Science (1967), gives him a valid claim to be counted a peer among the professional political scientists.

Altogether, then, the existing corpus of work in the politics of science is now impressive both in its quality and quantity. Only one important feature of the "newer" political science seems to be missing: systematic survey research data, either specially collected for the purpose or brought under "secondary analysis" when collected for other purposes. So far, nearly all of the work in this field has been of the "case history" type, with important admixtures of census-type statistical data. As the field matures further, as it takes its initiative more from its own autonomous intellectual base and less from the pressures of political events and exigencies, then it will formulate its own hypotheses and collect its own survey data to these those hypotheses.

The reader that Sanford Lakoff has put together represents fairly well what this new field is like. His own introductory essay, "The Third Culture," is a survey of "science in social thought" from Bacon to Bagehot. Part 1 includes "cases and controversies" on the trial of Robert Oppenheimer (by Lakoff), on the Mohole fiasco (by Daniel Greenberg, though this version is analytically not nearly so good as the one in his book cite above), on the nuclear test ban treaty (by Cecil H. Uvehara), on the establishment of NASA (by Enid Curtis Bok Schoettle, in what is really a small monograph that deserved separate publication as a book), on Comsat (by Roger Kvam), and on smoking and health (by Stanley Reiser). Part 2 is on the governing of science and includes a profile of the President's Scientific Advisory Committee (by Carl William Fischer), a discussion of scientific advice for Congress (by Eilene Galloway), and an overview on the place of the scientific establishment in a pluralistic American political structure (by Lakoff). Finally, Part 3 moves a little away from the earlier professionalism of the collection and offers Alan T. Waterman on federal support of science, Alvin Weinberg on criteria for scientific choice, McGeorge Bundy on the role of the scientist in forming national policy, Harvey Brooks on the needs for support of basic research, and Philip H. Abelson, in an upbeat, ideological statement chiefly on "science in the service of society."

Specialists in this field might have made different selections that did Lakoff, they might have included more of the "classics," but Lakoff's choice will serve any political scientist well who wishes to introduce himself or his students to this field which is now of considerable intellectual as well as policy interest. And the politics of science specialists will be grateful for the several solid pieces of work which are published here for the first time. A number of these are products of Price's Harvard Seminar.—Bernard Barber, Barnard College, Columbia University.

Congress and the Constitution: A Study of Responsibility. Donald G. Morgan. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1966). Pp. xv, 465. $8.95.)

This volume can be approached from three aspects: first, in terms of the problem the author is concerned with and his convictions on that topic. Second, in terms of a research project presenting his data and the conclusions derived from them. And, third, his prescriptions of reforms to deal with the problem. Although his informed concern and detailed scholarship are evident throughout, he is not equally successful with all three aspects of his work.

His main thesis, which he presents with vigor and conviction, is that in the modern world considerations of policy and constitutionality have been divorced; they are now considered distinct topics to be dealt with by separate branches of government. As technical questions, matters of constitutionality are supposed to fall within the province of specialists possessing expert training and operating under special procedures. (Or in other words, the judiciary.) Congress, lacking these qualifications and procedures is supposed to deal with questions of policy, but in matters of constitutionality should defer to the pronouncements of the courts.

Vigorously attacking this "judicial monopoly" position, Morgan argues persuasively for a "tripartite theory" of responsibility for the consideration of constitutional questions. Congress, like the other two branches, will inevitably confront such questions in the normal course of their duty and must not, in Morgan's view, eschew such a confrontation as a matter of basic responsibility. Congress also brings to such deliberations some advantages which the courts lack, such as greater ability to reflect and, perhaps, create a community consensus, the basic for compliance with and acceptance of constitutional settlements. There are also issues which because of their special character (so-called "political questions") may never reach the courts and where congressional pronouncements have an air of finality.

Morgan contends there is an increased willingness in Congress to defer to the courts-to embrace the "judicial monopoly" theory-with the mid-1930's representing a turning point in that direction. Here he adduces his research to support this contention. But it is at this point that he is less persuasive, although still vigorous in his assertions. He relies primarily on a series of case studies largely drawn from the written record, some of which are very tedious. They range from a 1789 controversy over the presidential removal power and the Sedition Act of 1798, to more modern issues such as the Communist Control Act of 1954 and the Civil Rights Act of 1964. But the criteria by which some controversies are included and others excluded are never made explicit. For example, why not include the still-relevant question of federal aid to church-related schools? Thus a reviewer can not be certain how representative the cases presented are as pictures of congressional consideration of constitutional questions. Particularly, if as the author contends, the 1930's are a turning point, why does he largely ignore developments between the Sherman Act of 1890 and the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935?

At times he presents data, such as the length of tenure for congressmen participating in a debate, which apparently supports a point he is making. Yet in numerous instances his point is not really clear or the data is more erratic than his conclusion suggests. At other times, he makes judgments without supplying any supporting evidence. Thus one learns (page 315) without being told how or why, that the major impetus to detached consideration of the 1964 Civil Rights Act came from Congressman Howard Smith of Virginia. Perhaps, I am too cynical or partisan, but this thought simply dazzles my mind. At other times his conclusion seems only one of a number of plausible interpretations of what happened yet these other possibilities are either ignored or given short shrift in his discussion.

The author also relies (mainly in an appendix) on a written questionnaire submitted to members of the 86th Congress, yet its usefulness is very limited. Personal interviews would have proven more informative, especially since respondents' statements could be checked against over behaveior such as voting. And a questionnaire, if submitted to a number of congresses, would have been less static in character than one used only in the 86th.

In his concluding section, Professor Morgan prescribes a set of reforms. For he is convinced that when Congress deals with constitutional issues, it is ill-equipped in terms of internal machinery, procedural rules and expert sources of advice. His reforms, such as providing more experts or occasionally relying on a national commission of inquiry, seem reasonable. But the alleged defects-haste, lack of full deliberation, and partial and partisan information-are not wholly confined to constitutional questions but may be characteristic of modern legislatures. Certainly his reforms, no matter how well intended, are not panaceas. For example, the providing of additional experts does not guarantee the absence of disagreements among the experts or prevent the skewing of their views in the direction of the views of the appointing authorities. Finally, Congress operates in a highly political context-the target of various pressures and demands -which inevitably color and influence its judgements. But this character of congressional deliberations receives, at least to this reviewer, insufficient consideration in Morgan's indictment of Congress and his prescriptions for reform.

In conclusion, Morgan's work succeeds more on the level of a polemic from a concerned and dedicated scholar than it does as a piece of empirical research. And for the reader the volume is, perhaps, overly long and at times, somewhat tedious.

—Dale Vinyard, Wayne State University.

The Politics of Provincialism: The Democratic Party in Transition, 1918-1932. By David Burner. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968. Pp. xiii, Pp. 293. $6.95.)

Those who read the Historical Methods News-letter or other internal channels of communication realize that history is becoming more behavioral.

David Burner's study of the Democratic party is primarily old style historiography, but it does contain one example of what the new research may be able to contribute.

For most of his book Burner uses standard sources, primarily newspapers, magazines, memoirs, and collections of private papers from the era, in a conventional manner. He develops a "theme," namely that the 1918-1932 Democrats were "provincial." Their provincialism, in Burner's view, consisted in the determination of two contending internal factions to emphasize the differences in their values rather than to seek a unifying set of national goals. The native, rural, dry Protestants led by McAdoo and the immigrant, urban, wet Catholics led by Smith chose to fight each other, demonstrating "provincial" behavior. Burner's format is largely descriptive and chronological. He traces the origin of each faction, the temporary coalition under Wilson, the gradual disintegration of the early 1920's, the disastrous 1924 Convention and election, Roosevelt's subsequent efforts to build a national party apparatus, and the 1928 Smith campaign.

The descriptive chapters suffer from two difficulties. First, there is an absence of conceptualization about parties, voting, or elections. Although Burner's footnotes and bibliography indicate familiarity with the political science literature on these subjects, he makes minimal use of it. Things just happen; events roll on. Burner lacks the theoretical sophistication of the superb original essays on historical party development in the Chambers and Burnham volume, The American Party Systems. Where individual voting choices are concerned, Burner is literary, observing that (p. 222) his "... inquiry must be tentative, for in the final analysis the motives of an electorate are hidden-perhaps even from itself." He does not even treat Republican victories in the widely familiar framework of maintaining elections.

Second, Burner is reluctant to use hard data in his chronological sections. In a very thorough description of the values of each faction, he does not indicate adequately what offices in what states each side held. His long chapter on the 1924 Convention omits analysis of the roll call votes except for a table showing simple counts of candidate strengths on different ballots. Burner relegates to a footnote Bain's correlation analysis of the anti-Klan resolution and McAdoo's support, and quotes instead The New York Times' impressionistic report that there was some connection between the two. He does not utilize previous quantitative analyses of sectional voting at that convention or produce his own.

There are, however, several chapters where Burner departs from his descriptive approach. In Chapter Six he analyzes the behavior of the Congressional wing of the Democratic party; in Chapter Eight he introduces original data to indicate the impact of Smith's candidacy on different ethnic and religious voting blocs. In his treatment of the legislative party, Burner knows what he wants to do-show the bloc patterns of intraparty behavior. Unfortunately, his methodology is limited to taking one vote at a time. He reports and interprets individual and party behavior vote by vote rather than analyzing sets of votes in any of the accepted and widely used ways-indices of cohesion, scaling, cluster-bloc or factor analysis. Other historians, for example Thomas B. Alexander in his treatment of roll calls and sectionalism in the House between 1836 and 1860, have learned to do much better.

In Chapter Eight, Burner finally makes an original and impressive contribution. He has uncovered special welfare surveys of so-called "sanitary districts" taken during the era in New York, Chicago, and Boston. These surveys identified the ethnic compositions of the populations. Then Burner has used election districts which lay wholly within homogeneous German, Irish, Italian, Jewish, or Polish sanitary districts as a basis for analyzing group voting between 1916 and 1932. For each group, Burner is able to document a marked shift toward increased Democratic support at the election of 1928. For example, in a New York sanitary district with 85% Italian population, the 1924 Democratic vote was 48%, the 1928 Democratic vote 77%. In a predominantly Polish Chicago sanitary district, the 1924 Davis vote was 51%, the 1928 Smith vote 83%, A Chicago sanitary district with a mostly Jewish population votes 37% for Davis, 78% for Smith, Burner thus adds additional evidence to that developed earlier by Key and more recently by Pomper which suggests that the present-day Democratic party began with Al Smith, not Franklin Roosevelt.

Throughout, Burner's writing is interesting and readable. One wishes that he had devoted more effort to material such as the sanitary district data and less to the description of already well-known events.—JAY S. GOODMAN, Wheaton College, (Massachusetts).

Congressional Insurgents and the Party System, 1909-1916. By JAMES HOLT. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967. Pp. ix, 188. $5.50.)

The theme of historian Holt's book is the failure of insurgent Republicans to attain their self-defined goals in Congressional and Presidential politics because of their minority status within their own party and their hesitancy to coalesce with like-minded Democrats on a sustained basis. Mr. Holt makes his case by selecting several "struggles" in which the insurgents were involved between 1909 and 1916, including, among others, the fight to reduce Speaker Cannon's power, the Payne-Aldrich Act, the Underwood Tariff Act, and American foreign policy prior to activate entry into World War I. In each instance the author examines the insurgents' position, their justification of that position, and their relationship with the regular Republicans and the Democrats. His data consists of personal papers of principal insurgent actors, newspapers, and historical studies related to the period. In each instance the author asserts that the insurgents were divided from regular Republicans by their strong belief in the control or destruction of "trusts," in the extension of popular government (and concomitant hatred for real or imagined political machines which blocked popular government), or their noninterventionist stance on foreign policy. The insurgents were separated from Democrats, Holt argues, more by partisan identification than by ideological or issue disagreement.

Political scientists who hope that historians will do much of the work of examining relationships of factions within and among parties will be disappointed with this study for a number of reasons.

First, there is justification to be dissatisfied both with the thesis that the insurgents failed and with the explanation of why they failed. The author gives no reason why he selected the relatively few cases he used to document the insurgents' failure. It might be just as easy to choose a dozen cases to make the opposite argument. Even if they failed, the author is not successful in explaining why they failed. The insurgents' reluctance to risk their traditional Republican identification during the 1912 and 1916 presidential campaigns by joining other parties is well founded. In each instance the author documents the concern of various insurgents with giving up the loyalty and ballot box votes engendered by the Republican label in their district. However, he is less successful in using the same reasoning for explaining why the insurgents did not coalesce with Democratic congressmen on specific legislative proposals after 1912. Temporary legislative alliances would not have had such far reaching consequences as to bring about a realignment of parties and jeopardize the Republican identification of the insurgents as the author implicitly argues. In American government one does not have to cross the aisle to vote regularly with the opposition, as the records of literally dozens of congressmen attest. The insurgents may have had sufficient reason not to join the Democrats simply because the Democrats might not have been espousing the clearly identified progressive positions the author assumes they were.

Second, the study's methodology generates discontinuities in analysis. It skips from event to event, using information derived from specific personalities involved in each event. For example, the study indicates that Senator Beveridge did something on one issue for certain reasons, Senator LaFollette something else on another issue for certain reasons, and at times certain well-known insurgents voted against their usual allies. There is never an analysis of the collective whole of the insurgent group on a particular position that permits the reader to know their composition and their strength relative to other factions and parties.

Finally, the author does not clearly define the "insurgents." Who were they? What issues divided and united them? Over a wide range of issues, to what extent did they agree with Democrats and regular Republicans? Who were the "hard core" and peripheral members of the group? The author virtually neglects these questions. Obviously, rollcall analysis by identifying clusters of like-minded members of Congress on a wide range of issues could define the membership of the insurgent faction and establish the extent of their cohesiveness. This would designate the range of issues on which they were united and permit identification of this faction in the context of other factions by allowing comparisons along several dimensions. The statement, "Nevertheless the existence of a relatively cohesive insurgent faction within the Republican party in Congress between 1909 and 1916 is indisputable" (p. 2) could have been subjected to empirical test. If the author had tested his hypotheses he would have had a focus for his study. He could then have used this very rich collection of data to go beyond roll-call analysis by explaining the patterns he found, the strategy of the participants, and so on. This procedure would have transformed his relatively diffuse analysis into a focused and intriguing study which political scientists would find useful.—Delmer Dunn, The University of Georgia.

Labor and Liberty: The LaFollette Committee and the New Deal. By JEROLD S. AUERBACH. (Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company, Inc., 1966. Pp. ix, 246. $6.50.)

In view of the rapidly expanding interest, within political science, in Congressional standing committees, it seems surprising that little attention has been devoted to serious study of Congressional investigating committees. This is not to say that our literature omits mention of such investigations—how many times, after all, are we told that such investigations are seldom productive, and very often violate the personal dignity and private liberties of persons and groups subjected to scrutiny?

Jerold Auerbach, an able and articulate historian, has stepped into this void created by professional indifference and suspicion, and has produced a well-written and illuminating account of a Congressional investigation perhaps less known to contemporary students than the Kefauver or McCarthy serials but nevertheless one which may have had a more profound effect on government policy-The LaFollette Committee, Between 1936 and 1940 this committee conducted exhaustive hearings into violations of labor's civil liberties during the New Deal period. The reports of the committee, Auerbach concludes, made Congress, the Roosevelt administration and the public aware for the first time of widespread and vicious violations of civil liberties by industry and local governments. In rising to protect the civil liberties of laborers, especially in their right to organize and picket, the stage was set for the post-1940 "civil rights revolutions," as the government and society accepted their responsibility to protect citizens from state, local, and private violations of civil liberties.

Auerbach first describes the unrest and violence in industry-labor and farm-tenant relations which led to demands for a Congressional investigation. Then we view the formation of the committee, the men who composed its membership, and its labor-oriented goals. Through the committee reports, we learn of the bloody and desperate industrial warfare of the New Deal period, and of the militant anti-Communist rhetoric of business and local government (not so different from later periods). Auerbach illuminates the Marxist biases built into the committee investigations and reports by its staff, a piece of analysis which is especially interesting and valuable. Finally, Auerbach weighs the successes and failures of the LaFollette investigations.

Any major work such as this inevitably has certain problems. I have never really understood why so many scholars place such great faith in quotations. At so many points, especially in historical research and writing, theses are advanced in a highly definitive fashion and are "proved" with one intriguing quotation from a hard-to-getat paper collection. Auerbach more or less shares this definitely non-systematic approach to data collection. I can only warn that conclusions reached on the basis of such non-systematic, unspecified methods are likely candidates for scholarly coup d'etats by future researchers. One could wish Auerbach and the other historians were more humble about their supporting evidence.

Certainly the major weakness of the book is that—while the author has clearly outlined the role the LaFollete Committee played in public exposure of industrial suppression of civil liberties—Auerbach fails to prove his larger point: that agitation for labor's civil liberties was the major impetus for federal government protection of all civil liberties. While labor certainly played its part, it is important to remember Supreme Court actions in cases involving such groups as Jehovah's Witnesses or Negro college students. Auerbach barely mentions the Supreme Court, which, I think, must be considered a powerful independent variable in government's growing awareness of deprivations of civil liberties.

I hope other historians and political scientists will examine other Congressional investigating committees. The history and operation of such investigations are likely to provide rich data for our understanding of legislative behavior and of policy formation. Mr. Auerbach has done a great service in opening up this inquiry. And in so doing, he has provided an absorbing picture of the conflicts, torments, and revolutionary fervor in the New Deal years. The similarities and contrasts between New Deal political life and contemporary politics which Auerbach's book helps illuminate are especially valuable for those of us who, amazing as it may seem were born after the LaFollette Committee disbanded.—Douglas Camp Chaffey, University of Montana.

Congressional Ethics: The Conflict of Interest Issue. By ROBERT S. GETZ. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc., 1966. Pp. vi, 202. $1.95.)

The disciplinary action taken by the House and Senate against Adam Clayton Powell and Thomas Dodd help make this book timely. The author's essentially reasonable and systematic treatment of conflict of interest on Capitol Hill make it relevant. Although the work was published in 1966, an Epilogue has been added to include events through April 1967.

Professor Getz examines the few formal restraints Congress has imposed upon the conduct of its members; discusses recent efforts to increase these restraints; suggests reasons inherent in the American legislative process to explain why most additional restrictions would be inappropriate; and prescribes financial disclosure as a feasible and justifiable remedy for responding to the intense pressure currently being exerted on Congress by an outraged public.

The book's thesis can be reduced to several essential ingredients. Congress has taken pains to prevent government employees, current or retired, from using positions of public trust for private ends. Efforts to extend conflict of interest restrictions to congressional behavior have been frustrated.

This failure, says Getz, can be traced to the nature of the representative function and the character of legislative employment. The increasingly diverse economic mix of most congressional districts and a rise in the number of matters upon which a legislator may act independently have induced many congressmen to see themselves as "brokers," rather than as "delegates" or "trustees." The broker orientation, together with the community of interest the legislator shares with constituents and his own diverse economic interests, make the limitations imposed upon other government employees inappropriate to his function. It would be uncreasonable for a farmer-congressman, for example, to disqualify himself from voting on farm bills, or cefuse to serve on the Agriculture Committee, or cefrain from directing an inquiry to the Department of Agriculture on behalf of his constituents.

Moreover, the insecurity of elective office, the extraordinary expenses incurred by the office holders, and the frequency with which congressmen are retired to civilian life make post-employment restrictions on conflict of interest particularly inappropriate.

On the few occasions that each house has been forced to recognize alleged indiscretions, they have been loathe to mete out punishment. According to Getz, they have been content to permit the matter to be resolved in other ways, i.e., through election defeat, resignation, or in the courts. The au-•thor feels that, in light of recent events, the public is increasing the pressure for legislative remedies, and that some action must be taken, even if it is symbolic only. He asserts that financial disclosure =is feasible, capable of being enforced, and consistent with the nature of legislative life. He con--cedes that the proposal has been rejected deci--sively when it has been suggested, but is encour--aged by the intensity with which its advocates have supported it.

The thesis is plausible and imaginative, although some of the strands holding it together are tenuous. It is not altogether clear, for example, why "delegate" and "trustee" representational roles should be any more suitable to the application of conflict of interest restrictions than the "broker" role. While the latter denotes a somewhat different orientation toward legislative decision-making, delegates and trustees are likely to behave in precisely the same fashion as brokers in most of their dealings with the executive branch.

The author relies upon a few of the more recent works on congressional behavior to support his argument, but their findings are sometimes oversimplified. His assumptions about the rationale behind committee selection is a case in point (p. 73). His analysis of voting behavior also leaves something to be desired.

The book leans too heavily on detailed accounts of specific legislative situations, frequently giving more attention to concrete developments than the burden of the argument requires. Many are not entirely relevant and their abbreviation or relegation to the footnotes would have sharpened the presentation.

Finally, the writing is mechanical, occasionally labored, and frequently uninspired. Powell is described as "having effectively muddled the outlook on his political fate" when he returned to Bimini (p. 188), and the House is charged with having "opened up a Pandora's Box of problems" when refusing to seat the Harlem Congressman (p. 191).

Nevertheless, Congressional Ethics deals insightfully within a narrow area of inquiry and compares favorably with most accounts which attempt to prescribe the medicine of reform.—IRWIN N. GERTZOG, Yale University.

W. J. Cash: Southern Prophet: A Biography and Reader. By Joseph L. Morrison. (New York: Alfred A. Klopf, 1967. Pp. xiii, 309. $6.95.)

This biography of the great historian of the southern mind reveals the inward struggles of the man who, probably as much or more than any other American writer, has written best on the origins and development of racial and racist attitudes in the South. Perhaps Cash did not foresee the tortured racial developments to 1968 in all their detail, but since his brilliant book, The Southern Mind will no doubt be read more than ever today, his biography by Joseph L. Morrison will be much welcomed, especially since it throws considerable light on Cash's personality as a social analyst. Cash's gloom, his grief, and obsessive fears of threat and persecution, which eventually led to his suicide by hanging in Mexico, are in some ways reminiscent of Rousseau.

Morrison traces the fascinating background of the man from the cotton mill town of Gaffney who went to an "intellectual awakening" at the Baptist Wake Forest College, during the turbulent presidency of William Lewis Poteat, who taught Darwinism and was under attack throughout the South. We learn of Cash's omnivorous and insatiable reading habits, mercurial temperament, and of his perceptiveness as a Carolina reporter and contributor to the American Mercury. We are carried through the painful and extended authorship of The Mind, faithfully coddled by the sympathy and encouragement of H. L. Mencken and Alfred and Blanche Knopf, Lastly, pages are spent-too many for some-on the final days leading to his death.

The principal merit here is in clarifying that Cash's suicide was not traceable to depression over the South's future—gloomy in Cash's view. Nor was it related to public reaction to The Mind of the South, as has been asserted. On the contrary, Cash's book was well received and reviewed; perhaps the most notable exceptions to this were the Nashville Agrarians—notably John Crowe Ranson, Donald Davidson, and Allen Tate. Cash's overriding prepossession had, in fact, shifted from the gloom about the South to the German aggression and the Nazis, who in his last days, he thought were following him in Mexico. Morrison concludes that his death was due to "toxic" origins. Morrison's concerns—giving way to belabored attention—seems to be in dispelling any idea that Cash, a neurotic throughout, might have had a diseased mind throughout. His point, even though some of the details might have been in an appendix—is indeed an important one.

The most valuable part of the book is the 24 pages of Chapter VII, entitled "Perspectives." Here Cash's work is related to other writers and groups such as Thomas Wolfe, William Faulkner, James Branch Cabell, Clarence Cason, The Nashville Agrarians, The Chapel Hill Regionalists, and Gunnar Myrdal, Myrdal, by the way, was far more optimistic about the South's future than was Cash. Regrettably, only in the few pages of this chapter are the criticisms of Cash really examined: that he may have ridden his thesis too far. that he overstressed the continuity and essential unity of the southern mind, that his attention to The Southern Mind eclipsed considerations of the Negro mind, that his work is impressionistic and fails to examine areas outside of the Carolina Piedmont, such as the Gulf, the Virginia Tidewater, the East Tennessee Unionist areas, and so forth.

Nowadays, with the civil strife, and the race problem having in part moved from the southland to the great northern cities, the diversity and the contradictions in the southern mind—its very lack of homogeneity—cries out for study. It is significant when Fortune Magazine conducts a survey and finds that Negroes in the South feel, in contrast to Negroes in the North, that the whites there are genuinely trying to find answers to mutual problems, and have less hypocrisy in their efforts. Many of these modern day southern whites are not in the mainstream of Cash's The Mind, and Morrison could have done more to examine these shortcomings.

Be this as it may, Morrison appropriately says about his hero: "No professional historian with daring enough to attempt so audacious an intellectual feat had ever come forward with an analysis of the southern mind in its totality." Whatever the shortcomings of The Mind, it is a great achievement. However one may wish Professor Morrison had spent more time in a critical analysis of The Mind, this biography is indeed well done, much needed, and very necessary for a reappraisal of what The Mind missed as well as what it stimulated and achieved.

The collection of Cash's short pieces in the reader section of Morrison's book—newspaper and magazine articles, and his address at the University of Texas shortly before his death—are of value only as a supplement to Cash's great book.

Professor Morrison, who teaches journalism at the University of Carolina, has done a thorough research. He admires Cash intensely, and has produced an important and perhaps essential comparion to Cash's book. Now lacking is a critical analysis of The Mind.—David M. Abshire, George town University.

Public Management at the Bargaining Table. B. Kenneth O. Warner and Mary L. Henness: (Chicago: Public Personnel Association, 196 Pp. IXV, 490. $11.95.)

This prescription studded discussion by Warne and Hennessy is designed to appeal more to the practitioner of public personnel administration than to students of political phenomena; as such its value is limited. The currency of the appearand its timely utilitarianism have been dramatize in recent weeks by the troubled labor relations between public management and public employee across the nation.

Warner and Hennessy specify four needs mear to be served by the book: (1) To describe th "current status of employee organizations and th extent of collective bargaining"; (2) To stimulat thought and crystalize ideas among managemer personnel engaged in collective bargaining; (3) To inform public officials not yet involved of the problems of collective bargaining and some conse quences of alternative actions; and (4) To specif; necessary decisions "that must be made if effective management-employee relations are to be maintained through the process of collective bargain ing." To these ends the authors move smoothly and incisively, albeit redundantly (although the redundancy is an admitted and necessary strategy of the authors).

The book is organized in direct relationship to the several intents. Part I, the Dynamics of Col lective Bargaining, analyses definitions, explore history and current status of public employee or ganizations and bargaining in Canada as well as the United States, and presents two case studies that whet one's appetite for what follows. The hors d'oeuvres which constitute Part II are capsulated in Chapter 7 dealing with "Collective Bar gaining from Start to Finish." Covering in sequence preparation for negotiations, techniques of negotiations, and writing and implementing the agreement, the authors structure the subsequenfour chapters around occasionally disparate bu usually incisive opinions from a number of experienced labor relations spokesmen. Dissenting opinions highlight and underscore the author's attempt to disentangle the troubled morass of the public employee collective bargaining issue, but the confusion is also indicative of the growing pains being experienced in this vital area of public management. While somewhat muddled in concept, the authors deftly bring the reader through the attitudes and divergent theories of the practitioners to a fuller appreciation of the problem.

If the reader is befuddled as he emerges from Part II, he can expect to find little solace in the main course: Part II, the Future of Collective Bargaining. The problem here is magnified and personalized, the idea being that public management cannot afford to ignore the collective bargaining movement or to approach the bargaining table with reluctance or animosity. Recognizing the lack of a standardized approach to collective bargaining (other than ostrich-oriented), the authors freely speculate and prescribe. For those unaccustomed to a bargaining situation, measures short of formal negotiations are presented and discussed. To the initiated, chapters are given over to the impact of collective bargaining upon public administration generally and public personnel administration in particular. As to the latter, an interesting discourse revolves about the merit system and its relationship to collective bargaining. In a final "Memo to Management," Warner and Hennessy bring to fruition their underlying intent: a warning against any twenty-five cent panacea. The book closes with an excellent set of appendices and an annotated bibliography, both of which enhance the value of the book to the practitioner.

To those who are interested in public employee collective bargaining as a political phenomenon, the book can be a valuable resource tool and should be taken with that expectation. To the public manager, for whom the book is directly intended, its broad coverage and moderate depth are ideal as a means to isolate issues and pose alternative questions and answers. The warning against a twenty-five cent panacea is well intended to dispel the who-has-change-for-a-quarter management approach.—Donald P. Sprencel, The University of Iowa.

Economic Evaluation Of Urban Renewal: Conceptual Foundation Of Benefit-Cost Analysis.

JEROME ROTHENBERG. (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1967. Pp. xiii, 277. $6.75.)

In its first nearly twenty years of existence the federal urban renewal program has aided American cities with some $6 billion in grants for purposes of eliminating and preventing slums and blight. The political, social and economic impact of the urban renewal program has generated a relatively large volume of scholarly inquiries of varying interest to political scientists. Professor Rothenberg's study will more than likely be received by political scientists with equally varying attention.

This is clearly not a study of the politics of urban renewal. Rather, as one of a score of volumes published in the Studies of Government Finance series by the Brookings Institution, this work presents the dual thrust of a contribution to the extant literature on urban rénewal and vet another formulation in the growing literature on cost-benefit analysis. The most significant achievement of the book is to be found in the formulation of a specific cost-benefit technique by which the urban renewal program may be evaluated in welfare economic terms. In presenting his analytic method of evaluation, Rothenberg discusses at length the problems of constructing "benefit" and "cost" categories and the difficulties in obtaining comparable data to fit those categories. The author's framework for analysis represents a healthy initial contribution for those attempting to evaluate the utility of the urban renewal program when contrasted with alternative methods of renewing American cities.

This study assembles an analytic framework applicable primarily to one of many urban renewal project types—that of residential redevelopment. Rothenberg's concentration on redevelopment projects is guided by the fact that this particular type of renewal program represents the largest and earliest program emphasis of the Urban Renewal Administration. Personally, I do not share the author's sometimes too uncritical view of the residential redevelopment program. For example, at one point Rothenberg concludes,

"In sum, there is recognition that slum removal in the past has imposed undesirably heavy burdens on slum dwellers, and changes are being made to correct this. They can be pushed further within the framework of redevelopment." (p. 226)

In fact, recent federal programmatic changes, resulting at least in part from burdens imposed on slum residents, have emphasized residential rehabilitation, Model Cities, rent supplements, Turnkey projects, etc., etc. These programs depart markedly from the redevelopment projects.

Rothenberg's book is not, nor was it intended to be, for the political scientist who is looking for a compendium of data on the urban renewal program. Only one serious attempt is made by the author, in chapter 11, to numerically illustrate his method of analysis. Five completed residential redevelopment projects in Chicago are probed for data amenable to analysis under the procedure developed in the study. The author explicitly declines to claim meaningful empirical findings here, but rather attempts to indicate how the method would be applied and what problems would have to be overcome in collecting the appropriate data. The variety of categories in Rothenberg's analytic procedure that are not amenable to statistical analysis points to the unresolved difficulties remaining in gathering data appropriate to the schema. In fact, this numerical illustration is of most value precisely in making us aware of the limitations imposed on cost-benefit analysis by the types of data available. Taking the author on his own grounds however, he was not attempting an empirical study. We will have to await further study in the application of the method to available data.

A final reservation needs to be entered on the author's presentation of his cost-benefit procedure. Rothenberg in large part ignores the impact that the introduction of cost-benefit analysis would have on the decision-making process concerning the urban renewal program. That application of the author's analytic method by the ultimate decision makers would affect the direction of public policy is assured. But the questions of "in what direction" and "to what extent" remain unanswered in this presentation. The final two paragraphs of the book, which assess the role of cost-benefit analysis, are here viewed as incomplete.

What saves this volume from becoming a cookbook on "how to do cost-benefit analysis" is Rothenberg's often enlightened discussion of the substantive urban renewal program. In chapters 3 and 4, the author analyzes seven goals attributed to the urban renewal program. He finds the goals of the "mitigation of poverty" and the "provision of decent, safe, and sanitary housing in a suitable environment for all" to be in conflict with the goals of the "revival of downtown business areas of the central cities" and the "achievement and/or maintenance of an adequate middle-income household component in the central city." Later in the book, Rothenberg's introduction of the concept of "neighborhood externalities" elevates his assessment of the total contribution of the redevelopment program. The final two chapters offer an interesting discussion of the major cirticisms of the urban renewal program and an evaluation of some alternatives to the urban renewal program as issues of public policy.

Despite the limitations and omissions of this study, we have here an important first step in conceptualizing a method by which to evaluate a major federal program affecting American cities in a time which begs for such evaluation.—David J. Olson, University of Wisconsin.

Food and Fiber in the Nation's Politics. By Charles M. Hardin. (Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1967. Pp. xi, 236.)

Students of agricultural politics and policy will be interested in this series of essays. Commissioned as a technical paper by the National Advisory Commission on Food and Fiber, they include studies of agriculture and the economic aspects of foreign policy, programs for price supports and allotments, soil conservation, agriculture and political responsibility, and policy for agricultural sciences. Each essay sketches the history of public policy in a particular area of agriculture and joins it with an assessment of the equity of policy outcomes.

The author's thesis is a familiar one in political science. Agricultural policy making is fragmented, each fragment being comprised of administrative elites at the bureau level in USDA, legislative elites at the committee level, and interest group elites. Not only is the system fragmented, it is also highly decentralized with at least one USDA representative in virtually every county in the nation. Under conditions of fragmentation and decentralization, executive control is difficult either at the secretarial or presidential level. Consequently, there is no coherent national agricultural policy, in the author's view.

Some of the results of the operation of decentralized bargaining elites in agriculture are ably described. Overseas programs have been and are still heavily protective of established farm interests. The "farm program" for price supports, storage and allotments serves to provide greater advantages to established and relatively well off farmers than to those less well off and established. The well developed pattern of co-optation through the farmer-committee system and the extension program through land grant colleges, has resulted in a strong grass-roots clientele of better off farmers, and agriculturists. It has also resulted in policy outcomes that favor these interests in much the same way as independent regulatory commissions come to reflect the preferences of the elites of those regulated. Further, the field arm of the "farm program," the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, remains an important source of legislative patronage all the way from State committeemen to farmer fieldmen. Among the results of this system is the maintenance of discrimination toward Negro farmers and Negro land grant colleges in Southern and Boarder States, and continued strong support for tobacco and peanut interests. Similar patterns of racial discrimination and advantage to "better and more influential farmers" are described in the operations of the Soil Conservation Service.

The characterization of Agriculture as fragmented and decentralized is similar to assessments of other departments, notably Defense, HEW, HUD, and DOT. These findings square with the conclusion that elitism is a fundamental characteristic of large scale government. Although this may be empirically clear, it is painful on normative grounds to those who are concerned about the unequal distribution of advantages and disadvantages associated with democratic elitism. The author takes the normative question as his theme, He insists that fragmented and decentralized policy making by agricultural elites which results in inequities in the distribution of advantages is "unconstitutional" because of the lack of "effective political responsibility and accountability." Although he decries elitism and inequity in a democratic system, he does not wrestle with the fundamental normative questions either in terms of theory or specific policy recommendations.—H. George Frederickson, Syracuse University.

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Political Participation in Communist China. By JAMES R. TOWNSEND. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967, Pp. x, 233. $5.50.)

In this admirable study, Professor James R. Townsend examines the ways in which the ordinary workers and peasants, men and women, of contemporary China participate in the political process. Throughout this century, in ever increasing numbers the people of China have become conscious of political developments and active participants in political life. Although the traditional Confucian regime disappeared in the Republican Revolution of 1911, traditional values continued to play their part in forming attitudes toward authority. The CCP was founded several years after the first great popular movement swept through China's cities in the wake of the May Fourth demonstrations of 1919. When the CCP came to power thirty years later, the Chinese revolutionary movement was directed against the "mutant tradition" of a transitional society disorganized by wars, piecemeal economic modernization, and chaotic political change. Wars and revolution made the Chinese masses long for a strong political regime, and the CCP demanded that literally everyone must participate in the regime it established.

Exploring the historical and ideological roots of the revolutionary style of political participation in Communist China, Professor Townsend discovers these roots in traditional Chinese attitudes toward authority, popular reaction to political and economic modernization in this century, the influence of Soviet Marxism, and the experience of the Chinese Communist elite in mobilizing the people for revolutionary and national war before 1949. Then he examines the CCP concept of political participation as it has evolved since 1945: the democratic dictatorship of several classes, party leadership in state organs, mass activism as the means to foster correctly oriented political consciousness, and the theory of non-antagonistic contradictions governing both the relations between leaders and masses and relations between theory and practice. He goes on with a lucid analysis of mass participation in the state structure and in non-governmental organizations.

By 1949, the CCP developed its own theory of mass mobilization—the Maoist mass line. This theory or line is not based on Western democratic precedents but on traditional Chinese modes. That is, it inculcates values through face-to-face contacts, through small groups meeting in familiar social settings. New techniques such as hsia-fang—giving officials experience working directly with the masses—are intended to narrow the enormous gap between the masses and the modernized urban intellectuals. In actual practice, Professor Townsend asserts, the Maoist mass line may be directly antithetical to administrative modernization.

One of the great virtues of this study is its focus on the degree of conscious voluntary participation by ordinary Chinese in carrying out political decisions made by the party elite. Under the Communist regime, almost all Chinese must take part in political rituals as well as in normally nonpolitical acts (like fly swatting, deep plowing, or stilt dancing) that the party has defined as politically supportive. The notion that guided involvement in implementing political decisions is a meaningful form of political activity runs counter to traditional democratic concepts of genuine political participation. Thus, for a modernizing state such as Communist China, Professor Townsend finds the concepts of political participation derived from democratic theory inadequate. The Chinese masses rarely participate spontaneously in the political process. Morevoer, they have little influence, and certainly no direct impact, on the selection of Central Committeemen or on decisions made by the Politburo. The Chinese people may influence the development and operation of the political system either by cooperating willingly with Party policies or by dragging their feet. If most people readily cooperate, the system will require less compulsion than if some people play stupid and passively resits the implementation of Party policies.

For the purposes of his study, Professor Townsend has defined political participation as "all activities through which individuals consciously become involved in attempts to give a particular direction to the conduct of public affairs, excluding activities of an occupational or compulsory nature." (p. 4.). This definition raises a most interesting and most difficult problem: measuring the amount of spontaneity, voluntarism, and/or compulsion in the performance of political acts. There is no ready measure of the amount of voluntary participation in the Chinese Communist political system.

However, in Professor Townsend's judgment compulsion does not explain the Party's organizational success. Some of the Chinese masses who participate have a genuine ideological consciousness and commitment, but the voluntarism of the great majority rests on other factors: habitual obedience to authority, commitments to nationalism and progress, desire for personal advancement and social status, and shared interests in satisfying common needs. If popular participation gives a particular direction to the conduct of public affairs, that direction is not always one that the party would choose. Mass participation rarely reaches the level of conscious commitment that the Maoist doctrine of the mass line prescribes. The mass line of the party elite injects strong elements of continuity and predictability into Chinese politics, but its utopian claims have kept all political institutions outside the CCP in a constant state of flux. Mass political mobilizations without political institutionalization, the author suggests, may bring about disintegration and decay rather than development of a modern economy and a powerful state capable of meeting the needs of a developing nation. Distinguished by clarity in presentation, lucid, concise analysis, and broad historical perspectives, this book is a most valuable contribution to the growing body of literature on Communist China.—John E. Ruz, Oakland University.

Colombia: The Political Dimensions of Change. By ROBERT H. DIX. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1967. Pp. xi, 452, $10.00.)

Among the lingering curses that traditionally have stultified the growth of a truly democratic politics within the nations of Latin America is the conspicuous absence of a genuinely pluralistic structure of interest groups and associations. In at least one Latin American nation, Colombia, there is cause to hope that tradition is now passing with the stormy vicissitudes of change. Robert H. Dix has shown, with assiduous care, that Colombia is moving toward a pluralistic democratic politics, albeit a planned democracy under the aegis of the Frente Nacional, and in which such traditional bulwarks of the status quo as Army, Church, and privileged oligarchy are showing incipient capacities for change. At the same time, however, he is able to see that the unique sort of consensus embodied in the Frente Nacional, i.e., placing severe constitutional limits upon entry of new power contenders into the political arena, may act conversely to frustrate the popular spirit of reform. The numerous crises that Colombia must solve in the coming decade are still without appropriate institutional channels for the articulation and redress of popular grievances and ills. Not the least of her ills are the violence, the continuing displacement of rural folk into the great cities, and the resultant burgeoning of slums and barries piratas.

To those of us who have studied Colombia in field research situations (that were outside the towering shadow of any professional commitment to the United States' Alliance for Progress investment in that troubled nation) it may naturally appear that Colombia's violence reflects a direct attack upon the established order, its agents and instruments, as well as being symptomatic of the helpless futility of bringing about change by peaceful and rational means. Yet, Mr. Dix tells us "to qualify as genuinely revolutionary, violence must be centralized, and must attack the seats of political and administrative power, as well as the established social order. This the Colombian guerrillas never did." (p. 370) Instead, Dix portrays the violence as a process of catharsis in which sociopolitical-economic-ethnic and a cluttered mosaic of other violent and irreconcilable frustrations are sifted through the polarized conflict mechanism of the two traditional political parties. With the foregoing, this reviewer may disagree (as did later the Mexican journalist Mario Menéndez Rodréguez, editor of Sucesos, who lived during 1967 for one month with the Ejército de Liberación Nacional in Colombia and was subsequently expelled from Colombia and later condemned for his published documentaries on guerrilla actions and goals). Dix tends to see Colombia's most poignant national problem as an inter-elite conflict rather than as a direct popular assault upon the established order itself. In so doing he does not do justice to the basic sociological fact that the violence, as Norman Bailey has argued, produced an accelerated overpoliticization of the peasantry which, in turn, generated a momentum of nihilism and anarchy that outran the capacity of the traditional order to contain that which it had itself nurtured.

I stress what appears to me as a shortcoming constructively and with full recognition of the obvious fact that Dix has produced an excellent work with which there is otherwise really very little to find fault. If he would permit me to indulge in two more observations that are slightly negative, I would say that 1) despite numerous caveats to the contrary Dix comes off sounding mildly like a partisan of the "modernizing elite" which, in Colombia, probably does not merit the honor of his confidence (any more than Rojas Pinilla merited that of Fluharty), and 2) he paints an excessively laudatory picture of the North American influence in terms that would not be shared by the slum pirsoners of "Alpujarra" in Medellín nor by those of "Chambacú" in Cartagena.

The historical, environmental, and theoretic sections of this work are superior. Dix has done a superlative job of bringing contemporary sociopolitical-economic theory to bear upon the ongoing traumata of a developing nation. Although this book may not be as colorful in its description of the ethos of Colombian political change as are the excellent works of Vernon Fluharty and John Martz, the Dix treatise approaches new dimensions of theoretic rigor in its introspection of a given Latin American political system and is an important complement to the foregoing works. Most important, however, Mr. Dix has given us a work that is not only intellectually stimulating but one that is a challenging instrument of pedagogy as well. I have assigned his book to graduate and undergraduate classes. That, of course, is the critical test, and an important one, especially for those struggling academic neophytes whose research funding limitations make Bogotá a place only to be read of .-- KENNETH F. JOHNSON, University of Southern California.

Canadian Legislative Behavior: A Study of the 25th Parliament. By ALLAN KORNBERG. (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1967. Pp. vii, 161. $2.95.)

The central assumption Professor Kornberg brings to this study is that "...legislative behavior is a product of the interaction between the individual legislator, the influence of his society, and the influence of the legislature per se." (p. v) To develop this conception he examines categories consonant with some recent studies of American legislatures. Data relevant to his concerns are gathered by structured interviews with a sample of 165 MPs.

In his early chapters, Professor Kornberg sets out his conceptual scheme, discusses the institutional setting of Parliament, and deals with such matters as social background, socialization, and recruitment. Though generally there is little that is startling in these chapters, his discussions of the role of the party as a recruitment agent and the importance of early political socialization are of some interest. The middle chapters deal with legislative goals and role orientations and their relationship to certain other variables. Goals and role orientations are in turn treated as dependent variables and correlated with a number of independent variables including both those of a preparliamentary and postparliamentary nature. Preparliamentary variables utilized include positions on a French Canadian Index, Political Environment Index, and Cosmopolitan Index, as well as education, father's occupation, prior political experience, and motives for becoming a candidate. Post-incumbency variables include such matters as party affiliation, urbanism of districts, perceptions of party competition, contact with constituents, and parliamentary experience. Articulated goals and roles are then employed as independent variables and correlated with differences in motives for maintaining a legislative career, differences in contacts with and attitudes toward constituents and interest groups, and attitudinal differences toward contrived conflict situations. In general (though not without exception), correlations that resulted from pre-incumbency variables ranged from minute to modest (the author wisely acknowledge this), those that resulted from post-incumbency variables were better, and those that ensued from using goals and role orientations as independent variables were more substantial. A chapter entitled "The Normativeness of Party," accents the author's findings that there is much ideological agreement within Canadian Parliamentary parties, that party discipline is not perceived by MPs as being unduly restrictive, and that local party organizations loom rather large in the lives of members of Parliament. In an excellent concluding chapter, the author generalizes that the bi-cultural theory of Canadian politics is largely unsubstantiated as it applies to the behavior of MPs, a fascinating conclusion in and of itself. He goes on to attempt to account for the paradox that about three-quarter of the MPs expressed policy aspirations as goals in a system that allows individual members scant opportunity to influence policy outcomes. Again, he attempts to explain why most pre-incumbency variables were not more meaningfully associated with legislative goals and role orientations. This, he suggests, is the influence of party writ large.

Acknowledging the importance of comparable categories to the development of systematic knowledge about legislatures, it is nonetheless to be regretted that professor Kornberg did not focus more sharply on a problem of particular importance to the Canadian Parliament. That is, given the fact that about one-third of the nation is separated sectionally, ethnically, linguistically and religiously, how is it that a body such as Parliament is able to engage in conflict management and yet keep that conflict in bounds? Certainly the author generates information relevant to this problem. The two-party plus national party system and the parliamentary system require that integration on a national scale take place continuously within each of the major parties; the largest proportion of MPs are motivated to keep up legislative careers for personal-instrumental reasons and thus must maintain party and system to maintain their offices; and again, the recruitment and socialization roles of the major parties contribute to party cohesion and minimize the importance of differences in prelegislative experiences.

There is a danger in the area of legislative behavior, also manifested in Kornberg's work, of confusing what is being referred to as "role orientations" (utilized to mean expectations of a single partner in a potential role set) with the concept of "role" defined as mutual expectations. Data about the former result from responses to a few questions which ought to be accepted only provisionally; indeed, established in this way, role orientations may be little more than self-justifications. When conceived as mutual expectations, however, role can be a powerful concept. It can be usefully employed to study interactions in a decisional process, it allows the scholar to distinguish between institutional and personal forces, it directs attention to expectations that are in conflict, and it invites discussions of systemic integration via the notion of role complementarity. It is highly questionable whether the data being gathered under the rubric of role orientation are sufficient to deal with these problems.

Still, Professor Kornberg has accomplished a worthwhile task. He has carried out a quite comprehensive analysis of the Canadian Parliament utilizing categories which facilitate the development of a comparative dimension. His book ought to receive wide use in legislative behavior courses, even in those courses where the focus is primarily on American legislatures.—Dean L. Yarwood, University of Missouri, Columbia.

The Development of Modern Nigeria. OKEI ARIKPO. (Baltimore: Penguin African Library, Pp. 176. $1.25.)

To Americans, Nigeria resembles the little girl of doggerel fame: "when she was good, she was very very good, and when she was bad, she was horrid." Any current study of Africa's most ethnically complex and populous country faces the dual and seemingly contradictory task of explaining 1) how such a diverse group of peoples could attain independence as a single sovereign state featuring such aspects of Western democracy as multi-party competition and a relatively free press, and 2) why Nigeria should suddenly have turned "horrid," with two military coups, the massacre of some 30,000 Ibos, the secession of its Eastern Region (Biafra), and a tragic civil war occurring within the past two years. The contradiction is only apparent, as Okei Arikpo shows in this little book, for the very diversity of a country can pull it in two quite different directions. On the one hand, diversity may convince many leading citizens, including the author, of the necessity and desirability of what David Apter has termed a "reconciliation system"; on the other hand it may contribute to the breakdown of the political system itself once the fragile institutions of unity cease in fact to reconcile the interests of major groups within the polity. Although most of the book was written prior to the demise of the First Republic, one is made aware throughout of the dual potential of diversity, and a final chapter and Additional Preface analyze these failures to reconcile ethnic, regional, and generational interests which precipitated the military coups of 1966.

Mr. Arikpo's background enables him to write a well-balanced and objective appraisal of the development of his own country. As a member of an Eastern Minority group, he analyzes events without obviously favoring any of the major contending "nationalities"—Yoruba, Ibo, or Hausa-Fulani, -and he points up the important mediating and centralizing role played by minorities in the political and cultural life of Nigeria. As a one-time politician, the author writes knowingly of the pressures and temptations to which political leaders are subject, and he quite properly emphasizes that the allocation—and withholding—of amenities to particular communities is a central concern of politicians in new states such as Nigeria. As an administrator-he has been Secretary of the National Universities Commission-Mr. Arikpo discusses realistically some of the problems confronting top bureaucrats. How, for example, can educational planners cope with massive unemployment among primary school leavers and with simultaneous shortages of high-level manpower in certain vital fields?

The book is least successful in dealing with the forces of tribal and regional chauvinism, which the author decries as "incompatible with the development of a rising educated populace and an expanding modern economy." (p. 11) Mr. Arikpo fails to point out that such chauvinism is dependent on these very aspects of social mobilization for its emergence and maintenance. In a traditional society "tribalism" scarcely exists, for social relations occur at a face-to-face and/or kinship level. With modernization different ethnic groups converge on the city, where they become acutely aware of what separates them from each otherincluding different opportunities and incentives to modernize-while engaging in a new kind of competition for scarce political and economic resources. And the very involvement of Nigeria's regions in raising per capita income and extending literacy has accentuated conflict among the regions and between them and the federal government. Nigeria is an excellent example of the dual potential of social mobilization for disintegration as well as integration, and this second set of dualities might have been stressed as strongly as the first.—David B. Abernethy, Stanford University.

The Prime Minister's Policy Speech: A Case Study in Televised Politics. By Colin A. Hughes and John S. Western. (Canberra: Australian National University Press, 1966. Pp. xvi, 227. S4.50 (Aust.), paper.)

In November, 1963, the then Australian Prime Minister, Sir Robert Menzies, produced an innovation in Australian politics by opening his party's parliamentary campaign with a televised policy speech to the nation rather than with the customary personal address to a gathering in his own constituency. Hughes and Western's The Prime Minister's Policy Speech is a report on their study of the impact of this political stimulus on a sample of Australian television viewers.

The authors attempt to measure this influence through analysis of change in the candidate, party, and issue orientation of their respondents after viewing the speech. The primary dependent variables studied are images of Menzies and his Liberal Party, plus knowledge of and affect toward issues raised in the campaign. Other than exposure to the televised address, the independent variables utilized by Huges and Western consist of respondent characteristics such as educational level, objective and subjective social class, and partisanship. The conceptual framework for the study is provided by cognitive dissonance theory.

In general, the findings presented by Hughes and Western are consistent with prior studies of political perception in that partisanship is found to structure cognition and individuals tend to change their opinions in ways that lead to "cognitive balance." However, the authors attempt to cover a broader range of topics as well, extending from the sources and effects of "radicalism" to causes and consequences of partisanship.

A basic strength of the Hughes and Western examination consists of their effort, both in the construction of instruments and in the analysis of data, to relate their research effort to prior studies on comparable topics. Thus the authors are able to present some interesting semi-replications in a different social setting of prior research by such investigators as Pool, Campbell, Gurin, and Miller, and Steiner.

Weaknesses of the study stem, at least in part, from the problem of inadequate time for prior planning which is typically involved in the study of elections in political systems where the timing of the election is left to the discretion of political leaders, rather than occurring on a fixed, periodic basis. The brief period of time between announcement of the Frime Minister's intention to call an election and the presentation of his policy speech precluded the possibility of pre-testing the questionnaire and thus resulted in several lacunae. In addition, the results of the authors' untried sampling approach were disappointing. Five hundred names were carefully drawn from electoral rolls in Canberra with the assistance of a table of random numbers but, in the end, doubtless due to the small number responding to the invitations, questionnaires of any spouses and interested friends who showed up were tabulated along with those of the selected respondents. A basic N of 262 was thus attained.

That the variable deemed by the authors to be of greatest importance to the study-partisanship -was tapped by so questionable an indicator is particularly regretable. Instead of determining the political orientation of respondents by asking how they intended to vote, their party identification, or their voting record, for this study partisanship was obtained by asking, "If the election were being held today, which party would you want to win?" Unfortunately, this question was not posed to the panel in the initial questionnaire, but only after exposure to the Prime Minister's speech. To attribute primary causal influence to partisanship measured in this way is clearly tautological, as is exemplified by a hypothetical "independent" voter who, due to his favorable reaction to the Prime Minister's speech, subsequently indicates the Liberal Party as the one which he would want to win. In Hughes and Western's study, his "partisanship" would be interpreted as influencing his perception of the speech.

Another weakness of the study derives from an attempt to present more data than the authors are able to properly analyze within the pages they devote to them. Some examples of problems arising from the attempt to cover too much data are the presentation of four rather complex tables sequentially without a word of discussion intervening (pp. 166-169), and a two-sentence "analysis" of a table containing 48 entries (p. 55).

Finally, this study would have benefited from greater attention to details of data analysis. Such occasional errors as percentage breakdowns based on N's as low as four, five, and six respondents, percentages which could not possibly be derived from the bases given, and inexplicable changes in the base N from table to table mar an otherwise sophisticated analysis.

Hughes and Western introduce their report with the not untypical caveat that "our study may best be regarded as a pilot project for larger, more expensive research which could perhaps provide more satisfactory answers." While the book contains findings of undoubted interest to those concerned with mass media influence on public opinion, this judgment by the authors appears to be based not on false modesty, but on a valid appraisal of their effort.—Kenneth H. Thompson, University of Southern Californic.

Parliament Factions and Parties: The First 30 Years of Responsible Government in New South Wales, 1856-1889. By P. Loveday and A. W. Martin. (Melbourne University Press. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1967. Pp. xiii, 207. $10.50.)

Political Scientists seem to be increasingly realizing that generalizations about politics can—and should—be tested as much by historical data as by data describing present situations. For this reason political scientists interested in the dynamics of party systems should find this book invaluable. It is a scholarly and readable account of politics in New South Wales, Australia, between the granting of responsible government in 1855 and the development of a more or less stable two-party system toward the end of the '80's.

This was a period in which politics was carried on not by the political parties usually associated with parlimentary government but by a fluid faction system that had no basis in the electorate and could usually create only impermanent majorities in Parliament. The factions themselves were composed of small groups of men who shifted freely from faction to faction but frequently stayed together for long periods. The authors trace the development of various factional alignments with admirable clarity, and argue, despite some preconceptions to the contrary, that the faction system was not incompatible with good—that is to say, stable—government.

But the most interesting aspect of this book is the way in which it traces the evolution of the faction system into the subsequent two-party system. Given the situation as it existed between 1856 and 1880, it does not seem that there was anything inevitable about a two-party system. Its important features were a small fragmented electorate, and the absence of any major economic crisis. As Schattschneider suggests is normal, it seems that the factions did seek to gain strength by mobilizing the electorate, but this mobilizing did not or could not take a form of permanent party organization; rather, according to the authors, "they acted covertly, seeking through widespread 'wire pulling' to exploit a variety of local conflicts to promote the election of members likely to support them in Parliament." Under more or less prosperous conditions and given the isolation and localism of the electorate, the bargains developed in this way between members of Parliament and more or less unorganized interests apparently kept both satisfied. Because there were no great issues cutting across the electorate the incapacity of coalition majorities to enact sustained legislative programs was not of great significance; the faction system could, and did, provide perfectly adequate "housekeeping" legislation for the colony.

The givens of the situation began to change by the end of the '70's. On the one hand, the size of the electorate grew, and its fragmentation declined. On the other hand, various political organizations in the electorate began to develop and search for representation in Parliament. When the boom finally broke a few years later the resistance of the faction system to such demands also collapsed. The authors give a fascinating account of the way in which the demands of these non-Parliamentary groups and the power-seeking of factional leaders adapted to each other in the developing party system.

As all good case studies should be, this one is highly suggestive. Not only does it give a fine description of coalition formation in a situation where the major payoffs seem to have been the unashamed enjoyment of power, but it also shows quite clearly that under some circumstances a parliamentary system can function adequately short of a developed party system. It is a valuable addition to the party literature.—John Orbell, University of Oregon.

The Commonwealth Bureaucracy. By Gerald E. Caiden. (Melbourne University Press. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1967. Pp. xiii, 445. $16.50.)

Commonwealth Bureaucracy is a comprehensive analysis of personnel administration in the Australian civil service. Caiden is concerned not merely with all administrative agencies comprising the Commonwealth government, but also, though less directly, with the role played by the public bureaucracy in Australian society. Despite this wider interest, Caiden's approach is quite straightforward. He first describes the environment, role, nature, organization, and composition of the public bureaucracy. He then analyzes the variety of personnel authorities and controls. Finally, he examines personnel structure and classification, recruitment, promotion, remuneration, fringe benefits, employee rights and obligations.

As no self-respecting work on public administration would be complete without a full offering of suggested reforms, Caiden closes his study with a series of intelligent and far-reaching proposals for improving the Commonwealth Public Service. Given his extensive interviews with service officials, Caiden's proposals require serious consideration by scholars and administrators alike. He is clearly sympathetic with the recommendations of the Boyer Committee (1958) and expects them to prove functionally necessary for a bureaucracy capable of serving Australian society in the decades thead. His own recommendations go beyond those of the Boyer Committee, and are guided by both his sense of the hostility to change and his somber observation that "the first point that must be stressed about the Commonwealth Service . . . is That nobody knows how efficient it really is or how capable are the staff." (434) Given these premises, it is no surprise that even Caiden's committee like prose is redolent with a restrained desperation about the need for radical changes. This eneed is underscored by the dynamic role public Dureaucracy is coming to play in Australia. According to Caiden, it is the "most important single organization . . . combining the skill and talents of Australians and utilizing them for tackling future problems." (vii) It is the "national unifier, largest economic force, major socializing influence" (4); the "most important social institution" (27); a "major egalitarian force . . . irrespective of . . . the party or coalition in office" (29); and withal the bearer of "new responsibilities . . . detrimental to democratic political processes." (23) Though these alarming assertions tend to be unargued and somewhat impressionistic, they do lead one to wonder whether it is the Australian future we are headed for.

Despite its late development, the Australian public service displays many of the difficulties of any modern bureaucracy. But its long-term troubles are the product of a developing system searching for its own administrative style. A richer insight into this aspect of the subject is provided by Caiden's earlier and in many ways more interesting study of the history of personnel administration in the Australian Public Service (Career Service, 1965. The Australian system was the product of a fusion of American and British approaches to public administration. This is evident both in its concrete institutional arrangements and practices and in the cultural patterns of Australian society and the public service. Nothing else explains the number (29), vigor, and retrograde outlook of staff associations, i.e., civil service unions. One of the more fascinating elements in the situation, especially in its historical dimensions, is the "mix" of deferential, formal, and class-conscious mores with an informal and egalitarian ethos. Another expression of this has been the general resistance within the service to tougher meritocratic policies in the recruitment, training, and promotion of an administrative elite.

While Commonwealth Bureaucracy occasionally resembles a government organizational manual, there is much in it of interest for students of comparative administration. To an American raised amidst lush theories of developmental change and bureaucracy, the overall value of the book is marred by a certain lack of theoretical focus. Caiden wavers between employing a strict Weberian model of bureaucracy and utilizing the perspectives established either by the sociology of informal organization or the group theory of administrative pluralism. His tie-in of culture and bureaucracy is suggestive but not systematically explored, while his description of the functional role of the bureaucracy is not wholly supported by empirical evidence. A more explicit theoretical approach might well have provided Caiden with a discriminating cutting-edge for his general analysis. I do not mean to detract from the admirable product of his exhaustive and picneering researches. This is as definitive an examination of Australian personnel administration as we are likely to have for some time. Perhaps Professor Caiden will provide us with a more generalized study of Australian bureaucracy in the future .--HENRY J. STECK, SUNY, Cortland.

Lenin: The Man, The Theorist, The Leader A Reappraisal. Ed. by Leonard Schapiro and Peter Reddaway. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. x. 317. $7.50.)

Fifty years after the birth of the Soviet state, its founding father has become the subject of a growing body of literature. The large volume of Soviet publications in this case feeds Western scholarship because the former contains many bits and pieces of hitherto unknown or unpublished material; and there still remain sources to be tapped. Some of the contributors of the volume under review make use of selected/ new information. But they do not do so systematically, and in the bibliography even the Soviet works that may have been cited in the text are omitted. Western sources fare better, although here too the list of works consulted is spotty. Most of the contributions themselves fall short of systematic coverage of their topics. They are essays or summaries rather than scholarly monographs. In a book setting out to "reappraise" Lenin this is perfectly justifiable, and my mentioning it does not imply a qualitative judgment.

Still, collective works of this kind are inevitably of uneven quality. Some of the chapters contain brilliant observations or novel statements of great interest to the scholar; I would single out the contributions of Reddaway, Erickson, and Nove in this regard. Some others barely go beyond summarizing materials with which undergraduates in this field are likely to be familiar.

This qualitative unevenness may be related to a strain between two aims motivating the contributors—that of making a scholarly assessment of Lenin's thoughts and activities, as against that of giving an ideological critique of his failures and inadequacies. The tone for this second theme is struck in the Introduction, where the senior editor contrasts socialist dreams with Lenin's achievements and then proceeds to question Lenin's sanity (at least after 1917). To be sure, it would be impossible and undesirable to make a rigid distinction between scholarly appraisal and ideological critique. But it does seem that those chapters in which the note of indignation and scorn is toned down happen to be the more rewarding ones for the scholar.

On the whole, a negative attitude toward Lenin predominates among the contributors. Yet, almost as if despite their efforts, they manage to convey an image of him that brings out his versatility, depth, and political genius. Victor Frank, in a thoughtful essay, discusses his place within the Russian intelligentsia, which he defines in a highly stimulating fashion. Peter Reddaway quite surprisingly reveals the depth of Lenin's devotion to art, literature, and music. J. C. Rees researches, in fair and balanced fashion, the old scholastic question of whether or not Lenin was a Marxist, John Erickson's brilliant piece on Lenin's crucial and successful role as a civil war leader is a fine contribution. So is Alec Nove's assessment of Lenin's strength and weakness as a political economist (Nove rates him more highly than Western writers have in the past). Henry Willetts points out that his analysis of peasant life was thorough, original, and scholarly, albeit polemical. Had he given up politics in 1900, he argues, Lenin would be remembered as an expert on agrarian Russia. Both Willetts and Nove discuss Lenin's least well-known work the monumental treatise on the development of Russian capitalism, which Willetts dubs the best Marxist book since Das Kapital. Mary Holdsworth's summary of Lenin's views on the national question is thoughtful, but contains no new insights.

I find the chapter on Lenin as a philosopher unimpressive and a bit incoherent, and the appraisal of Lenin as a tactician unconvincing. It overstresses the differences between his machiavellian amoralism and that of other politicians and does so probably because it is based excessively on a conspiratorial interpretation of bolshevism. This in turn results from taking bolshevik delusions about their own ability to plan, manage, and control political events much too seriously. At the same time, and quite inconsistently with his conspiratorial view the essay on Lenin as a tactician underestimates his shrewdness and his political realism. In retrospect, this political horse sense rather than some abstract operational code appear to be the secret of his great successes.

Although the book discusses Lenin from almost every conceivable angle, there are two topics I would have liked to see added. One is Lenin's views on organization and his activities as the master of a political machine. The other is the question concerning his qualities as a charismaticleader; and, needless to say, the combination of charismatic and bureaucratic leadership is so rare and remarkable that, from the point of view of the political scientist, the omission of these two topics is deplorable.—Alfred G. Meyer, The University of Michigan.

Islam in the Soviet Union. By Alexandre Bennigsen and Chantal Lemercier-Quelquejay. (New-York: Frederick A. Prager, 1967. Pp. xiii, 272 $7.00.)

This book represents a remarkable success in condensation and coverage; seldom has so much-been said so well with such brevity. The sources cited are few, but they include essentially all of the best ones. These authors know their subject thoroughly, and their outstanding competence shows through on every page. Their knowledge of Islam especially adds a depth to this study of twentieth century Soviet Central Asia, and other Muslim areas of the USSR, which is lacking in most other discussion of it.

It falls short of greatness because it lacks a general theory, of the middle or any other range. It offers no theoretical or generalized conclusions or even suggestions about Soviet nationalities policy generally, about the USSR and its government as reflected in the area, about nationalism, or religion, or even Islam-Communism attraction or repulsion. The book is weakest in economics and politics, and strongest in cultural analysis. The handling of nationalism, however, is careful and sophisticated; indeed the whole book possesses these qualities.

The authors deal primarily with the twentieth century, but provide good and solid discussion of pre-1917 as well as of post-1917. Their consideration of the Tatars and Kazan represents a significant addition to the usual limitation of studies of Islam in Russia to Soviet Central Asia. Some references to Muslims outside of Russia appear, but no serious comparative study is attempted. Throughout, there appears a neat and sophisticated balancing of generalization and detail, and indication of what united and what separated the Islamic peoples of Russia. Creative and substantive footnotes add biographical and other information of great interest.

It also is a tribute to Geoffrey Wheeler that he arranged the publication of, and wrote a generous introduction to, a book dealing with "his" subject, a book providing what is probably a better introduction to Soviet Central Asia than his own works.

This small book constitutes a significant contri•bution, and its authors deserve high praise.—Robert A. Rupen, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill.

Resistance: The Political Autobiography of Georges Bidault. By Georges Bidault. trans. by Marianne Sinclair. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967, Pp. xx, 348 $6.95.)

"Toute ma vie je me suis fait une certaine idée de la France." So General de Gaulle begins his famous war memoirs. Resistance reveals that Bidault too has a certain vision of France, and the surprising thing is how much it overlaps with his arch antagonist's. Both men have an obsessive notion of a mythical France, the center of civilization; are exasperated by the real France and by flesh-and-blood Frenchmen; and manifest unmentionable contempt for French parliamentarianism, political parties, and public opinion. The one refers to the "plague" of democracy, the other to the "vomit" of party haggling. Both are Christians without much charity for their opponents: show a puritan-like intolerance for human foibles: and would obviously like to substitute order, piety, and a somewhat prudish temperance for the virtues (or vices) that they see currently dominant in the lives of their countrymen. And both, needless to say, are massive egocentrics whose vanity stands out even in a nation whose politicians are not particularly noted for their personal modesty. The fact that both had similar upbringings-rigid bourgeois family; provincial setting; Catholic education with its emphasis on patriotic songs and legends about past French glories-accounts no doubt for much of this overlap.

And yet, of course, there are major differences. Chief among them is that de Gaulle, for all his lofty conceptions and pronouncements, is a superb opportunist who has uncanny ability to detect future developments in any situation and no inhibitions about shifting his position in order to drift along with them. In this he demonstrates consummate political skill; "things being what they are," his favorite catchphrase, is after all only a variant on the timehonored truism that "politics is the art of the possible." The secret of the General's success resides in his mastery of the politics of the possible while disguising this opportunism by means of his carefully cultivated inscrutability and his no less carefully conceived highminded rhetoric. Bidault does not apparently understand this secret. By all odds he should be the supreme political intriguer since he showed such amazing staying power in the unsettled political situation of the Fourth Republic; between 1944 and 1954, he was twice Premier and held the post of either Foreign Minister or Vice-Premier almost without interruption. Yet he turns out on the strength of his book to be hopelessly rigid in his beliefs and quixotically devoted to futile causes. His doctrinal honesty is what has made him so vulnerable to a masterful operator like de Gaulle who plainly used him, not only in 1944, but in 1958 as well. Ironical as it may seem, his downfall derives from the fact that he has the stubborn courage of de Gaulle's convictions.

Take his impenitent colonialism. Many are the reviewers who have contrasted Bidault unfavorably with de Gaulle on this sore; and if a man's actions are to be judged by their consequences rather than by the motives behind them, then the comparison is undoubtedly just. Without question de Gaulle performed a signal service for France in extricating it from its imperial tangles in Africa. But if we ask what the General really aspired after at the time and perhaps continues to believe in? In this case Bidault may have something when he speaks of hypocrisy. At any rate, the General now and then forgets himself and lets the cat out of the bag, as in his April 1961 sneer about "improvised States" dominating the UN General Assembly. There is nothing new in this stratagem of identifying a purely national mission with the greater interests of mankind, especially when that mission aims at increasing the rank and power of one's own nation at the expense of an alleged hegemon; the heavyfooted leaders of Wilhelmian Germany, for instance, found themselves urged to adopt it by liberal imperialists like Hans Delbrueck and Friedrich Naumann. But whereas de Gaulle can readily appreciate such a maneuver, Bidault, the frustrated idealist, cannot. Not only is he an old fashioned colonialist who sees only childlike savages, godless terrorists, and Red troublemakers afoot in the new nations of the third world, but in addition he is absolutely opposed, on principle, to de Gaulle's policy of maintaining French influence there by means of extensive foreign aid.

Bidault must thus be counted an honest man in expressing these views at some length in Resistance. They are clearly the views that have driven him to the desperate course that he took over Algeria. As for the quality of these views—this, obviously, is a different matter. It is a strange process of mental blockage that prevents a former President of the National Council of the French Resistance from grasping that others, too, may desire national freedom. Seen in this light, Bidault's formation of a second National Council in 1962, with its links to the terrorists of the Secret Army Organization, looms as a grisly parody of patriotism grown narrow and idealism gone sour.

Resistance is sub-titled a political autobiography. This is not completely justified by its contents. It is more in the nature of an embittered and combative indictment of the author's enemies, which seem to include nearly everybody active in French politics but especially de Gaulle. But the abuse and egomania that pervade its pages do not make it an effective polemic, and it is decidedly inferior as an assault on Gaullist politics to Paul Reynaud's La Politique Etrangére du Gaullisme. One does not expect a hounded exile to be charitable to his enemies, but $6.95 seems a lot to pay for a protracted outpouring of invective and regrets.—Michael R. Gordon, University of California, Santa Barbara.

Maxime Weygand and Civil-Military Relations in Modern France. By Philip C. F. Bankwitz. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967. Pp. xiii, 445. $10.00.)

In much of the world, the military coup d'etat and "man-on-horseback" are such pervasive and recurrent phenomena as to constitute almost "natural" features of the political landscape. That the great majority of these more overt forms of military intervention have occurred in non-Western settings sometimes tends to obscure the fact that, even in so-called "developed" industrial societies, military men have not infrequently risen to challenge civilian supremacy. This stark reality is no more better illustrated than in the example of modern France where, twice within the past decade alone, the army has directly intervened in domestic politics. The French deviation from what many would regard as the "normal" Western pattern of an apolitical military has increasingly attracted the interest of social scientists and Philip Bankwitz' study is but the most recent addition to a growing literature on the subject.

In focusing upon the inter-war years, Professor Bankwitz examines a particular period of French civil-military relations which until now had received little scholarly attention. Although one might argue with the author's premise that the army's act of disobedience in 1940 was of decisive import in structuring its later de-stabilizing role in the Fourth and Fifth Republics, there can be little question that it did set an unfortunate precedent fully capable of finding future emulation. Central to the discussion is the personage of General Maxime Weygand and the complex set of psychological, situational, and environmental factors that are seen as contributing to his leading role in June 1940 in toppling the Reynaud government. Widely rumored as the natural son of Leopold II, Weygand is revealed to be of illegitimate Belgian origin, driven throughout his military career by an unconscious search for personal identity. Having entered St. Cyr in 1885, emerging from the Dreyfus affair "never convinced that Drevfus was innocent" (p. 9), and having earned a reputation as a "star to watch" while instructing at Saumur, the future Chief of the General Staff is said to hav found a father figure in Foch while serving as th Marshall's much misunderstood staff officer i World War I. Foch, according to the author, em bodied precisely those qualities of authority an acceptance that Weygand's past had denied hir and in so doing fulfilled "one of [his] . . . greapsychological needs" (p. 14).

But it was with the army itself that Weygand is seen to have found his primary sense of identity and over which he came to exercise an almost pa ternal protectiveness in a post-war France whos governments displayed neither the authority no the apparent "understanding" of the military which Weygand, on the personal level, had found in Foch. Threats to the military interest are described as deriving from a variety of sources during Weygand's tenure as army chief from 1930 to 1935 but those dealt with in most detail are the crises over manpower levels, disarmament, and doctrine. Professor Bankwitz views these as the base factors "poisoning" civil-military rapport in the 1930's and in terms of which Weygand became convinced "that the entire military system was facing annihilation by a historically antimilitaristic enemy" (p. 48).

What little theoretical meat that the book offers is contained largely in Chapter 6 where Professor Bankwitz attempts to weave each of the above variables-i.e. psychological, situational, and environmental-into a coherent explanatory framework. The result is somewhat disappointing and involves a rather disorganized and inconclusive effort to establish a linkage between these and the transformation of Weygand (and much of the army command) from a mood of unconditional to conditional obedience to the government. What emerges out of all this is the hardly original conclusion that: "Guardians of the besieged Army, many high officers were becoming protectors of the harassed country as well. They no longer felt themselves to be the instrument of the Government's policy but rather the true representatives of the nation itself." (p. 240.) How often have we been offered virtually the same explanation of an identification between the military's institutional interests and those of the "nation" with reference to civil-military relations in other contexts?

The only really novel twist involves the author's persistent though fleeting references to an alleged relationship between Weygand's inner needs and his ultimate actions. The closest that Professor Bankwitz comes to articulating this is on page 232 where he describes the army as "Weygand's only 'real' family" after a "harsh and empty childhood." Throughout, Weygand is portrayed sympathetically as a political novice having little or no conception of the changing balance of power between the military and government that developed in the waning days of the Third Republic. Thus, we are told in the conclusion that the "General's very professionalism—the totalization of his life in the service of the Army which had made him into a man—was responsible for the interlocking series of illusions and defenses which robbed him of self-awareness, deprived him of an accurate view of the world, and blinded him to the true significance of his most important acts." (p. 379). However, with the evidence presented, one could just as easily take the opposite and equally popular point of view—namely, that there was a deliberate effort by Weygand and the army command between the wars to undermine civilian authority.

Balanced against these negative comments, is the fact that Professor Bankwitz has produced a substantial and impressively researched work of history and it is highly recommended to students having an interest in contemporary French politics. Unfortunately, for those of us with a more far-ranging commitment to the general study of civil-military relations, it provides few new insights.—John N. Colas, The American University.

The Social Programs of Sweden, A Search for Security in a Free Society. By Albert H. Rosenthal. With a Foreword by Marquis Childs. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1967. Pp. xvi, 193. $6.00.)

With his subtitle, A Search for Security in a Free Society, Rosenthal proffers an interesting and potentially useful approach to the rather old, fundamental, and unsolved conflict between individual needs and social responsibility. It is an approach which has particular political address to a community of under-developed public philosophy in which political ideas are more concerned with eighteenth century civil rights and protection of the individual against supposed tyranny, than with looking forward to government being a useful means to solving hard-pressing common problems. Security versus freedom is, however, a very ambitious concept and difficult to realize as a fundamental feature in a rather limited research project.

According to Rosenthal, "Politicians are applauded when they object to increased governmental activity—especially at the federal level. Most Americans rarely think of the over-all question of the role of government or consider it in philosophical terms" (p. ix). "... many...look at government as an 'enemy' rather than as a 'servant'... take from you your money and your good old-fashioned rights....[identify] the growing national government as the paramount threat to our way of life" (p. 170).

As pointed out by Marquis Childs in the Foreword, "There has been a great deal of emotional writing in this area . . . now comes an author ideally equipped to appraise . . . by reason of his background" (p. vi f.). Childs may well be right, but Rosenthal succumbs to attributing the common antagonism toward the role of the growing national government to a basic question, giving his book doubtful political and partisan overtones.

The Preface, and also the concluding chapter, Chapter 8-Freedom in a Secure Society-are mainly concerned with the problem of balancing basic social needs with maximum personal freedom. There is no attempt at a systematic theoretical analysis-neither an outline of the general concept nor a statement of the criteria and premises of the study. The phenomena are merely presented and loosely described as they are observed, without any relationship to patterns of political theory. Not even the two main terms, security and freedom, are given operational definitions, and this despite the fact that the theme has been a matter of ideological and political controversy for more than 200 years. Nor do the theoretical components seem to have any function for the body of the book, apart from being a kind of reminder of interesting comments and footnotes, to the empirical description.

The main part of the book, however, lives up to its title and the author's statement in the Preface: "This book was undertaken on the premise that a description of the major Swedish social programs would be of value to Americans and others seeking to improve the social programs in their countries" (p. xi). Those who are seeking insight into a highly integrated social and political system will undoubtedly benefit from studying this book about the Swedish experiment. The growth and kinds of social programs are briefly described in Chapters 1 to 5: Growth of Social Programs; The Social Security Programs; Health Insurance; Public Health; and Welfare and Related Programs. The author has to a great extent achieved accurate descriptions free from evaluations.

Chapter 6 is devoted to the relationship between-The Government and the Individual. Rosenthal introduces the chapter with: "An understanding of the administration of the social programs in Sweden requires some knowledge of basic concepts, structure, and operation of the government. Most important, this understanding must include a comprehension of the confidence the citizen has in, and his relationship to, the government" (p. 92). It is probably true that confidence or support and structure of a political system are expected to be mutual variables in over-all decision-making, but the description of the public institutions involved, although accurate, does not add much light to the complicated and fundamental relationships mentioned. The lack of a theoretical approach is obvious.

Chapter 7 deals with: A Program—Comparisons

Between Sweden and the United States. Rosenthal finds that "examination of the similar social programs in the two countries indicates a striking... similarity in both stated objectives and accomplishments" (p. 137). "Comparative statistics must be reviewed in the light of the differing classifications of welfare programs used in the two countries as well as the federal-state character of the major programs in the United States" (p. 152). It is a moot question, however, how fruitful it is to directly compare statistics from two such different countries, particularly in relation to a freedom-security approach.

Finally, as previously mentioned, Chapter 8 is devoted to Rosenthal's basic concern-freedom versus security. He presumes that Sweden is almost a "secure society" and attempts to discuss whether this has brought serious reductions in individual liberty and free enterprise. In his examination of individual liberty, role of government, free enterprise, loss of incentive, cost of social programs, and moral standards, he does not find any serious threats to the freedom of individuals. Individual rights, so far as they have any isolated meaning, seem to be taken care of through mechanisms strongly integrated in the system. This is not at all surprising in such a highly developed and stable political system, but it may calm some of the more fanatic and fearful proclaimers against ultimate freedom.

Rosenthal's book presents a worthwhile collection of data and an excellent description of a highly developed social security system and its related political system. He has undoubtedly made many correct and important observations and hopefully will soon follow them up with an effort at systematic theory. In the meantime, this book will serve as an introduction both for politicians and political science students.—Arne J. Stokke, University of Oslo.

The Kingdom of Quito in the Seventeenth Century. By John Leddy Phelan. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1967. Pp. xvi, 415. $10.)

Not everyone has heard of the Kingdom of Quito, which never existed. The subject of the book is the Audiencia of Quito, a division of the viceroyalty of Lima and ancestor of the state of Ecuador (although the map in the text gratuitously excludes modern Ecuador from the territory of the audiencia). An audiencia was also called a "reino," which usually meant kingdom; hence the title

Why a longish book on a relatively minor subdivision of the Spanish empire, of no great economic or political importance, during a period when nothing of outstanding significance occurred? For one thing, the author ranges without obvious scruples for relevance over the whole of the Spanish American empire and beyond and through the entire period of its existence and after, bringing in many facts, from the world-wide conflict of Spain and the Netherlands to the contemporary boundary dispute of Peru and Ecuador. and the incidence of measles in modern Chile. For another, Prof. Phelan, by diligent work in archives, especially in Madrid, garnered a large amount of information, especially from reports of an inquisitorial inspection of the Audiencia of Quito from 1624 to 1637, which washed publicly a lot of very dirty linen. He has woven his facts into an unusual and fairly readable book, and he has demonstrated again that North American scholarship can devote far more intellectual energy to the study of Latin American nations than these devote to themselves. However, he apparently felt that laboriously mined details must never be thrown away, and he generously gives us all of them.

One can here, consequently, learn much of a section of the Spanish empire, its population, its primitive economy, its society and government. The picture is not pretty: sweat shops of chained Indians; class divisions and antagonisms, and an extraordinary amount of factionalism among the elite; immorality, with much detail of who was whose mistress for how long; omnipresent venality and corruption; a Church given to ritual, splendor, and corporate self-seeking, as the Spanish clegy refused to dilute the lucrative priesthood by opening it to Indians; and a complicated and inefficient administrative system, designed, one gathers, to keep maximum authority in the hands of men in Madrid who were unable to govern effectively because of distance and their own confusion. These are all familiar from other studies of Spanish colonial rule, but it is well to have them further documented.

In areas of interest to political scientists, however, Prof. Phelan does not have much to offer. He makes much of the fact that the king, although he was theoretically absolute and the only source of law, was little more than a final arbiter and did not decide very much of himself: kings never do unless they are strong personalities, and seventeenth century Spanish Hapsburgs were a very poor lot. His principal specific finding is that the "basic cause of graft at all levels was inadequacy of salaries" and believes this evil could have been simply cured in a fundamentally rotten society by better feeding (with unavailable funds) insatiable appetites. The administrators are several times discussed in terms of Plato's guardians. an ideal of which they might better be called the caricature.

Finally, in a more ambitious concluding chapter, the author finds in the Spanish imperial bureaucracy elements of charismatic rule (feeble); feudal traits, as in the real weakness of central control local powers staked out de facto fiefs, law was privilege, society was divided into exclusive classes, and the elite was imbued with an exaggerated sense of formal honor; patrimonial elements, in that all in theory were absolutely subject to the king, who employed the usual checking devices of absolute rulers; and legal elements, as some fixed norms were essential to make the creaky system function as well as it did, although a common response was, "I obey but do not execute." But the same thing can be said of any large closed empire. This labelling process deepens comprehension of imperial rule in the same way that understanding of stomach pains is improved by attributing them to gastritis.—ROBERT G. WESSON, University of California, Santa Barbara.

The Genesis of German Conservatism. By Klaus Epstein. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1966. Pp. xiv, 733. $17.50.)

In this detailed and readable history of German thought and politics between 1770 and 1806, the late Klaus Epstein divides the Conservative "movement" into three main species: Defenders of the Status Quo, Reactionaries, and Reform Conservatives. His sympathy with the Reform Conservative position is explicit (p. viii), reflected in his distribution of praise and criticism, and related to his conception of history. The typical Defender of the Status Quo is "ahistorical" in outlook, while the Reactionary romanticizes the past at the cost of "historical accuracy." The Reform Conservative, on the other hand, "has an understanding of the course of historical development and sees the inevitability of certain changes"; accordingly, he acts to maximize continuity by adapting the old order to "modern needs." Small wonder that the Reform Conservative, suspect to his contemporaries, is apt to receive the acclaim of "historians," (Pp. 7-11.)

Epstein's book itself is cast in the Reform Conservative mold, mediating between a radical challenge and an older order of scholarship. The traditional view was that "German political thinking... is the child of the French Revolution" (G. P. Gooch). This was challenged by Fritz Valjavec, who attempted to show that liberal, democratic, and conservative "tendencies" in Germany began before 1789. Specifically, "Central European Conservatism first arose not as a response to a political event, the Revolution, but as a response to an intellectual tendency, the Enlightenment, although only the events after 1789 led to its development." (Die Entstehung der politischen Strömungen in Deutschland, 1770–1815, München, 1951, p. 5.)

In Part One (1770-1790) Epstein follows the general lead of Valjavec. He discusses Aufklärung and the secret societies formed to propagate and oppose it, surveys the religious, social, and political controversies provoked by the impact of Außklärung (controversies over toleration, serfdom, absolutism, etc.), and concludes with a "portrait of a prerevolutionary Conservative," Justus Möser, the administrator and historian of Osnabrück, who still stands where Karl Mannheim left him. "at the threshold between an unreflective traditionalism and a self-conscious Conservatism" (p. 335). Part One aims "to establish the general theme that Germany possessed a well-articulated Conservative movement before, and therefore independent of [the French Revolution]" (p. 23), but issues in the more moderate conclusions that (a) the time was ripe only for ad hoc responses to ad hoc criticisms, and (b) "the elements for future Conservative systematization were all present in [Möser's] work" (pp. 335f.). The latter conclusion is dubious for two reasons. First, Möser lacked altogether the kind of historical perspective essential to Reform Conservatism. Second, neither in Möser nor in any of the others discussed do we find seeds of the dialectical worldview that was to become so prominent with the great Conservative theorists Müller and Hegel (who are not treated within the limits set by Epstein for this volume). Their fusion of politics with speculative philosophy grew out of the tension between Aufklärung and traditional faith, to be sure, politicized by the Revolution, but Epstein has discussed the impact of Aufklärung primarily as manifested in pamphlets on matters of policy and in controversies over Masons, Illuminati, and Rosicrucians. The deeper intellectual and emotional crisis-still largely underground, but documentable from manuscripts, letters, and even published writings—is not treated in this Part Two (1790-1806) sets the stage with chapters surveying the political situation in Prussia and the Hapsburg monarchy and ends with chapters chronicling the disintegration of the Empire. At times the focus blurs and the book takes on the appearance of "a general history of Germany" (p. vii), which it is not. The core of Part Two. however, consists of chapters on "the challenge of the French Revolution," "the conspiracy theory of the Revolution," and the life and thought of August Rehberg, the Hannoverian statesman and publicist sometimes called the German Burke and presented here as "a good example of the Reform Conservative." Along the way, Epstein redresses the emphasis of Part One: "there is obviously a core of truth in the traditional view, for the French Revolution did have a great impact upon political development"; and Valjavec's book is rebuked as "unfortunately not without the exaggerations too often characteristic of 'revisionist' historiography." (P. 434.) Thus is rough justice meted out to old and new: judicious scholarship, like judicious statesmanship, lies in taking a middle path.

A less detailedly descriptive, more analytic treatment of these issues would make more of certain distinctions: e.g., between a pre-existing nonpolitical conservatism that was politicized by the Revolution (as in Rehberg's case) and a conversion to conservatism prompted by the excesses of the Revolution. (This seriously affects the issue of continuity between Parts One and Two.) There is also a question of the quality of political thinking. The world reconstructed by Epstein is a culturally "democratic" world of journalism and pamphleteering, in which we encounter an occasional insight (e.g., Möser on the psychological cost of a merit system, p. 326). But all the German political thought worth reading today for other than antiquarian purposes—with the exception of an essay by Kant-appeared after 1789, and most of it appeared during the Romantic and Napoleonic period after 1800. The question of chronology and of preconditions thus depends on the level of thinking, as well as on how political it is. Continual reliance on terms like "tendency" and "movement" (neither of which is critically explored) does not conduce to clarity of comprehension.

Finally, there is the problem of "the specificity of . . . Conservatism," which concededly makes a history of European Conservatism more difficult than a history of European Liberalism. (Pp. 6f.) Given the variety of social conditions and regimes in the German states of the late 18th century, however, does it make sense even to speak of "German Conservatism?" How meaningful is it to treat under the same heading a defender of the semi-medieval Ständestaat and a defender of enlightened absolutism, even though each could appear as a Defender of the Status Quo in some part of "Germany"? It may be that the focus on "German Conservatism" obscures the more basic political dilemma of the time; too often "progress" and absolutism seemed to go hand in hand, while constitutionalism seemed linked with a discredited social order. In this and in certain other respects, the German states were the first "backward" societies responding to the intellectual and political imperialism of Western Europe. The pattern of responses and, in particular, the fortunes of the varied strategies of compromise termed by Epstein "Reform Conservatism"—whose problematic "triumph" in theory and practice after 1807 would apparently have been discussed in the next volume of this history—are therefore of some enduring interest.-John Rodman, Pitzer College and The Claremont Graduate School.

The Foundations of Indian Federalism By K. R. Bombwall. (New York: Asia Publishing House, 1967. Pp. xiii, 348., $6.50.) Distributed by Taplinger Publishing Company, Inc., New York.

Professor Bombwall has analysed the social, constitutional, and political forces and factors that have helped shape the present-day federal system in India. The book contains four main hypotheses: 1) Due to the size of the Indian subcontinent and its regional diversities, a federal structure of government was not only unavoidable, but inevitable: 2) Federalism was a logical development of the British decision to introduce responsible government in India: 3) Rising Nationalism on one hand and the British encouraged separatist demands, communal as well as feudal, on the other, could only be reconciled through the promotion of "national unity within regional diversity"; and 4) India's experience with federalism has been successful and the system has come of age.

The author examines these hypotheses in detail and relies heavily on information generally available in public documents and a number of partial studies on the subject. His method understandably is historical and more than two-thirds of the book is devoted to an analysis of the developments before the constitution of free India came into force in 1950. New insights, however, are readily visible throughout the discussion which help the reader gain a better understanding of the past developments. For instance, it has been generally believed that until the Montford Reforms of 1919 when "Dyarchy" was introduced in the Provinces, the British rule symbolized the epitomy of Central authority in India. Professor Bombwall's insightful discussion of the developments points toward an opposite direction, that a significant delegation of power to the Provinces started as early as 1861 with the enactment of Indian Councils Act (pp 57-93).

The obvious stepstones to Indian Federalism, of course, began with the Montford Reforms (Supra) and The Government of India Act of 1935 when "Provincial Autonomy" was introduced. The author expresses the view, shared by many, that if the federal structure envisaged in the 1935 Act had come to fruition and if Indian leaders had not failed in resolving the Hindu-Muslim question the partition of the country could have been avoided through a federal system of government. (After all, though the diversity of Indian subcontinent is readily visible, its unity is much deeper. It is a single geographical and economic unit and did maintain political unity for prolonged periods of time).

The partition of the country changed the social and political setting radically. Gone were the restraints of communal demands and feudal and princely obstructionist devices receded into background. A new concept of federalism with a strong center came into being. Here again, Professor Bombwall convincingly counters the general belief that India with its "federal structure and unitary spirit" is not a "true" federation. He points out that the framers of Indian Constitution realized rather early in the game the nature of modern federal governments where Central authority inevitably comes to assume a policy-making role for the entire nation and also recognized the dual problem of the emergent polity-the maintenance and consolidation of Indian national unity along with rapid economic development through national planning. In this sense, Indian federalism is not only a more accurate reflection of current practice, but also is more functional in terms of its contemporary needs (p. 296).

Finally, discussing the experience since independence, the author maintains that despite a further growth in the powers of the Central government, mainly due to national planning and a virtually monopolistic dominance of a single political party at the Center and the States for twenty years, a new political "balance of power" has begun to emerge. And with the 1967 elections we can look forward to the establishment of a true partnership between the Center and the States.

This is an "old fashioned" book—no tables, charts or graphs, yet it is systematic, detailed, and scholarly. Professor Bombwall has made a needed and valuable contribution to our understanding of the Indian experience with federalism.—Baljit Singh, Michigan State University.

Laissez-faire-Pluralismus: Demokratie und Wirtschaft des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters. Ed. by Goetz Briefs. (Berlin: Duncker and Humblot, 1966, Pp. xiv, 532. 59.60 DM.)

The West German economic recession of 1966-1967 has demonstrated that even the muchheralded "economic miracle" created by the former minister of economics and chancellor Ludwig Erhard could not last forever. Since December 1966 the coalition cabinet composed of Christian Democrats and Social Democrats has veered away from the Erhard neo-liberal model of encouraging a competitive social-market economy to a Keynesian model of engaging in a massive pump priming program whenever necessary. Under the skillful touch of Minister of Economics Karl Schiller, a Social Democrat, and Minister of Finance Franz-Josef Strauss, chief of the Christian Social Union, the recession is ebbing, as government expenditures are cut and deficit financing and public investment programs are embarded upon.

Since this book, edited and primarily authored by Professor Goetz Briefs, was published before the West German recession had gained momentum, one can only surmise what position the chief author would take presently. Professor Briefs, teaching at Georgetown University and at the Technical University at Berlin, obviously has sympathies for the classical liberal system of the nineteenth century, but realizes that such a system could not be operative in a modern industrial system. Thus in the context of the contemporary period he seems to be supporting those neo-liberals who advocate a mix of a free enterprise system with some government regulation, if only interest associations were to refrain from putting governments under excessive pressure.

As he surveys the relationship of interest associations to governments in the nineteenth century, he finds those situations ideal where associations representing labor and peasants were weak and where they served primarily to correct existing inequalities. But as he surveys the contemporary neo-liberal or semi-planned economies not only of the Federal Republic of Germany but also of Western Europe and the United States he concludes that the interest associations have become so powerful in a pluralistic environment that they constitute a threat to the existing order.

Thus, he is especially highly critical of trade unions, such as the American longshoremen's unions which have the power to paralyze shipping along the entire eastern or western seaboard for weeks on time. Briefs claims: "The democratic process hangs on one thread when mighty trade union leaders have it in their power through strike threats to bring it to a standstill" (p. 287). The threat is even graver, he maintains, when a strong labor party is allied with trade unions, hence combining political and extra-political weapons, such as a mass strike.

But what Briefs forgets in this sharp indictment is that none other but the German trade unions called a mass strike in 1920 at the time of the right wing Kapp Putsch when the very existence of the democratic Weimar regime was threatened. And if the trade unions had called a mass strike in July 1932 when Chancellor von Papen ousted the legitimate Prussian coalition government headed by Social Democrats then perhaps the Nazi seizure of power might have been averted. Thus the trade unions might often act as the champions of democracy rather than its killers. In addition, as shown in Great Britain, Scandinavia, and recently in the Federal Republic of Germany, when socialists are in or share power, they tend to restrain exorbitant wage demands made by organized labor.

Moreover, Briefs fails to equate the power of business with that of labor. In many democratic countries conservative business interests wield much political, economic, and financial power, and are prone to support non-democratic movements. Thus, a certain balance is missing in his indictment of the power of interest groups in modern democratic systems.

Of course the author raises significant questions to which contemporary societies have not yet found satisfactory answers. As interest groups become increasingly powerful, can the state be more than a broker of their claims? Will the groups be able to undermine the fabric of government, and reduce further the role of the individual in society? The author is most pessimistic when looking into the crystal ball. He sees associations determining price, wage and taxation policy, even in planned economies. He sees the danger of welfare states turning to absolutism and totalitarianism under the flag of democracy. He sees democracies losing their "moral and metaphysical" foundations.

What remedies does the author suggest to prevent these trends? The supremacy of the state to promote the general welfare must be established, while the interest groups must be relegated to the "societal space." This can be accomplished if the activities of interest groups are limited to legitimate economic tasks now taken over by the state.

But, we may ask, will not a powerful state lead to new dangers? And who will determine the nature and content of general welfare? Given these problems and given the dynamics of political and economic movements will the advocates of a modified laissez-faire pluralism win out in the end? The weakness of liberal parties in Great Britain and on the continent would suggest that their academic supporters face many obstacles in gaining converts to their cause.

In addition to this thought-provoking essay (317 pages long), three other authors contribute shorter pieces on the state, law, and welfare (Dr. Bernd Bender); inflationary forces in a pluralistic free economy (Professor Cyril Zebot); and wage and profit policy in an industrial society (Professor Hanss-Joachim Rustow).—Gerard Braunthal, University of Massachusetts.

An Essay on Marxian Economics. By Joan Robinson. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1966. Pp. xxiv. 104, $3.50.).

Aims and Methods of Soviet Planning. By Mik-HAIL BOR. (New York: International Publishers, 1967. Pp. 255. $6.95.)

It is a pleasure to welcome and to highly recommend to the reader the revised text, with an added new introduction, of Professor Joan Robinson's enduring classic, first published a quarter of a century ago. This book deservedly achieved its reputation as probably the hest critical introduction to Marxian economics, written by one of the leading economists of our time—remarkably versed in modern economic theory to which she so much contributed.

"The purpose of this essay is to compare the economic analysis of Marx's Capital with current academic teaching" we read in a foreword to the first edition. The book is also an assault on and a searching criticism of "traditional orthodox economics," expressing Mrs. Robinson's profound discontent with the state of economic science. What finally emerges is an admirably lucid, succinct, critical, and searching, but very sympathetic commentary on the three volumes of Capital. Mrs. Robinson stresses the crucial contribution of Marx and evaluates the differentia specifica of the Marxian approach to economic problems. Since Capital is representative of the "nineteenth-century metaphysical habits of thought . . . alien to a generation brought up to inquire into the meaning of meaning," Mrs. Robinson "tried to translate Marx's concepts into language that an academic could understand. This puzzled and angered the professed Marxists, to whom the metaphysic is precious for its own sake." (vii-viii) There is no need to turn Marx, "as many seek to do, into an inspired prophet. He regarded himself as a serious thinker, and it is as a serious thinker that I have endeavoured to treat him." (5)

Mrs. Robinson maintains that Marx was a precursor of the modern theory of effective demand. There is a germ of truth in a joke that Marx was "a little-known forerunner" of Kalecki and Keynes. (vi) Marx was predominantly concerned with explaining the genesis, development, and structure of a capitalist economy. In his analytical scheme the theory of exploitation—theory of distribution of industry's net product between wages and profit-emanated from the theory of value (relative prices). The unfortunate association of the two concepts has been a "plentiful source of confusion." (vii) Mrs. Robinson remarks: "The concept of value seems to me to be a remarkable example of how a metaphysical notion can inspire original thought, though in itself it is quite devoid of operational meaning." (xi) According to the third volume of Capital, under developed capitalism, value is modified into the price of production and commodities produced with dissimilarly constituted capital. Under competition the conversion of surplus value into an average rate of profit expresses the principle of equal profit on equal capital, and is the essence of the transformation of value into the price of production. I would be inclined to join Mrs. Robinson in her argument that "the transformation is from prices into values, not the other way." (xi)

I can only allude here to Mrs. Robinson's illuminating discussion of value under socialism. No doubt, "no system of prices based upon costs will prove practicable," and the recent debates in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe attest to it. Moreover, it is the marginal cost, rather than the average as reckoned by Marx, that, in most cases, is relevant for decision-making.

Mrs. Robinson notes the new trends in economic thought: "Nowadays the academics are impatient of static analysis; the classical problems of growth and development have come back into fashion, reviving interest in the classical economists and Marx amongst them." (vi) On the other hand, there is a discernible trend among Marxists to separate ideology from analytical tools of economics and to apply these tools to real problems. It is difficult to disagree with her comment that "on both sides a radical rethinking of the theory of prices is evidently required." (xxi)

Professor Bor's book emerged from a report prepared for the United Nations. It is presented with an interesting introduction by Maurice Dobb. The stated aim is "to tell readers how national economic planning developed in the U.S.S.R. and what methods it now adopts." (8) Professor Bor is one of the leading Soviet authorities on planning. He is particularly known for his refinements of the material balances techniques and as an advocate of the need for an integrated (over-all balance) approach to economic planning. His book constitutes a notable effort to rationalize planning as practices in the U.S.S.R. He also devotes some space to changes in the approach to planning techniques. In the final chapter of his book he contrasts Soviet planning with indicative planning, with more partiality than could be desired, as witnessed by his comment that "far from introducing any essential changes in the capitalist mode of production, programming only accentuates the class contradictions in it." (246)

Before turning to a Western evaluation of Soviet planning the interested reader will undoubtedly wish to refer to a first hand account by a Soviet scholar who for over a quarter of a century participated in shaping the planning techniques. However, it should be noted that Professor Bor does not belong in the ranks of the new school of Soviet planometrics. There is much that is traditional in his thinking.

When reading his work one should keep in mind that the Soviet planning system was primarily designed for swift, massive, and expedient redirection of resources for forced and rapid industrialization, relying primarily on extensive use of resources and nonmarket instruments. It is a moot question whether with a different growth strategy and alternative working arrangements the results would have been better. Be it as it may, it seems that at the present stage, with the necessary shift to intensive use of resources, a radical changeover in plan construction and working arrangements is mandatory. But what is the nature and optimum combination of the plan and the market, what is the objective function of the economy, and what are the necessary and sufficient conditions for the success of the alterations—are all vital, fascinating, complex, and yet unresolved questions.—George R. Feiwel, The University of Tennessee.

The Politics of Conformity in Latin America. Ed. By Claudio Veliz. (London: Oxford University Press, 1967. Pp. x, 291. $7.00.)

The editor states this book was to have been entitled, "The Politics of Change in Latin America," focussing on the ideas and activities of those groups "most obviously and efficiently determined to bring about profound changes in the institutional structures of Latin American society." But the forthcoming contributions instead revealed these groups as primarily seeking to gain a higher position in the existing social structure, and to protect the structure by preventing fundamental change. A reading of the contributions indicates, however, that the present title is somewhat misleading, since one finds analyses of deviant and innovative as well as conformist political behavior.

E. J. Hobsbawm documents the massive migration of the rural poor to the cities since the 1930's, and the consequences of this demographic transition for the emergence of populist political parties. He suggests that while there is a temporary lull in urban mass politics, we can anticipate demands for radical transformation from the urban proletariat in the future. In a careful analysis of the Mexican ejido, Francois Chevalier points out that the achievements of the Mexican Revolution, especially under Cardenas, in the extension and preservation of communal and private small landholdings, is threatened by over-population and the growth of a younger urban and rural generation for whom these achievements are not likely to be considered sufficient. Conformity in the sense of preserving the achievements of the past will not assure future political stability in Mexico.

Alistair Hennessy's wide-ranging dissussion of university students does not support the editor's assertion that they are essentially conformist. While social mobility is a major individual motive for university attendance, collective student protest constitutes a continuing pressure on governments for major reform, while former student leaders are seeking to modernize their societies in Venezuela, Cuba, Chile and elsewhere. Collective student conformism is best exemplified in resistance to university modernization, leading to government attempts to depoliticize the university through both repression and reorganization.

In the major theoretical contribution of the book, José Nun argues persuasively that the military coup represents the interests of the middle class, compensating for its inability to achieve hegemony, rather than constituting a threat to the middle class or serving the interests of national development. Hugh Thomas disputes the thesis that the Cuban Revolution was a middle-class protest movement betrayed, arguing instead that the absence of liberal institutions and the compromise of business with the Batista regime left responsible middle-class politicos in a weak position from which to oppose Castro's radical program.

Papers by Oscar Cornblit and Emauel de Kadt discuss respectively the suppression of immigrant industrialist interests by Argentine political parties, and the role of the Church as both conservative and innovative political force in Brazilian political change. Finally, Richard N. Adams discusses the relations among social class, power and prestige without locating his analysis within specified political and social systems, and without proposing answers to clearly defined theoretical or substantive problems, virtues present in most of the other papers.

To summarize, this collection constitutes on the whole a valuable contribution to the growing literature on Latin American politics, especially where the authors confront prevailing interpretations with well-reasoned and documented alternative analyses. One might prefer, however, that such a collection would produce a better payoff for the reader, and a better contribution to Latin American studies, were it to focus on the analysis of a single phenomenon, such as the distribution of power, class structure and relationships, or the rural proletariat, viewed from a shared theoretical perspective, and focussing on this phenomenon comparatively in each of several Latin American societies. But this is perhaps a personal preference, and if it points to a weakness in this book, it is one shared by many others in the field.—Ken-NETH N. WALKER, University of Toronto.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW, AND ORGANIZATION

Force, Order and Justice. By ROBERT E. OSGOOD AND ROBERT W. TUCKER. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1967. Pp. viii, 374. $10.00.)

This is a difficult book to discuss. It is divided into two parts, each by a different author, which are meant to arrive at the same goal by different paths. The two parts do not really fit together, however, and they are also of strikingly different quality. Professor Osgood's section, an historical discussion of changes in the means of international violence, the role of violence, and strategic thinking about its use over the last two centuries, is disappointing, often unoriginal, and unsatisfactory; Professor Tucker's essay, addressed strictly to normative concerns, is stimulating, original, and valuable.

Osgood's introductory chapter, on the insuperability of obstacles to international order, is a good summary which, as he acknowledges, owes much to Rousseau, Aron, Waltz, Hoffman and others. (It also states a viewpoint that Tucker relies on later, and thus represents the only problem discussed about which one can be certain the authors are in agreement). Osgood then proceeds to give a good brief history of modern warfare up to the nuclear era, demonstrating the failure of both "laissez-faire" (e.g., balance-of-power) and "systemic" (e.g., general disarmament) theories about the control of international violence. In a chapter titled "The Control of Force" he continues with an account of developments since the end of World War II, in which the problems and prospects of nuclear arms control receive an informed and speculative (though not often original) discussion.

Osgood's history is marred, however, by the virtual absence of any consideration of political factors in the expansion and control of force. His emphasis is entirely on developments in weaponry and strategic thinking, and on the gradual breakdown of European alliance systems. Taken in conjunction these factors are said to account for the drastically increased scope and intensity of violence in the last century. But of the political roots of international disorder, the underlying processes -nationalism, imperialism, revolution and the emergence of mass-based governments-which determined that the developments Osgood discusses would have such catastrophic results, almost no mention is made. His preference for regulatory (as opposed to laissez-faire or systemic) controls on force remains merely a prejudice, therefore. The "professional" managers of conflict who are expected to accomplish such regulation seem to be the same kind of people whose strategic thinking is earlier described as having once been so disastrous. Nor are Osgood's assurances that "they" have learned the lessons of the past satisfactory. for it is not the state of decision-makers' intellects but the political forces operating on them which are decisive in setting the direction of their behavior.

For what purposes do the professionals—the theorists and practitioners of nuclear deterrence today—manage force? Cui bono? Professor Osgood's few references to such questions are not reassuring for here, when he does discuss the political dimension of violence, he betrays an often unalloyed cold-war nationalism, as evidenced by the following remarks: ". . . military deterrence in Asia must depend far more than in Europe on local non-nuclear fighting capabilities. Yet no military deterrent can prevent wars that capitalize on the vulnerability of the Third World to insurgency, except by the demonstration through military resistance that such wars will fail or involve too great a risk of disadvantageous escalation." The "Third World" is a concept from the realm of propaganda, not social science; and the theory here put forth is one not of "deterrence" or "regulation" but rather of expansive American power. Osgood rather precisely describes where such thinking has led in the past, but apparently fails to see any connection, and this is discouraging since he is presumably a professional manager of force himself.

Professor Tucker's contribution, a discussion of the philosophy of force developing contemporaneously with the events Osgood describes, is of a different order altogether. His is a lucid, often brilliant treatment of normative judgments and their empirical roots and consequences: still the sort of thing that political science does best. Among the propositions for which he offers persuasive argument the following are the most challenging: 1) The perceived aversion to force in modern times is unfortunately accompanied by a ready ability to justify its excessive use, 2) The "moral economy" of force depends largely on its quantitative effects, and the development of nuclear weapons therefore heightens all preexisting dilemmas about the use of force. 3) Rules for the restraint of force are in practice completely fragile as long as the rightfulness of any degree of force thought requisite for preservation of the state in extremis is accepted; the theory of nuclear deterrence, which proposes to police "limited" wars with the underlying threat of utter destruction, is the ultimate expression of this essential incompatibility between the idea of limits and the idea that national self-protection is necessary for the preservation of individual and communal happiness.

Tucker's own view of the role of force is ambiguous, since he recognizes both the sometime validity of the argument from necessity and the perverse uses to which it is often put. (Indeed, his discussion of the intellectual and physical crimes committed in the name of raison d'état is both trenchant, and happily free of Osgood's nationalism). He offers a qualified "optimism" about the prospects for successful deterrence and "crisis management" regulation. This solution to the problem of force is also Osgood's, and here Tucker's analysis is like Osgood's in being not political enough: his idea of a "new beginning" seems at the moment to be wishful thinking (though that is surely preferable to nationalist bias). After his previous comments, this conclusion is surprising. At the end, however, he does note the extent of the disaster that will occur if his optimism proves unjustified, and asserts that we must somehow go "beyond deterrence" eventually (which is the point that Osgood ignores). Having pointed out the critical need for some world order, and the presently insuperable obstacles to it, he has taken his analysis as far as it can go. The result, in any event, is an essay well worth reading and rereading.—Philip Green, Smith College.

The Trial of the Germans. By EUGENE DAVIDSON. (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1967. Pp. vii, 636. $12.50.)

Yet another book on the Nazi Era—could well be ones first reaction to the title of Eugene Davidson's The Trial of the Germans. That reaction could be followed by a second one, upon reading the sub-title "An Account of the Twenty-two Defendants Before the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg": Why rehash the Nuremberg Trials more than twenty years after they occurred?

After reading Mr. Davidson's voluminous account and perusing his twenty-two page bibliography which is a painstaking collection of Allied and German primary and secondary sources, both contemporary and historical, and covers the entire period of the Third Reich as well as much of the material of the Trials, I submit that this book be ranked the definitive one volume study on Nuremberg.

It is not only a very scholarly volume, but it raises the questions of the Nuremberg Trials—the legal as well as the moral ones—in a manner and at a time that make this book a major addition to the bookshelf of the historian, the political scientist, the international lawyer, the legal scholar, but above all, the political decision-maker in the age of nuclear weapons, total war, and such "undeclared" warfare as Vietnam.

The leaders of National Socialism and the architects of the Thousand Year Reich come to life again in the book the twenty-four originally named the twenty-two who stood trial of whom eleven were sentenced to "death by hanging"; those who would be tried later; and those who did not have the courage to face the consequences of their actions which resulted in the deaths of millions of innocent people, and escaped trial by suicide.

Grouped into the major political, social and economic institutions which were the pillars of the Third Reich, the reader encounters once more Julius Streicher, at the "Core of the Conspiracy": "The Number-Two Man," Hermann Goering; Bormann, Hess (the only man still in Spandau Prison and probably the only one of the defendants who should have been committed to a mental hospital) and Rosenberg representing the NSDAP in "Action and Theory." "The Diplomats," Ribbentrop, Neurath, and Papen; Schacht and Funk for "the Party and Big Business": Frick "The Law" and "Youthleader" Baldur von Schirach: "Party, Police, and Army" are tried in the persons of Kaltenbrunner, Keitel and Jodl; and Grandadmirals Raeder and Doenitz representing "The Navy." The final chapters of the book deal with "The Proconsults," Frank and Seyss-Inquart: Speer and Sauckel, who were charged with "Building the War Plant" on "Forced Labor," and the "Propagandist" Hans Fritzsche making a poor substitute for Goebbels who had taken his own life.

Each one of the men and his ambitions, his rise to power, his weaknesses and vices in many cases, his strengths in some instances, as well as their pettiness and rivalries, their visions and blindness are portrayed with painstaking accuracy, based on thorough examination of memoirs, documents, records of interrogations, and on what friends, rivals and foes said about the defendants. Their behavior during the various stages of power in their lives and while they stood in the dock as accused is described and analyzed. If most of them emerge as a weak, sick and sorry lot, it is because that is what they were-not of what the author made them. By the same token, the Tribunal, the Prosecutors, and the Defense appear as they must have been-and in the sober light of hindsight some of their actions are as petty and sorry and as motivated by blind zealousness and political overeagerness as most of the defendant's actions had been in earlier days.

In his meticulous examination of the Trial records and his fair narration Eugene Davidson presents all facets of the drama at Nuremberg: the arguments of judges and prosecutors, the struggle of the defense lawyers to obtain evidence on behalf of their clients, the ideological orientations of the justices representing the Allied powers, and the attitudes of the defendants towards their former superiors, who had escaped the trial by suicide, and their behavior towards each other as well as their responses to their charges. The greatest merit of the book, however, is the re-examination by its author of the moral and legal questions raised by Nuremberg, the complex issues of "war guilt," "crimes against humanity," and "preparations to wage war." These issues have been confronting mankind since the beginning of time, but they have taken on new, vast dimensions with the systematic extermination programs of innocent peoples devised by the National Socialists as well as the large-scale killing of soldiers and civilians in total warfare.

Davidson concludes his first chapter with the observation that the Nuremberg Trials served as "catharsis of the pent-up emotions of millions of people" which had to be provided, and as a "record of what had taken place duly preserved for whatever use later generations would make of it." "The record would not completely document the infamy in the twentieth century, but it would reveal one vast concentration of evil that could be exorcised."

The final chapter, an evaluation "Two Decades Later," defends Nuremberg as a "political event," "if not as a court." In it, the Nuremberg Tribunal is assessed as of doubtful legal validity, but once more its role in pinpointing the moral issues confronting mankind in our age of kill and overkill is stressed. The book presents an autopsy of an era, but the author goes one step further, he does what a true scholar should do—once the facts have been presented as accurately as possible, he tries to relate them to the norms and values which must be our concern in this age of ideology and total warfare.—Elke Frank, Hunter College, City University of New York.

The Years of Opportunity: The League of Nations, 1920-1926. By Byeon Dexter. (New York: Viking Press, 1967. Pp. xxiii, 264. $8.50.)

Politics and Diplomacy of Peacemaking: Containment and Counterrevolution at Versailles, 1918-1919. By Arno J. Mayer. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1967. Pp. viii, 918. xx. $15.00.)

New perspectives on the Versailles settlements and the early history of the League of Nations, such as those suggested by the titles of these works, are overdue. Neither book, however, provides convincing explanation of the interpretive thesis which its title suggests. Neither faces up to the task of explicitly relating the historical record to an appraisal of the possible and the probable. The gap between what is asserted or assumed and what is demonstrated is partially closed by argument in Dexter's book, but one wishes for more evidence; in Mayer's lengthy work, citation abound, but no sustained attempt is made to show just what it is that they prove.

Byron Dexter, the long-time managing editor of Foreign Affairs, has written an interpretive essation "the general reader." The book is padded by discursive background commentary and by the texts of the Covenant and the Charter, leaving only about 120 pages which deal with the first seven years of the League. It provides a mellow resume which is not inaccurate (except for the assertion that Japan did not submit reports on in mandate in the Pacific) but which immerses events in atmospherics so deeply that they lose outline. Discussion of the Mosul opinion of the Permanent Court, for example, which could hardly have been less incisive, is followed by the comment: "It was a very interesting judicial opinion, following a line of reasoning along curves that caused eyebrows to be raised among lawyers."

The principal thesis, however, is clearly set forth and is worthy of attention, for it contrasts both with an orthodoxy which has long prevailed and with the assumptions of the Mayer book. The "opportunity" which Dexter sees was to make use of the League as the instrument of Britain and France in maintaining a settlement which, on the whole, was fair and moderate. The crisis for the League was the attempt to maintain an effective guarantee of the territorial provisions of Versailles as an essential condition for disarmament and the reconstruction of Germany, through the Draft Treaty of Mutual Assistance and the Geneva Protocol. "The pacifist illusions of the time," however, gave Stresemann the opportunity through adroit appeal to deprive the League of the "core of organized power" which was needed for collective security and to turn it into an instrument of appeasement through the Locarno agreements. While Locarno "did not itself produce Hitler," it "guaranteed the success of his strategy."

Mayer's work, in contrast, is a major feat of historical scholarship. Following his Political Origins of the New Diplomacy, 1917-1918 by eight years, it represents an exhaustive exploration of available sources in many countries. At the very least, it is a vast compendium of contemporary comment. Unfortunately, it is not much more than that.

It is clear that the author has brought to his work a viewpoint based on conviction. In the preface, he deplores the tendency "either to avoid crucial controversial issues or to treat them in terms consonant with the current conventional wisdom" and gives credit to several "fellow internal exiles" for having "fortified" his "critical outlook." Already his work has been hailed by the New Left for having identified the origins of what it sees as the main theme of American diplomacy: "Containment and Counterrevolution." But nowhere in a very long work is there more than a sketchy statement of the interpretative thesis or an attempt to weight its merits in comparison with other viewpoints or emphases. In part, it is because the present work is a sequel that one feels a lack of orientation. The main categories are established in the earlier book and the various strands of political and social movements in the several countries are identified. But one looks in vain there also for an appraisal of options which justifies the categories.

In Mayer's approach, "the forces of order" confront "the forces of movement." In "this first round of the international civil war of the twentieth century," the European Right undertook the "twin assignment of stabilizing governments throughout Europe and of containing if not destroying the Russian Revolution." They used the "spuriously inflated bogy of Bolshevism" in calculated efforts both to advance foreign policy goals and to fortify political positions at home. It might appear that "the clamor for a punitive peace" was not the best approach to these objectives. In Mayer's view, however, this "was stirred up as part of a vast political design" the purpose of which was not to fend off the revolutionary Left but "to rout and destroy the very core of the forces of change, . . . pre-emptively" before it could rally around Wilson and make gains toward "the forty-eight hour week, collective bargaining, graduated income taxes, and social welfare measures." Wilson and Lloyd George, who correctly, Mayer points out, "rejected the conspiratorial view of the Russian Revolution," fell victim, it would seem, to this counter-conspiracy of the Right.

Ultimately, it is a matter of taste and of philosophy whether one accepts a conspiratorial (or a counter-conspiratorial) view of history. Neither proof nor disproof is likely to be convincing. It must be pointed out, however, that a thesis may gain currency and prestige from the apparent substance of narrative and citation to which it is related. It is almost an earmark of revisionist history to mobilize detail and disregard proportion: one thinks of Tansill and of Beard. In my opinion, the mass of evidence which Mayer sets forth does not support his view. It is an extended catalog of folly rather than a telling collection of clews. It shows the blindness and despair of men overwhelmed both from within and from without by forces not comprehended, and taking refuge in nationalism, rather than conspiratorial calculation. It induces renewed respect for Wilson and even engenders sympathy for Lloyd George. In this new time of turmoil, it is poignant reading indeed.

One matter of revisionism in style should be noted. Mayer has succumbed to two expressions which are dear to undergraduates but which have rarely if ever appeared in serious writing. Neither was used in his earlier work. In the belief that they constitute linguistic decay rather than linguistic development, I have woven them into a concluding assessment: While I am "not about to" deny the value of this work as documentation of popular and political responses to a turbulence which swept across national boundaries, it is "not all that" valuable as an interpretation of the moves and the motives of the men at Versailles.—Whitney T. Perkins, Brown University.

The Functioning of the International Political System. By Andrew M. Scott. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1967. Pp. x, 244. $3.95.)

Professor Scott seeks in this essay to apply systems theory to the field of international politics. He is inspired to do so by his disenchantment with the persistent vogue of the "view of world politics that has been dominant for generations." Founded on the "obsolete" concepts of equilibrium and balance of power this traditional view is unable to cope with new realities, fails to avail itself of modern empirical techniques and is of little use in the practical exercise of problem-solving and policy formation. Yet the "new approaches" which treat today's problems with today's techniques have failed to make this old approach the relic it deserves to be. No one has as yet gathered these new approaches together and presented them in an ordered fashion.

What is needed is a new method. The author proposes to use systems analysis which has the capability of integrating these new yet disparate approaches into a coherent whole. The integrating mechanism is the "vocabulary" of systems analysis which "makes possible the conversion of separate currencies into a common currency" linking together "observations relating to nationalism, loyalty, ideology, capabilities, statecraft, collaboration, conflict, escalation, deterrence, negotiation, decison-making, communication, community formation and so on" (p. 9).

His second point is a promise not to clutter his model with normative assumptions. He admits that systems theory is no freer from involvement with normative elements than the theories of yesterday, but he does not propose to substitute a new set for the old. He explicitly rejects models such as Easton's "authoritative allocation of values" and anthropomorphic and teleological "baggage" such as "systems maintenance" and pursuit of goals. To be effective, he claims, the systems approach must produce a value-free framework "hospitable to many types of supporting analysis."

Professor Scott then uses the vocabulary of systems analysis to describe the "new approaches." International relations, the nation-states, governments and politicians are replaced by such terminology as systems, subsystems, actors and decision-makers. The language stresses the interrelationship of the "individuals, organizations and nation-states" that make up the international system. It also succeeds in dividing the new approaches into two categories—one dealing with activities occurring within a system, the other with activities occurring between or among systems. Creation of images, ideology, communication and decision-making are examples of intrasystemic phenomena; they are either attributes of specific systems, as would be the case of ideology, or are specific functional systems in themselves, such as communication. Intersystemic activities may be exemplified by negotiation, deterrence, threats, conflict and collaboration. The latter category clearly demands a plurality of systems. To sum up, the first category presupposes interaction among disparate functions within a unified whole. The second presupposes interaction between or among unified wholes. The point is that both intrasystemic and intersystemic activities and the approaches which analyze them deal with aspects or parts or a larger whole but not with the whole itself. Thus the new approaches emerge as applicable to elements of the whole international system. but not to the system itself.

What is this total system? The application of systems language to the new approaches suggests that the model of a system at a subordinate level is a self-contained unit composed of complementary interrelated parts. It follows that the maximal system—in this case the international system -should be structurally similar. But the picture of the international system which emerges bit by bit as one makes his way through the book turns out to be a different type. One is first told that the international system is a "conflict" system. Then it is asserted that the system is evolutionary. And finally, in a burst of candid prescriptive rhetoric, the reader is apprised that the defects of the international system stem from a characteristically unsystemic lack of capability to provide direction and purpose. The system "has been seriously deficient in rules, norms, and institutions to facilitate collaboration and to regulate conflict" which "can be remedied only by the development of supplementary forms of (transnational) authority" (p. 230f). The Hobbesian world of nation-eat-nation will evolve contractually into one that will in the end produce a world sovereign. It is evident that until such time as the miracle is wrought, normative assumptions which appear not uncongenial to the lesser constellations would be inapplicable to a "system" that has yet to arrive at systemic coherence. Once achieved, however, one is left to wonder if such an ideal world polity, alone and unchallenged by anything but environment, could justifiably be considered a system.

Professor Scott's target appears to be the undergraduate classroom. He has made an interesting contribution by applying systems analysis to the "new approaches" in order to bring them together in a single volume. In attempting to give them place in one all-inclusive theory, however, he has stretched the analytical framework beyond its capability.—Frederic Wurzburg, University of New Hampshire.

The Politics of the Third World. By J. D. B. MILLER. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967. Pp. xiv, 126. $3.75.)

This brief, readable volume begins with the observation that "the Third World [is] a cant phrase, derived from the French tiers monde and used to describe those countries which are plainly neither Communist nor Western." It ends with the conclusion that "A Third World characterized by unity, purpose, and effective tactics is . . . a chimera." In the intervening pages, the author struggles to demonstrate the existence of something resembling that cant phrase while at the same time denying its vitality if not its validity.

Despite the concept's ephemeral nature, however, the author identifies the states that comprise the Third World, analyzes the well-springs of national interest that often undergird their policy determinations, discusses their roles in the United Nations and regional groups, and evaluates their relations with the major powers. Finally, in a chapter entitled "Vulgar Errors," the author attacks what he somewhat patronizingly refers to as "certain illusions about the Third World." This endeavor more so than the rest of the book seems to depend almost wholly on the author's judgments of what motivates Third World states, what exactly they are striving to do, and why. After describing the first "vulgar error" as one of viewing the states as a bloc or harmonious group, the author proceeds to commit what often appears to be the same error by treating them as a unified group in foreign policy attitudes and actions. Yet, his analyses, taken individually, usually make sense to this reviewer. In their demands for trade liberalization without reciprocity, for example, the author asserts that Third World states are not seeking to despoil the advanced countries but to give impetus to an increase in trade that can only serve to enrich both sides. The widely shared myth that the poor countries of the world, like the poor of the American ghettoes, can improve their lot only at the expense of richer states or citizens is one of the most durable and devastating fables. It must be exposed and discarded if some semblance of real stability is ever to be achieved.

Throughout this book, Professor Miller develops interesting if not unique observations concerning the special attributes and needs that characterize the political life of Third World states. Their leaders, he notes, began as agitators for independence who promised great changes once the imperial yoke was removed. Their failure to achieve these kinds of changes has produced a "decaying national movement" in many, and it has become clear (at least to Professor Miller) that two groups are now indispensable: one, the Europeaneducated people in commercial, professional, and administrative posts who are the only ones who can run the government and the economy effectively; and, two, the army, which is the only group that combines discipline, modernization, and opportunity to coerce. The author provides a few examples of military-governed states—Egypt, Nigeria, Burma, Ghana, Pakistan, and Indonesia—but he suggests no evidence that might support a conclusion of indispensability. Although the case for greater "efficiency" is an obvious one, whether a class of technocrats aided by a military elite can evoke the national spirit and call forth the sacrifices of the masses to support a successful modernization effort remains an unresolved question.

Times have also changed in terms of the foreign policy imperatives of Third World states, according to Professor Miller. The early flambovant militancy of the independence movements and the efforts to stay clear of entangling alliances with the East or West established a common bond among them that led to the holding of the Bandung Conference of 1955 and the enunciation of the "Bandung spirit." The abortive effort to hold a "second Bandung" in Algiers in 1965-described appropriately by the author as a "non-event"-leads him to the conclusion that "there is little future for Afro-Asianism as such." Yet, much of the book tends to belie such a sweeping conclusion. More positive bases for developing unity and cooperation than the older anti-colonialism and anti-Westernism are emerging in such fields as trade, aid, development, and United Nations politics. Although the author avoids discussion of human rights, here in particular Afro-Asianism has found a rallying cause that can support a unanimous Third World condemnation of South Africa and Rhodesia as the worst offenders. The efforts of Afro-Asian states to spur the world community into taking effective action against these two major transgressors have, in fact, been far more productive of Afro-Asian unity than of changing policies within the two states. In addition, the terrible destruction that has been visited upon Viet Nam to "protect" it has tended to rekindle a common abhorrence of military alignments that may have been weakened prior to 1965 and the massive American involvement.

The author, who is Professor of International Relations at the Australian National University, has done a generally first-rate job of discussing and interpreting the politics that characterize many Third World states. The book, however, contributes little to scholarly inquiry in the field that is essentially new or helpful to a deeper understanding of the Third World states. One can hardly expect a penetrating, definitive piece of work on such a complex, motley group of entities in little over one hundred pages. But, in spite of this drawback (or conceivably because of it), the book is one that can be highly recommended as a supplement to the introductory international politics course. It should have a stimulating and challenging impact on the student who is in the process of being initiated into the rather nebulous world of international politics because its central themes are developed from a different frame of reference than those found in most textbooks on international politics. Thus, it can supply the student with a new perspective for analyzing and evaluating world politics.—Jack C. Plano, Western Michigan University.

The Intermediaries: Third Parties in International Crises. By Oran R. Young. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1967. Pp. viii, 427. $10.00.)

The author in this volume on third-party intervention in crises asserts that his purpose is to break new ground in generating hypotheses about the management of conflict. He further states that the study is chiefly "an hypothesis-raising" rather than "an hypothesis-testing" effort. The central goal of the various lines of enquiry—six in number—is to outline at least the rudiments of general theory of third-party intervention.

But the theoretical material and apparatus which the author develops, he feels, is not sufficient. To add clarity and relevance to the theoretical material and apparatus, it is necessary to engage in testing of theory by applying it to pragmatic situations. He singles out the peace-keeping effort of the UN as the concrete situation to test, and points out that this form of third-party intervention is currently under the doctrines developed during the Hammarskjöld regime, which "take a dim view of the possibility of constructive United Nations intervention in superpower crises."

Since the international system is changing rapidly (what the author means by "system" is not explained), he advances the proposition that "the overall framework of the international system" including "the more specific relationships between the Soviet Union and the United States, have been moving in directions which place the notion of constructive United Nations intervention in future Soviet-American crises clearly and definitely within the realm of the possible."

While the Hammarskjöld concept of the limits of the United Nations intervention in conflicts between power blocs still prevails today and is likely to remain so in the foreseeable future, the author asserts that the propositions he advances in this volume "are more nearly a set of supplementary ideas than the basis of an alternative to the present theory. . . . In fact, they constitute," in the author's opinion, "a response to the broad spectrum of international crises to which the prevailing theory does not address itself."

These "supplementary ideas" derive from an analysis of the rapid and substantial changes that are presently taking place on a number of fronts. The author observes that there is a decline of bipolarity and a trend toward a pluralistic arrangement of power centers. He describes the developments in this area as focusing on four themes: "1) polycentrism within the established blocs: 2) the declining efficacy of major alliance systems; 3) the rise in the numbers and salience of extrabloc actors; and 4) the emergence (or indicated emergence) of several new 'great' powers." The analysis of these four themes, predicated on a number of possible variables, is highly speculative. However, the speculations appear to be educated ones and require the thoughtful and concentrated attention of the reader.

How then will all this affect the prospects for third-party intervention by which the author, if the reviewer understands him correctly, means the United Nations? Is it likely to reduce or enhance the prospects for third-party intervention? The author continues his speculation, and engages in a somewhat tortuous description of "a full-blown version of a modified balance-of-power" where "the United Nations could come to act more nearly as a concert mechanism than as an independent opinion factor." This, however, the author avers might be a temporary phase since it would very likely be highly unstable. He concludes that "the possibilities of third-party intervention in various situations would almost certainly become salient again." Whether the author's "supplementary ideas," based on predictions such as the "hard shelled" territorial state is declining and that the sense of international community is growing, thanks to the advent of nuclear weapons, will indeed supplement the Hammarskjöld concept, this reviewer can not predict. The author manifests no hesitation in answering the question affirmatively.

The review's conclusion about this book is that the hypothetically minded student of international relations might possibly find the analysis stimulating even if somewhat discursive, and the pragmatically minded, unrealistic and difficult to follow.—David W. Wainhouse, Johns Hopkins University.

French Foreign Policy Under de Gaulle. By Alfred Grosser. (Boston: Little, Brown, & Co., 1967. Pp. xiv, 175. $5.00, $2.50 paper.)

Professor Grosser first presented this sensible, perceptive guide to contemporary French foreign policy as a lecture course at the Institute of Political Studies in Paris in 1964. The Club Jean Moulin sponsored its publication in France and now it has survived the difficult trans-Atlantic passage. Despite the lapse of time in the fast-moving world of diplomacy, the book holds up well.

Professor Grosser begins with the proposition that foreign policy may be evaluated on the basis of the extent to which it has "attained the goals for which it was intended." His concluding chapter, using that criterion contends that de Gaulle's "positive record is short, and the negative record very long." In between, chapters examine that record with respect to Algeria, tropical Africa, Franco-German relations, Europe, defense, and East-West relations and NATO, Prefatory chapters deal with the record of the Fourth Republic and de Gaulle's foreign policy conceptions. An epilogue carries the account forward from 1965 to 1967. Professor Stanley Hoffmann of Harvard University wrote a special foreword and the author revised the epilogue for the American editions and Lois Ames Pattison made the very competent translation.

The author does not apply his criterion to de Gaulle systematically, nor does the material lend itself to such application consistently. Often, de Gaulle's goals are not defined publicly or are so ill defined as to be useless in attempting to evaluate his success.

Take Algeria, for instance. What goal did de Gaulle have in Algeria in 1958? Integration? Independence? Autonomy? One may argue very plausibly that he had no goal except to end the war as soon as possible while preserving as much of French influence and interests as possible. If so did he succeed? No one can say. No one knows what was possible. Grosser believes that "de Gaulle did not, from the beginning, desire the policy that he adopted in the end," that he wanted Algeria to have "a sort of internal autonomy," rather than full independence. If so he failed. By Grosser's criterion, de Gaulle also failed in tropical Africa, His "community on a federal model" collapsed within two years and de Gaulle was compelled to improvise another facade behind which French control might be maintained. So, too, with his policies toward the western alliance. Neither NATO nor Britain nor West Germany nor Spain has become a suitable weapon in his assault on the United States. Grosser sees "the most important aspect of other European countries have not yet become aware of that role." He may, indeed, be playing that role as he sees it, but as long as "his five European partners are in fundamental disagreement with him," he cannot play it very well. Is that success?

Grosser is especially severe in evaluating de Gaulle's military policy. He believes that conventional forces would be more effective for French defense, especially as de Gaulle's nuclear force lacks that essential element of deterrence-credibility. But, is defense de Gaulle's goal? If so, only conjecture can measure its success until-or-unlesshis force fails to deter. If not, what is his goal? In either case, the problem of evaluation by Grosser's criterion is very difficult.

Quite apart from problems of application, moreover, one is obliged to ask whether the author's criterion is adequate. De Gaulle suggested another criterion himself in The Edge of the Sword: "men are remembered less for the usefulness of what they have achieved than for the sweep of their endeavors"

By that criterion, de Gaulle fares well. The restoration of France to great power status, the use of NATO to control American foreign policy globally, the elevation of balance-of-power politics to a global plane, the organization of a bloc of neutral nations behind France, and the replacement of American influence in Latin America are sweeping endeavors, indeed. But, is the amount of remembrance as important as the cause? Is de Gaulle to be remembered as the greatest showman since Barnum or as a great statesman who maximized French power and influence.

To answer that question one must adopt different criteria than either Grosser or de Gaulle. Does not "the usefulness of what they have achieved" evaluate statesmanships? Should not de Gaulle be judged by the extent to which he has served the enlightened self-interest of France than by the glamor of his performance or his ability to achieve such goals as he chooses?

Grosser's selection of criteria and his failure to apply them systematically detract from the value of this essay. Nevertheless, it deserves the attention of serious students of French and international affairs. The author is an astute, perceptive Gaullogist who sheds much light on his subject. We will be much in his debt when he writes for the Fifth Republic as systematic and scholarly a study as his La Quatrieme République et sa politique extérieure.—William G. Andrews, State University of New York, Brockport.

The Sea in Modern Strategy. By L. W. MARTIN. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. 190, $5.00.)

There is hardly any question that the grand concepts of war at sea as developed primarily by Alfred T. Mahan have lost their glorious individuality. The reasons for this are at least three-fold. First, the nuclear weapon sits perched above all considerations of war, and, despite much talk about "firebreaks" and the "tradition of non-use," the super-powers can hardly envisage a major war between themselves in which there is little danger of nuclear weapons being used. One of the results of this circumstance is that it inhibits conceiving of a war which is both on a grand scale and prolonged, which is the kind of war that makes the classical naval strategy come to life. Second, with sea forces able to throw inland and land forces able to hurl out to sea missiles or aircraft capable easily of three thousand miles range, the previously sharp distinction between the dominion of the sea and that of land has become exceedingly blurred. Third, we live in a world in which, at least so far as surface and naval air power are concerned, there is really only one great sea power, the United States. The Soviet Union has a formidable submarine fleet, and, after some backtracking, is now adding substantially to her surface fleet. Nevertheless, despite its tremendous advances in performance since World War II, the submarine (where it is not a strategic weapons launcher) is still mostly an instrument for challenging maritime control rather than establishing it, and the Soviet surface fleet is not the kind of challenge to U.S. naval power that we have observed in naval races of the past.

One might also add that insofar as naval operations like those conducted in 1950-1953 around Korea and since 1964 around Vietnam need to be described in strategic terms, the conceptions handed down by Mahan and others still do well enough. At least, our present author seems to think so, and I believe he is right. This situation very much affects what is left to write about.

On the other hand, large sums of money are being spent on naval armaments, in which there have been very great changes since the end of World War II. These changes, as well as comparably drastic changes, which have occurred also in the political climate, call for continuing clarification of the appropriate character and functioning of modern naval arms under those various sets of circumstances that appear sufficiently probable to warrant the kind of anticipation which costs money.

Hardly more than two years ago we had the work by Admiral Sir Peter Gretton, Maritime Strategy: but Professor Martin has justified the assumption of himself and of the Institute for Strategic Studies, under whose auspices he produced the present book, that there was room for yet another approach. Admiral Gretton's book and this one are, after all, the only new books of their kind that have been available for some time, and the market has therefore hardly been surfeited.

Professor Martin first examines the nature of modern naval forces. He has done his homework well, and the disposition to do so is usually an excellent substitute for a high security clearance—without entailing the disabilities often clinging to the latter. Professor Martin then moves on to consider such things as the use of sea power in "wars of intervention" characterized by Korea and Vietnam, and "occasions for limited war at sea" where he discusses among other things the curious view originally put forward by Mr. Paul Nitze and apparently embraced also by Mr. Robert S.

McNamara (although neither is mentioned in this connection in the book) that naval power acting by itself may on occasion serve an important role in restraining enemy aggression, thereby presumably making it unnecessary for troops to become involved in the mud and jungles of another Vietnam. I think the generally negative attitude which Professor Martin shows to this idea is entirely correct. Other chapters, among the total of eight, bear titles like "Cost and the Naval Balance" and "Sea Power and Non-Belligerent Action," which adequately describe their content.

This is an honest book, and it contains a good deal of useful information. It is also intelligently organized. I wish it were possible for me to be more enthusiastic about it. The reasons I cannot, lie in the tone of the book, both stylistically and intellectually. The writing is clear enough, but exceedingly and everlasting bland, lacking the occasional penetrating and skillfully executed phrase which makes the person reading it content at the moment not to be doing something else. No doubt more important is the equally bland quality of the thinking, reflected in the author's disinclination really to struggle with an idea or insight, whether his own or someone else's.

Professor Martin often expresses a preference for one view over another, but it is rarely other than a mild and tentative preference. He observes that contemporary admirals seem not to grapple with the really critical questions of future naval war, but neither, beyond pointing this out, does he. A significant question to which he draws notice he dismisses with the comment that it "might perhaps be debated"—but the debating he leaves to others. On what is among the most crucial of relevant issues, the effects of nuclear deterrence in determining levels of engagement or combat, he gives to the somewhat exceptional views of a colleague the accolade that his argument "is by no means implausible," but that is the end of it.

All this gives one the sense of non-involvement, and how is the reader to become involved when the author is not?—Bernard Brodle, University of California, Los Angeles.

The European Common Market and the World. By Werner Feld. (Englewood Cliffs. Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1967. Pp. vii, 184. $4.95.)

This is a valuable little book, which is almost monographic in nature. It seems to be one of several studies of the European Economic Community commissioned by Prentice-Hall. Professor Werner Feld, Chairman of the Department of Government at Louisiana State University, has examined the relationships, internal and external, that have grown up with the existence of the European Economic Community.

The EEC is a political entity whose chief worth is economic. Its inception created the third great economic union. These economic unities—American, Soviet and European—create a host of problems and prospects. They cannot be ignored; they must be accommodated.

The formation of the EEC was no simple process. It had predecessors of limited purpose and value. Its members were involved in organizations as various as NATO, OEEC (OECD), and GATT. The possibility of conflicting allegiances was serious. Most nations brought with them a baggage train—special relationships with former colonies, monetary zones, and settled trade patterns.

Reconciling these conflicting interests and obligations was no easy task, and the first decade of the EEC was devoted to this delicate, often exasperating task of internal harmonization. The coming years must be devoted increasingly to a reconciliation of conflicts with the rest of the world, the theme of Feld's work.

The relationship of the EEC to the American common market has been one of efforts to accommodation marred by irritating incidents like the "war of the frozen chickens." The connections with the Communist bloc has been one of growing intercourse with surprisingly minimum frictions. The EFTA nations are an especial difficulty, for this is a rival bloc of-like nations with common associations. The most crucial matter could be the special relationships with the developing societies, most of whom are former colonies. These prideful nations-so jealous of their nationhood and their economic independence—have practically demanded and received a special association with the EEC from their former metropolis. With this privileged position goes inevitably the peril of economic dependence, the handmaiden of political dependence.

The EEC is no monolith; it is beset by strains and fissures. Vital interests must be protected. The sheltering of French agricultural inefficiency has aggravated the more efficient agricultural nations of the market. The privileged arrangement for the many and diverse French client-states caused no small exacerbation within the walls. The strength of the German industrial complex constitutes a source of discomfort, raising faintly the specter of the Zollverein. The French veto of the British application caused a trauma among certain quarters within the EEC. Moreover, there is a fundamental disharmony in the Common Market along the lines of the ancient American experience—the suspicion and conflict between the large and the small states. The Benelux powers fear and resist the transformation of the entity into a Gallic or Teutonic economic community.

The political and economic power of the Common Market is quietly and steadily growing, and its existence creates certain problems for the world economy. Any such markey is a form of economic regionalism with its protectiveness, provincialism, and discrimination. It has begotten other such regional corporations—the Latin American Free Trade Association and the Central American Common Market. This economic regionalism can produce distortions in the trade patterns of the world economy. The common markets and customs unions promote intramural trade at the expense of international trade. More and more, trade may be between the blocs, not among the nations. High tariffs may decline among the nations only to reappear among the blocs. True international trade may suffer with the proliferation of these markets.

The greatest prospect for the EEC lies in the political arena. The original conception envisaged the growth of political unity, possibly a supranational European state. Already, the embryonic structure exists in the form of extranational parties, interest groups, parliaments, courts, and councils of ministers. Certain practices and rituals of the Eurocrats approached diplomatic intercourse and vaguely hinted of sovereignty. De Gaulle complained that Commission President Walter Hallstein was assuming the prerogatives of a "chief of state." Moreover, present French policy resists political integration while basking in the benefits of economic union. De Gaulle seeks instead a l'Europe des patries-united in certain political and economic matters but separate in their nationhood and sovereignty.

Professor Feld has ably considered the place of the EEC in the politics and economics of the world. The work is written with a husbandry of words and a care of expression that is admirable. It is comprehensible to the informed layman without losing its value to the specialist. The treatise avoids the pitfalls-common to such works of political economy-of inundating the reader with charts and statistics. Detail and statistical illustrations are abundant and useful, but the book is not burdened by them. The excellence of the work is slightly lessened by the absence of a bibliography. The EEC literature is growing rapidly, and such a compilation would have been helpful. However, this omission is partially compensated by complete references in footnotes.—Vernon C. War-REN, JR., Austin Peay State University.

The Foreign Aid Programs of the Soviet Bloc and Communist China: An Analysis. By Kurt Mul-Ler. (New York, Walker and Co. 1967. Pp. xiii, 331. $15.00.)

The translation of Kurt Muller's book only proves that you can not tell a book by its outside cover. Only if the reader happens to look inside the title page will he discover that originally Muller's book was entitled Uber Kalkutta nach

Paris? The title change in the translated version therefore gives the impression that it is completely devoted to a discussion of communist foreign aid. Although the original title is sexier than the actual product, it is nonetheless a more accurate reflection of the scope of the book, Unfortunately the discussion of foreign aid makes up less than one half of material covered and much of what is devoted to foreign aid is simply a listing of foreign aid and trade agreements. Because of the mislabeling, the reader sits with the expectation that there will be more analysis of communist foreign aid than there actually is and therefore he is disappointed when he does not find it. Much of the other material in the book if taken on its own terms would be interesting in itself, but since the appetite is whetted for a discussion of foreign aid, one sits and waits for the main course only to see it flit by without feeling really satisfied.

As for what is actually in the book, it is fair to say that Muller has brought together a good deal of useful information about Soviet relations and ambitions in the less developed world. Thus this could be a handy reference source. Unfortunately there are numerous shortcomings in this volume which prevent the realization of this prospect.

One of the major problems is that Muller's book was originally written in 1963 and subsequently revised for its translation into English. Since communist policies in the developing countries have changed so rapidly, it is not enough to make an alteration or two in the old manuscript in the expectation that the book will then reflect the current state of events. In several cases the entire context has changed. For example on p. 73, Muller attempts to show how the communists attempt to subvert a country through the use of communist trained functionaries in the schools, cadres, and publishing houses etc. As an illustration he cites the Ghanian weekly paper. The Spark. But as Muller himself recognizes, since the German version was published, Nkrumah has been overthrown. Since this is the best example that Muller seems to be able to find, it would appear that this particular case if it proves anything, proves the opposite. That is, such endeavors have not been ultimately successful from the communist point of view. His example of communist support for Oginga Odinga in Kenya is similarly inappropriate.

Because of the day to day gyrations in Cuban foreign policy, Muller finds himself with all kinds of inconsistencies in his handling of Soviet and Chinese relations with Cuba. On p. 56, he talks of the Russian desire to create Cuban-style bridgeheads all over the world. Subsequently he describes China's anger because Cuba has opted to follow Russian foreign policy. At this writing at least, the Russians would be quite surprised to hear that the Cubans have been classified as loyal followers of the Moscow line.

The changes over time may also explain why Muller's long lists of reasons and explanations always fail to provide a complete answer to the problem he is trying to analyze. This happens on p. 62 and again on p. 92. It often seems that new paragraphs which have been added to bring the book up to date disprove the analysis so one is left wondering why the analysis was made in the first place.

The effect of such incidents creates a very disjointed book. Perhaps this can be blamed on poor editing. This unsettling feeling is made worse by the fact that the last two-thirds of the book consists of 200 pages divided up into 28 chapters; that is an average of 7 pages per chapter. To say the least, it is uncommon to read chapters that are only 3 to 4 pages long in a book devoted to the social sciences. Moreover the book's editors apparently made no effort to tone down some of the intemperate political language. The communists or their sympathizers are almost always referred to in such terms as "hacks" or worse.

The book also contains numerous small mistakes. On p. 26, Muller says that communist countries provided sizeable loans only after 1956 whereas on p. 240 he acknowledges that the Czechs were an exception and started lending in-1954. He omits a Soviet loan of $45 million worth of sugar to China in 1961. He is also wrong on p 96 when he states that India does not extend foreign aid. Similarly he is incorrect when he claims that the other communist countries are incapable of building a complete plant without Russian support or supplies. There are important exceptions such as the Rumanian oil refinery at Gauhati India and the Czech tool works at Ranchi, India On occasion, it is the Russians who find themselves forced to rely on outside help as in Nepa where they have had to call in the Czechs to provide equipment for the Russian sponsored sugar mill and cigarette factory. Muller is also wrons when he says that Soviet statistics do not reflec technical services provided by Soviet technicians.

There are some larger questions as well tha Muller never confronts. Have the Russians eve thought through the consequences of their foreign aid program? If their aid is successful, and economic development in fact takes place, will this lead to communism as Muller seems to think of to an economically viable and independent government?

Lest the reviewer be misunderstood, there ar many redeeming sections in this book. Mulle finds traces of Sino-Soviet animosity as early as 1956. He also shows how the Russians start with an adverse foreign trade balance in their dealing with less developed countries and generally en up with strongly favorable balances of trade. Only Malaysia seems to have avoided this hazard. He also explains how the Russians have managed to provide themselves with a loophole for the legal reselling of commodities purchased from the developing countries. Also Muller has gathered fairly complete lists of loan agreements extended by both the Russians and the Chinese. But as if Muller were destined to have a difficult time with this translation, even that which is valuable may be of no use for the researcher. For some reason, the translators have neglected to include either an index or bibliography. This makes much of the material irretrievable and therefore of limited use.—Marshall I. Goldman, Wellesley College.

Insurgent Era: New Patterns of Political, Economic and Social Revolution. By RICHARD H. SANGER. (Washington: Potomac Books, 1967. Pp. 231. $5.95.)

One category of books on international politics is that of the interpretive report by the diplomat or journalist who does not pretend to be a social scientist and who may be pleased that he is not. In the 1920-40 period books of this sort were especially numerous and influential in shaping popular images of such things as conditions in the Ukaraine or the exploits of Abd-el-Krim. Too few of them were written by shrewd diplomats. Some went beyond personal involvement to discuss events they did not know immediately. This book falls into the latter sub-class. Written by a former American F.S.O. with experience in the Middle East and Africa, it is representative of a category which has declined in numbers during an age of higher levels of knowledge and new methods.

The author undertakes to sketch the history of eight cases of unrest since 1917. He uses "societal revolutions" as the frame for Communist struggles in Russia and China, the Egyptian Revolution of 1952 and Cuba's 26th of July Movement. Distillation creates unsatisfactory generalizations, e.g., the account of the Bolshevik seizure of power (pp. 29-31). Problems of analysis are also apparent. The chapter on Egypt begins with the statement that "The Egyptians are not Arabs. . . ." They might not be, but their recent leaders have thought that they were with significant political results. Glibness is not absent. Mohammed Ali is described as a "son-of-a-Macedonian-tobacco-merchant-turned-Pasha" and his importance in modern Egyptian history passed over lightly. Few of the book's historical summaries are creative. The best one of them is about Cuba.

Under the heading of "Independence Rebellions" Mr. Sanger discusses Indo-China, concentrating on the emergence of Ho Chi Minh and the military events up to the Geneva Conference. Subsequently, Vietnam from 1954-1967 is discussed under the third main part of the book, "Cold War Conflicts," a section which also includes chapters on Magsaysay and the Huks, and the Congo. The author adopts the view that communism is largely responsible for Vietnam's troubles. He did not make use of Douglas Pike's study of the Viet Cong. Against the liberal tide, his interpretation of Diem is sympathetic without being unbalanced. Included under "Independence Rebellions" is Gandhi's nonviolent nationalism. More might have been said about the inclusion of the Indian leader and satyagraha. Apparently it was the author's intention to illustrate that protest takes many forms and to suggest that the study of insurgency should not be limited to political violence.

What principles were used for inclusion of some struggles but not others? No clear explanation is given. Is there a theory to tie together the cases selected? The reviewer could not discover any other than what is found in the statement that "no man need settle for a dirt floor merely because his father did." Some men, of course, will settle for a dirt floor if they can get rid of foreigners, a point indirectly recognized by the discussion of India. A "Life Cycle of A Revolt" is presented in Chapter 1. The model includes the elements of the leader, popular cause, support for the party of revolt, outside help, use of mobs, and others. All the cases selected do not fit the model. Is there any larger pattern to these upheavals? The author speaks of seven waves of unrest since 1648, the most recent beginning about twenty years ago. In an appendix he offers an uneven listing of violent events for 1945-1966. Yet there is no suggestion about the meanings of these waves and events other than the implied teaching that change is permanent.

Perhaps the main disappointments about the book are the lack of definitions to help tell one conflict from another, and the fact that the insights of the diplomatist were withheld in his efforts to photograph epic landscapes.—Paul F. Power, University of Cincinnati.

1969-70 Congressional Fellowships

The deadline for submitting applications for the 1969-70 Congressional Fellowship Program is December 1, 1968. Preference will be given applicants between the ages of 23 and 35.

Qualifications:

- For Political Scientists—Completion or near completion of Ph.D. in political science. Preference will be given to persons who are teaching or who intend to teach.
- For Journalists

 —Bachelor's degree and at least two years of professional experience in newspaper, magazine, radio or television work.
- For Law School Faculty—LL.B. degree and at least one year's teaching experience in an accredited law school.

Further information and application blanks may be obtained from:

The American Political Science Association 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W. Washington, D.C. 20036

APSA SUMMER FLIGHTS TO EUROPE

FLIGHT A—Approximately June 15 to September 1, 1969

FLIGHT B—Approximately August 1 to 31, 1969

For the tenth successive summer, the Association will provide air service to Europe for its members.

Flights will originate at New York International Airport and arrive on the continent of Europe. The cost per seat will be under $300.00.

Persons wishing to make reservations now may write directly to the Association, in care of the Director, Summer Flight Programs, 1527 New Hampshire Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C.

A HISTORY OF WESTERN POLITICAL THEORY

Gerald Runkle, Southern Illinois University, Edwardsville

A basic textbook for courses in political theory and political philosophy. Presents an objective, chronological account of the important political theories from the time of Plato to the present. Each theory is clearly expounded and analyzed, and quotations from original sources are documented and are from editions easily available to students. In order that the student may appreciate the significance of each theory, the author presents the context in which it was developed: political, economic, and social events; the intellectual quality of the period; and the philosophical basis of the theory itself. To encourage the student to make a meaningful evaluation of each theory, the author presents his own critical comment. Both contextual and critical sections are set off from the expository sections. 1968. 668 pp.

GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Webb S. Fiser, State University of New York at Albany; Stuart Gerry Brown, University of Hawaii; and John S. Gibson, Tufts University

This textbook surveys concisely but comprehensively the framework of the American governmental system. Intergovernmental relations are developed as cooperative action between levels of government rather than as compartmentalized treatments of federal, state and local systems. Going beyond discussion of politics, parties, and pressure groups, this book shows how the political process unfolds around concrete policy issues in the context of changing historical developments. Particular attention is given to such currently important problems as urban renewal, metropolitan areas, poverty, race relations, law enforcement, agriculture and education. Instructor's Supplement available. 1967. 803 pp. $8.50

POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY

Paul Buckholts, Eastern Michigan University

Provides a systematic approach to political geography for students of geography or related fields. It focuses on the need for stressing relationships within a state before attempting a meaningful exploration of the international aspects. References to history disclose views of the subject which emphasize both its continuity and the variety of approaches taken to it. Main theme is how man, as a political animal, controls and affects, or is influenced by, his environment—never alone but in relation to differing environments. 1966. 534 pp., illus. $9.00

ESTABLISHED 1900

The Ronald Press Company

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

John M. Pfiffner, University of Southern California; and Robert Presthus, York University, Toronto

The Fifth Edition of this famous text examines administration at all levels of government. It integrates descriptive-institutional materials of administrative science with behavioral analyses of administration in action. It analyzes such aspects as the historical and institutional framework, separation of powers, role of executives (particularly that of the modern specialist), and the problem of obtaining superior talent. Covers decision-making and the data-processing revolution, and incorporates recent research into group behavior, individual motivation, and leadership dynamics. 5th Ed., 1967. 567 pp. $8.00

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

Russell M. Ross, University of Iowa; and Kenneth F. Millsap, Assistant City Manager, Iowa City, Iowa

This text provides a thorough treatment of the governmental activities of the 50 states and their local governmental units. Although predominant emphasis is on administrative aspects of state and local government, the book also presents material on the structure of governmental units below the national level. The role of counties, the position of the municipalities and special districts, and the peculiar problems of metropolitan areas are examined in detail. The importance of intergovernmental coordination is stressed, as is the growing relationship between the national and local governments. 1966. 705 pp., illus. $8.50

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

Donald C. Blaisdell, The City College of The City University of New York

This textbook acquaints the student with the theory and practice of international organization. It also serves to identify problems in international organization and to open fresh paths for further inquiry. The governmental structure that the world's nation-states have agreed to establish, their procedures, staffs, and finances are examined together with methods for meeting threats or breaches of the peace. Analyzes the success of these organizations in maintaining peace, promoting respect for human rights, and fundamental freedoms, and dealing with problems of general welfare. Questions at the end of each chapter. 1966 531 pp. $7.50

79 Madison Avenue · New York, N.Y. 10016 -

mc - car - thy - ism /

n -s usu cap M & 2dC [Joseph R. McCarthy † 1957 Am. politician + E -ism]: a political attitude of the mid-twentieth century closely allied to know-nothingism and characterized chiefly by opposition to elements held to be subversive and by the use of tactics involving personal attacks on individuals by means of widely publicized indiscriminate allegations esp. on the basis of unsubstantiated charges

—Webster's Third New International Dictionary (unabridged)

⑤ 1959 by G. & C. Merriam Co.

CHARGE AND COUNTERCHARGE

A Film of the Era of Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy

Produced and directed by

EMILE DE ANTONIO

(producer and director of the film "Point of Order")

For information on sales and rentals, please write to Appleton-Century-Crofts, 440 Park Avenue South, New York, New York 10016.

Appleton-Century-Crofts

division of meredith coeforation
440 Park Avenue South, New York 10016

Political science and history from the University of Chicago Press

The Soviet System of Government Fourth Edition Revised John N. Hazard

The fourth edition of this book is a valuable guide to the nature of the Soviet System as it functions in practice and an indication of the direction in which it is moving en its fiftieth anniversary. The Soviet system, evolving from totalitarian "Stalinism" to a promised new "socialist democracy," is the Communists' chief instrument of change. Focal questions for this edition are: Is such change possible? Does the Soviet system differ qualitatively from authoritarian systems of the past or present?

1968 LC:68-24557 288 pages Cloth $6.75 Paper $3.25

Organized Crime in Chicago

Second Edition

John Landesco

With a New Introduction by Mark Haller

John Landesco's study of organized crime in Chicago during the 1910's and 1920's is probably the best analysis yet written of the place of organized criminal activity in the social structure of an American city. This work has not been readily available since it was originally published as part of the Illinois Crime Survey. Now reissued separately, Landesco's book presents a vivid history of Chicago crime that will interest the scholar and the general public alike.

1968 LC:68-24353 322 pages, $7.50

Justice on Trial
The Case of Louis D. Brandeis

A. L. Todd

Louis D. Brandeis was a man for the people in an age of monopolies, and the first Jew to be appointed to the Supreme Court. "In Justice on Trial Mr. Todd has provided an exciting and superlatively fair story of Brandeis' appointment . . . the four months of ugly opposition that it evoked in the smugger sections of Boston and Cambridge, and the victory for decency that emerged at last. From start to finish the episode crackles with drama, and the author recounts it superbly." Edmond Cahn, Book Week.

1968 Paper P321 $2.95

The Correspondence of Edmund Burke

Volume VII

January 1792-August 1794

Edited by P. J. Marshall and John A. Woods

Two concerns dominate this seventh volume of Edmund Burke's correspondence. The first is Burke's effort to persuade the British and Irish governments to make adequate concessions to the Irish Roman Catholics, and the second, his attempt to find an effective strategy for Britain's war against revolutionary France. The correspondence also provides material on India, on British domestic policies, and on Burke's relationship with his only son, Richard. "Such books as these should be an unqualified delight to their readers."—Times Literary Supplement. Vol. I (April 1744—June 1768), $8.00; Vol. II (July 1768—June 1774), $12.00; Vol. III (July 1774—June 1778), $12.00; Vol. IV (July 1778—June 1782), $12.00; Vol. V (July 1782—June 1789), $12.00; Vol. VI (July 1789—December 1791), $13.50

1968 LC:58-5615 $16.00

The American Partnership

Intergovernmental Co-operation in the Nineteenth-Century United States Daniel J. Elazar

Elazar challenges the theory that, until this century, the American governmental system was one of dual federalism. He presents considerable evidence that the pattern of American federalism—the American partnership—has been a constant one since the establishment of the Republic. By studying the activities of the American government in the nineteenth century, he shows that federal-state relations were already those of the co-operative federalism held to be a twentieth-century development.

1962 LC:62-17132 358 pages, $6.50

University of Chicago Press, Chicago 60637

Five important new books from

New York University Press

TOWARDS A GLOBAL FEDERALISM

William O. Douglas

Here is Justice Douglas' proposal for the worldwide rule of law he is convinced is necessary to our survival both as a nation and as individuals. He pleads eloquently for the rights of minorities and expresses deep concern for the economic plight of the developing nations. This is a major statement by one of our foremost citizens. The James Stokes Lectureship on Politics.

October. $7.95

THE KENNEDY LITERATURE

A Bibliographical Essay on John F. Kennedy

James Tracy Crown

"I have found the book to be not only an indispensable guide to the voluminous Kennedy literature but also an absorbing presentation of the Kennedy story in itself."

—James M. Burns, Williams College

November. $6.95

THE DEFENSE SECTOR AND THE AMERICAN ECONOMY Jacob K. Javits, Charles J. Hitch, Arthur F. Burns

Views the threat to freedom and economic stability from the "military-industrial" complex and the "scientific-technological" elite in the light of the Vietnam buildup and postwar prospects. The Moskowitz Lectures.

July. $4.95

A FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION

Thomas M. Franck and Edward Weisband, editors

A new alternative for three great Western powers—a proposal for the formation of a free trade association with the United States, Great Britain, and Canada as the core—this book results from a seminar held at New York University and attended and endorsed by leading figures from the three nations. The contributors are Harry Cowie, H. Edward English, Robert G. Hawkins, Harry G. Johnson, and the two editors. A Study in Peaceful Change.

87.95

WHY FEDERATIONS FAIL

An Inquiry into the Requisites for Successful Federalism

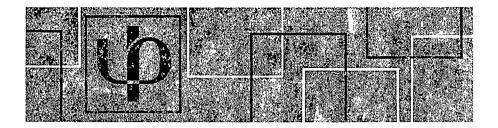

Thomas M. Franck, Gisbert H. Flanz, Herbert J. Spiro, Frank N. Trager

Here a team of experts conduct a post-mortem on four attempts at regional unification that have recently failed and provide a theoretical framework for predicting future success or failure. A Study in Peaceful Change.

September. $7.50

DIMENSIONS OF ACADEMIC FREEDOM

by Walter P. Metzger, Sanford H. Kadish, Arthur DeBardeleben, and Edward I. Bloustein

Current student protest and revolt underscore the pertinence of these essays which explore the concept of academic freedom vis-à-vis the rapidly changing nature of to-day's university and its internal and external commitments. The authors treat major challenges to the vital character of this freedom posed by the increasingly delocalized academic institution, by the professorial strike and forms of unionization based upon it, by the demands of university interaction with external society, and by the role of the "new student" in American colleges. Coming in December. Cloth, $3.95; paper, $.95.

COMMUNITY COLLEGES: A PRESIDENT'S VIEW

by Thomas E. O'Connell

In this candid, hardhitting, and often irreverent book, the president of Massachusetts' Berkshire Community College takes a searching look at the rapid growth, present state, and future role of the "new" community college in terms of what Walter Lippmann has called "the gigantic work of adjusting our way of life to the scientific revolution of this age and to the stupendous growth of the population." ". . . skillfully conveys the excitement of academic pioneering, the zest of intellectual creativity, the challenge of institutional planning and development."—The Boston Globe. Cloth, $5.50; paper, $1.95.

SOCIAL THEORY AND AFRICAN TRIBAL ORGANIZATION

The Development of Socio-Legal Theory

by Kenneth S. Carlston

The place and function of law in society are viewed in new dimension in this provocative and highly original study of African tribal life and law, set in a framework of social theory. Using a wide range of ethnographic data to test and refine emergent conceptual schemes, Mr. Carlston integrates social theory and law to arrive at new perspectives in the creation of a unified body of social theory. He further provides detailed information on the tribal backgrounds of today's African states, thus affording significant insights into tribal and modern social relationships. Just published. $10.00.

The Impact of American Constitutionalism Abroad

by Carl J. Friedrich

Carl J. Friedrich considers three key aspects of American constitutionalism—presidentialism, federalism, and judicial review of human rights—and traces their influence on a wide variety of European and American political situations, both past and present.

"This book demonstrates the analytical clarity and focus on the relevant issues that we have come to expect from Carl Friedrich. It is a superbly organized and clearly written discussion. Professor Friedrich's volume should stimulate political scientists to do further research on this highly important subject."—Dante Germino, Department of Government and Foreign Affairs, University of Virginia.

A GASPAR G. BACON LECTURE

$4.75

BOSTON UNIVERSITY PRESS

138 Mountfort Street, Brookline, Massachusetts 02146

Ideological Change in Israel

By Alan Arian

"The fascinating aspect of Israeli politics is that the dominant ideology, so dynamic in substance, has coincided with a form of politics so conservative in style. The recent developments in Israeli political life give the impression of basic change; in fact, however, . . . fundamental change comes about very slowly. My purpose here is to offer a glimpse of political and ideological transitions in Israel; my message is that these are taking place at a much slower rate than most think and many want." — from the Preface. This closely documented study illuminates the complex interrelationship between ideology and politics in one of the most vigorously ideological of the world's new nations.

240 pages, $6.95

Rousseau's Social Contract: An Interpretive Essay

By Lester G. Crocker

"We are still learning how to read Rousseau — even as some claim we are only beginning to read Marx and Freud." — from the Preface. This major new interpretation of the Social Contract treats that work not as an isolated unit but as one part of a single socio-political system, carefully worked out in Rousseau's mind and having analogues in the larger body of his writings: a system based on techniques of behavioral control that would make men virtuous and happy. The author explores the totalitarian implications of Rousseau's concept of the ideal world and, by revealing identities and parallels between Rousseau's thought and systems postulated by later writers, throws further light on the significance of the Social Contract and on its reverberations in the minds of other men.

224 pages, $6.95

The Intellectual as Urban Reformer: Brand Whitlock and the Progressive Movement

By Jack Tager

Novelist, journalist, urban reformer in Ohio, and United States minister to Belgium during World War I, Brand Whitlock (1869-1934) was an unusual composite: man of letters and political idealist. During his lifetime, Whitlock witnessed the revolutionary change taking place in American life — from an agrarian to an industrial society — and both as novelist and politician was impelled by an intense belief in individual freedom. His vision of the "free city" — a purified city where the creative spirit could flourish — led him toward the urban reforms that were his goals as mayor of Toledo. This scholarly analysis of a major figure of his time does much to illuminate early twentieth-century progressivism in America.

208 pages, $6.50

The Press of Case Western Reserve University 11000 Cedar Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio 44106

MIT Studies in International Communism Under the general editorship of William E. Griffith. Published for the International Communism Project, Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology. This series examines the nature and development of communist parties around the world, both ruling and nonruling.

Albania and the Sino-Soviet Rift. William E. Griffith. $10.00 Pacer, $3.95

Communism in North Vietnam: Its Role in the Sino-Soviet Dispute, P.J. Honey, $6.95

The Sino-Soviet Rift. William E. Griffith. $10.00 Paper, MIT-12, $3.95

Communism in Europe Vol. I and Vol. II. William E. Griffith, editor. MIT-69 and MIT-70 each $3.95

Nationalism and Communism in Chile. Ernest Halperin. $7.50

Viet Cong Douglas Pike. $10.00 Paper, MIT-81, $2.95

Sino-Soviet Relations, 1964-1965. William E. Griffith. $15.00 Paper, $3.95

The French Communist Party and the Crisis of International Communism. François Fejtő, $10.00

The New Rumania: From People's Democracy to Socialist Republic. Stephen Fischer-Galati. $6.00

Economic Development in Communist Rumania, John Michael Montias. $15.00

Cuba: Castroism and Communism, 1959-1966. Andrés Suárez. $7.50

Unity in Diversity: Italian Communism and the Communist World, Donald L.M. Blackmer, $15.00

MIT Studies in Comparative Politics Under the general editorship of Harold D. Lasswell, Daniel Lerner, and Ithiel deSola Pool. This series focuses on studies of elites and symbols, with the intention of reinvigorating and refining the research tradition established a decade ago under these general editors in the Hoover Institute Studies.

The Turkish Political Elite. Frederick W. Frey. $12.50

The Emerging Elite: A Study of Political Leadership in Ceylon. Marshall Singer, $7.50

World Revolutionary Elites: Harold Lasswell and Daniel Lerner, editors. $15.00 Paper, MIT-60, $3.95

Language of Politics Harold D. Lasswell, Nathan Leites, and Associates. $10.00 MIT-95, $2.95

The General Inquirer Philip J. Stone, Dexter C. Dunphy, Marshall S. Smith, Daniel M. Ogilvie. $12.50 Paper, $7.95

Political Elites: A Select and Computerized Bibliography. Carl Beck and J. Thomas McKechnie $20.00

The Vietnam War and International Law

Sponsored by The American Society for International Law Edited by RICHARD A. FALK

Is the Vietnam War a civil war, or is it a peculiar modern species of international war? Quincy Wright, Roger Fisher, Wolfgang Friedmann, Dean Rusk, and U Thant, among others, present divergent views on legal issues arising from the United States involvement in Vietnam. Documents include the SEATO treaty, the 1962 Geneva Agreement, and the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution. Cloth, $15.00 Paper, $3.95

Theory and Reality in Public International Law

New Edition CHARLES DE VISSCHER Translated by P. E. Corbett

This new edition of the work regarded as a modern classic in the field of international law corresponds to the third French edition in which the author updates his attempts "to increase the authority of international law by bringing back into it the values upon which it was founded." Published for the Center of International Studies, Princeton University. $12.50

The Jurisprudence of John Marshall

ROBERT KENNETH FAULKNER

Chief Justice John Marshall had the unique opportunity to preside over the Supreme Court from the turn of the century to 1835. During this time the Court interpreted the Constitution, defined the powers and limits of government, and provided authoritative decisions on issues that touched the very basis of the American order. Professor Faulkner examines the jurisprudence of the Chief Justice and the political philosophy implicit in Marshall's decisions. $10.00

The Congress Party of India

The Dynamics of One-Party Democracy STANLEY A. KOCHANEK

By tracing the path of the Congress Party's development since independence, Professor Kochanek demonstrates the reasons for its success. He focuses mainly on the development of the party at the national level, giving an extensive account of the changing role of the Congress President and the Working Committee in relation to the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, and the state governments. A postscript to the volume deals with the 1967 elections.

$13.50

Princeton University Press

Princeton, New Jersey 08540

Political Order in Changing Societies

by Samuel P. Huntington

The causes of violence and instability in the developing countries of Asia, Africa, and Latin America, argues Samuel P. Huntington in this major contribution to modern political analysis, are to be found in the lag in the development of political institutions behind social and economic change. Focusing on ways of creating new, effective bases of political association, the author provides valuable insights on age-old problems of political change in both Western and non-Western societies. $12.50

Big Business in Japanese Politics

by Chitoshi Yanaga

In this, the first systematic effort to show how the power of organized big business operates directly and indirectly in Japan's political process, Mr. Yanaga provides the most penetrating analysis yet made of the nature, function, and role of the Japanese bureaucracy. He clearly shows that the Japanese governing process is a joint effort of big business, party government, and administrative bureaucracy. $8.75

An Election in Finland

Party Activities and Voter Reactions by Pertti Pesonen with a Foreword by Angus Campbell

Finland's electoral process is of particular interest because of the presence of a strong Communist party, and Mr. Pesonen brings an insightful comparative approach to a wealth of data in this comprehensive presentation of Finnish elections and voting behavior. An important contribution to a much-needed body of literature on voting studies, this work was translated by the author from the original Finnish edition, Valtuutus kansalta. $12.50

The Aland Islands Question

Its Settlement by the League of Nations by James Barros

"A worthwhile contribution to the literature of the now nearly forgotten problems of post-First World War settlements . . . reveals in sharp focus the realities of international politics and diplomacy."—Francis Deak. $10.00

Yale Paperbound

Political Oppositions in Western Democracy edited by Robert A. Dahl

"On the whole the volume is one of the major contributions to Comparative Politics that have appeared in this country for some time. The study of the issue as such as well as of the individual reviews is highly rewarding."—Karl Loewenstein, The Annals. $2.95 (cloth $12.50)

Yale University Press New Haven and London

McGRAW-HILL BOOKS

Available winter

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS: Anarchy and Order in The World Society, Seventh Edition

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, Williams College. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science.

A comprehensive, up-to-date survey of world affairs in historical perspective. Judgments are offered and predictions are made on the basis of an analysis of national politics and of diplomatic and military history.

CRIME AND THE LEGAL PROCESS

WILLIAM J. CHAMBLISS, University of California at Santa Barbara. McGraw-Hill Series in Sociology.

Brings together the most significant research studies on crime and legal process. The author provides a theoretical framework for interpreting and understanding the empirical findings of the studies and emphasizes that criminal law is a dynamic institution which is shaped by and in turn shapes the social setting.

Now available

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION, Second Edition

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT, University of California at Santa Barbara. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 160 pages / $3.75 (clothbound), $1.60 (soft-cover)

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL PROCESS

CHARLES R. ADRIAN, University of California at Riverside; and CHARLES PRESS, Michigan State University. 768 pages / $8.95

McGraw-Hill Book Company

330 West 42nd Street, New York, New York 10036

West Africa under Colonial Rule

by Michael Crowder

This book, essentially a comparative study of the impact of French and British colonial rule on West Africa, traces the origins of European interest in the area, examines the period of conquest and occupation, and delineates the social changes brought about during the seventy-five year period of colonial rule. This study will be the standard work on the rise and fall of colonialism in all the vast areas of the West African coast.

530 pages
$10.00

Russian Peasants and Soviet Power

by Moshe Lewin

The years 1928 and 1929 form a particularly significant period in Soviet history, one marked by tremendous forward thrust in industrialization, as well as by the mass collectivization of the peasantry. This study analyzes the problems of the period from the view of both the politician and the peasant.

556 pages $11.50

The Role of the Lawyer in the European Communities

by André Donner

The author examines the problems posed for the lawyer by the creation of the European Communities—the European Coal and Steel Community, the European Economic Community, and Euratom—and describes the role that the legal profession, especially in its judicial function, continues to play in their solution.

100 pages $3.50

Northwestern University Press

1735 Benson Avenue

Evanston, Illinois 60201

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

An Introduction to Political Science

by JOHN C. WAHLKE, The University of Iowa and ALEX N. DRAGNICH, Vanderbilt University, editor.

Random House; 618 pages; $8.50

A widely acclaimed book for introductory courses in political science. "An outstanding and imaginative work, unique in its organization and of far greate comprehension and value than . . . (other) texts of this type."—Lee J. Rosch, Golden West College by ALFRED G. MEYER, University of Michigan Random House, 1967; PS-34; 256 pages; $2.25 paperbound

A brilliant short introduction to the study of Communism as a system of ideas, a political movement, and a form of government.

COMMUNISM Third Edition, Revised

PATTERNS OF GOVERNMENT

The Major Political Systems of Europe

Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged

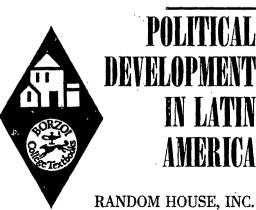

by SAMUEL H. BEER and ADAM B. ULAM, Har vard University, HARRY ECKSTEIN and NICHOLAS WAHL, Princeton University, and HERBERT J SPIRO, University of Pennsylvania Random House; 832 pages; $8.50

Great Britain, France, Germany, U.S.S.R.

Edited by RANDOLPH L. BRAHAM, The City College of the City University of New York

Knopf; 224 pages; $2.75 paperbound

DOCUMENTS OF MAJOR EUROPEAN GOVERNMENTS

Instability, Violence, and Evolutionary Change

by MARTIN C. NEEDLER, University of New Mex ico

Random House; August, 1968; PS-63; 224 page: $2.45 paperbound; $6.95 hardbound

ALFRED A. KNOPF, Inc

WORLD POLITICS Second

Second Edition

Revised Revised

and

Enlarged

By A. F. K. ORGANSKI, The University of Michigan

Knopf, August, 1968; 544 pages; $8.50

This revised and thoroughly updated edition of Professor Organski's widely acclaimed basic ext in international politics incorporates the most recent developments in the field. The first section, dealing with the nation as a unit, includes a new chapter on the process of national growth. The second examines the interrelationships and interdependencies of national units and includes a new chapter on the balance of terror. In the third section Professor Organski discusses international organizations and the concept of collective security and raises questions about future trends.

The College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 10022

Harry Byrd and the Changing Face of Virginia Politics, 1945-1966

By J. Harvie Wilkinson III, student, School of Law, University of Virginia; former Scholar of the House, Yale University. Approx. 410 pp., frontis., illus., tables, maps, index, 6 x 91/4. L.C. 68-22731. $8.75

More than a study of politics in Virginia, this book is a case study of the South and its painful integration into the national scene after World War II. This account of the most powerful and venerable political machine in the South and its fight for survival provides the first comprehensive picture of the personalities and techniques which governed the Old Dominion for more than a half-century.

Harry Byrd and the Changing Face of Virginia Politics begins with a description of the organization, its leaders and its courthouse network, as exemplified by Brunswick County in Southside, Virginia, at the peak of its power in 1945. The careers of Harry Byrd, Howard W. Smith, William Tuck, and Harry Byrd, Jr., are used to illustrate the policies and principles of the machine and the way it operated on the local, state, and national levels.

Special emphasis is given to the problems that challenged the organization over the ensuing two decades—the racial revolution, urban growth, a strength-ened Republican opposition, national intervention, and the emergence of a new generation of young Virginians with changing attitudes. The steady decline of power is traced through the years of "massive resistance," Senator Byrd's "golden silence," the "Young Turk" revolt, the 1964 presidential election, and the 1966 state campaigns. Some of the material, including correspondence between Senator Byrd and Governor Almond during the massive resistance crisis, is published here for the first time.

The Negro in Virginia Politics, 1902-1965

By Andrew Buni, Associate Professor of History, Boston College. ix, 296 pp., tables, index. 6 x 91/4. L.C. 67-21659. $6.00

For this, the first book to study the Negro's role in Virginia politics in the twentieth century, the author has interviewed extensively leading Negro political leaders and collected information, neglected until now as source material, from the state's Negro newspapers. The participation of the Negroes in the political life of the state is seen chiefly through their own eyes. "The work is a scholarly, objective, and valuable contribution."—Virginius Dabney, Virginia Magazine of History & Biography

"Buni has written an informative and scholarly book."—David M. Reimers, The Journal of American History

University Press of Virginia

Charlottesville

New and Important . . .

ESEA

The Office of Education Administers a Law

by Stephen K. Bailey and Edith K. Mosher

This is the story of a Federal agency suddenly faced with the responsibility for developing and administering a new law of vast complexity and profound importance. It is an account of the events and pressures leading up to the enactment of ESEA in 1965, of the administrative behavior of USOE in the period of policy gestation and organizational crisis in the first year of the law, and of the intricate web of tensions—personal, societal, political, and governmental—within which, as a vast grant-in-aid agency, USOE had to function.

Yugoslavia: New Class in Crisis

by Nenad D. Popovic

Nenad D. Popovic was a Minister Plenipotentiary in Yugoslavia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and an internationally known economist, when he defected to the West in 1961. Now in a deeply revealing book on the internal structure and operation of this Communist state he describes the development of the privileged "new class," its power, and its effect on Yugoslavia's political and ideological life, foreign relations, and economy, manipulated by the new class as it has tried to subordinate economic laws to its own interests.

The Arab-Israeli Dilemma

by Fred J. Khouri

The intent of this study is to cover as factually and comprehensively as possible in a single book the significant phases of Arab-Israeli relations from the historical beginnings to 1968, providing a thoroughly documented chronological account of events and an analysis of opposing viewpoints on such major issues as Jerusalem, the Arab refugees, and the barriers to peace. The ten years of research by the American-born author, who is professor of political science at Villanova University, included exhaustive study of all UN documents on the subjects and three years of field research in the Middle East. $10.00

The Geography of Modernization in Kenya

A Spatial Analysis of Social, Economic, and Political Change

by Edward W. Soja

In a new approach to the study of societies in transition, this book presents a detailed analysis of the introduction and spread of modernization in Kenya from the viewpoint of a geographer, describing the cultural setting before colonization, the spread of Europeans and Asians, the development of transportation and communication systems, a money economy, trade and education, and examining population characteristics and distribution as they relate to these factors.

$11.00

From your bookseller or

Syracuse University Press Syracuse, New York 13210

TULANE STUDIES IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Volume IX

W. B. Gwyn, THE MEANING OF THE SEPARATION OF POWERS

An analysis of the doctrine from its origin in 17th century England to the adoption of the United States Constitution $3.00

Volume X

Henry L. Mason, MASS DEMONSTRATIONS AGAINST FOREIGN REGIMES

A study of five crises: Amsterdam Demonstrations of 1941; East Netherlands Protests of 1943;

Study of five crises: Amsterdam Demonstrations of 1956. Panamanian Riots of 1964

3.00 Netherlands Rail Strike of 1944; Hungarian Uprisings of 1956; Panamanian Riots of 1964

Volume XI

Alex B. Lacy, Jr. (ed.), POWER IN AMERICAN STATE LEGISLATURES

Case studies of the Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Oklahoma legislatures

$3.00

Volume XII (forthcoming)

James D. Cochrane, THE POLITICS OF REGIONAL INTEGRATION: THE CENTRAL AMERICAN CASE $3.00

Volume XIII (forthcoming)

David R. Deener (ed.), THE ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT: DIMENSIONS OF CONFRONTATION

$3.00

Copies may be obtained from

DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL SCIENCE TULANE UNIVERSITY NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA 70118

IL POLITICO

Rivista Italiana di Scienze Politiche (fondata de Bruno Leoni)

M 4 R 7 O 1 O 6 9

M A R Z O 1968
La commemorazione del Prof. Bruno Leoni all'Universita di Pavia
Cenni biografici e opere di Bruno Leoni
Le parole del rettore dell'Universita
Bruno Leoni, maestro e uomo
Bruno Leoni the Scholar
Bruno Leoni lo studioso
L'opera scientifica di Bruno Leoni
Scienza politica e scienza economica nel pensiero di Bruno Leoni
ARTICOLI
The Changing Theory and Practice of Totalitarianism
NOTE E DISCUSSIONI
A propos du dollar et de l'or
Direzione, redezione e amministrazione: Istituto di Scienze Politiche dell'Università di Pavia Abbonamento (4 fascicoli): Lire 6.500 Direttore: Carlo Emilio Ferri Redattore Capo Responsabile: Pasquale Scaramozzino

Just Published

THE GRASS ROOTS

Readings in State and Local Government

Edited by ERWIN C. BUELL, North Texas State University WILLIAM E. BRIGMAN, Florida State University

This supplement to standard government texts is based on the assumption that understanding government is impossible without an appreciation of the political context in which the governmental structure operates. While structural considerations are maintained, case studies and other relevant materials emphasize the functional and political aspects of state and local government. Articles add political flavor to the serious questions of government texts and pose possible solutions to them. The book provides a comprehensive study of state and local government without duplicating material found in basic texts. It emphasizes the cooperative elements in the federal-state-local relationship, avoiding legal argument and highlighting functional aspects. The inner workings of the legislature are studied, with significant readings on reapportionment and the urban-rural problem included. Articles on administration stress the politics of administration, and material on metropolitan problems looks at both the present and the future. 544 pages, softbound, $4.75

CONSTITUTIONALISM AND POLITICS

Conflict and Consensus

Edited by C. PETER MAGRATH, University of Nebraska

This book of readings provides an integrated description and analysis of the American constitutional system, showing both evolution and present-day meanings. Chapter introductions by the editor place selections in perspective, and selection notes emphasize the significance and relevance of each reading. A bibliographical essay provides material for exploring further the mechanics and major features of the American constitutional system. Selections are balanced to present diverse views on the nature of a living constitution influenced by Federal Supreme Court and judicial decisions, the President, Congress, political parties, administrative bureaus, interest groups, and shifting public opinion. Scott, Foresman American Government Reading Series. 208 pages, softbound, $2.95

Scott, Foresman and Company College Division Glenview, Illinois Atlanta Dallas Palo Alto Oakland, N.J.

HOWARD FERTIG, INC.

Hardcover Reprints of Important Scholarly Works

William Y. Elliott $15.00 THE PRAGMATIC REVOLT IN POLITICS	Harold J. Laski $9.00 STUDIES IN THE PROBLEM OF SOVEREIGNTY
Syndicalism, Fascism and the Constitutional State With a new introduction and additional material by the author	Leon Duguit $9.00 LAW IN THE MODERN STATE
William S. Carpenter $8.00	F. J. C. Hearnshaw $9.50 CONSERVATISM IN ENGLAND
THE DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN POLITICAL THOUGHT Frank Gavin $7.50	Luigi Sturzo $9.50 THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY AND THE RIGHT OF WAR
PROBLEM OF CHURCH AND STATE	Arnold Brecht $7.50 PRELUDE TO SILENCE
Gordon Wright $9.00 THE RESHAPING OF FRENCH	The End of the German Republic
DEMOCRACY	H. Quigley and R. T. Clark $9.00 REPUBLICAN GERMANY
Walter Rice Sharp $9.50 THE GOVERNMENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC	Robert A. Brady $11.00 THE SPIRIT AND STRUCTURE OF GERMAN FASCISM
Godfrey Elton $8.00 THE REVOLUTIONARY IDEA IN	A Study of Nazi Institutions
FRANCE, 1789-1871	Paul Knaplund $18.50 THE BRITISH EMPIRE, 1815-1939
Cecil J. S. Sprigge $8.00 THE DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN ITALY	Hans Kohn $10.00 NATIONALISM AND IMPERIALISM IN THE HITHER EAST
Benito Mussolini $10.00 FASCISM: DOCTRINE AND INSTITUTIONS	C. A. Bodelsen $8.00 STUDIES IN MID-VICTORIAN IMPERIALISM
Eugene Staley $13.50 WAR AND THE PRIVATE INVESTOR A Study in the Relations of International Politics and International Private Investment	Agnes Murphy $8.50 THE IDEOLOGY OF FRENCH IMPERIALISM, 1871-1881
Lionel Robbins $8.00 THE ECONOMIC CAUSES OF WAR	George W. Keeton 2 vols. $27.50 THE DEVELOPMENT OF EXTRA- TERRITORIALITY IN CHINA

A complete catalogue of publications is available upon request. Books may be ordered direct from the publisher.

HOWARD FERTIG, INC.

Publisher -

80 East 11th Street, New York, N. Y. 10003

Debate the issues?

What are the issues?

The way for students to find out . . . read!

LIBERALISM VERSUS CONSERVATISM: Readings in American Government

Edited by the late Willmoore Kendall, University of Dallas; and George W. Carey, Georgetown University. 1966, 446 pages, $4.50 (paper).

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT, Second Edition

Russell W. Maddox, Jr. and Robert F. Fuquay, both of Oregon State University. 1966, 736 pages, $9.50.

ISSUES IN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERN-MENT, Selected Readings

Edited by Russell W. Maddox, Jr. and Robert F. Fuquay. 1965, 424 pages, $4.75 (paper).

BUSINESS, GOVERNMENT, AND PUBLIC POLICY, Second Edition

Reuben E. Slesinger, University of Pittsburgh; and the late Asher Isaacs. Fall 1968, about $9.95.

ASIAN POLITICAL SYSTEMS: Readings on China, Japan, India and Pakistan

Edited by Betty B. Burch, Tufts University; and Allan B. Cole, The Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Tufts University. 1968, 464 pages, $5.95 (paper).

POLITICAL SYSTEMS OF LATIN AMERICA, Second Edition

Martin C. Needler, University of New Mexico.

Send for your on-approval copies. Write College Department

Robert A. Dahl's American Government text

PLURALIST DEMOCRACY IN THE UNITED STATES: Conflict and Consent

Enthusiastic readers have praised the "compelling grand design," the "simplicity, clarity and logic," and the "strong historical character" of this book. They have called it "a new departure in texts," a "splendid analysis," and "a valuable contribution to the political theory of the American system."

It is a clearly written, well-organized basic text which introduces students to an original political philosophy of American government and shows how and why a pluralist democracy emerged on the American continent.

Professor Dahl's work is as carefully structured as it is innovative. His development of pluralist democracy in the presence of conflict is supported by case studies and analyses, the findings of behaviorally oriented studies, and traditional and classical writings. His use of personal references, asides, and penetrating questions involve students in his examination of the purposes of our political institutions, their evolution to the present, and the influence which individuals can have on a pluralist democracy.

Professor Dahl's flowing style imparts the mood and tone of a scholar talking directly with his readers. His use of personal references and frequent asides promotes rapport and involvement on the part of the reader. He encourages personal analysis by offering penetrating questions about the formation, principles, and application of pluralist democracy. 471 pages. $7.50.

Two important new books in political science . . .

AMERICAN GOVERNMENTAL INSTITUTIONS

Edited by AARON WILDAVSKY, University of California, Berkeley

NELSON POLSBY, University of California, Berkeley

Fifty-one short but pointed articles and essays in this book evoke the texture, flavor, and spirit of the day-to-day work in politics. They introduce students to American government and to five contemporary components of our political system.

The articles and essays carry students beyond theory into the very real world of major political bodies. They will see, for example, how a freshman Congressman sees the House—a day-by-day description of life in the White House—What it was like to work with Justice Brandeis—and who influences decisions at national conventions. c. 700 pages. c. $5.95.

INTRODUCTION TO POLITICAL SCIENCE

By WILLIAM C. MITCHELL and JOYCE M. MITCHELL both of the University of Oregon

A rigorous new introductory text in political science, based on the teaching experiences, experiments, and collaboration of the authors.

The Professors Mitchell present students with newspaper clippings and relevant data from economists and behavioralists. Institutional descriptions are the setting rather than the core of the book. Students are asked to consider the actual data of policy outcomes in each area of decision making.

The authors have advanced decision rules for judging the processes and outcomes of political systems. At the same time, they encourage students to formulate their own theories and tests of propositions—conveying the excitement that political scientists experience in their work. c. 600 pages. c. $7.50.

RAND MCHALLY & COMPANY The College Department • Box 7600 • Chicago, Illinois 60680

New Books in Political Science . .

NEW PERSPECTIVES ON THE House of representatives

Second Edition

Edited by ROBERT L. PEABODY, The Johns Hopkins University NELSON POLSBY, Wesleyan University

The second edition contains selections from contemporary research which add to a reader's factual knowledge and intuitive understanding of the House. Included is a discussion of the successive waves of organizational change, to come over the House. Committee enlargement and concluding with the aftermath of the 1964 elections.

$3.95 paper. $6.50 cloth.

LEGISLATIVE PROCESS IN THE U.S. SENATE

By LAWRENCE K. PETTIT, American Council on Education EDWARD KEYNES Pennsylvania State University

A fascinating and insightful approach to the workings of the Senate, based on carefully edited private and professional opinions side-by-side with the authors' own selections. The materials are focused in four lucid introductions.

Students learn how the Senate recruits new members; how the substance of legislation relates to congressional rules of procedure; how leadership is developed in the Senate; and how the Senate reaches legitimate policy decisions.

$4.50 paper.

THE DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC: An Introduction to American National Government

By MARTIN DIAMOND and WINSTON M. FISK, both of Claremont Men's College, and HERBERT GARFINKEL, Michigan State University

A clear definition of the fundamental premises and structures of the American political order. THE DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC blends constitutional, legal and institutional analysis with relevant findings from modern behavioral research. The authors demonstrate in this definitive text that political behavior and normal constitutional arrangements are inextricably woven together and are of equal importance in a study of American government.

As a departure from outworn argument, the authors discuss the American system in a new light, as the unique experiment in reconciling the advantages of democracy with the sobering qualities of republicanism. American political history is seen as the experience of the successes and failures of that reconciliation.

A distinguishing feature of the book is its reliance on classics of political analysis like. The Federalist and de Tocqueville's Democracy in America to broaden the student's understanding of the developing political system. 572 pages/55 illustrations/$7.50.

RAND MCNALLY & COMPANY The College Department • Box 7600 • Chicago, Illinois 60680

Rand McNally Public Affairs Series

Edited by ROBERT A. GOLDWIN Kenyon College

LEFT, RIGHT, CENTER Essays on Liberalism and Conservatism in the United States

Authoritative spokesmen with opposing viewpoints discuss the controversies of liberal and conservative politics. 169 pages. $1.75 paper.

REPRESENTATION AND MISREPRESENTATION: Legislative Reapportionment Theory and Practice

Eight essays discuss steps taken by the fifty states to conform to the Supreme Court's legislative reapportionment rulings. 189 pages. $1.75 paper.

HIGHER EDUCATION AND MODERN DEMOCRACY: THE CRISIS OF THE FEW AND THE MANY

Eight selections examine present problems in higher education. 185 pages. $1.75 paper.

A NATION OF CITIES: Essays on America's Urban Problems

Essays on the "urban crisis" by leading spokesmen with opposing viewpoints. 160 pages. $1.75 paper.

POLITICAL PARTIES, U.S.A.

158 pages, $1.75 paper.

WHY FOREIGN AID?

140 pages. $1.75 paper.

AMERICA ARMED Essays on United States Military Policy

140 pages. $1.75 paper.

100 YEARS OF EMANCIPATION

217 pages. $1.95 paper.

Rand M¢Nally Series on the Organization Sciences

Edited by ROBERT T. GOLEMBIEWSKI University of Georgia

NEW IN 1968 . . . ELECTRONIC DATA PROCESSING SYSTEMS IN PUBLIC MANAGEMENT Edited by GEOFFREY Y. CORNOG, ELLIS L. SCOTT, JAMES B. KENNEY, and JOHN J. CONNELLY

Introduces government executives to EDP as it can be applied to law enforcement, tax and fiscal systems and educational systems. 224 pages. $2.95 paper. $8.00 cloth.

THE PROFESSIONAL IN THE ORGANIZATION

By MARK ABRAHAMSON

Focuses on the professional as a member of an organization. 168 pages. $3.50 paper, $7.00 cloth.

ORGANIZING MEN AND POWER: Patterns of Behavior and Line-Staff Models ROBERT T. GOLEMBIEWSKI

An unorthodox model of line-staff functions which challenges traditional theories. 288 pages. $3.75 paper. $6.00 cloth.

EMPATHY AND IDEOLOGY: Aspects of Administrative Innovation Edited by CHARLES PRESS and ALAN ARIAN

Generalized and specific readings on problems and issues of administrative innovation. 276 pages; $3.75 paper. $6.00 cloth.

MANAGERIAL BEHAVIOR AND ORGANIZATION DEMANDS Edited by ROBERT T. GOLEMBIEWSKI and FRANK K. GIBSON

30 managerially related articles portray demands to which managers must respond. 464 pages. $4.25 paper. $8.50 cloth.

RAND MCHALLY & COMPANY The College Department • Box 7600 • Chicago, Illinois 60680

AMERICAN POLITICS RESEARCH SERIES

Edited by AARON WILDAVSKY

A COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF LEGISLATIVE ISSUES
IN THE FIFTY STATES
By WAYNE FRANCIS

A clear, insightful picture of the nature of political conflict in the state legislatures, with an eye toward the implications of such conflict for actual policy. 128 pages. $4.95.

POWER IN COMMITTEES: An Experiment in the Governmental Process By JAMES DAVID BARBER

An empirical study of the exercise of power in the decision-making process. 189 pages. $6.00.

SOCIAL INSECURITY: The Politics of Welfare By GILBERT Y. STEINER

A critical examination of the role of politics in the making of American public assistance policy. 270 pages. $7.00.

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, AND THE PUBLIC: Policy Outcomes in the American States By THOMAS R. DYE

325 pages. $7.00.

AMBITION AND POLITICS:
Political Careers in the United States
By JOSEPH A. SCHLESINGER

226 pages. $7.00.

THE IMPACT OF NEGRO VOTING:
The Role of the Vote in the Quest for Equality
By WILLIAM R. KEECH

c. 120 pages. $3.50.

Two important new titles in the American Politics Research Series

SPENDING IN THE AMERICAN STATES

By IRA SHARKANSKY, University of Wisconsin

The principal question of this book is: Why do some state governments spend more than others?

Dr. Sharkansky's statistical analysis identifies patterns in state government spending and isolates deviant states. The study analyzes in detail the effects of national crises, economic change, population change, and federal aid on state government spending. c. 160 pages. c. $5.00.

READINGS IN PSYCHOTHERAPY AND COUNSELING

By WILLIAM S. SAHAKIAN, Suffolk University

Dr. Sahakian presents salient portions of the major works of principal contributors to psychotherapy, affording the student an opportunity for face-to-face encounters with Freud, Jung, Rogers, Frankl, Wolpe and many others, speaking for themselves. c. 640 pages. c. $17.50.

Write for Examination Copies.

RAND MCHALLY & COMPANY

The College Department Box 7600 Chicago, Illinois 60680

Important Titles in Political Science

ENEMIES IN POLITICS

By DAVID J. FINLAY, OLE R. HOLSTI and RICHARD R. FAGEN

Theoretical and empirical discussion of the ways in which enemies are defined in politics. 264 pages. $2.95 paper. $7.50 cloth.

INTERNATIONAL REGIONS AND THE INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM:

A Study in Political Ecology

By BRUCE M. RUSSETT.

Empirical study of the relationships between political systems and their social and physical environments.

320 pages. $3.75 paper. $8.50 cloth.

GOVERNMENT AND SLUM HOUSING: A Century of Frustration

By LAWRENCE M. FRIEDMAN

Development of general concepts about slum housing with a discussion of housing programs.

c. 250 pages. $2.95 paper. $8.00 cloth.

A METHODOLOGICAL PRIMER FOR POLITICAL SCIENTISTS

By R. T. GOLEMBIEWSKI, WILLIAM WELSH, and WILLIAM J. CROTTY

Develops specific methodological guidelines for empirical research in political science. 640 pages. $8.50.

STUDIES IN POLITICAL CHANGE SERIES

Edited by MYRON WEINER
Massachusetts Institute of Technology

CULTURAL PLURALISM AND NATIONALIST POLITICS IN BRITISH GUYANA

By LEO A. DEPRES Western Reserve University

The author's field research analyzes the cultural dimensions of nationalist politics in British Guiana (now Guyana) and their development during the closing years of colonial rule (1960-61). 240 pages. $4.50 paper.

CREATING POLITICAL ORDER: The Party-States of West Africa

By ARISTIDE R. ZOLBERG, University of Chicago

An intensive analysis of one-party regimes as illustrated by Ghana, Guinea, Mali, the Ivory Coast, Senegal. 168 pages. $2.95 paper.

SONS OF THE ESTABLISHMENT: Elite Youth in Panama and Costa Rica

By DANIEL GOLDRICH, University of Oregon

Shows how the thinking sons of incumbent elites in Panama and Costa Rica will affect the future of these countries. 139 pages. $2.95 paper.

PUBLIC LIBERTIES IN THE NEW STATES

By DAVID H. BAYLEY, University of Denver

Discusses the current status of important civil liberties in emerging nations and analyzes factors which have developed or curtailed these freedoms. 152 pages. $2.50 paper.

Write for Examination Copies.

RAND MCHALLY & COMPANY

The College Department Box 7600 Chicago, Illinois 60680

- Authoritative
- Up-to-Date

NEW books or

EMPLOYEE — MANAGEMENT RELATIONS IN GOVERNMENT

► PERL — Public Employee Relations Library —

10 issues per year — written by outstanding leaders in the field. $10 each — $50 per year subscription

Public Management at the Bargaining Table

Kenneth O. Warner and Mary L. Hennessy 490 pp. - $11.95

Questions and Answers on Public Employee Negotiation

W. D. Heisel and J. K. Hallihan 214 pp. - $8.95

► Collective Bargaining in the Public Service — Theory and Practice

Kenneth O. Warner, Editor 200 pp. – $7.00

- For further information write to Dept. B
- Public Personnel Association
- 1313 E. 60th Street Chicago, Illinois 60637

10% Educational Discount • Postpaid with check or money order • Postage and handling added to billed orders.

A New Assessment and Sourcebook

WOMEN IN AMERICAN POLITICS

by Martin Gruberg, Wisconsin State University

Of special interest to students of women's voting behavior and political role since suffrage in 1920. Fully annotated and indexed, with references to many of the women who have been active in political parties and organizations at national, state and local levels.

Cloth 6 x 9, 350 pp., $7.50. Just published.

At your bookseller or from publisher:

ACADEMIA PRESS, Box 125, Oshkosh, Wisconsin 54901

New in paperback:

Studies in British Politics

Richard Rose

This collection of articles is designed to portray the political behavior of the British public. Each of its five selections reflects a particular aspect of the influences on the British voter outside the formal machinery of government, and introductions and headnotes help place the selections in their proper social science contexts.

352 pp. Paper: $3.75

Political Theory

Its Nature and Uses

George Kateb

This latest study in St. Martin's Series in American Politics is both a rationale and a description of political theory, defining it in its traditional role and demonstrating its importance in the field of political science. The author discusses how the political theorist generalizes from what he observes of political practices and how he makes use of the classical political theorists.

112 pp. $1.75

Also new this fall:

New Approaches to International Relations

Morton A. Kaplan, ed.

This volume, the product of the 1966 Conference of the Norman Wait Harris Memorial Foundation at the University of Chicago, contains definitive statements of the new approaches to international relations which political scientists have thus far recognized. Contributors: Kaplan, Wohlstetter, Golden, Kahn, Deutsch, Alker, Burns, Guetzkow, Galtung, North, Falk, Hsi-sheng Chi, Franke, and Reinken.

534 pp. $10.00

Rebels and Whips

An Analysis of Dissension, Discipline, and Cohesion in British Politics

Robert J. Jackson

By presenting a careful definition and an empirical examination of the nature of British party discipline and cohesion, Professor Jackson lays the groundwork for further study of a significant but little treated development in the evolution of British politics.

352 pp. $10.00

ST. MARTIN'S PRESS

College Department

175 Fifth Avenue

New York, New York 1001(

The Soviet Union

A Half-Century of Communism

EDITED BY KURT LONDON. Highly readable interpretations of the achievements and failures of the first fifty years of communist rule in the Soviet Union are provided by John A. Armstrong, Frederick C. Barghoorn, Robert A. Feldmesser, Andrew Gyorgy, John P. Hardt (with Carl Modig), Dan N. Jacobs, Harish Kapur, Roman Kolkowicz, Kurt London, Klaus Mehnert, Boris Meissner, Otto Schiller, H. Gordon Skilling, Robert C. Tucker, and Thomas W. Wolfe.

$12.00 cloth, $2.95 paper

The Broken Triangle

Peking, Djakarta, and the PKI

BY SHELDON W. SIMON. In this important analysis of the abortive 1965 communist coup in Indonesia, Dr. Simon evaluates Chinese and Indonesian foreign policy objectives and the domestic and international conditions that led to Peking's setback. He suggests that the results of the coup—coupled with certain events of The Great Cultural Revolution—challenge the view that China can subvert all of Southeast Asia.

$6.95 cloth

Arms Control Agreements

Designs for Verification and Organization

BY DAVID W. WAINHOUSE AND OTHERS. Seven eminent scholars analyze the structure of international organizations required to verify and administer arms control agreements. The authors present case studies dealing with the control of nuclear arms and general and complete disarmament. In Part II they consider verification problems and general principles, and conclude with a recommendation for the creation of a single verification organization. $6.95 cloth

American Defense Policy, Second Edition

EDITED BY MARK E. SMITH III AND CLAUDE J. JOHNS, JR., Associates in Political Science, United States Air Force Academy. First published in 1964, this source book on the strategy and machinery of defense pioneered the study of national security as a separate field. Ninety per cent of the original has now been replaced by more recent essays. "Assembles in one volume a representative selection of the recent extensive American writings on defense matters: it succeeds brilliantly."—International Affairs $12.00 cloth, $5.00 paper

The Limits of Foreign Policy

BY CHARLES BURTON MARSHALL. "Mr. Marshall is one of a small but vital group of Americans who think about foreign policy with a minimum of passion and a maximum of perspective."—New York Times Book Review "Remarkably succinct . . . It is a character sketch of the American poeple in their relation to international problems and responsibilities . . . since the second World War."—Paul Pickrel, in American Panorama $1.95 paper

THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS / Baltimore, Maryland 21218

new from Bobbs-Merrill

Republican Strategies in 1964

brilliant new theory of political parties 384 pp. $4.75 paper $7.50 cloth

John H. Kessel

ably recaptures the problems and strategies of the 64 presidential campaign, and so far as I can judge he does so with complete accuracy as to detail." DENISON KITCHEL

...a very admirable job. He has come closer than others I have read in putting his finger on the importance of consensus to the President's strategy."—BILL D. MOYERS forthcoming in 1969 and 1970

BOBBS-MERRILL POLICY ANALYSIS SERIES

THOMAS R. DYE, Editor

THE AIM OF THE POLICY ANALYSIS SERIES IS THE SYSTEMATIC EXPLANATION OF THE CONTENT OF PUBLIC POLICY. THE FOCUS OF THE SERIES IS ON PUBLIC POLICY CHOICES OF NATIONAL, STATE, AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS, AND THE FORCES WHICH OPERATE TO SHAPE POLICY DECISIONS.

Books in the Series are not concerned with what policies governments ought to pursue, but rather with why governments pursue the policies they do. Public policies are not debated or argued in these volumes; rather they are assembled, described, and explained in a systematic fashion.

Each volume deals with an important area of public policy—education, taxation, economic opportunity, agriculture, urban problems, and military affairs. Each volume treats public policy as an output of political systems, and endeavors to explain policy outputs with reference to historical, environmental, political, and cultural forces which generate demands upon political systems. Each volume attempts to employ systematic comparative analysis in the explanation of public policy. This involves the comparison of policies past and present, the comparison of policies in different issue areas, the comparison of policies generated by national, state and local political systems, and the comparison of the effects of political, environmental, and cultural forces in the shaping of public policy. Each volume strives for improved theoretical statements about public policy determination.

Initial volumes in the Series

POLITICS AND PUBLIC POLICY IN AMERICA

POLITICS AND URBAN AFFAIRS

Richard I. Hofferbert

POLITICS AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Randall B. Ripley

POLITICS AND AGRICULTURAL POLICY

Robert H. Salisbury and J. P. Heinz

POLITICS AND MILITARY POLICY
THE POLITICS OF TAXING AND SPENDING POLITICS AND EDUCATIONAL POLICY

James M. Gerhardt Ira Sharkansky Harmon Ziegler

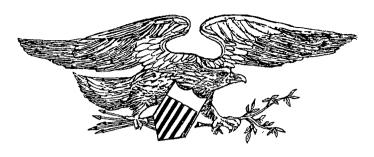

Thomas R. Dye

The Series will be produced in paperback editions of about 150 pages each.

Future announcements will indicate when books will be available for classroom orders.

COLLEGE DIVISION

Books Designed To Lend Additional Depth To Your American Government Courses

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: THE CLASH OF ISSUES, 3rd Edition, 1968. James A. Burkhart, Stephens College; Samuel Krislov, University of Minnesota; Raymond L. Lee, Indiana University of Pennsylvania. Provides an organizing center for a problems approach to controversial issues of American government. April 1968, 457 pp., paperbound $3.95

CASES IN AMERICAN NATIONAL GOV-ERNMENT AND POLITICS Edited by Rocco J. Tresolini, and Richard T. Frost, Reed College. Brief, complete cases to intrigue beginning students and illustrate how public policies are shaped and decisions made. 1966, 384 pp., paperbound $4.50

AN INTRODUCTION TO POLITICAL ANALYSIS: PROBLEMS IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, 4th Edition, 1967. Robert E. Lane, James D. Barber, Both of Yale University; Fred I. Greenstein, Wesleyan University. Concrete case studies of government in action, placed in a theoretical framework with attention on significant political issues. 1967, 416 pp., paperbound $5.50

CASE STUDIES IN AMERICAN GOVERN-MENT Prepared by the Inter-University Case Program; Edited by Alan K. Campbell, Inter-University, and Edwin A. Block, Syracuse University. Illuminates the interrelationships between personalities, value consideration, structural organizational elements, and power politics. 1962, 368 pp., paperbound $4.95

CASES IN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERN-MENT Edited by Richard T. Frost, Reed College. Presents actual problems in particular communities, reflecting the intimate, face-to-face nature of state and local government. 1961, 362 pp., paperbound $4.95

THE POLICY-MAKING PROCESS Charles E. Lindblom, Yale University. Provides an introduction to the multifaceted subject of government policy making, and an overview of current manifestations of the phenomenon. In the Foundations of Modern Political Science Series. May 1968, 128 pp., paper $1.95, cloth $4.95

PEOPLE AND POLITICS: AN ANALYSIS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SYSTEM

Lewis A. Froman, Jr., University of California. Sets forth a general theory of politics based on the premise that political decisions involve the distribution of advantages and disadvantages among people with different resources. 1962, 114 pp., paperbound $2.50

THE PROMISE OF POLITICS Henry S. Kariel, University of Hawaii. Develops a point of view for coming to terms with contemporary America. 1966, 118 pp., paperbound $2.25

ISSUES OF AMERICAN PUBLIC POLICY, 2nd Edition, 1968. Edited by John H. Bunzel, San Francisco State College. Built around controversy and conflict, this work presents a variety of political views on the important issues of our time. January 1968, 372 pp., paperbound $5.75

For approval copies write: Box 903

PRENTICE-HALL, Englewood Cliffs, N.J.

"The totalitarian claim to power is not kept within the bounds of possible governmental competence but—as the name makes clear—is intended to dispose unreservedly over the totality of human life."

From-

TOTALITARIAN RULE:

Its Nature and Characteristics By HANS BUCHHEIM

Translated from the German by RUTH HEIN. With annotations by Kurt P. Tauber and by the translator.

Mr. Buchheim personally experienced the degradation of Germany under totalitarian rule. In this brilliant theoretical work he carefully defines totalitarianism, drawing examples mostly from Hitler's Germany and Communist Russia. From specific events emerge principles that can measure the degree of totalitarianism in any political-social system.

HANS BUCHHEIM was the only person in his class who avoided joining the Hitler Youth. As an officer, he fought and was wounded on the Eastern Front. He took his doctorate at Heidelberg in philosophy and history. For many years associated with the Institut für Zeitgeschichte in Munich, he is now at the University of Mainz. 112 pages. With notes and bibliography. $4.50

THE GERMAN CONCEPTION OF HISTORY:

The National Tradition of Historical Thought from Herder to the Present

By GEORGE G. IGGERS

"No student of modern German history should miss reading this informative and thoughtful book."

—Hans Kohn 376 pages. With notes, bibliography, and index. $10.00

BEYOND EAGLE AND SWASTIKA:

German Nationalism Since 1945

By KURT P. TAUBER

"Indispensable for charting a course through German politics."

-The New York Times

1,648 pages. With 50 photographs, chart, appendixes, notes, bibliography, and full indexes. Two volumes, $35.00

IDEOLOGIES IN WORLD AFFAIRS

Andrew Gyorgy, Sino-Soviet Institute, George Washington University

George Blackwood, Boston University

This book discusses the political philosophies of the world's major systems—Communism, Fascism, Socialism, and Capitalism 1967 262 pages Paper $3.50

THE PERMANENT CRISIS

Kurt London, Sino-Soviet Institute, George Washington University

This text focuses attention on the far-reaching changes in the character and substance of international politics since World War I and suggests the contributing causes for these changes.

1967 246 pages Paper $2.95

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT AND DEMOCRACY

Carl J. Freidrich, Harvard University

This newly revised fourth edition of a well-known text studies the nature and development of modern government, the pattern of constitutional government, governmental tensions, breakdowns, and adjustments.

1968 728 pages $9.75

VOTING AND NONVOTING: IMPLICATIONS OF BROADCAST-ING RETURNS BEFORE POLLS ARE CLOSED

Kurt Lang, State University of New York Gladys Lang, Center for Urban Education

The Langs study the immediate and long range effects of mass media on elections in this volume. Particularly timely and of interest to everyone. 1968 172 pages Paper $2.50

CONSTITUTIONALISM IN AMERICA: ORIGINS AND EVOLUTION OF ITS FUNDAMENTAL IDEAS

Arthur E. Sutherland, Harvard Law School

Deals in detail with five ever-present ideas and ideals in a government of laws as it becomes a government of men.

1965 618 pages $8.75

FORTHCOMING

THE DEMOCRATIC POLITICAL PROCESS: A CROSS NATIONAL READER

Kurt L. Shell, Johann Wolfgang Goethe-Universität, Frankfurt

SCIENTIFIC FOUNDATIONS OF POLITICS

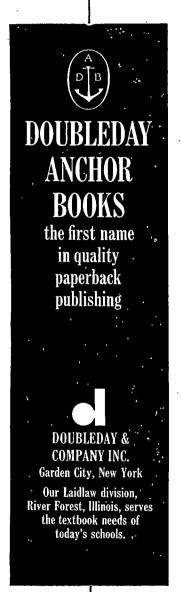

James Dyson, Florida State University George Graham, Vanderbilt University

Blaisdell Publishing Company

A Division of Ginn and Company

275 Wyman Street, Waltham, Massachusetts 02154

IMPERIALISM & SOCIAL REFORM

English Social-Imperial Thought 1895-1914

Bernard Semmel. "A scholarly, sophisticated discussion of ideas and attitudes which were influential, not only prior to 1914, but also since as well" (Current History). This ground-breaking study probes the British attempt to make the working class aware of the benefits of Empire, in the critical years between 1895 and 1914. $1.25

SOLDIERS AGAINST THE STATE

The French Army in Politics

John Steward Ambler. Using an interdisciplinary approach which employs the techniques of sociology, history, social psychology, and political science, Professor Ambler examines the whole relationship of military force to civilian government in France from 1815 to the present. His analysis sheds important light on the way in which an uneasy alliance between generals and politicians becomes a central problem of democracy. $1.75

TODAY'S LATIN AMERICA Second Edition, Revised

Robert J. Alexander. One of the most successful and authoritative studies of Latin America's twenty nations is brought up to date, reflecting political, cultural, and international developments since 1962. Individual essays probe aspects of geography, society, and politics; the new edition analyzes political shifts since President Kennedy's death, the increased influence of Castro's Cuba, and changes in U.S. aid policy and Latin American moods. An Anchor Original. $1.25

REPUBLICAN PAPERS

Edited by Representative Melvin R. Laird. This fourth volume in Anchor's "position paper" series represents an important collaboration between members of the academic community and leading Republican members of the House of Representatives. Problems are defined and solutions offered in approximately a dozen crisis areas; contributors include Daniel P. Moynihan (on "Where the Liberals Went Wrong"), Milton Friedman, Rep. Charles E. Goodell (N.Y.), and Rep. Robert E. Michel (Ill.) An Anchor Original. $1.75

A DISSENTER'S GUIDE TO FOREIGN POLICY

Edited by Irving Howe. This handbook on U.S. foreign policy brings together, in some two dozen essays, the major critical issues of the coming election—and the coming decade. Topics include the case against interventionism, and the use of American power in Vietnam. Contributors include Michael Harrington, Gunnar Myrdal, Walter Laqueur, and Robert Heilbroner. An Anchor Original. $1.75

THE CHINESE WORLD ORDER

JOHN K. FAIRBANK, editor Thirteen scholars from half a dozen countries examine the foreign relations of the Chinese empire before the present century, showing that Sinocentrism has had an abiding influence on China's political attitudes, and is a major force in explaining Peking's behavior today. Harvard East Asian Series, 32. $10.00

BARBARA MILLER LANE

ARCHITECTURE AND POLITICS IN GERMANY, 1918–1945

Mrs. Lane shows that Nazi views on architecture, far from being cohesive or monolithic, were inherited from the Weimar Republic and were generated by a complex of historical factors. She provides much new information on such relevant topics as Nazi political concepts, cultural organizations, and propaganda methods. 109 illus. $15.00

OLIVER GARCEAU, editor

POLITICAL RESEARCH AND POLITICAL THEORY

These nine essays in honor of the late V.O. Key, Jr. elucidate some of the major characteristics and tendencies of political science today. The authors are: Avery Leiserson, J. Roland Pennock, Frederick M. Watkins, M. Brewster Smith, Douglas Price, Austin Ranney, Leon D. Epstein, Duane Lockard, and Merle Fainsod. $7.95

HARA KEI IN THE POLITICS OF COMPROMISE, 1905–1915

TETSUO NAJITA

Making extensive use of materials not previously employed in Western studies of Japanese party history, the author examines the career of the astute politician Hara Kei and through it reassesses the meaning of the political compromises made from 1905 to 1915. Harvard East Asian Series, 31. $7.50

KOREA

The Politics of the Vortex

This book presents a wholly new interpretation of the pattern of Korean politics and its origins in Korean society and culture, a valuable study of the comparative politics of modernization, and a suggestive proposal for encouraging political stability and pluralistic democracy in Asian and African societies. Center for International Affairs. $11.95

AGREEMENTS OF THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA, 1949–1967

A Calendar

This invaluable book presents a chronological listing of all reported agreements concluded by the People's Republic of China up to Sept. 30, 1967, and is the most complete listing of Communist Chinese agreements in print. Harvard Studies in East Asian Law, 3. $12.50

LABOR POLITICS AMERICAN STYLE

The California State Federation of Labor

Mr. Taft traces the activities, policies, and problems of the California Federation from its beginnings in 1901 until the merger of the AFL-CIO in 1958, emphasizing its significance as a political institutions and relation to the national growth of the labor movement. Wertheim Publications in Industrial Relations. $7.00

PARTY RIVALRY AND POLITICAL CHANGE IN TAISHO JAPAN

In a comprehensive analysis of the establishment of two-party politics in early 20th-century Japan, the author examines the politicians' tactical and policy objectives within the context of their own aims rather than in terms of their failure to fulfill democratic ideals. Harvard East Asian Series, 35. $6.95

GREGORY HENDERSON

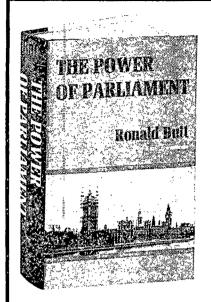

DOUGLAS M.
JOHNSTON and HUNGDAH CHIU, editors

PHILIP TAFT

PETER DUUS

In Canada/Saunders of Toronto, Ltd.

To be published on October 22, 1968 at $8.50.

WALKER AND COMPANY

720 Fifth Ave., N.Y. 10019

The House of Commons in decay

THE POWER OF PARLIAMENT

An evolutionary study of the House of Commons in British politics

by RONALD BUTT

introduction by KARL LOEWENSTEIN

In this distinguished study of parliamentary politics, Ronald Butt describes the evolution of Parliament as an instrument in government. By providing a comparison of its present with its past place in politics, he offers evidence relevant to the current allegations of Parliamentary decline.

Mr. Butt was a tutor in English constitutional history at Oxford, and then became political editor of The Financial Times. For the past year he has been assistant editor for government and politics for The Sunday Times in London. Karl Loewenstein is one of the outstanding American authorities on the British constitution. In a fifty-page introduction he compares the English and American systems of government.

LOOKING FOR A BOOK PUBLISHER?

It is no secret that publication is regarded as the foundation stone of a scholar's career. In order to gain recognition, prestige, and advancement, the scholar must seek publication.

Here at Exposition Press, we offer scholars a complete publishing service, under our special academic imprint, "Exposition-University Books." Though the proportion of scholarly publications in the lists of the trade houses is shrinking, due to economic pressures, many of our recent titles in the academic fields have gained popular reviews, professional recognition and steady sales. These books are the result of a publishing plan that is bringing a steady flow of scholarly writers to Exposition Press. They reflect the high editorial standards and quality of design and production which have won the respect of libraries, schools, book-sellers and critics. Ask for free catalogs.

FREE! The behind-the-scenes story of book publishing revealed in two fact-filled, illustrated brochures, containing a detailed description of our subsidy plan including a breakdown of contract terms and typical costs (in print for the first time). Copies are available on request. Your inquiries and manuscripts are invited. An editorial appraisal will be furnished promptly without obligation. References upon request.

Please write to Dept. 93C

EXPOSITION PRESS INC., 50 Jericho Turnpike, Jericho, New York 11753

PAPERBACKS

GB 104

Legislatures

Second Edition

By K. C. WHEARE, A comparative analysis of the legislatures of Europe, the United States and the Commonwealth nations that describes their functions and present problems. $1.50

GB 253

The Scientific Estate

By DON K. PRICE. A consideration of the effects of modern science upon the processes of representative democracy. $1.95

GB 258

Consent, Freedom and Political Obligation

Second Edition

By J. P. PLAMENATZ. Reviews the arguments of the 1938 edition, which attempts a definition of political terms in common use. $1.50

GB 240

France, Germany, and the New Europe, 1945-1967

Revised and Expanded Edition

By F. ROY WILLIS. A history of the post-war rapprochement of France and Germany.

GB 231

The Poverty of Abundance

By ALBERT U. ROMASCO, A penetrating study of the response of American institutions and President Hoover to the Depression. $1.95

GB 199

The Crossroads of Liberalism

By CHARLES FORCEY. An examination of the political thought of Croly, Weyl, Lippmann—and the Progressive Era. $2.25

GB 211

The Republican Party, 1854-1966 Second Edition

By GEORGE H. MAYER. The story of a continuing and changing organization and of the personalities and issues that divide it. $2.95

GB 254

Defender of the Faith

William Jennings Bryan, The Last Decade, 1915-1925

By LAWRENCE W. LEVINE. "Eminently fair to [the] protagonist and his ideas while legitimately questioning both." - American Historical Review $2.25

At all bookstores

🖮 OXFORD 🖮 UNIVERSITY 👑 PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Democratic Representation:

REAPPORTIONMENT IN LAW AND POLITICS

By ROBERT G. DIXON, JR., The George Washington University. Against a backdrop of past representation theory and practice, this book provides an incisive analysis of the ongoing reapportionment revolution up to and including the Supreme Court's local apportionment rulings of 1968. Among the topics included are principles of representation, problems of judicial and legislative implementation, racial and political gerrymandering, role of computers, apportionment commissions, districting options, and problems for the Seventies.

1958

672 pp.

text edition $8.00

trade edition $12.50

Democracy and the Public Service

By FREDERICK C. MOSHER, University of California, Berkeley. "An excellent and incisive analysis of the American public service with occasional comparative data. It is well written, analytical, and objective. He raises the pertinent issues and assesses our progress in alleviating them. An excellent survey."—George S. Blair, Claremont Graduate School

1968

240 pp.

cloth $4.75

paper $2.25

The Government of Modern Britain

By FRANK STACEY, University College, Swansea. This work covers most aspects of central government in Britain, including elections, Parliament, the Cabinet, party organization, opinion polls, pressure groups, the Civil Service, and administrative tribunals. Developments in all these fields from 1945 to the present are examined, and some of the main academic controversies are evaluated.

1968

431 pp.

cloth $7.20

paper $4.50

Forthcoming

Democracy in the Administrative State

By EMMETTE S. REDFORD, University of Texas

Spring 1969

332 pp.

cloth $4.75

paper $2.25

Political Socialization

By KENNETH P. LANGTON, University of Michigan

Spring 1969

200 pp.

paper $1.95

W OXFORD W UNIVERSITY W PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The Politics of Science:

READINGS IN SCIENCE, TECHNOLOGY, AND GOVERNMENT

Edited by WILLIAM R. NELSON, United States Air Force Academ?. "Looks like an excellent reader with many 'key' articles by top experts. I certainly intend to adopt this. Timely treatment of critical issues facing science."—HAROLD G. MCCANN, III. University of California, Santa Cruz

1968

550 pp

paper $3.95

The Nature and Function of International Organization, SECOND EDITION

By STEPHEN S. GOODSPEED, University of California, Santa Barbara. "A comprehensive, analytical and readable textbook on international organization with a clear dissection of the complicated post-war issues confronting the world body; summary and appraisal at the end of the major chapters are particularly helpful."—H. T. Chu, Texas Technological College

1967

752 pp.

illus.

$7.50

The Judicial Process:

AN INTRODUCTORY ANALYSIS OF THE COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES, ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, SECOND EDITION

By HENRY J. ABRAHAM, University of Pennsylvania. "A thorough examination of the structural aspects of the judicial process."—I. H. BROMALL, Ohio University

1968

512 pp.

paper $2.95

Freedom and the Court:

CIVIL RIGHTS AND LIBERTIES IN THE UNITED STATES

By HENRY J. ABRAHAM. "... I found this a skillful and eloquent treatment of the relation of two vital institutions—the problem of freedom and the role of the court. Professor Abraham has treated the subject with discernment and conviction."—James MacGregor Burns, Williams College

1967

352 pp.

cloth $7.50

paper $2.75

Anglo-American Criminal Justice

By DELMAR KARLEN, New York University, and GEOFFREY SAWER, Wayne State University. A succinct but comprehensive study of the American and British systems of criminal justice. A model study in comparative law."—M. MARVIN BERGER, New York Law Journal

1968

233 pp.

cloth $6.00

paper $1.95

WOXFORD WUNIVERSITY PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The American Party Systems:

STAGES OF POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Edited by WILLIAM NISBET CHAMBERS, and WALTER DEAN BURNHAM, both of Washington University. "This book fills an important need in the text materials on American party development and history. An excellent choice of contributors. Combines historical and statistical materials in a balanced way."—JOSEPH ZIKMUND, Temple University

1967

336 pp.

cloth $6.75

paper $2.50

Punishment and Responsibility:

ESSAYS IN THE PHILOSOPHY OF LAW

By H. L. A. HART, Oxford University. "This is an excellent collection of essays that should have particular value as a text in upper-division ethics or jurisprudence course."—RICHARD P. HAYNES, University of Florida

1968

279 pp.

cloth $5.75

paper $2.50

Free Government in the Making:

READINGS IN AMERICAN POLITICAL THOUGHT, THIRD EDITION

By ALPHEUS THOMAS MASON, Princeton University

1965

952 pp.

$8.00

British Cabinet Government

By KARL LOEWENSTEIN, Amherst College. Translated from the German by Roger Evans

1967

396 pp.

paper $2.50

Basic Documents in International Law

Edited by IAN BROWNLIE, Wadham College, Oxford University

1967

251 pp.

cloth $4.00

paper $2.50

The Notion of the State:

AN INTRODUCTION TO POLITICAL THEORY

By ALEXANDER PASSERIN D'ENTRÈVES, University of Turin

1967

248 pp.

cloth $5.60

paper $2.95

MOXFORD WUNIVERSITY WPRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

The Art and Politics of Thomas Nast

By MORTON KELLER, Brandeis University. "Morton Keller . . . has assembled 241 of Nast's cartoons, grouping them topically. The reproductions are clear and large enough to convey their visual impact. Keller provides an introductory essay for each major division of his work. The essays place the cartoons in their political context, giving as well a brief but accurate narrative of the period 1862-1885. . . . Keller's valuable book contributes to our understanding both of Nast's work and of a relatively neglected period of our political history."—David R. B. Ross, N.Y. Times Book Review $12.50

Origins of the Fifth Amendment

By LEONARD W. LEVY, Brandeis University. "The first and only full-length study in the history of English and American law of the right against self-incrimination. His study, besides being unique, is also definitive and indeed monumental."—ROBERT F. DRINAN, Boston Herald. "Levy has accomplished something that may exceed his original intention. His study provides an unfolding chronicle of Western man's increasingly civilized methods for judicially resolving public and private disputes."—JON R. WALTZ, Book Week $12.50

Woodrow Wilson and World Politics

AMERICA'S RESPONSE TO WAR AND REVOLUTION

By N. GORDON LEVIN, JR., Amberst College. "The author has described brilliantly and perceptively both the dynamics and the long-range purposes of Wilson's foreign policies. . . . His analysis is extremely sophisticated. While affirming the essential unity of Wilson's foreign policies, he points out their contradictions and ambiguities. . . . Judicious, balanced, and as detached as it is humanly possible to be."—ARTHUR S. LINK, N.Y. Times Book Review $7.50

Government and Revolution in Vietnam

By DENNIS J. DUNCANSON. "Informed both by first-hand observation and scholarly research, this inquiry into the causes, influences, and motives that have contributed to the Vietnam predicament today is an outstanding historical study and an invaluable reference work. . . . It is one of the few books that students of (and experts on) Vietnam and Southeast Asia will find an important addition to their libraries."—ROBERT W. RINDEN, Foreign Service Journal $9.50

WOXFORD WUNIVERSITY WPRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Malaysia: Prospect and Retrospect

THE IMPACT AND AFTERMATH OF COLONIAL RULE

By SIR RICHARD ALLEN, British Ambassador to Burma, 1956-1962. Although this book begins with the early history of Malaya, Singapore, and Indonesia, it concentrates on events after the defeat of Japan. Particular attention is paid to the formation of Malaya and its growth into Malaysia, the secession of Singapore, and Sukarno's campaign of confrontation and subsequent downfall, relating these events to the wider context of Western interests and concerns.

Representative Government in Western Europe in the Sixteenth Century

By GORDON GRIFFITHS, University of Washington. This book brings together the original texts of documents on the working of representative institutions in the sixteenth century. Professor Griffiths shows that these institutions played an indispensable part in the government of almost every country in western Europe. $14.00

Arnim and Bismarck

By GEORGE O. KENT, Library of Congress. This study analyzes the status of the office of the chancellor and the foreign minister of the German Reich. It discusses how the outcome of the struggle between Arnim and Bismarck settled the personal fate of the protagonists and determined the course of German foreign and domestic policies for some time. The book is based on a wide range of hitherto little known documents in the archives of the German Foreign Ministry in Bonn. $5.95

The Letters and Papers of Chaim Weizmann

SERIES A: LETTERS: VOLUME I: SUMMER 1885 TO FALL 1902

Edited by LEONARD STEIN in collaboration with GEDALIA YOGEV. This book sheds much new light on the development of the Zionist Movement, the history of the British Mandate for Palestine, and the beginnings of the State of Israel with the publication of this work. The opening volume covers Weizmann's formative years as a schoolboy in Russia and as a student at German and Swiss Universities when, at twenty-eight, he was beginning to make his mark as a leader of the younger Zionists.

$8.75

W OXFORD W UNIVERSITY W PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

New perspectives on government

THAILAND: ANOTHER VIETNAM?

Daniel Wit. Small but critically important, Thailand may become the next "danger zone" in Southeast Asia. Daniel Wit, who spent two years with the Institute of Public Administration in Bangkok, gives a much-needed, objective analysis of both the Thai environment and its system of government. As he highlights Thailand's probable development and future role in Southeast Asia, he stresses the need for political changes to assure the country's strong and viable future. Maps, Bibliography, Index. $4.95

DECADE OF DECISION

G. Theodore Mitau. In this exceptionally interesting study, Professor Mitau discusses revolutionary decisions made by the Supreme Court between 1954 and 1964—and how the American public has reacted to, and been affected by them. He points out how reinterpretations of the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment have decisively reshaped the lives of Americans, from segregation and reapportionment to internal subversion and prayers in public schools. Illustrated, Index. $5.95

CONGRESS

Dale Vinyard. A compact and lucid book explaining how Congress is organized, how it makes decisions, and how it carries out its role in our political system. The author discusses lobbyists, party structure, pressure groups, and Congress' relation to the executive and other legislative bodies.

$3.95

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

Nelson W. Polsby and Aaron B. Wildavsky. A new, 1968 edition of an invaluable guide to understanding the strategies of American electoral politics, from convention maneuvers to the electoral college. Exceptionally lucid, "this book is...sophisticated and...intelligently argued."—The American Political Science Review (commenting on the first edition). $4.95

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

597 Fifth Avenue, New York 10017

A Set of Materials edited by

RICHARD FALK, Princeton University, and SAUL MENDLOVITZ, Rutgers Law School

Vol. I: Toward a Theory of War Prevention Vol. III: The United Nations

Foreword by Harold D. Lasswell Foreword by Oscar Schachter

Vol. II: International Law

Vol. IV: Disarmament and Economic Foreword by Wolfgang Friedmann Development

Foreword by J. David Singer

"Professors Falk and Mendlovitz have planned and executed a program designed to shape an academic discipline oriented toward the principal policy question of the epoch. It is entirely appropriate that such a program should spread among professional and graduate schools, and ultimately permeate college and pre-college years.

The tone is sternly professional. It is responsible, scholarly, scientific, predictive, inventive, and critical."

From the Foreword to Volume I by Harold D. Lagguett From the Foreword to Volume I by Harold D. Lasswell

Projected for 1968 publication: Volumes V and VI supported by The Carnegie Corporation.

Vol. V: Regionalism and World Order

Vol. VI: The Role of the Individual and World Order

Four volume set, paperbound $10.00; Hardcover $14.00; Volumes I and II, $2.50 each; Volumes III and IV $3.50 each. 2,296 pp.

WORLD LAW FUND 11 West 42nd Street, New York, N.Y. 10036

Domestic Scene: 1949-1967

by

Peter Tang and Joan Maloney cloth, $10.00

Also Available:

C. Y. Cheng, Communist China's Economy, 1949-1962 cloth, $5.00

Mandarin Chinese Dictionary Series English-Chinese

Chinese-English

paper. $5.50 ea.

Chinese Language Textbook Series Three Sets, Twelve Volumes

SETON HALL UNIVERSITY PRESS, SOUTH ORANGE, N. J.

Distinguished Texts from Macmillan

THE SOVIET STATE

By Ellsworth Raymond, New York University

This new text provides a thorough analysis of the economics, politics, government, and history of the Soviet Union from the revolution to the Brezhnev-Kosygin regime. The author discusses Soviet political and economic geography, administration of foreign policy, non-governmental mass organizations, and many other subjects. Lively details, personal anecdotes and unusual photographs highlight the text. Each chapter contains a list of suggested readings. 1963, 462 pages. $7.95.

SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY

By Jan F. Triska, Stanford University and David D. Finley, Colorado College

This text provides an explanation and analysis of Soviet foreign policy and the factors influencing her behavior in the international system. It begins with a broad historical orientation. Following chapters are devoted to the process of Soviet foreign policy decision-making from the standpoint of role structure, personality, the belief system, and events. The book concludes with a discussion of the Soviet Union in international organization and international law.

1968, 518 pages, $9.95

THE DYNAMICS OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

Second Edition

By Norman J. Padelford, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Colonel George A. Lincoln, United States Military Academy

Shifting relationships within the power blocs, accelerated technological change, the mounting world population, agitation for nationhood and economic betterment, the slow progress toward larger community—these and other vital elements of the international political environment receive detailed consideration in the extensively rewritten and updated Second Edition of a successful and widely adopted text.

1967, 617 pages, $895.

THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED, Second Edition

By John C. Livingston and Robert G. Thompson, both, Sacramento State College

The Second Edition of this successful text has been sharpened and clarified by establishing, in the first four chapters, the democratic frame of reference needed before proceeding to an examination of American practices and institutions. The authors then pose questions about the nature of democracy and present their answers as well as those propounded by liberal, conservative, and "brokerage" theory. 1966, 591 pages, $7.95.

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

866 Third Avenue • New York, New York 10022

In Canada, write to Collier-Macmillan Canada, Ltd., 55 York Street, Toronto 1, Ontario

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

PLANNING AND PRODUCTIVITY UNDER SOVIET SOCIALISM

ABRAM BERGSON

On the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the U.S.S.R., a specialist on the Soviet economy assesses the failures and successes of Soviet economic planning. The performance of the system is compared with the performance of the capitalist systems in the United States and Western European democracies during this period.

A publication of Carnegie-Mellon University.

$4.00

ALLIANCES AND SMALL POWERS

ROBERT L. ROTHSTEIN

In this study, the author develops the theory that the Small Powers of the world, with their role in international affairs, are not merely smaller, less important versions of the Great Powers. He examines various twentieth-century alliances and alignment problems, and concludes with a discussion of the future prospects for the Small Powers with particular reference to the possibility of nuclear proliferation.

This book is one of the Institute of War and Peace Studies of Columbia University. $10.00

COMMUNISM AND THE YUGOSLAV NATIONAL QUESTION

PAUL SHOUP

This book analyzes the efforts of the Yugoslav Communist party, since coming to power in 1945, to deal with the historic rivalries of the national groups within the federal state. The author emphasizes the party's success in keeping free of Serb domination, thus maintaining the cultural autonomy and equality of the republics, but also points out inconsistencies and failures in applying policies. He gives special attention to the success of the creation of the Macedonian republic.

One of the East Central European Studies of Columbia University. $9.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

440 West 110th Street New York, N. Y. 10025

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

IMAGE AND REALITY IN WORLD POLITICS

JOHN C. FARRELL AND ASA P. SMITH, Editors

These essays point up the variation between image and reality as perceived by nations and their statesmen in regard to several major current and historical crises. A partial listing of contents: "The Social Myths in the 'Cold War,'" by Reinhold Niebuhr; "Perceptions, Reality, and the Franco-American Conflict," by Stanley Hoffman; "China and America: The Burden of Past Misperceptions," by John G. Stoessinger; and "Misperception of Aggression in Vietnam," by Ralph K. White.

paper, $2.25

THEORY AND REALITY IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

JOHN C. FARRELL AND ASA P. SMITH, Editors

The essays in this volume point up the differences between theory and reality in current and past instances of International Relations. They will prove very valuable for the study of political theory, especially in relation to dealings between nations and groups of nations. The contents include: "What is a Theory of International Relations?" by Raymond Aron; Common Sense and Theories of International Relations," by Hans J. Morgenthau; and "On the Concepts of Politics and Power," by Karl W. Deutsch.

paper, $2.25

COLUMBIA ESSAYS IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS VOLUME III, THE DEAN'S PAPERS, 1967

Edited by ANDREW W. CORDIER

This is the third annual volume containing research papers of students of the School of International Affairs and its related institutes. Topics treated include: Congress and the Power to Recognize, Soviet Foreign Policy Decision-Making, The Breakup of the United Arab Republic, and A Chinese "Warlord" Faction: The Chihli Clique, 1918-1924.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

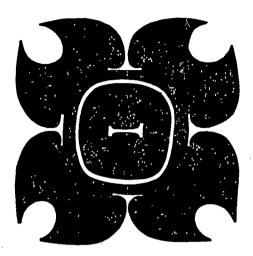

440 West 110th Street New York, N. Y. 10025

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

Ready this month in low-priced DELTA editions

THE CHINESE LOOKING GLASS

Dennis Bloodworth

Dennis Bloodworth, twelve-year Far Eastern correspondent for the Observer, attempts to explain in his book just what makes the China of the 1960's tick; why Mao Tse-tung operates the way he does; what motivates Red Chinese youth; how the Chinese millions feel about the West (not how the Westerner thinks they ought to feel). THE CHINESE LOOKING GLASS traces more than three-thousand years of history, philosophy, literature, and day-to-day living that have helped form the deeply-rooted character of today's Chinese, the enigmatic people who make up one-quarter of the world's population.

"A well-informed, charming, crazy-quilt guide to the Chinese character through thirty centuries of turbulent history."—The New York Times 448 pages $2.45

TO MOVE A NATION

The Politics of Foreign Policy in the Administration of John F. Kennedy Roger Hilsman

President Kennedy himself brought Roger Hilsman into his administration to be one of its key makers of foreign policy. As Head of Intelligence in the State Department and then as Assistant Secretary of State for the Far East, Mr. Hilsman was in the thick of foreign policy crises of the Kennedy years. His intimate knowledge of the specific men and particular events that have determined the course of American foreign policy is so thorough, has been so well assimilated and reflected on, that his writing immediately establishes its authority.

"An important and engrossing work of diplomatic history ... unfailingly lucid, reasonable, and humane, and—rare for a work in its genre—never self-serving."

624 pages $2.95

—The New Yorker

Contact the College Department DELL PUBLISHING CO., Inc. 750 Third Avenue New York, N.Y. 10017

This is the long awaited International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences.

The first reference work of its kind in over thirty years, it brings the full scope of modern social science to your library.

The original Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences was published by The Macmillan Company in 1937. Instead of merely "bringing it up-to-date," we felt that a totally new encyclopedia was called for—one which would reflect the far-reaching progress being made by current social science.

Now, after an investment of more than seven years and two million dollars, the International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences is ready.

This monumental work covers the full range of contemporary social science: anthropology, economics, geography, law, political science, psychology, sociology—and statistics, the tool of the social scientist.

Every article is written with unusual clarity. But sophisticated concepts have not been oversimplified. And the encyclopedia is liberally cross-referenced and indexed to be of maximum use to students, social scientists—and laymen in other fields.

The authority of the work is unquestionable. The list of over 1,600 contributors—as well as the editorial board—reads like a virtual "Who's Who" of distinguished social scientists throughout the world. No viewpoint of any importance has been overlooked.

Send for our free prospectus today. It includes a complete list of editors and contributors (with their affiliations), a detailed index of all 17 volumes, and the story of how this unique encyclopedia was created.

Use the coupon below.

Inter	national	Encyclopedia
		Sciences

Indian Foreign Policy in Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam, 1947-1964

D. R. SarDesai

In this analysis of India's attitudes toward the states of former French Indochina, Mr. SarDesai provides us with important insights into Nehru's policy toward neutralized Laos, non-aligned Cambodia, West-allied South Vietnam, and Communist-allied North Vietnam. Of particular interest is the treatment of the change in India's policy after the outbreak of hostilities with China in 1962 and of India's position as Chairman of the International Control Commission.

FORTHCOMING

Black Scare

The Racist Response to Emancipation and Reconstruction

Forrest G. Wood

Other studies of race relations during the Civil War and reconstruction have usually focused on the Negro and his painful adjustment to freedom, or on the radicals use of him for political gain. Black Scare looks at the opposition; it is about white men, not Negroes, and it reveals what is best described as the first "white backlash" in American history.

FALL $5.95

Royal Government in Colonial Brazil

With Special Reference to the Administration of the Marquis of Lavradio, Viceroy, 1769-1779

Dauril Alden

In the mid-eighteenth century, Brazil, Portugal's most important colony, found itself in a state of crisis brought on by the end of the mining boom and the escalation of a century-long rivalry between Sao Paulo and the Rio de la Plata. Professor Alden's book ranges from the sixteenth to the early nineteenth century, but focuses on this period of crisis and particularly on the administrative reorganization and fiscal reforms brought about by the Marquis of Lavradio.

FALL $15.00

BACK IN PRINT

Prejudice, War, and the Constitution

Causes and Consequences of the Evacuation of the Japanese Americans in World War II

Jacobus tenBroek, Edward N. Barnhart, and Floyd W. Matson

During World War II, 110,000 citizens and resident aliens of Japanese ancestry were banished from their homes and confined behind barbed wire for two and a half years. This comprehensive work surveys the historical origins, political characteristics, and legal consequences of that calamitous episode.

FALL Cloth, $7.50

Paper, $2.45

SCHILLER COLLEGE—GERMANY

BERLIN STUDY CENTER

of SCHILLER COLLEGE offers a quarterly European Seminar Program for American college students of political science and history with above-average academic records.

Courses and lectures under Schiller College faculty and outstanding Berlin educators. Possibility of auditing at other educational institutions in Berlin.

Located in a villa in the Grunewald section of Berlin (near the Kurfürstendamm) the Study Center is home for the students and a place for valuable social contacts.

Impressive Berlin and Vienna cultural events and a Study Tour to Dresden, Prague, Vienna, Salzburg, the Alps, Munich and Nuremberg included in cost.

Fall Quarter: Sept. 1, 1968 (quota full); Winter Quarter: Dec. 15, 1968; Spring Quarter: Mar. 10, 1969
$880 includes tuition, room, board, Cultural Program and Study Tour

For information on Schiller College Academic Year Program, Summer Sessions or Berlin Study Program write to:

Schiller College 7121 Kleiningersheim Germany or

U. R. Laves Director, U. S. Office 429 N. W. 48th St. Oklahoma City, Okla. 73118

Party Strategies in a Multiparty System By

Gunnar Sjöblom

Ph.D., Univ. of Lund

WHAT FACTORS INFLUENCE POLITICIANS? WHAT MAKES THEM DECIDE AS THEY DO?

The author of this book "Party Strategies in a Multiparty System" is thoroughly familiar with the modern "schools" and he has been inspired above all by David Easton, Anthony Downs and Richard Snyder.

Although Dr. Sjöblom's starting-point is the Swedish political scene his penetrating analysis should be of interest to policy-makers and social scientists in other countries as well.

295 pages $6.50

Order your copies through your book-seller or through the publisher.

Studentlitteratur

P.O., S-221 01 LUND 1, SWEDEN

Administrative Implementation of Civil Rights

BY JOSEPH P. WITHERSPOON

This important study should be on the reading list of everyone who is concerned with solving one of the most pressing problems confronting America today. Joseph P. Witherspoon, professor of law at The University of Texas, examines the nature of the civil rights problem and the relatively successful experience of the few well-organized local and state human-relations commissions. He demonstrates that local rather than state governments should be the principal administrators of civil rights law at the local level and suggests that the thesis underlying these roles of state and local government has far-reaching implications regarding the role of the federal government. $10.00

Civil Service Reform in Brazil

Principles versus Practice

BY LAWRENCE S. GRAHAM

Professor Graham's study of the Brazilian civil service reform movement focuses on the years between 1945 and 1964, a period which allowed a relatively free play of political forces but which, ironically, produced fewer successful reforms than the authoritarian periods which preceded and followed it. This study of the reform problems in Brazil is also relevant to other developing countries trying to create more effective national administrative systems.

A Latin American Monograph Series book.

$6.50

Origins of the War with Mexico

The Polk-Stockton Intrigue

BY GLENN W. PRICE

The political rhetoric which veiled our entry into war with Mexico, as Glenn W. Price establishes, is part of the myth of American innocence. The story of President Polk's interest in acquiring California and of his intrigue with Robert F. Stockton represents a singularly objective approach to national history.

Illustrated. $5.00

UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS PRESS

AUSTIN & LONDON

Box 7819, Austin, Texas 78712

from Lippincott in '68

Second Edition . . .

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS IN A REVOLUTIONARY AGE

W. W. KULSKI, Duke University

A thoroughly revised, completely reset edition which presents a comprehensive view of the trends and tensions that are currently reshaping international politics. The author probes the ruptures within the communist system, the growing Western conviction that a Soviet military move in Europe is unlikely, and the feeling that the Cold War is over. Professor Kulski details the growing independence of the Soviet satellite states, and the moves toward closer economic and political ties between Eastern and Western Europe. The widening gap in living standards between the advanced nations and the Third World is vividly described.

768 Pages

$7,95

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND ORGANIZATION

An Introductory Reader

Edited by RICHARD A. FALK, Princeton University, and WOLFRAM F. HANRIEDER, University of California, Santa Barbara

Moving beyond traditional emphasis on legalistic and formalistic aspects, the editors project the study of international law and organization into the wider setting of international relations. The distinctive features of a decentralized legal system are stressed. The result is an approach that is highly compatible with International Relations courses at all levels. The selections, together with the editors' commentaries, provide students with an introduction to the important questions that bear on the character of contemporary international order.

368 Pages

Paperbound

$3,95

THESE LIBERTIES Case Studies in Civil Rights

ROCCO J. TRESOLINI

Unlike many existing casebooks intended for advanced students and specialized audiences, this new book—a virtual text in civil liberties—is designed for students at freshman and sophomore levels. The author has selected thirty-eight cases that have contributed to the growth of our fundamental freedoms. Each case is preceded by a brief introduction which defines the issues in question; describes the social, political, and economic circumstances surrounding those issues; and gives pertinent facts about the life and career of the Justice rendering the decision.

320 Pages

Paperbound

$1.95

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

College Department

East Washington Square

Philadelphia, Pa. 19105

Major Foreign Powers

FIFTH EDITION

GWENDOLEN M. CARTER, Northwestern University JOHN H. HERZ, The City College, The City University of New York The standard work in its field for almost twenty years, Major Foreign Powers provides a detailed, authoritative analysis of politics and government today in Great Britain, France, Germany, and the Soviet Union. For this new Fifth Edition, each section of the book has been thoroughly revised to include new evaluations and information, and the extensive bibliographies have been brought up to date.

701 pages. $9.50

Also available in separate paperbound editions

THE GOVERNMENT Second Edition	OF	THE	UNITED	KINGDON	A.
Gwendolen M. Carter				218	pages.	$2.95
THE GOVERNMENT	OF	FRAN	ICE
Gwendolen M. Carter	•			138	pages.	$2.45
THE GOVERNMENT	OF	GERM	MANY
John H. Herz	-			172	pages.	$2.75
THE GOVERNMENT	OF	THE	SOVIET	UNION
Second Edition
Gwendolen M. Carter				137	pages.	$2.45

To accompany Major Foreign Powers

Documents of Major Foreign Powers

A SOURCEBOOK ON GREAT BRITAIN,

FRANCE, GERMANY, AND THE SOVIET UNION

Edited by LOUISE W. HOLBORN, Radcliffe Institute, JOHN H. HERZ and GWENDOLEN M. CARTER

A collection of 140 documents and readings that includes the crucial historical documents for each country as well as contemporary material of paramount interest for today's students. To help the student place the documents in proper perspective, the editors have provided a general introduction to each country and headnotes for each document or group of related documents.

Paperbound. 382 pages, $4.95 (probable). Publication: September 1968

The Chief Executive

REVISED EDITION

LOUIS W. KOENIG, New York University

A thorough analysis of the American Presidency and the men who have held that office, The Chief Executive is now available in a new paper-bound edition. Professor Koenig has thoroughly revised every chapter of the book to take into account the latest scholarship and important events of the past four years. He has also added an entirely new section comparing the Presidency with other executive offices at the state and local level, a new chapter on "Personality and the Presidency," an expanded bibliography, and reference citations for each chapter.

Paperbound 466 pages, $3.95. Just published

Western Political Theory

FROM ITS ORIGINS TO THE PRESENT

LEE CAMERON McDONALD, Pomona College

A distinguished one-volume history of political theory, this book offers a detailed analysis of the major theorists and schools of thought from Plato to the present. Professor McDonald concentrates on major figures, and his explanations of each man's point of view, complemented by substantial quotations from his writings, give the student a firsthand acquaintance with the man's philosophy, his style, his approach to life, and the age in which he lived.

653 pages. $9.50

Political Patterns in Today's World

SECOND EDITION

D. W. BROGAN, Professor Emeritus, Cambridge University DOUGLAS V. VERNEY, York University

A brief, comparative introduction to politics and society that provides the student with an opportunity to evaluate the two basic political patterns in today's world—liberal democracy, as exemplified in the governments of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Sweden, and communism, as practiced in the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, and China. For this new Second Edition, the authors have thoroughly revised and reorganized their mater al and have brought the text up to date; they have also added an annual tated bibliography and tables for each nation.

Paperbound. 278 pages. $2.95

THE NATIONAL PRESS INC.

128 C Street N. E. Washington, D. C. 20002

1. THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF WORLD POWER, by Senator Gale McGee. Here at last is an authoritative, scholarly presentation of the Johnson Administration's foreign policy. With some 50 books preaching the other side of the story, this one will be sought by partisans as well as students and concerned citizens. GALE McGEE is eminently qualified for education and experience to be the spokesman. He was professor of History and chairman of the Institute of International Affairs at the U. of Wyoming before election to the Senate where he now serves his second term. 276 p. Cloth, $6.95.

2. HOW TO RUN FOR PUBLIC OFFICE, AND WIN! by Senator Hugh Scott, Millions of young Americans anticipate public service who, a generation or even a decade ago, might never have entertained such thoughts. HUGH SCOTT ran for and won election to the U.S.

House of Representatives seven times before running for and winning election and reelection to the Senate. His book tells how to do it. 192 p. Cloth, $5.95. Paper, $2.95.

3. CROSSROADS, U.S.A., by Senator Harrison A. Williams, Jr. Many authorities believe domestic issues today are more dangerous and threatening than Vietnam. This book discusses the causes, present status, and future solutions of such problems as riots, poverty, education, housing, and civil rights. HARRISON WILLIAMS, as a ranking member of the Senate Com-Frontier and Great Society legislation as any man in Congress. Poignant photographs complement the text. 134 p. Cloth, $5.95.

4. WHERE ARE THE VOTERS? by Jerry W. Friedheim with research assistance and introduction by Richard Scammon. Proves by statistics and sprightly text where American voters are located by age, occupation, race, sex, education, religion, and political preference. Gives professional advice on how to get them to vote for your party or candidate. "Votefinder" charts show how many votes a presidential candidate needs in each State and where he and his partisans can find them and how to get their votes. 332 p. Cloth, $5.95. Paper, $2.95.

5. YOU CAN FIGHT CITY HALL, by H. Jackson Daniel. The citizen's guide to combat municipal bureaucracy. The former City Attorney of Webster Groves, Missouri explains how city hall functions and the language it uses to communicate. The book gives the details of zoning, garbage collection, street maintenance, schools, permits, dogs, and other municipal headaches.

A "primer" on local government.

6. THE RIPON PAPERS, Edited by Thomas E. Petri. This loosely knit association of young business, academic, and professional men and women calling themselves "The Ripon Society" have, in a number of notable instances, goaded their moss-backed elders in the Republican Party to fury, and action. The Ripon Society is a research and policy organization not formally affiliated with the Republican party, but rather, informally seeking to be its conscience. It takes its name from Ripon, Wisconsin, the founding place of the Republican Party, and its inspiration from the renowned Bow Group in Great Britain. Some topics of these papers are: "The Myth of Bipartisanship," "China '68," "The Negative Income Tax," "Politics and Conscription," "The Realities of Vietnam," "The Courage to Face Tomorrow." Cloth, $6.95. Paper, $2.95.

7. AMERICAN-EAST EUROPEAN TRADE, Controversy, Progress, Prospects, Edited by Phillip D. Grub and Karel Holbik. Professor Grub of George Washington University and Professor Holbik of Boston University are prominent teachers of international trade and have been members of trade missions to East Europe. This book examines the continuing controversy quoting politicians pro and con. It summarizes existing laws and legislative proposals. It covers legal, economic, and business considerations. The book projects the future of U.S. East European trade. In addition it offers a comprehensive bibliography. Cloth, $6.95. Paper

8. AMERICA, I LOVE YOU, by Ralph de Toledano with annotations by Karl Hess. Something for the Conservatives by one of their most respected and popular writers—his first book since RFK, The Man Who Would Be President. A collection of controversial reports on subversion, espionage, and international politics. Slashing attacks on the Liberal Establishment in the great style of American journalism. KARL HESS, Goldwater's former speech writer, ties it all together with incisive comments. 324 p. Cloth, $7.50.

EXPANSION AND COEXISTENCE The History of Soviet Foreign Policy, 1917-67

ADAM B. ULAM

The distinguished Professor of Government at Harvard University offers "the most comprehensive, balanced, and lucid account of the Soviet Union's relations with the outside world that has yet appeared in English."—from an advance comment by Edward Crankshaw. ca. 768 pp., index. Paperbound Text/$4.95

VIETNAM: A POLITICAL HISTORY

JOSEPH BUTTINGER

Mr. Buttinger has skillfully condensed his monumental three-volume history (The Smaller Dragon and the two-volume Vietnam: A Dragon Embattled) into a single succinct text. A new chapter analyzes "The Americanization of Vietnam" from the fall of Diem to the brink of possible settlement in mid-1968. 576 pp., maps, notes, bibliog., index. U-651/$3.95

THE POLITICAL THOUGHT OF MAO TSE-TUNG

Revised Edition

STUART R. SCHRAM

This new edition of the now-standard 1963 work includes an expanded version of Dr. Schram's highly acclaimed critical introduction, many of Mao Tse-tung's little-known but increasingly relevant earlier writings, as well as major recent texts.

October. ca. 350 pp., chronology, bibliog., index. U-548/ca. $2.95

TRENDS OF FEDERALISM IN THEORY AND PRACTICE

CARL J. FRIEDRICH

In a truly comparative survey of modern federal systems, Harvard University's Eaton Professor of the Science of Government emphasizes the process of federalism; eleven concise case studies illustrate his cogent theoretical analysis.

208 pp., index. U-652/$2.50

THE ORIGINS OF SOCIALISM

GEORGE LICHTHEIM

The well-known author of Marxism traces the development of socialist thought from its conception during the French Revolutionary period, through the influence of the British Utopians and the philosophy of Hegel, to the classic formulation achieved by Karl Marx. November. ca. 352 pp., notes, bibliog., index. U-661/ca. $2.95

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY SINCE WORLD WAR II

Third Revised Edition

JOHN W. SPANIER

In this major revision of a basic text, Professor Spanier (author of World Politics in an Age of Revolution) re-examines American foreign policy throughout the turbulent postwar period, and adds new material on the crucial events of the past three years. "An excellent guide for contemporary undergraduates."—Choice. 320 pp., bibliog., Index. Paperbound Text/$2.95

College Division, FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publishers

111 Fourth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10003

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

The books to use in an election year are from Wiley-

ELECTIONEERING IN A DEMOCRACY

Campaigns for Congress

By DAVID A. LEUTHOLD, University of Missouri. With the current election year already in progress this indeed becomes a very valuable text. Based on data drawn from empirical studies of congressional elections in the San Francisco Bay Area in 1962, this study examines the problems faced by various types of candidates—Republicans and Democrats, incumbents and nonincumbents, sure winners, sure losers, and competitive candidates. It shows how these candidates try to acquire and utilize campaign resources, and it then considers the implications of these problems for democracy.

1968 150 pages Cloth: $6.95 Paper: $2.95

THE AMERICAN VOTER

By ANGUS CAMPBELL; PHILIP E. CONVERSE; WARREN E. MILLER; and DONALD E. STOKES, all of the Survey Research Center, The University of Michigan. "Among those books that become classics in their own time, The American Voter occupies a prominent place. No one today writes or thinks about voting behavior without acknowledging a large debt to the works of Campbell, Converse, Miller and Stokes."—Aaron Wildavsky, in the American Sociological Review. Picked as one of "Fifty Key Books" by The Kiplinger Washington Editors, this "classic in its own time" is available in an abridged and revised paperback edition and in the original cloth edition.

Original cloth edition: 1960 573 pages $9.95

Abridged paperback edition: 1964 302 pages $2.95

Also of interest this year-

CITY POLITICS AND PUBLIC POLICY

Edited by JAMES Q. WILSON, Harvard University. "Jim Wilson's collection is excellent."—Wallace S. Sayre, Columbia University. This collection of empirical studies, most of them published here for the first time, attempts to discover how and why American cities differ in the kinds of public policies they pursue.

1968 300 pages $7.95

INTERNATIONAL LAW Current and Classic

By RICHARD N. SWIFT, New York University. All the conventional subjects of international law are covered in this text but with an immediacy rare in either legal textbooks or casebooks. It combines readable prose exposition with up-to-date case and documentary materials, drawn not only from the classical cases in international law but also from materials relating to issues as current as the conflict in Vietnam.

1968 Approx. 592 pages $10.95

ECONOMIC POLICY-MAKING AND DEVELOPMENT IN BRAZIL, 1947-1964

By NATHANIEL H. LEFF, Columbia University. A study of the impact of politics on economic policy and development in Brazil. The first half of the book deals with specific cases of Brazilian economic policy-making—coffee policy, protection, allocation decisions, policy toward direct foreign investment, and export policy. The second half of the study analyzes the political structure which made possible the political autonomy.

1968 201 pages $7.95

JOHN WILEY & SONS, Inc.

605 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

notes and readings

Comparative Politics

Third Edition by Roy C. MACRIDIS, Brandeis University, and BERNARD E. BROWN, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York. This book introduces comparative political analysis, not the study of individual foreign countries; considers how systems function, how they differ. 676 pages/$6.95 text

Explanation in Social Science

a system paradigm

by Eugene J. Meehan, University of Illinois. A new definition of "explanation" for the social scientist which is compatible with scientific practice, avoids conceptual difficulties of the familiar deductive paradigm, and is less constrictive. 139 pages/$1.95 text/paperbound

a text

International Law

Revised Edition by H. B. Jacobini, Southern Illinois University. This text presents a comprehensive, brief, and readable account of the law of nations while emphasizing a political interpretation of law. Includes the law of peace, the law of war, and remnants of the law of neutrality. 471 pages/$8.50 text

Public Opinion and Public Policy

models of political linkage

by NORMAN R. LUTTBEG, Florida State University. The subject is "political linkage," the mechanism which allows political leaders to act in accordance with the wishes, desires, and demands of their public. Explores the balance between leadership discretion and citizenship participation in modern democracies. 480 pages/$4.95 text/paperbound

Political Theory

a conceptual analysis

by Joseph S. Murphy, Director, Peace Corps, Ethiopia. Not a chronological record of political thinkers, events, or institutions, this book is written from the stance of analytic philosophy and construes political theory as an activity whose purpose is the clarification of political concepts. 280 pages/$5.50 text

An Introduction to the Legal System by JAY A. SIGLER, Rutgers, The State University. Covering every major aspect of the legal system, this book tries to relate it to the social system in the American context. A simple systems analysis is employed throughout to show the flow of decision-making within the system. 256 pages/$5.50 text

1968 TEXTS

Published in the Dorsey Series in Political Science consulting editor: NORTON E. LONG University of Illinois.

write now for examination copies

Homewood, Illinois

A tribute to the work of V. O. Key, Jr.:

POLITICAL RESEARCH and POLITICAL THEORY

Edited by Oliver Garceau

This volume in honor of the late V. O. Key, Jr. consists of an introduction and nine essays by distinguished scholars which, taken together, elucidate some of the major characteristics and tendencies of political science, especially in the broad areas to which Mr. Key contributed. Each of the contributors has written in his own field of present concern, and there has been no attempt to replicate or appraise the work of Professor Key. The collection does, however, seek to reflect Key's understanding of the way to develop political science in the absence of an over-arching theory of the political system or a definitive model of political interaction patterns. Further, the essays confirm Key's wisdom in pursuing empirical research without tangling with the search for a "value-free" science and without abandoning moral commitments.

Several themes recur in the essays, among them the application of comparative methods to political science, the uses of systematic and normative theory, and the problems of scale in research design. The section on Theory contains essays by Avery Leiserson, J. Roland Pennock, and Frederick M. Watkins. There are two essays on Method, by M. Brewster Smith and Douglas Price. The third section, on Party, contains the contributions of Austin Ranney, Leon D. Epstein, Duane Lockard, and Merle Fainsod. $7.95

In Canada/Saunders of Toronto, Ltd.

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS

Academia Press
Audio Visual Research
Blaisdell Publishing Company
The Bobbs-Merrill Company
University of California Press
University of Chicago Press
Columbia University Press
Dell Publishing Company
The Dorsev Press
Doubleday & Company, Inc
Howard Fertig, Inc
Harcourt, Brace & World
Harper & Row Publishers 749 Harvard University Press 1060, 1061, 1086
Il Politico
Il Politico1042University of Illinois Press1031International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences1075
Johns Hopkins University Press
J. B. Lippincott
McGraw-Hill Book Company 1037 The Macmillan Company 1071
The MIT Press
National Press
New York University Press 1030 Northwestern University Press 1037
Oxford University Press
Frederick A. Praeger
Prentice-Hall
Public Personnel Association
Rand McNally
The Ronald Press
St. Martin's Press
Scott, Foresman & Company
Charles Scribner's Sons
Studentlitteratur ab
Syracuse University Press 1041 TIAA 1088
University of Texas Press
Tulane University Press 1042 United Nations Publications 1032
D. Van Nostrand
University Press of Virginia
Walker & Company
John Wiley & Sons, Inc
World Law Fund

You mean I can get $50,000 of TIAA Life insurance for less than $100?

That's what an Assistant Professor asked us when he heard about TIAA's low life insurance costs.

It's true. At his age 30 the annual premium for a 20-Year Home Protection policy providing $50,000 initial amount of insurance is $159.00. The first-year dividend, based on our current dividend scale, is $61.00, making a net payment of $98.00. Dividends, of course, are not guaranteed.

The Home Protection plan is level premium Term insurance providing its largest amount of protection initially, reducing by schedule each year to recognize decreasing insurance needs. This is just one example of the many low-cost T.AA plans available. If you need more protection for your family, ask us to mail you a personal illustration with figures for a policy issued at your age. We'll also send the Life Insurance Guide describing other TIAA policies.

ELIGIBILITY

Eligibility to apply for this or other TIAA life insurance is limited to persons employed at the time of application by a college, university, private school, or other nonprofit educational or scientific institution that qualifies for TIAA eligibility.

TEACHERS INSURANCE AND ANNUITY ASSOCIATION 730 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017	tiaa
Please mail the new Life Insurance Guide and	l a personal illustration.
Name	YourDate of Birth
A.ddress	Z!P
Dependents' Ages	educational or scientific institution

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Some Reflections on Soviet-American Relations Merle Fainsod	1093
A Causal Model of Civil Strife: A Comparative Analysis Using New Indices
Ted Gurr	1104
Measuring Social and Political Requirements for System Stability in Latin America	1195
Ernest A. Duff and John F. McCamant Protest as a Political Resource	1125
Michael Lipsky	1144
Motivation, Incentive Systems, and the Political Party Organization
M. Margaret Conway and Frank B. Feigert	1159
Coalition Polities in North India Paul R. Brass	1174
Sources of Local Political Involvement Robert R. Alford and Harry M. Scoble	1192
Malapportionment, Party Competition, and the Functional Distribution of Governmental Expenditures Allan G. Pulsipher and James L. Weatherby, Jr.	1207
Agency Requests, Gubernatorial Support and Budget Success in State Legislatures	1000
Ira Sharkansky	1220
The Soviet Central Committee: An Elite Analysis Michael P. Gehlen and Michael McBride	1232
The Recruitment of Candidates for the Canadian House of Commons	٠.
Allan Kornberg and Hal H. Winsborough Research Notes	1242
A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling Hugh Donald Forbes and Edward R. Tufte	1258
A Note on Censorship Gordon Tullock	1265
Communications to the Editor	1268
Book Reviews and Notes Richard F. Fenno (ed.)	1274
Announcements	1408
Index to Volume LXII Nancy B. Edgerton and Mary H. Grossman	1410

VOL. LXII December, 1968 NO. 4

Published Quarterly by

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

4 ...

From Commentary To College Classrooms

You can have samples free of the most important articles to appear in "one of the world's best edited periodicals." (C. P. Snow)

List the five Commentary Reports, on your letterhead, that you would consider for classroom adoption and we'll send them right out.

Special Reports:

- ☐ The Dominican Revolt. Theodore Draper. New paperback based on his administration-shaking article in Commentary$2.50
- ☐ American Reactions to The Six-Day War. Robert Alter, Arthur Hertzberg, Milton Himmelfarb, Martin Peretz $1.00
- □ Liberal Anti-Communism Revisited. A symposium: Lionel Abel, David T. Bazelon, Daniel Bell, Lewis A. Coser, Paul Goodman, Michael Harrington, Sidney Hook, Irving Howe, Murray Kempton, Robert Lowell, Dwight MacDonald, William Phillips, Robert Pickus, Philip Rahv, Harold Rosenberg, Richard H. Rovere, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Stephen Spender, Diana Trilling, Lionel Trilling, Dennis H. Wrong $1.00

Quantity discounts for classroom purchases: 25-49 copies less 10%; 50-99 copies less 15%; 50-99 copies less 20%; 300-499 copies less 30%; 500-1,000 copies less 40%; more than 1,000 copies less 50%.

Write for the Commentary Classroom Magazine Subscription Plan too.

em em . h du. Burddamur A Pada Mur burdduduu C. Andrew Uniber	604
☐ The American Presidency—A Defective Institution?—Andrew Hacker
☐ The Origins of Human Bonds—Selma Fraiberg
The Legacy of Che Guevara—Norman Gall
☐ The Shape of American Politics—Richard N. Goodwin	50¢
A Guide to Reagan Country—The Political Culture of Southern California—James	ro.
Q. Wilson	50¢
"Bonn Is Not Weimar"-Reflections on the Radical Right in Germany-Walter	504
Laqueur
Counterrevolutionary America—Robert L. Heilbroner
☐ The President and the Negro: The Mcment Lost—Daniel P. Moynihan
Communism in Asia-Donald S. Zagoria
☐ The Failure of the Warren Report—Alexander M. Bickel
☐ The Unremembered Genocide—Marjorie Housepian
☐ In Defense of 'Black Power'—David Danzig
☐ Black Power and Coalition Politics—Bayard Rustin	50€
☐ Church and State: How High a Wall?—Milton Himmelfarb	50¢
☐ The Problem of the New Left—Tom Kahn	50¢
☐ The Myth of the Jewish World Conspiracy—Norman Cohn	50¢
☐ The Arab Refugees—A Zionist View—Marie Syrkin	50¢
Conservatism After Goldwater-David Danzig	50¢
☐ The Meaning of Negro Strategy—David Danzig	50¢
The State of Soviet Jewry-Maurice Friedberg; Soviet Anti-Semitism: An Exchange-Bertrand Russell & Aron Vergelis	50¢
Up From Apathy-The Woodlawn Experiment-Charles E. Silberman	50¢
☐ The Failure of Urban Renewal—A Critique and Some Proposals—Herbert J. Gans	50¢
Five Years of Castro's Cuba-Theodore Draper	50c
□ Public School 165—Richard Schickel	50¢
☐ The Watts 'Manifesto' and the McCone Report—Bayard Rustin	50c
From Protest to Politics: The Future of the Civil Rights Movement-Bayard Rustin	50¢
The American Reading Problem-Selma Fraiberg	50¢
Big Business and the Democrats-David T. Bazelon	50¢
Mutual Aid and the Negro-John Slawson	50¢
The Trial of Jesus-Paul Winter
China's Strategy , A Critique-Donald S. Zagoria	50c
☐ The Future of Capitalism—Robert L. Heilbroner
☐ Chinese Visions and American Policies—Berljamin Schwartz
The Negro and the New York Schools-Midge Decter
☐ Intermarriage and the Jewish Future—Marshall Sklare
American Catholicism After the Council-Michael Novak
Lessons of the 'Long Hot Summer'—Bayard Rustin
My Negro Problem-and Ours-Norman Podhoretz
Negroes and Jews: The New Challenge to Pluralism—Nathan Glazer
☐ The John Birch Society—Fundamentalism on the Right—Alan F, Westin
E THE COME SHOW SOURCE AND AND AND AND AND AND AND AND AND AND	Jop

Write to: John Gladstone

Commentary Report

165 E. 56th St., New York, N. Y. 10022

The first volume in the

AMERICAN POLITICAL BEHAVIOR SERIES

David J. Danelski, Editor, Yale University

CONGRESS: TWO DECADES OF ANALYSIS

. RALPH K. HUITT and ROBERT L. PEABODY

Brings together six of Dr. Huitt's landmark articles on the U.S. Senate and the executive-legislative process, together with an original introductory essay by Dr. Peabody, who comprehensively assesses Congressional research since World War II. Selective bibliography. Ready in February. $3.50 (tentative); paper

Ready in January

THE NEW COMMUNISMS DAN N. JACOBS

Original essays by noted authorities. A focus on the breakdown in the solidarity of the international Communist movement. Treats the ideological and the practical factors that triggered this dissolution; examines the varieties of Communism, based on national interest, that have evolved in various countries. Extensive introduction provides a framework; conclusion. 326 pp.; $8.00 cloth; $5.00 paper

COMPARATIVE POLITICAL ANALYSIS: An Introduction HOWARD A. SCARROW

A focus on the major comparative concepts of political systems and related methodological techniques. Unites the comparative study of national and sub-national political systems; delineates the functional and causal modes of explanatory analysis; shows the relationship between the two modes of explanatory analysis and the methodological problems of evidence; discusses problems surrounding some of the field's major concepts; shows the relationship of political science to sociology; discusses comparative politics as a specialized field within political science. 146 pp.; $2.95; paper

Ready in March

THE PRESIDENTIAL ADVISORY SYSTEM THOMAS E. CRONIN and SANFORD D. GREENBERG

For the first time, two recent White House aides focus specifically on the presidential advisory system through essays and research papers by political scientists as well as former science, economic, budget, and foreign policy advisors. The book comprehensively examines the formal and informal, institutionalized and ad hoc advisory support staffs for the presidency, as well as the role they play in the presidential policy-making process.

$6.00 cloth; $3.25 paper (tentative)

Harper & Row, Publishers · 49 E. 33d St., New York

Now Available . . . Fifth Edition

BIOGRAPHICAL DIRECTORY of the AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

published: August, 1968

- Complete, up-to-date reference volume containing biographical information and names and addresses of approximately 12,000 individual APSA members—political scientists, federal, state and local government officials, businessmen, attorneys, journalists—a cross-section of persons in the United States and abroad who have a continuing interest in the study and development of the art and science of government.
- Compiled and produced by automated processes from questionnaires submitted by members.
- Appendices include a geographical listing and a classification of members by fields of interest.

ORDER NOW:

- Institutions and libraries may order copies at $25.00 clothbound, $18.50 paperback.
- Individual members may order copies at $17.50 clothbound, $12.50 paperback.

MAIL ORDER TO: Biographical Directory Order Dept.

AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION
1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W.

Washington, D. C. 20036

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIE

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

AUSTIN RANNEY, Managing Editor, University of Wisconsin

FRED I. GREENSTEIN, Wesleyan University HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Columbia University

WARREN E. MILLER, University of Michigan

WALTER F. MURPHY, Princeton University

MELVIN RICHTER, City University of New York

JOHN E. TURNER, University of Minnesota VERNON VAN DYKE, University of Iowa MYRON WEINER, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

RICHARD F. FENNO, Book Review Editor, University of Rochester NANCY B. EDGERTON, Madison MARY H. GROSSMAN. Madison

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR
North Hall, University of Wisconsin
Madison, Wisconsin 53706

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA 1527 New Hampshire Ave., N.W. Washington, D.C. 20036

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September. and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students; five-year limitation). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy; for back issues prior to 1963 address Johnson Reprint Corp., 111 5th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10003; subsequent to 1963 send request directly to the American Political Science Association.

Applications for membership, orders for the Review, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1527 New Hampshire Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 25th day of the month before publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the Review to Austin Ranney, North Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis. 53706. All manuscripts should be submitted IN DU-PLICATE. They should be double-spaced and may be in typed, mimeographed, hectographed, or other legible form. Footnotes should appear at the end of the manuscript, not at the bottom of the page.

Since manuscripts are sent out anonymously for editorial evaluation, the author's name and affiliations should appear only on a separate covering page. All footnotes identifying the author should also appear on a separate page.

Address books intended for review to Richard F. Fenno, 575 Mount Hope Avenue, Rochester, New York 14620; information, including News and Notes, for the Association's newsletter P. S., should be sent to 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036; advertising, reprint and circulation correspondence to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the Review before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Political Science Abstracts and the International Index to Periodicals index current issues. Microfilm of the Review, beginning with Volume 1, may be obtained from University Microfilms. 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan. A Cumulative Index of the Review, Volumes 1-57: 1906-1963, may be obtained from Northwestern University Press, 1735 Benson, Evanston, Illinois.

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

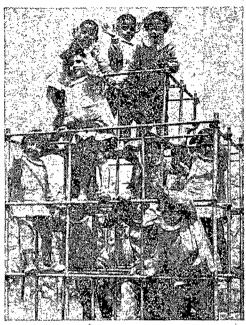

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1968, by The American Political Science Association

CHANGES WITHIN A DISCIPLINE

UNICEF, photo by Bernard Gerin

Everyone approaches a problem from a different angle. Some jump right into the middle of it. Some find they have loose ends that don't fit. And some come out on top of the problem. Political scientists know the story: one person will attempt to build a structural framework and make the specifics fit, and another will take the specifics and builds a structure. Regardless of style all political theorists try to keep abreast of current theories and methodology. THE PREN-TICE-HALL texts on political theory are published with this in mind. Variety of theory and method makes the discipline challenging.

Featured in 1968

THE POLITICS OF AMERICAN DEMOC-RACY Fourth Edition, 1968 Edited by Marion D. Irish, The American University and James W. Protho, University of 1968, 416 pp., $7.95 (82203-1) North Carolina 1968, 704 pp., $8.95 (68570-1)

COMPUTERS AND THE POLICY-MAKING COMMUNITY: Applications to International Relations Edited by Davis B. Bobrow, Oak Ridge National Laboratory, and Judah L. Schwartz November 1968, 368 pp., $12.50 (16559-7)

SEARCH FOR COMMUNITY POWER By Willis D. Hawley, University of California, Berkeley, and Frederick M. Wirt. Dennison University 1968, 156 pp., $5.25 (79690-4)

SOME CONCEPTUAL APPROACHES TO THE STUDY OF MODERNIZATION BY David E. Apter, University of California, Berkeley

Coming in January 1969

OF POWERS AND THEIR POLITICS By Arthur Lee Burns, The Australian National University, Canberra In The Contemporary Political Theory Series 1969 approx. 304 pp., $7.50 (63056-6)

A THEORY OF POLITICAL EXCHANGE: Economic Reasoning in Political Analysis By Robert L. Curry, Sacramento State College and Lawrence Wade. University of California, Davis 1969, approx. 156 pp., $5.95 (91463-0)

For further information, write Box 903

PRENTICE-HALL ENGLEWOOD CLIFFS, N. J. 07632

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers.

The American Political Science Review

VOL. LXII

DECEMBER, 1968

NO. 4

SOME REFLECTIONS ON SOVIET-AMERICAN RELATIONS*

MERLE FAINSOD

Harvard University

As World War II drew to a close, the leaders of the anti-Hitler coalition-Roosevelt, Stalin, and Churchill—assembled at Yalta to ponder the future. Already, sharp clashes at the conference table over the future fate of Poland and Eastern Europe cast a sombre spell over the proceedings. But the necessities of the alliance still served to suppress differences and to emphasize a search for consensus. At a tripartite dinner meeting on 8 February 1945, President Roosevelt, ever hopeful, described the relations of the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and the United States "as that of a ■family" and spoke of a future in which their common objectives would be "to give to every man, woman, and child on this earth the possibility of security and well-being." Marshal Stalin, perhaps more realistic, "remarked that it was not so difficult to keep unity in time of war since there was a joint aim to defeat the common enemy which was clear to everyone. .. the difficult task came after the war when liverse interests tended to divide the allies."2 Nevertheless, he expressed himself as "conident that the present alliance would meet this est also and that it was our duty to see that it vould, and that our relations in peacetime hould be as strong as they had been in war." rime Minister Churchill somewhat grandiloquently spoke of "standing on the crest of a hill 7ith the glories of future possibilities stretching efore us. He said that in the modern world the aunction of leadership was to lead the people

* Presidential address delivered at the Annual Ieeting of the American Political Science Association, Washington, D.C., September 5, 1968.

ut from the forests into the broad sunlit plains

f peace and happiness. He felt this prize was

¹ U. S. Department of State, Foreign Relations "the United States: The Conferences at Malta and alta, 1945 (Washington, 1955) p. 798:

² Ibid.

nearer our grasp than any time before in history and it would be a tragedy for which history would never forgive us if we let this prize slip from our grasp through inertia or carelessness."³

In retrospect, it is almost too easy to dismiss the pronouncements of Roosevelt as naïve, the declarations of Stalin as misleading, and the effusions of Churchill as meaningless banquet oratory. Yet, harsh as history's judgment may turn out to be on the aftermath of Yalta, there remains a sense of a great opportunity tragically lost, of statesmen not unaware of their responsibilities, but denied the possibilities of fulfilling them because of the very different visions of national interest and world order which guided their thoughts and actions.

On the American side two sharply contrasting views of post-war relations with the Soviet Union emerged as the time approached for peace-making. The more sanguine school envisaged no insuperable barriers to a satisfactory post-war relationship with the Soviet Union. Indeed, it assumed that American willingness to recognize Soviet security interests in Eastern Europe and to provide aid in Soviet post-war reconstruction would disarm Soviet suspicions, change the attitudes of its leaders toward collaboration with the West, and build the basis of a permanent peace. On the other hand, those who prided themselves on their realism saw the expansion of Soviet power in the postwar world as a force which had to be checked and restrained. Persuaded, as George Kennan

³ Ibid, pp. 798–799.

⁴ Whatever may have been Stalin's long range goals, his actions in the closing days of the war and the immediate post-war period clearly revealed that he was determined to assume a dominant position in Eastern Europe and to regain the Far Eastern Tsarist territories lost in the Russo-Japanese War. But his claims were even was later to put it, that the Kremlin's "main concern is to make sure that it has filled every nook and cranny available to it in the basin of world power," the conclusion followed that "the main element of any United States policy toward the Soviet Union must be that of a long more far-reaching. They included a demand for a military base on the Turkish Straits which would enable the Soviet Union to control access to the Black Sea, trusteeship of one of the former Italian North African colonies which would establish the Soviet Union as a Mediterranean power, participation in control of the Ruhr as well as unilateral control of the East Zone of Germany, and an insistence on prolonging Soviet occupation of Iranian territory. It could be, and indeed was, argued that none of these actions directly affected American interests. But, as Harriman put it in a wartime dispatch (September 20, 1944) to the Secretary of State, "What frightens me however is that when a country begins to extend its influence by strong arm methods beyond its borders under the guise of security it is difficult to see how a line can be drawn. If the policy is accepted that the Soviet Union has a right to penetrate her immediate neighbors for security, penetration of the next immediate neighbors becomes at a certain time equally logical." It was out of the fear of further penetration that the policy of containment was born.

In theory, at least, Stalin might have pursued an alternative course which would have eased the task of post-war collaboration with his wartime allies. Had he limited his expansionist claims and permitted regimes based on local preferences to emerge in Eastern Europe, the way might have been opened for a large American post-war reconstruction loan to aid in the rebuilding of the Soviet economy. Yet to state an option in this form is to fail to come to grips with Stalin's commitments and calculations. Deeply suspicious of his capitalist partners, he could not even conceive of entrusting his future security to their goodwill or good nature. As his Politburo associate, Mikhaiel Kalinin put it in an August 1945 address to a conference of party propagandists: "Even now after the greatest victory known to history we cannot for one minute forget the basic fact that our country remains the one socialist state in the world The victory achieved does not mean that all dangers to our state structure and social order have disappeared. Only the more concrete, most immediate danger, which threatened us from Hitlerite Germany, has disappeared. In order that the danger of war may really disappear for a long time, it is necessary to consolidate our victory."

To consolidate the victory meant installing term, patient but firm and vigilant containment of Russian expansive tendencies." This doctrine of containment, which was to be adopted as the basis of American policy toward the Soviet Union in the post-war period, clearly meant that the United States would "regard the Soviet Union as a rival, not a partner, in the political arena." While the existence of this rivalry did not exclude an uneasy coexis-

"friendly" regimes wherever the writ of Soviet power ran, and in the last analysis the only "friendly" regimes that could be fully trusted were Communist-dominated ones. As Stalin stated in an unusual moment of frankness, "A freely elected government in any of these countries would be anti-Soviet, and that we cannot allow." Assured by Roosevelt at the Yalta Conference that there would be no American troops left in Europe two years after the war, he counted on the dissipation of American military forces to open up new opportunities for the Soviet Union as the dominant continental military power. At the same time he did not overestimate his strength and sought to avoid direct challenges which maximized the risk of war. Urged by Tito to help drive the Anglo-Americans out of Trieste, he gave the Yugoslavs diplomatic support, but stopped short of military action. In a revealing exchange with the Yugoslavs, he declared: "Since all other methods were exhausted, the Soviet Union had only one other method left for gaining Trieste for Yugoslavia-to start war with the Anglo-Americans over Trieste and take it by force. The Yugoslav comrades could not fail to realize that after such a hard war the USSR could not enter another." Nor did Stalin at first believe that the policies which he was espousing necessarily meant that he would have to forego Western aid in-Soviet post-war reconstruction. Convinced that the United States faced the prospect of large scale unemployment and a major economic crisis at the end of the war, he apparently calculated that the Americans would be driven to extend sizable credits on favorable terms by their need to find outlets for their exports. In this, as in othe appraisals of American reactions, Stalin turned out to be mistaken. The result was to force hin back on his own resources, to lead him to exploi to the utmost such war booty and reparations a were available to him and to launch a new in dustrialization drive at home with its attendan sacrifice of living standards to guarantee th "homeland . . . against all possible accidents."

⁵ George F. Kennan, "The Sources of Sovic Conduct," reprinted in A Foreign Affairs Reade—Philip E. Mosely, (ed.), The Soviet Union 1922-1962, (New York, Praeger, 1963), pp. 177-178.

⁶ Ibid, p. 183.

tence of the two systems, its effect was necessarily to increase the strains of the Soviet-American relationship and to open up the prospect of a series of dangerous confrontations wherever Soviet and American interests impinged or collided.

From the beginning, the doctrine of containment had its critics. Voices on the right denounced it for its passivity and lack of aggressiveness. They argued that containment was essentially a negative and static policy, that it left the initiative with the Soviet Union, and that the main object of American policy ought to be to roll back the Soviet advance and liberate areas captured by the Communists. Perhaps the most articulate spokesman for this point of view was John Foster Dulles, though once ensconced in power as Secretary of State he did more than any one else to demonstrate that it was empty rhetoric. Put to the test of responding to the East German rising of 1953, the Hungarian revolution of 1956, and repeated calls to unleash Chiang-Kai-Shek, he proved it was easier to condemn containment than to abandon it.

On the other hand, there were some like Walter Lippmann who criticized the doctrine of containment from a different vantage point. Writing in 1947, Lippmann saw containment as implying "unending intervention in all the countries that are supposed to contain the Soviet Union" and feared that it would involve the United States in commitments which would strain its resources to the breaking point. Lippmann refused to accept the then prevalent view that the Soviet Union was bent on world domination. Arguing that Soviet obejectives were limited and amenable to comporomise, Lippmann called for an effort to ease the tensions of the Cold War by neutralizing Germany and withdrawing Soviet and Western orces from Central Europe. George Kennan, the father of the doctrine of containment, shared many of Lippmann's misgivings about the way in which containment was being interpreted by American officialdom.8 Because he believed that American policy makers were ver-emphasizing the military threat from the Joviet Union, Kennan regarded military assisance to nations such as Turkey, which bor-Mered on the Soviet Union, as unduly provocawive. Because he believed that American foreign policy should only be concerned with areas vital to American security, he also objected to open-ended commitments to oppose Communism anywhere and everywhere. Nor, in Kennan's view, did containment exclude efforts to lessen tension between the United States and the Soviet Union. In the post-Stalinist period Kennan became an ardent advocate of Lippmann's proposals for the neutralization of Germany and disengagement in Central Europe.

As post-war relations between the Soviet Union and the United States deteriorated, the warnings and pleas of the Lippmanns and Kennans went unheeded. The lessons of the first Berlin crisis and the Korean War were read as dictating a policy of building American positions of military strength wherever a threat of Communist aggression presented itself. The results were predictable. A stalemate of sorts was achieved. But meanwhile both sides embarked on a desperate arms race. Both sides sought to strengthen and solidify their own systems of alliances while probing for weaknesses in the camps of their antagonists. Both sides sought to exploit the power vacuum created by decolonization to carve out new areas of support and influence. And both sides on occasion tested each other's resolution by acts of brinksmanship that threatened to set the whole world on fire. The Cuban missile crisis epitomized the dangers of confrontation in a thermonuclear age. Surely no one who endured that week with its eerie sense of a doomsday clock ticking relentlessly away will ever forget that the rivalry of the two most powerful nations on earth had reached a point where there was a serious possibility of their mutual extinction. Nor was the lesson lost on Moscow. Khrushchev summed it up in a memorable sentence: "There was a smell of burning in the air."9

We have reason to be profoundly grateful that this and other crises in Soviet-American relations have thus far been surmounted without a nuclear catastrophe. We have been compelled in recent years to learn a great deal about the art of crisis management; perhaps the time has come to address ourselves to the art of crisis prevention.

The question which I should like to pose this evening is whether we and the Soviet Union stand condemned to behave, in J. Robert Oppenheimer's metaphor, like two deadly scorpions in a bottle, "each capable of killing ing the other, but only at the risk of his own life," or whether we can find a basis for living ⁷ Quoted in Walter Lafeber, America, Russia, nd the Cold War, 1945-1966 (New York: John √Viley and Sons, 1967), p. 55.

⁸ George F. Kennan, Memoirs, 1925-1950
Boston: Atlantic, Little, Brown, 1967), pp. 354-67.

⁹ Pravda, December 13, 1962.

together peacefully by a joint recognition that our survival depends on the prevention of total war.

Let me begin, where foreign policy begins, with the two political systems and cultures that we are considering. In a much-quoted passage in Democracy in America, Alexis de Tocqueville wrote in 1835:

"There are, at the present time, two great nations in the world which seem to tend towards the same end, although they started from different points: I allude to the Russians and the Americans. Both of them have grown up unnoticed; and whilst the attention of mankind was directed elsewhere, they have suddenly assumed a most prominent place among the nations..."

"All other nations seem to have nearly reached their natural limits, and only to be charged with the maintenance of their power; but these are still in the act of growth; all the others are stopped, or continue to advance with great difficulty; these are proceeding with ease and with celerity along a path to which the human eye can assign no term. The American struggles against the natural obstacles which oppose him; the adversaries of the Russian are men; the former combats the wilderness and savage life; the latter, civilization with all its weapons and its arts; the conquests of the one are therefore gained by the ploughshare; those of the other by the sword. The Anglo-American relies upon personal interest to accomplish his ends, and gives free scope to the unguided exertions and common sense of the citizens; the Russian centres all the authority of society in a single arm; the principal instrument of the former is freedom; of the latter servitude. Their starting point is different, and their courses are not the same; yet each of them seems to be marked by the will of Heaven to sway the destinies of half the globe."11

I cite this passage not because I subscribe to de Tocqueville's catalogue of American virtues and Russian vices, but because in an almost uncanny way, de Tocqueville more than a century ago, not only caught the dynamic quality of the two societies but pointed up the antithesis between a pluralist and an authority-dominated culture which present-day proponents of the theory of convergence tend to obscure. Because industrial societies tend to be alike in many respects, it does not follow that they will be alike in all respects. Political ideas and movements have a vitality all their own; their development is not unilaterally determined by the discipline of the assembly line.

The Soviet political system is the outgrowth and projection of an authority-dominated culture: its ruling party elite arrogates to itself the right to determine the policies and programs which guide the destinies of the state. Its primary domestic objective has been rapid industrialization: indeed its historic achievement has been the transformation of a relatively backward society into an industrial and military super-power by authoritarian means. It has given priority to the development of heavy industry, science, and armaments while stinting on investments in agriculture, housing, and consumer goods. Its most fundamental concern has been its own survival and security, and it has based its security on a monopoly of political power and the building of industrial and military strength. Its suspicion and distrust of the so-called capitalist world have strong ideological roots in Marxism-Leninism; these have in turn been reinforced by the experiences of the Allied intervention and blockade during the Civil War, the Nazi invasion, and the Cold War. Its Leninist legacy had been a messianic dream of the triumph of Communism on a world scale, though messianism has waned as Soviet national interests have come to the forefront and met resistance from both Communist and non-Communist states. The imperial domain inherited from the Czars has become the focal point of a new Soviet patriotism; the Soviet leaders, like the Czars before them, have manifested a special interest in expanding Russian influence in Eastern Europe, the Balkans, the Straits, the Middle East, Central Asia, and the Mongolian and Manchuriar borderlands.

At the same time a half century of Soviet rule has produced changes in Soviet society. that impose brakes and restraints on the forward thrust of Soviet foreign policy. Revo lutions have their own natural history. Over time they exhaust their revolutionary driveand demands set in for normalization. The social changes which revolutions effect congesinto vested interests in the post-revolutionary status quo. The result in the Soviet Union ha been to create a highly bureaucratized and stratified society resistant to change. Whil the economy is still capable of reasonably rapid growth, technological progress in suc new industrial fields as automation, computers petro-chemicals, and industrial research and development has lagged behind the Unite

¹⁰ J. Robert Oppenheimer, "Atomic Weapons and American Policy," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 31, No. 4, July 1953, p. 529.

¹¹ Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, trans. Henry Reeve (New York: Colonial Press, 1899), Vol. 1, pp. 441-442.

States, and problems of planning and industrial management have become increasingly intricate and difficult. The appetite for bourgeois amenities has never been sharper. After decades of deprivation and sacrifice under Stalin, the Soviet leadership is under increasing pressure to raise the living standards of its own people and to invest more heavily in its relatively backward agricultural sector. The generations that have come to maturity since Stalin's death can no longer be put off with promises of a future Utopia; they look for benefits in the here and now. And some among the scientific and creative intelligentsia have expressed open dissatisfaction with the policy of arrested de-Stalinization which the current leadership is following. They call for an end to literary trials and judicial arbitrariness, for a lifting of censorship, for a greater exchange of information on an international scale, for the right to travel abroad, and for a larger role in the shaping of their own destinies. "Today," in the words of the distinguished Soviet physicist Andrei D. Sakharov, "the key to a progressive restructuring of the system of government in the interests of mankind lies in intellectual freedom."12 These demands arouse no enthusiasm in high Soviet party circles; they see the call for more freedom as a threat to their own power. Indeed, one of the primary reasons behind the decision of the Soviet Union and its client states to invade Czechoslovakia was the fear that the contagion of progressive liberalization would spread, not merely to neighboring Communist states, but to the Soviet Union itself. In the wake of events in Czechoslovakia one can only anticipate that the Soviet leadership will put even greater stress on the dangers from without in order to justify the suppression of the threat within.

The problems and dilemmas of the Soviet regime are not limited to domestic policy. As the historic leader and most powerful nation in what used to be called the Communist camp, the Soviet Union has proved powerless to arrest its crumbling structure. Yugoslavia asserted its independence early. China and Albania can now be counted Soviet enemies. Rumania has declared her economic independence and oriented much of her trade westwards. Czechoslovakia's valiant struggle to regain her freedom in both domestic and foreign affairs could only be suppressed by brute force. Cuba is committed to its own brand of revolutionary guerrilla strategy. North Korea and North Vietnam represent arenas of combat in which both the Soviet and the Chinese leadership contend for influence. Only Bulgaria, Hungary, Poland, and East Germany can still be numbered among the Soviet faithful, and in the case of Hungary and Poland at least, the events of the year 1956 serve as a reminder of the tenuousness of their loyalty. Meanwhile, Communist parties throughout the world, from the largest to the smallest, have been emboldened to find their own voices and have not hesitated to disassociate themselves from Soviet policies when to do so served their own interest. The result is that world Communism is a house divided. There are no longer one, but many Communist truths. Nationalism has proved a corrosive force in eroding unity among Communist nations and parties. It should, perhaps, come as no great surprise that so powerful a force as nationalism should reappear in a Communist guise, but for those who have taken professions of brotherhood among Communist nations at face value, it has nevertheless come as a profound shock.

¹² See his essay, "Thoughts on Progress, Peaceful Co-existence, and Intellectual Freedom," The New York Times, July 22, 1968. This is one of many such statements which are denied publication in the Soviet Union, but which nevertheless circulate privately among the intelligentsia.

These developments have had two contradictory consequences for Soviet policy. They have left the Soviet Union with the problem of legitimizing its credentials as a revolutionary power; the aid extended to Cuba and North Vietnam serve this purpose. At a more fundamental level, they have exposed the brittleness of Bloc solidarity and thrown the Soviet Union back on its own resources. Its rhetoric continues to invoke the revolutionary phraseology of Marxism-Leninism. Its actual behavior is increasingly indistinguishable from that of any other Great Power.

As a Great Power its interests are world-wide, but its basic concerns focus on Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East, and more particularly the areas bordering on the Soviet Union. The border states of Eastern Europe are deemed a vital part of the Soviet defense zone. Here the Soviet leadership insists on a tier of "friendly"—that is, Communist—states joined in a defense pact with the Soviet Union. It is opposed to any form of Western "bridge-building" to Eastern Europe which seeks to drive a wedge between the Soviet Union and its East European allies.

The so-called Bonn-Washington axis is seen as the greatest threat to Soviet interests in Europe. With vivid memories of the massive destruction wrought on Russian soil by German armies in both World Wars, the Soviet Union is prepared to do everything in its power to keep Germany divided, to press for the general recognition of East Germany's sovereignty, to isolate West Germany, and to deny it nuclear weapons. Its constant stress on the strength of revanchist forces in West Germany is designed to serve as a reminder to its East European allies that their true interests lie in relying on Soviet protection. The Soviet attitude toward the American presence in Europe has an element of ambiguity. The dominant line is to call for the withdrawal of American troops from West Germany, the dissolution of NATO and the Warsaw Pact, and the adoption of a new European security arrangement from which the United States would be excluded and in which Soviet influence would be paramount. But there are also occasional indications of grudging acceptance of the American presence and intimations that it may even play a stabilizing role in restraining Bonn's revanchist ambitions. The flirtation with de Gaulle provides an opportunity to weaken American influence in Europe, to disrupt NATO, and to isolate West Germany. But de Gaulle's Grand Design for a powerful French-led European Third Force arouses no enthusiasm in Moscow, which suspects with some reason that it may be directed equally against the Soviet Union and the United States.

Soviet policy in the Middle East is aimed at turning the flank of NATO and CENTO and becoming the dominant protector of Arab interests in the region. Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan, one-time American client states, are being wooed with offers of both economic and military aid in the hope of inducing them to adopt a more friendly orientation toward the Soviet Union. The Soviet alignment with the Arab states, also cemented by extensive military as well as economic aid, is directed, not merely at Israel, but even more at the elimination of Western influence in the area.

On its Far Eastern and Central Asian borders, the Soviet Union confronts China, still relatively weak in military and economic terms, but nevertheless a power which has already demonstrated a nuclear weapons potential, which has placed its irredentist claims against the Soviet Union on record, and which, over the longer term, may develop into a formidable antagonist. Although hopes for the restoration of Sino-Soviet friendship after the passing of Mao are still expressed by the Soviet press, they are not asserted with much conviction. There is no disposition to underplay the threat from China. In language which would do our own Right-Wingers proud, an authoritative Soviet commentator, writing under the pseudonym of "Ernst Henry." recently outlined what he called the "Mao plan" for world domination. Said this commentator, "Mao proposes to include in his Reich—in addition to China itself—Korea, the Mongolian People's Republic, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, Indonesia, Malaysia, Burma, and several other countries in the area. In the second stage of 'the storm from the East,' expansion is planned in the direction of the Indian subcontinent, Soviet Central Asia, the Soviet Far East and the Near East. What is anticipated on paper for the third stage is not vet clear. But the plan is not restricted to the 'Maoization of Asia.' We shall gaze proudly upon five continents, one of Mao-tse-tung's myrmidons declares."13

Faced with these vaulting ambitions, the Soviet Union has adopted a policy which we can readily recognize as our old friend, containment. It has strengthened its military units along the borders of the Soviet Far East. Central Asia, and Outer Mongolia, and it has provided military aid to India as well as aid to Pakistan to counter Chinese influence. Indeed, even the extensive military and economic aid which it has supplied to North Vietnam may be viewed, not merely as a demonstration of its willingness to come to the assistance of a brother Communist state in order to help it expel the American "imperialists," but also as an effort to decrease the North Vietnamese dependence on China and to reinforce historic Vietnamese resistance to Chinese domination.

Compared to the Soviet involvement in Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East, Soviet interests in other areas may be described as secondary. Like the United States, it has used trade, military and economic aid, technical assistance and cultural penetration in order to heighten its influence in the underdeveloped world, but in contrast to the diffuse American aid effort, the Soviet program has focused heavily on selected target countries. In the interest of improving relations with nationalist leaders in the new states, it has discouraged premature revolutionary bids for power by local Communists and concentrated instead on building up support within the ruling nationalist movements. It has sought to channel its aid to promote national democratic regimes—that is to say, regimes which stress a socialist path of development and can be counted on to support Soviet foreign policy objectives. But, like the United States, it has discovered that even very large scale military and economic aid can yield disappointing political results, and its experience in Indonesia and Ghana has been particularly disenchanting. Together with the United States, it has also discovered that most of the leaders of the new nations treasure their own independence above all other values, and that they welcome Soviet-American competition in aid-giving primarily as an opportunity to broaden their field of maneuver in order to promote their own interests.

¹² Ernst Henry (pseud.), "The View from the Pamirs," Literaturnaya Gazeta, September 27 and October 4, 1967.

Thus, the Soviet Union finds itself in a position well described by Maxim Litvinov, for many years Soviet Commissar of Foreign Affairs, in his 1929 report to the Soviet Central Executive Committee:

"Unlike other Commissariats, the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs cannot, unfortunately, put forward a five-year plan of work, a plan for the development of foreign policy In . . . drawing up the plan of economic development we start from our own aspirations and wishes, from a calculation of our potentialities, and from the firm principles of our entire policy, but in examining the development of foreign policy we have to deal with a number of factors that are scarcely subject to calculation, with a number of elements outside our control and the scope of our action. International affairs are composed not only of our own aspirations and actions, but of those of a large number of countries . . . pursuing other aims than ours, and using other means to achieve those aims than we allow."14

Like the United States, the Soviet Union must contend with a world in flux moving in directions which it may hope to influence, but which it cannot fully anticipate nor control. The solid, monolithic Communist bloc of Stalin's dream is no more; national communisms are on the rise, and the largest of these, China, is a sworn antagonist of the Soviet Union. The interests of the Soviet Union collide with the United States on many fronts, but where the containment of China is involved, they also run parallel and merge. The equation of Soviet-American relations has become infinitely more complex than it gave the appearance of being in the simple days of a birolar world.

¹⁴ From the report by Maxim Litvinov, Vice Commissar for Foreign Affairs, to the Central Executive Committee, December 4, 1929, translated in Jane Degras, Soviet Documents in Foreign Policy (London: Oxford University Press, 1952), Vol. 2, p. 408.

The question for both the United States and the Soviet Union is not merely whether they can recognize these new complexities, but whether they can make constructive use of them to achieve a more satisfactory relationship. Recent events in Czechoslovakia do not create a propitious climate for such an effort. Nor can it be said that the American electorate is currently much interested in grappling with the problem. There is a widespread feeling of frustration growing out of America's multiple foreign involvements, a sense that the United States is over-committed abroad and undercommitted at home. Racial conflict, ricts and burnings in the black ghettos, the decay of the inner cities, the long-neglected demands of the black community and other minority groups for improved treatment, and the shockingly high incidence of poverty, crime, and violence have persuaded many Americans that the time has come for the United States to set its own house in order. The morass of Vietnam has significantly sharpened the feeling that America is over-extended. Balance-of-payment difficulties, disarray in NATO, the belief that allies are not carrying their fair share of the common burden, and disillusionment with foreign aid programs all contribute to a new mood of neo-isolationism. Its results are visible in cutbacks in foreign aid appropriations, in demands for the withdrawal of American troops from West Germany, and above all, in a widespread insistence that the Vietnamese war be brought to a quick end.

Meanwhile, American commitments continue to be global in scope. In Latin America the United States is a party to a hemispheric collective self-defense treaty and joint defense arrangements, though President Johnson's effort in the wake of the 1965 Dominican crisis to proclaim a new doctrine of unilateral American intervention to prevent the spread of Communism in the Western hemisphere, while approved by the House, was not accepted by the Senate. Under the terms of the NATO pact the United States is pledged to come to the aid of its NATO partners in the event of an armed attack against any one of them. Its responsibilities in Germany include the defense of West Berlin and a pledge to work for German unification. In the Middle East the United States has agreed to furnish military equipment to Israel, as well as to "moderate" Arab states; under the Eisenhower doctrine proclaimed in 1957 and approved by the Congress the President may send military forces to any nation in the Middle East which requests help in preserving "its independence and integrity." The United States is not a party to CENTO, but in effect it provides backstop support for that organization through its bilateral military aid treaties with Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan. In Southeast Asia the SEATO pact provides a basis for American intervention to resist armed aggrèssion and counter subversive activities in the Philippines and Thailand, as well as South Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. provided that the threatened government approves. The American Seventh Fleet stands guard in the Formosa Straits to assure the security of Taiwan and the Pescadores under the terms of a mutual defense pact with Chiang-Kai-Shek. Japan is bound to the United States by a mutual security pact which provides for the continuation of American military bases on Japanese soil, and a similar treaty commits the United States to the defense of South Korea. Under the terms of the so-called ANZUS Treaty the United States guarantees the security of both Australia and New Zealand.

These wide-ranging commitments, inspired variously by fear of aggression from the Soviet Union, Communist China, and local subversive Communist movements, place a heavy burden on Americans which many appear increasingly disinclined to bear. They note a spiralling defense budget of more than 80 billion dollars imposing sharp limits on the resources which are made available to solve America's own social problems, while the pressing needs of the poor nations of the world also suffer neglect. They see the casualty figures from Vietnam, not as abstract statistics but as the dead, the maimed, and the missing in their own families and neighborhoods. They watch with apprehension as those dear to them are called up for military service, and they fear that their country's self-appointed role as a world policeman may involve them in conflicts that will make Vietnam look like a minor skirmish. Some ask whether the United States cannot limit its commitments without endangering its vital interests and whether even the shocking Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia should be permitted to deter efforts to find terms of accommodation with the Soviet Union and other Communist

But such sentiments are by no means universally shared by Americans. Thus former President Eisenhower in his message to the 1968 Republican National Convention warned against a "growing disposition" toward "wishful thinking" which expressed itself in a search for "surface accommodations" with the Communists. In Eisenhower's words, "Abroad, in every major sector, we confront a formidable foe—an expansionist tyranny which respects only toughness and strength. Today the Communists reach ruthlessly for domination over Southeast Asia. . . . In the Middle East, month by month they move closer to testing our resolution. The same is true in Korea. Constantly they stir new troubles in every area of weakness they can ferret out in Eastern Europe, in Africa and Latin America . . . they continue to expand their military power." And the tocsin which he sounded was no retreat.

Meanwhile, a number of steps have been taken which move in the direction of a Soviet-American detente. In the wake of the Cuban missile crisis arrangements were made for a direct line between Moscow and Washington, in order as President Kennedy put it, "to avoid on each side the dangerous delays, misunderstandings, and misreadings of the other's actions which might occur at a time of crisis."16 This action was followed by the conclusion of a treaty outlawing nuclear tests in the atmosphere, outer space, and under water, but leaving the parties free to conduct underground tests. In 1967 an Outer Space Treaty was approved prohibiting, among other things, the stationing of nuclear weapons in orbit. The very important non-proliferation treaty signed this year is accompanied by assurances from both the Soviet Union and the United States that they will come to the aid of any signatory non-nuclear weapon state that is threatened with nuclear aggression, an action which would presumably give India the assurance of protection against a Chinese nuclear attack. Explorations are under way to impose mutually agreed limits on the production of both offensive and anti-ballistic missiles. During the course of the past year both countries also reached an agreement to assist astronauts downed in either country, signed a consular treaty, inaugurated direct flights between New York and Moscow, and, after some delay, renewed their cultural exchange agreement.

Opinions will differ as to whether these are more than "surface accommodations." Certainly large and important issues continue to separate the United States from the Soviet Union. But these agreements do suggest that there are shared interests as well as great differences. The question is whether the interests that we hold in common provide a sufficient basis for a continuing search for a detente. The pursuit of such a goal is not likely to be easy. For however great may be the resistance of the Russians, a part of the trouble lies within ourselves. We are a nation torn by conflicting pressures, wavering between hopes for peace and fear of Communism, weary of foreign entanglements and yet fearful of abandoning them, more confident in our means than clear about our purposes, sure of our good intentions and frustrated when others do not recognize them, accustomed to victory and feeling betraved when we must settle for less, believing that every problem must have a solution and baffled when none is forthcoming, impatient with long drawn-out negotiations yet compelled to learn how to make creative use of them if we wish to survive.

¹⁵ New York Times, August 6, 1968.

¹⁶ President John F. Kennedy, "Toward a Strategy of Peace," (Commencement Address at American University, Washington, D. C., June 10, 1963), reprinted in Council on Foreign Relations, Richard P. Stebbins (ed.), Documents on American Foreign Relations, 1963 (New York: Harper & Row, 1964), p. 121.

What then are the common interests of the Soviet Union and the United States on which we can build? The most basic is that neither of us would survive a nuclear conflict between us. President Kennedy summed it up well in his American University speech: "Today. should total war break out again-no matter how-our two countries would become the primary targets. It is an ironical but accurate fact that the two strongest powers are the two in the most danger of devastation. All we have built, all we have worked for, would be destroyed in the first 24 hours."17 Nor does Moscow dissent from this appraisal. As Khrushchev put it in an address to the East German Party Congress: "There is no doubt that if a thermonuclear war were unleashed by the imperialist maniacs, the capitalist system that gave rise to the war would perish in it. But would the socialist countries and the cause of the struggle for socialism throughout the world gain from a world thermonuclear catastrophe? Only people who deliberately close their eyes to the facts can think this. As far as Marxist-Leninists are concerned, they cannot think in terms of a Communist civilization built upon the ruin of the world's cultural centers, on ravaged earth contaminated by thermonuclear fallout. This is not to mention the fact that for many people there would be no socialism at all, since they would have been removed from the face of our planet."18

At the same time, both of the thermonuclear super powers are under great pressure to find, if they can, a solution to the problem of defense against thermonuclear striking power. Both are seeking and will be seeking in areas of science still unknown and unexplored the secret of their future security. Given the dynamic quality of military technology in the last decades, it would be a rash prophet indeed who would predict that the world has seen the end of innovation in weaponry. Yet there appears to be a widespread consensus in both the Soviet and American scientific-technical communities that the technology and tactics of nuclear attack have so far outstripped the technology of defense that the obstacles to an effective missile defense, at the present time, are virtually insurmountable. Some military theoreticians may still dream of a situation in which a combination of overwhelming superiority in attack weapons and an effective missile defense may enable one or the other side to launch a preemptive attack with impunity. But most American experts would agree with the Soviet academician, A. D. Sakharov, who recently observed. "Fortunately for the stability of the world, the difference between the technical-economic potentials of the Soviet Union and the United States is not so great that one of the sides could undertake a 'preventive aggression' without an almost inevitable risk of a destructive retaliatory blow. This situation would not be changed by a broadening of the arms race through the development of anti-missile defenses."19

17 Ibid, p. 119.

If these propositions are accepted as valid, they would suggest that the United States and the Soviet Union have a mutual interest in adopting a moratorium on the construction of anti-missile systems, in limiting the arms race in offensive weapons, and in seeking to "avert those confrontations which bring an adversary to a choice of either a humiliating retreat or a nuclear war." ²⁰

The Soviet Union and the United States also share a common concern about Chinese nuclear developments and territorial ambitions. This concern has already led to parallel actions providing both military and economic support to India at the time of the Sino-Indian border conflict, to efforts independently pursued to ease Indian-Pakistani rivalry and to counter Chinese penetration in Pakistan, and, as has already been indicated, to joint guarantees under the non-proliferation treaty designed to prevent a nuclear power like China from directing its nuclear force against its non-nuclear neighbors. These actions do not necessarily mean, as Peking has charged, that a Soviet-American alliance is in the making. When two rivals join to ward off a threat from a third who menaces them both, their differences do not automatically disappear. They may submerge their differences in the interests of common action, but each may still hope to emerge as the ultimate victor.

¹⁶ New York Times, July 22, 1968.

¹⁸ Pravda, January 17, 1963.

²⁰ President John F. Kennedy, op. cit., p. 120.

Yet it is precisely because there can be no victor in a thermonuclear war that we must find new ways of muting the frictions and tensions that have characterized the Soviet-American relationship. As we look round the world from West Berlin and Germany through the Middle East to Southeast Asia, we see crises and confrontations looming before us in every direction. Is it beyond the wit of man to find ways of dealing with them before they burst upon us? I hope that I will not be misunderstood as suggesting that the United States and the Soviet Union can between them solve all the world's problems or that they can once and for all achieve a grand settlement of their differences. In a world of movement and change, where power configurations within and among nations shift over time, and the ambitions of sovereign nations clash, it is utopian to expect that conflicts can be eliminated. What is at issue is whether they can be moderated. Are there fresh initiatives which can be taken now which will avert future Soviet-American confrontations?

Let us look briefly at a few of the world's danger points. Clearly one of the most troublesome issues is presented by the problem of German unification and the future of West Berlin. Equally clearly, no progress is likely to be made in resolving this issue as long as the Soviet Union continues to adhere to a policy of two Germanys and regards Western proposals for unification through free elections as ill-disguised attempts to liquidate the Communist regime of East Germany and to tie the whole of Germany to the West. Are there other approaches to the problem of German unification, which can win both Soviet and Western acceptance, as well as the approval of the two existing German regimes? Is it too late to reconsider proposals for the neutralization of Germany as a condition of unification? Can a basis be laid for unification by an agreed mutual withdrawal of troops? Can unification be made acceptable within the context of a European community, free of both Soviet and American domination? I fully realize that each of these questions raises a host of problems, and indeed that the most formidable obstacle to unification is the fact that the two parts of Germany embody such diametrically opposed political systems. It may be that unification will come only when the evolution of social and political forces in both East and West Germany prepares the way for it. I would only urge that where old formulas have brought us to a dead end the time may be ripe for fresh initiatives.

When we turn to the Middle East, the sense of an impending and almost unavoidable collision of Soviet and American power is heavy upon us. The decision of the Soviet Union after the six-day war to rearm its Arab clients has been met, if not matched, by American military aid to Israel. Efforts to reach agreement on a limitation of arms shipments to the area have thus far enjoyed no success. Soviet military personnel in increasing numbers are training Arab military forces, the Soviet Mediterranean fleet has been enlarged, naval bases have been established in Arab ports, the Soviet air lift capacity has been improved. and the possibility of direct Soviet military intervention in the area cannot be disregarded. Hopes of achieving a peace settlement between the Arabs and Israelis have centered on a resolution unanimously adopted by the United Nations Security Council on November 22, 1967 which laid down certain principles to be accepted by both sides, including the withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from occupied territories, the termination of all claims of belligerency, the right of freedom of navigation, a just settlement of the refugee problem, and the guarantee of the territorial inviolability and political independence of every state in the area. Thus far the efforts of Ambassador Jarring, the United Nations Special Representative, to obtain agreement on a settlement in accordance with the resolution have not borne fruit. Arab terrorism and Israeli reprisal raids continue. The Israelis call for direct negotiations and a formal peace treaty with the Arabs. Leaders of the Arab cause refuse to recognize Israel and talk of reopening a holy war to put an end to the State of Israel.

Are there initiatives which the United States can still take in negotiations with the Soviet Union to prevent the Middle Eastern crisis from flaring up into a major confrontation? Is it too late to renew efforts to impose agreed limits on arms shipments to the rival parties? Can a joint arrangement be reached to refrain from direct military intervention in the area? Is there sufficient common interest in avoiding a major confrontation in the Middle East to provide a basis for joint pressure on both the Arabs and the Israelis to moderate their most extreme positions in the interest of a workable settlement? Again, I repeat that I am under no illusions about the difficulties which stand in the way of the success of such efforts. I can only plead that not to try at all is a sure guarantee of failure.

Finally, let us turn to Southeast Asia. It is commonly assumed, and I believe correctly, that the termination of the war in Vietnam and the withdrawal of American troops would contribute to an easing of Soviet-American relations. But we would still be left with the problem of defining our future role in Southeast Asia and our obligations, such as they may be, to Laos, Cambodia, and Thailand, not to mention Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, and the Philippines. Would we, for example, dispatch troops to Laos to prevent a complete Pathet Lao take-over or send large military contingents to Thailand to help suppress a growing guerrilla movement? After our experience in Vietnam, it would appear most unlikely. Our proclaimed purpose in Southeast Asia is to assist nations whose self-determination is threatened and who want to help themselves. In practice this has meant providing help to non-Communist governments endangered by internal or external Communist subversion. In Vietnam this policy collided with the determination of both the Soviet Union and Communist China to help North Vietnam and the Viet Cong to overthrow the Saigon government and expel the Americans. Clearly, there can be no basis for a common Soviet-American policy in Southeast Asia as long as the United States is ready to suppress any bid to expand Communist power and the Soviet Union is prepared to assist so-called national liberation movements which the United States regards as thin veneers for Communist take-overs. Short of a mutual agreement to refrain from such intervention, perhaps the most that can be hoped for in the way of concerted policy is that the United States and the Soviet Union will take parallel actions in areas accessible to each of them to counter an expansion of Chinese power and influence in the region.

So far I have spoken mainly of conflicts and how they might be muted. But there are also opportunities for cooperation which have only begun to be explored. A start has been made in collaborative endeavor in Antarctica, in agreements for exchanges in scientific, technical, educational, cultural, and other fields, and in attendance and exchange of views by Soviet and American scientists and scholars at both national and international scientific conferences. But there are many other substantive fields in which collaboration would serve the interests of both nations. They include the exploration of space and of the ocean floor, attacks on the pollution of the environment, work on irrigation and the desalting of water, the establishment of a global satellite communications system, weather forecasting, medicine, population control, increasing food supplies, and many others. The scientific community in both nations would eagerly welcome such cooperation.

Meanwhile, Soviet-American relations are still entangled in a complex web of rival ambitions and shared concerns. Both Soviet and American policy makers have been made vividly aware of the suicidal implications of a thermonuclear conflict; the result has been to increase pressure on both sides to behave with restraint in major confrontations of power. Both the Soviet Union and the United States feel threatened by the long-term potential of Communist China; the result has been to force them to think of themselves as possible allies as well as rivals.

With these developments in mind, it would be pleasant to end this discussion on the note that a war between the United States and the Soviet Union is now unthinkable. Moscow is more cautious. Its formulation is that war is not fatalistically inevitable. But even that is progress. For it opens the way to action directed at the prevention of conflict rather than to its passive acceptance. As the philosopher Karl Jaspers once wisely put it: "Anyone who regards an impending war as certain is helping on its occurrence, precisely through his certainty. Any one who regards peace as certain grows carefree and unintentionally impels us into war. Only he who sees the peril, and does not for one instant forget it, is able to behave in a rational fashion and to do what is possible to exorcise it."

"It is of crucial significance for the course of events whether the individual can endure to remain in suspense; or whether he flees into certainties... The most compelling element in our lives is the fact that we do not know the future, but contribute toward its realization and see it loom before us incalculable in its entirety."²¹

Let me conclude in the words of President Kennedy: "There is no single, simple key to... peace, no grand or magic formula to be adopted by one or two powers. Genuine peace must be the product of many nations, the sum of many acts. It must be dynamic, not static, changing to meet the challenge of each new generation. For peace is a process, a way of solving problems."²²

²¹ Karl Jaspers, The Origin and Goal of History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953), p. 151.

²² President John F. Kennedy, op. cit., p. 118.

A CAUSAL MODEL OF CIVIL STRIFE: A COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS USING NEW INDICES¹

TED GURR Princeton University

This article describes some results of a successful attempt to assess and refine a causal model of the general conditions of several forms of civil strife, using cross-sectional analyses of data collected for 114 polities. The theoretical argument, which is discussed in detail elsewhere, stipulates a set of variables said to determine the likelihood and magnitude of civil strife.2 Considerable effort was given here to devising indices that represent the theoretical variables more closely than the readily-available aggregate indices often used in quantitative cross-national research. One consequence is an unusually high degree of statistical explanation: measures of five independent variables jointly account for twothirds of the variance among nations in magnitude of civil strife (R = .80, R^2 = .64).

It should be noted at the outset that this study does not attempt to isolate the set of conditions that leads specifically to "revolution," nor to assess the social or political impact of any given act of strife except as that impact is reflected in measures of "magnitude" of strife. The relevance of this kind of research to the classic concern of political scholarship with revolution is its attempt at identification and systematic analysis of conditions that dispose men to strife generally, revolution included.

¹ This is a revised version of a paper read at the 1967 Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, Chicago, September 5-9 The research was supported in part by the Center for Research in Social Systems (formerly SORO), The American University, and by the Advanced Research Projects Agency of the Department of Defense. This support implies neither sponsor approval of this article and its conclusions nor the author's approval of policies of the U.S. government toward civil strife. The assistance of Charles Ruttenberg throughout the process of research design, data collection, and analysis is gratefully acknowledged. Substantial portions of the data were collected by Joel Prager and Lois Wasserspring. The author owes special thanks to Harry Eckstein for his advice and encouragement. Bruce M. Russett and Raymond Tanter provided useful criticisms of the paper in draft form. Research was carried out at the Center of International Studies, Princeton University.

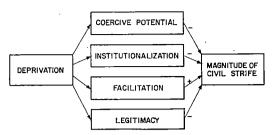

² Ted Gurr, "Psychological Factors in Civil Violence," World Politics, 20 (January 1968), 245-278.

I. THEORETICAL CONSIDERATIONS

The basic theoretical proposition is that a psychological variable, relative deprivation, is the basic precondition for civil strife of any kind, and that the more widespread and intense deprivation is among members of a population, the greater is the magnitude of strife in one or another form. Relative deprivation is defined as actors' perceptions of discrepancy between their value expectations (the goods and conditions of the life to which they believe they are justifiably entitled) and their value capabilities (the amounts of those goods and conditions that they think they are able to get and keep). The underlying causal mechanism is derived from psychological theory and evidence to the effect that one innate response to perceived deprivation is discontent or anger, and that anger is a motivating state for which aggression is an inherently satisfying response. The term relative deprivation is used below to denote the perceived discrepancy, discontent to denote the motivating state which is the postulated response to it. The relationship between discontent and participation in strife is however mediated by a number of intervening social conditions. The initial theoretical model stipulated three such societal variables that are explored here, namely coercive potential, institutionalization, and social facilitation.3 Results of a previous attempt to operationalize

3 Coercive potential is labelled "retribution" in ibid. The theoretical model also stipulates a set of variables that determines the intensity of deprivation. In the research reported in the present article, deprivation was operationalized directly rather than by reference to its component variables. The causal mechanism of the theory is the frustration-aggression relationship, which the author has attempted to modify and apply to collective strife in the light of recent empirical and theoretical work, e.g., Leonard Berkowitz, Aggression: A Social Psychological Analysis (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1962), and Aubrey J. Yates, Frustration and Conflict (New York: Wiley, 1962).

some of these variables and relate them to strife suggested that a fourth variable whose effects should be controlled is the legitimacy of the political regime in which strife occurs.⁴

The initial model, sketched in simplified form in Figure 1, specified no hierarchical or causal interactions among the mediating variables. Each was assumed to have an independent effect on the fundamental relationship between deprivation and strife. The theoretical arguments with reference to each variable are briefly stated here.

Great importance is attributed in psychological theory and equally, in theoretical and empirical studies of revolutionary behavior, to the inhibiting effects of punishment or coercion, actual or threatened, on the outcome of deprivation. The relationship is not necessarily a linear one whereby increasing levels of coercion are associated with declining levels of violence. Psychological evidence suggests that if an aggressive response to deprivation is thwarted by fear of punishment, this interference is itself a deprivation and increases the instigation to aggression. Comparative studies of civil strife suggest a curvilinear relationship whereby medium levels of coercion, indexed for example by military participation ratios or ratings of regime repressiveness, are associated with the highest magnitudes of strife. Only very high levels of coercion appear to limit effectively the extent of strife. No systematic comparative study has examined whether the curvilinear relationship also holds for levels of coercion actually applied. Comparative studies have, however, emphasized the importance of the loyalty of coercive forces to the regime as a factor of equal or greater importance than the size of those forces in deterring strife, and this relationship is almost certainly linear, i.e., the greater the loyalty of coercive forces, the more effective they are, ceteris paribus, in deterring strife.6 Two measures of coercion are used in this study: coercive force size, which is hypothesized to vary curvilinearly with levels of strife, and coercive force size weighted for the degree of loyalty of coercive forces to the regime, referred to throughout as coercive potential, which is expected to have a linear relationship with strife.

⁴ Ted Gurr with Charles Ruttenberg, The Conditions of Civil Violence: First Tests of a Causal Model (Princeton: Center of International Studies, Princeton University, Research Monograph No. 28, April 1967).

⁶ See Douglas Bwy, "Governmental Instability in Latin America: The Preliminary Test of a Causal Model of the Impulse to 'Extra-Legal' Change," paper read at the American Psychological Association Annual Convention, New York, September 2-6, 1966; Jennifer Walton, "Correlates of Coerciveness and Permissiveness of National Political Systems: A Cross-National Study," (M.A. thesis, San Diego State College, 1965); Gurr and Ruttenberg, The Conditions of Civil Violence . . . , 81-84.

The second intervening variable is institutionalization, i.e., the extent to which societal structures beyond the primary level are broad in scope, command substantial resources and/ or personnel, and are stable and persisting. Representative of the diverse arguments about the role of associational structures in minimizing strife are Huntington on the necessity of political institutionalization for political stability, Kornhauser on the need for structures intervening between mass and elite to minimize mass movements, and a variety of authors on the long-range tendencies of labor organizations to minimize violent economically-based conflict.7 Two underlying psychological processes are likely to affect the intensity of and responses to discontent. One is that the existence of such structures increases men's value opportunities, i.e., their repertory of alternative ways to attain value satisfaction. A complementary function is that of displacement: labor unions, political parties, and a range of other associations may provide the discontented with routinized and typically non-violent means for expressing their discontents.8 The proposed relationship is linear: the greater the institutionalization, the lower the magnitude of strife is likely to be.

⁶ See, for example, Chalmers Johnson, Revolution and the Social System (Stanford: The Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, 1964), pp. 14–22.

⁷ Samuel P. Huntington, "Political Development and Political Decay," World Politics, 17 (April 1965), 386-430; William Kornhauser, The Politics of Mass Society (New York: The Free Press, 1959); and Arthur M. Ross and George W. Hartmann, Changing Patterns of Industrial Conflict (New York: Wiley, 1960), among others.

8 Gurr, "Psychological Factors. . ."

Given the existence of widespread discontent in a population, a great number of social and environmental conditions may be present that facilitate the outbreak and persistence of strife. They may be categorized according to their inferred psychological effects, for example, according to whether they facilitate interaction among the discontented, or provide the discontented with a sense that violent responses to deprivation are justified, or give them the means to make such responses with maximum effect, or shelter them from retribution.9 Two aspects of facilitation are treated separately in this study: past levels of civil strife and social and structural facilitation per se. The theoretical basis for the first of these variables is that populations in which strife is chronic tend to develop, by an interaction process, a set of beliefs justifying violent responses to deprivation; the French tradition of urban "revolution" is a striking example. Social and structural facilitation (referred to below as "facilitation") comprises aspects of organizational and environmental facilitation of strife, and the provision of external assistance. The operational hypotheses are that the greater the levels of past strife, and of social and structural facilitation, the greater is the magnitude of strife.

Two considerations suggested the incorporation of the fourth intervening variable examined in this study, legitimacy of the regime. A study of strife for the years 1961-1963 identified a number of nations that had less strife than might be expected on the basis of characteristics they shared with more strife-ridden polities.10 One apparent common denominator among them was a high degree of popular support for the regime. This appeared consistent with Merelman's recently-proposed learning-theory rationale for legitimacy, to the effect that people comply with cirectives of the regime in order to gain both the symbolic rewards of governmental action and the actual rewards with which government first associated itself, an argument that applies equally well to acceptance of deprivation and is compatible with experimental findings, in work on the frustration-aggression relationship, that people are less aggressive when they perceive frustration to be reasonable or justifiable.11 9 Ibid.

The proposed relationship of legitimacy as an intervening variable is linear: the greater is regime legitimacy at a given level of deprivation, the less the magnitude of consequent strife.

II. OPERATIONAL MEASURES

The universe of analysis chosen for evaluating the model comprised 114 distinct national and colonial political entities, each of which had a population of one million or more in 1962. Data on civil strife were collected for 1961 through 1965. Cross-sectional multiple and partial correlation techniques were used. The use of product-moment correlation coefficients was justified on grounds of their necessity for multiple regression, although not all the indicators formally meet the order-of-measurement requirements of the techniques used.

Because of the very considerable difficulties of operationalizing a number of the variables, and the fact that most of the indicators constructed are new, this article gives relatively close attention to the data collection and scaling procedures.

With the exception of magnitude of strife and its components, the underlying variables examined in this study are unmeasured and must be inferred from indicators. In most instances they are in fact unmeasureable by aggregate data, since they relate in the instance of deprivation-induced discontent to a state of mind, and in the case of the intervening variables to conditions that have their effect only insofar as the discontented perceive them, and moreover perceive them as relevant to their response to deprivation. Following Blalock's recommendation that "when dealing with unmeasured variables it will usually be advisable to make use of more than one indicator for each underlying variable," each of the summary measures used in this study is derived by combining two to seven indicators of the underlying variable. This procedure has not only the advantage Blalock attributes to it, namely of minimizing the effects of confounding variables, but also facilitates incorporation of various empirically-discrete conditions that have theoretically-identical effects.13

¹² Five polities meeting these criteria were excluded: Laos on grounds that at no time in the 1960's did it have even the forms of a unified regime, and Albania, Mongolia, North Korea, and North Vietnam for lack of sufficient reliable data. The universe nonetheless includes polities with more than 98 percent of the world's population.

¹³ Hubert M. Blalock, Jr., Causal Inferences in Nonexperimental Research (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1964), pp. 166-167, italicized in original.

¹⁰ Gurr and Ruttenberg, The Conditions of Civil Violence . . . , 100-106.

¹¹ Richard M. Merelman, "Learning and Legitimacy," this Review, 60 (September 1966); see also the work of Pastore and of Kregarman and Worchel, reviewed in Berkowitz, op. cit., passim.

Magnitude of Civil Strife

The dependent variable of the theoretical model is magnitude of civil strife. Civil strife is defined as all collective, nongovernmental attacks on persons or property that occur within the boundaries of an autonomous or colonial political unit. By "nongovernmental" is meant acts by subjects and citizens who are not employees or agents of the regime, as well as acts of such employees or agents contrary to role norms, such as mutinies and coups d'état. Operationally the definition is qualified by the inclusion of symbolic demonstrative attacks on political persons or policies, e.g., political demonstrations, and by the exclusion of turmoil and internal war events in which less than 100 persons take part.

A three-fold typology of civil strife is also employed, based on an empirical typology of civil strife events identified by Rummel, Tanter, and others in a series of factor analyses. The general categories, and representative subcategories, are

- Turmoil: relatively spontaneous, unstructured mass strife, including demonstrations, political strikes, riots, political clashes, and localized rebellions.
- (2) Conspiracy: intensively organized, relatively small-scale civil strife, including political assassinations, small-scale terrorism, small-scale guerrilla wars, coups, mutinies, and plots and purges, the last two on grounds that they are evidence of planned strife.
- (3) Internal war: large-scale, organized, focused civil strife, almost always accompanied by extensive violence, including large-scale terrorism and guerrilla wars, civil wars, private wars, and large-scale revolts.¹⁴

¹⁴ In each of a number of analyses by Rummel and others a set of "domestic conflict" measures was factor analyzed. Turmoil, indexed by riots and demonstrations, is found to be a distinct limension in all the analyses; two other factors, abelled by Rummel "revolution" and "subeversion," are in some cases separate and in others combined. Principal components of the "revolution" dimension are coups, palace revolutions, plots, and purges; the category is labelled here conspiracy. Guerrilla war and terrorism are major components of the "subversion" dimension, here abelled internal war. See Rudolph J. Rummel. 'A Field Theory of Social Action With Applicaion to Conflict Within Nations," Yearbook of the Society for General Systems Research, X (1965), ■89-195; and Raymond Tanter, "Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within Nations, 1955-1960:

Various measures of the relative extent of civil strife have been used in recent literature, among them counts by country of number of strife events of various types, factor scores derived from such typologies, number of deaths from violent strife, man-days of participation in strife, and scaling procedures that take account of both number of events and their severity.15 One can infer from frustrationaggression theory that no single measure of magnitude of aggression, individual or collective, is likely to be sufficient. It is likely that high levels of discontent may be expressed either in intense, short-lived violence or in more protracted but less severe strife. Moreover, the proportion of a collectivity that participates in civil strife ought to vary with the modal intensity of discontent: mild discontent will motivate few to participate, whereas rage is likely to galvanize large segments of a collectivity into action.

Three aspects of civil strife thus ought to be taken into account in specifying its magnitude:

- (1) Pervasiveness: the extent of participation by the affected population, operationally defined for this study as the sum of the estimated number of participants in all acts of strife as a proportion of the total population of each polity, expressed in terms of participants per 100,000 population.
- (2) Duration: the persistence of strife, indexed here by the sum of the spans of time of all strife events in each polity, whatever the relative scale of the events, expressed in days.
- (3) Intensity: the human cost of strife, indexed here by the total estimated casualties, dead and injured, in all strife events in each Turmoil and Internal War," Peace Research Society Papers, III (1965), 159-183. The subcategories used here are adapted, with their operational definitions, from Rummel, "Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within and Between Nations," Yearbook of the Society for General Systems Research, VIII (1963), 25-26.

¹⁵ See, for example, Rummel, op. cit.; Tanter, op. cit.; Bruce M. Russett, "Inequality and Instability: The Relation of Land Tenure to Politics," World Politics, 16 (April 1964), 442-454; Charles Tilly and James Rule, Measuring Political Upheaval (Princeton: Center of International Studies, Princeton University, 1965); and Ivo K. and Rosalind L. Feierabend, "Aggressive Behaviors Within Polities, 1948-1962: A Cross-National Study," Journal of Conflict Resolution, 10 (September 1966), 249-271.

polity as a proportion of the total population, expressed as casualties per 10,000,000 population.

To approximate these requirements an extensive data-collection and -estimation effort was undertaken. Coding sheets and a coding manual were devised for recording a variety of information about any strife event, and a large number of sources scanned and coded to get as full as possible a representation of the strife events that occurred in the 114 polities in the 1961-1965 period. Three sources were systematically searched for data: the New York Times (via its Index), Newsyear (the annual volumes of Facts on File), and Africa Digest. This information was supplemented from a variety of other sources, among them The Annual Register of World Events, Africa Diary: Weekly Record of Events in Africa, Hispanic-American Report, and country and case studies. Some 1100 strife events were thus identified, coded, and the data punched onto IBM cards.16 Many small-scale strife events, and some larger ones, probably went unreported in these sources and hence are not included in this civil strife data bank. Moreover, much reported and estimated data is in varying degrees inaccurate. However, neither random nor systematic error seem sufficient to affect in any substantial way the analyses or conclusions reported here; the data are adequate for the purposes to which they are put.17

16 Information coded, in addition to that required for the three measures specified, included the socio-economic class(es) of the initiators, the social context in which they acted, the category of events, the targets and apparent motives of action, the number and role of coercive forces, and the extent and types of external support for initiators and regime, if any. Although no formal reliability tests were undertaken, the four coders did extensive practice coding on the same set of materials prior to coding and reviewed points of disagreement, and the author reviewed all coding sheets for internal consistency and, where necessary, recoding or search for additional information. It should be noted that the 1100 "events" include many cumulated reports, e.g., civil rights demonstrations in the U.S. were treated as a single set of events, all European-OAS terrorism in Algeria as a single event, etc.

17 It has been suggested that strife in countries with press restrictions is under-reported. As a check on this type of systematic error a nine-point measure of press freedom was incorporated in initial analyses; the measure is from Raymond B. Nixon, "Freedom in the World's Press: A Fresh Appraisal With New Data," Journalism Quar-

Data estimation procedures were used to circumvent the substantial missing-data problem. Methods for determining number of initiators serve as examples. The coding sheet itself contained two "number of initiator" scales. The first was a modified geometric progression of two used to record proximate estimates of initiators, its first interval being 1 to 40, its highest 55,001 to 110,000; for purposes of summing such estimates to obtain total number of initiators, the midpoint of each interval was used. The second scale was used for recording rough estimates, sometimes coder estimates, of number of initiators, ranging from "less than 100" (set equal to 40 for purposes of computing totals) to "10,001 to 100.000" (set equal to 40.000). Data for events for which no estimate could be made were supplied by calculating and inserting means for the appropriate subcategory of event, e.g., if a riot was coded "no basis for judging" for number of initiators, it was assigned the average number of initiators of all riots for which estimates were available.

"Duration" posed little difficulty, being coded on a geometric progression whose first two intervals were "one-half day or less" and "one-half to one day," and whose upper intervals were four to nine months, nine to fifteen months, etc. No event was assigned a duration of more than five years, though some began before and/or persisted after the 1961–1965 period.

Casualties were coded similarly to number of initiators, the principal missing-data component being estimates of injuries. The ratio of injuries to deaths was calculated for all events of each subcategory for which both data were available—the general ratio for all well-reported strife being 12:1—and was used to estimate injuries for all such events for which "deaths" but not injuries estimates were given. 18 terly (Winter 1965), 3-14. The correlations of this measure, in which high scores reflect low press freedom, with some measures of strife are: Duration, +19; Intensity, +17; Pervasiveness, -16 Total magnitude of strife, +11. The first two are significant at the .05 level, the third at .10. Ir effect, more strife tends to be reported from polities with low press freedom, not less, as might be expected. The results almost certainly reflect the association of high levels of economic development and press freedom in the Western nations which tend to have less strife than the developingmations.

¹⁸ The missing-data procedures gave implausi bly-high estimates for initiators and casualties fo

Strife events occurred in 104 of the 114 polities during the 1961-65 period. Pervasiveness, Duration, and Intensity scores were calculated separately, following the guidelines specified above, for turmoil, conspiracy, and internal war for each country, and for all strife taken together for each polity. All the distributions were highly skewed, hence were subjected to a log (X+1) transformation. To obtain combined magnitude scores for turmoil, conspiracy, internal war, and all strife, the three component logged scores were added, divided by eight to obtain their eighth root, and the anti-log used as the polity magnitudeof-strife score. The distributions remained skewed, but substantially so only in the case of internal war, which by our definitions occurred in only 25 of the 114 polities.19

Measures of Deprivation

A very large number of conditions are likely to impose some degree of relative deprivation on some proportion of a nation's citizens. Similarly, all men are likely to be discontented about some of their conditions of life at some point in time. On the basis of prior theoretical and empirical work, however, it was possible to construct, and subsequently to combine, a set of cross-nationally comparable indices of conditions that by inference cause pervasive and intense types of deprivation, relying in part on aggregate data and in part on indices constructed by coding narrative and historical material. In the initial stages of data collection a large number of measures were constructed. some of them representing short-term and some persisting conditions, some of each relating to economic, political, and sociocultural deprivation. Whenever possible, separate measures were included of the intensity of inferred deprivation and of its pervasiveness, i.e., of the proportion of population presumably affected, plus a third measure combining the two elements. A correlation matrix for 48 such measures and a variety of strife measures was generated, and 13 representative deprivation measures selected for combination.20 The general rationale for the two general types of measures, short-term and persisting deprivation, and the measures finally selected, are summarized below.

Persisting Deprivation: In the very long run men's expectations about the goods and conditions of life to which they are entitled tend to adjust to what they are capable of attaining. In the shorter span, however, some groups may persistently demand and expect values, such as greater economic opportunity, political autonomy, or freedom of religious expression, that their societies will not or cannot provide.

- (1) Economic discrimination is defined as systematic exclusion of social groups from higher economic value positions on ascriptive bases. For each polity the proportion of population so discriminated against, if any, was specified to the nearest .05, and the intensity of deprivation coded on a four-point scale (see below). The proportion and the intensity score were multiplied to obtain a polity score.
- (2) Political discrimination is similarly defined in terms of systematic limitation in form, norm, or practice of social groups' opportunities to participate in political activities or to attain elite positions on the basis of ascribed characteristics. Proportionality and intensity scores were determined and combined in the same manner as economic discrimination scores. The "intensity" scales were defined as follows:

Intensity

Score

Economic Discrimination

Political Discrimination

1 Most higher economic value positions, or some specific classes of economic activity, are closed to the group. Some significant political elite positions are closed to the group, or some participatory activities (party membership, voting, etc.).

number of events. In subsequent and comparble analysis it seems advisable to rely on estinates of deaths alone, rather than casualties, and ninsert means derived from comparable events in mparable countries rather than such events in ll countries.

Tables are available on request from the uthor listing the 114 countries, their strife scores, the summary measures of deprivation and mediating conditions discussed below, and the data sources.

²⁰ The 48 deprivation measures, with only one statistically significant exception, were positively associated with strife, most of them at a relatively low level. The thirteen were selected with regard to their representativeness, relatively high correlations with the dependent variables, and low intercorrelations.

Intensity Score	Economic Discrimination
2	Most higher and some medium economic value positions are closed, or many specific classes of economic activity.
3	Most higher and most medium economic value positions are closed.

Almost all higher, medium, and some lower Most or all political elite positions and most 4 economic value positions are closed.

Political Discrimination

Most or all political elite positions are closed or most participatory activities, or some of both.

Most or all political elite positions and some participatory activities are closed.

or all participatory activities are closed.

(3) Potential separatism was indexed by multiplying the proportional size of historically-separatist regional or ethnic groups by a four-point intensity measure.21 The intensity of separatist deprivation was scored as follows:

Intensity Score

Type of Inferred Separatism

- The separatist region or group was incorporated in the polity by its own request or 1 mutual agreement.
- 2 The separatist region or group was assigned to the polity by international agreement or by fiat of a former colonial or governing power, except when (3) or (4) below holds.
- The separatist region or group was forcibly assimilated into the polity prior to the 3 twentieth century, or was forcibly conquered by a former colonial power prior to the twentieth century.
- The separatist region or group was forcibly assimilated into the polity during the twen-4 tieth century, or was forcibly reassimilated in the twentieth century after a period of autonomy due to rebellion or other circumstance.
- (4) Dependence on private foreign capital, indexed by negative net factor payments abroad as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product in the late 1950's, is assumed to be a chronic source of dissatisfaction in an era characterized by economic nationalism. The greater the proportion of national product that accrues to foreign suppliers of goods or capital, the greater the inferred intensity of deprivation; the extent of such deprivation was assumed equal to the proportion of population engaged in the monetary economy. The polity score is the extent score × the intensity score.22
- (5) Religious cleavages are a chronic source of deprivation-inducing conflict. The scale for intensity of religious cleavage takes account both of number of organized religious groups with two percent or more of total population (the major Christian and Muslim subdivisions are counted as separate groups) and of the duration of their coexistence, the greater that duration the less the inferred intensity. The extent measure is the proportion of the population belonging to any organized religious group. The polity score is the product of the two scores.
- (6) Lack of educational opportunity was indexed, in proportionality terms only, by subtracting primary plus secondary school enrollment ratios ca. 1960 from 100. Education is so widely regarded as an essential first step for individual socio-economic advancement that one can infer deprivation among the uneducated, and among the parents of children who cannot attend school if not ye among the children themselves.

Six indicators of persisting deprivation were combined to obtain a single long-run deprivation measure.

These six measures all had distributions approaching normality, and correlations with 21 Coding judgments for both discrimination indices and for separatism were made on the basis of country studies. The proportionality measures are versions of indices reported in Ted Gurr, New Error-Compensated Measures for Comparing Nations (Princeton: Center of International Studies, Princeton University, 1966), 67-90.

²² A crude measure of the proportion of each polity's population engaged in the monetary economy, to the nearest .10, was constructed for the purpose of weighting this and some other measures. The measure was based primarily on labor census data.

several strife measures ranging from .09 to .27 To combine them they were weighted to bring their means into approximate correspondence and each polity's scores added and the averaged to circumvent the missing dat problem.

Short-Term Deprivation: Any sharp increas in peoples' expectations that is unaccompanie by the perception of an increase in value capabilities, or any abrupt limitation on what the have or can hope to obtain, constitute relativ deprivation. We inferred that short-term, rela tive declines in system economic and politica performance were likely to be perceived aincreased deprivation for substantial number of people. Indices were devised of five kinds (short-term economic deprivation and two political deprivation.

- (1) Short-term trends in trade value, 1957-60 compared with 1950-57: The percentage change of trade value, exports +imports, for 1957-60 was compared with the rate for 1950-1957, and any relative decrease in the later period was treated as an indicator of short-term economic deprivation. Decreases were scaled so that polities with lower rates of increase in the earlier period received greater deprivation scores than those with high rates.
- (2) Short-term trends in trade value, 1960-63 compared with 1950-60: Procedures identical with (1), above, were used. Both measures were incorporated in the final analysis because both were markedly correlated with strife measures but had a relatively low intercorrelation of :18.23
- (3) Inflation 1960-63 compared with 1958-61: Data on cost-of-living indices were scaled and combined in such a way that the highest deprivation scores were assigned to polities with substantial and worsening inflation in the 1958-63 period, the lowest scores (0) to polities with stable or declining costs-oi-living throughout the period.
- (4) 1960-63 GNP growth rates compared with 1950's growth rate; Economic growth rate data were scaled so that polities having low rates in the 1950's and even lower rates in the early 1960's received the highest deprivation scores; those with moderate rates in the 1950's but substantial relative decline in the early 1960's received somewhat lower deprivation scores; and those with steadily high, or moderate but steadily increasing, rates received zero deprivation scores.
- (5) Adverse economic conditions 1960-63: To supplement aggregate data indicators of economic deprivation, several summary news sources were searched for evaluative statements about adverse internal economic conditions such as crop failures, unemployment, export market slumps, drought, etc. Each such description was coded on the following intensity and extent scales:

"Severity" (Intensity) Scores

"Proportion Affected" (Extent) Scores

Moderate One region or city, or a small economic sec-=0.2Substantial, or moderate and persisting for Several regions or cities, or several economic =2more than one year =0.5sectors Severe, or substantial and persisting for more Much of country, or several major or one =3=0.7than one year dominant economic sector Whole country, or all economic sectors Severe and persisting for more than one year =4=1.0

The score for each such condition is the product of the extent and intensity scores; the score for each polity for each year is the sum of the "condition" scores; and the score used for the summary index is the sum of annual scores for 1960 through 1963. The sources used were Hispanic-American Report for Latin America and the Annual Register for other polities.²⁴

- (6) New restrictions on political participation and representation by the regime were coded from the same sources for the same years. Seventeen types of action were defined on a priori grounds as value-depriving political restrictions, including harrassment and banning of parties of various sizes, banning of political activity, and improper dismissal of elected assemblies and executives. These were ranked on a nine-point intensity scale.²⁵ The extent measure was the politically-participatory proportion of the population, crudely estimated to the nearest .10 on the basis of voting participa-
- ²³ The two measures will be used in subsequent analyses to examine time-lag relationships between short-term economic deprivation and strife. The trade data, obtained primarily from United Nations sources, was converted to U.S. currency when necessary to maintain comparability over time.
- ²⁴ The Hispanic-American Report is much more comprehensive a source, hence the mean deprivation scores for Latin America were much higher than those for other polities. As a crude adjustment, the Latin American polity scores were divided by a constant so that their mean approximated that of other polities. The same procedure was followed for indices 6 and 7, below. Analyses of regional clusters of polities, not reported here, provide a check on the adequacy of the procedure.
- ²⁵ Types of restrictive actions, and their scale values, are as follows:

- 1 Amalgamation of splinter party with larger party
- 1 Restriction or harrassment of splinter party
- 2 Banning of splinter party
- 2 Amalgamation of minority party with larger party
- 2 Restriction or harrassment of minority party
- 3 Banning of minority party
- 3 Amalgamation of a major party with another major party.
- 3 Restriction or harrassment of major party
- 4 Banning of major party
- 4 Improper dismissal of regional representative body
- 4 Improper dismissal of elected regional executive
- 5 Ban on party activities, parties allowed to continue their organizational existence
- 5 Improper dismissal of national legislature, with provision for calling new one within a year
- 5 Improper dismissal of elected chief executive, with provision for replacement within a year
- 6 Dissolution of all parties, ban on all political activity
- 6 Improper dismissal of national legislature, no short-term provision for reestablishment
- 6 Improper dismissal of elected chief executive, no short term provision for reelection

tion levels and, in lieu of voting data, on the basis of urbanization and literacy levels. The score for each action identified is the product of the intensity and extent scores; the annual polity score the sum of "action" scores; and the summary index the sum of annual scores for 1960–63.

(7) New value-depriving policies of governments 1960-63 were defined as any new programs or actions that appeared to take away some significant proportion of attained values from a numerically or socially significant group, for example land reform, tax increases, restrictions on trade, limitations of civil liberties, restrictive actions against ethnic, religious, or economic groups, and so forth. Two aspects of such policies were taken into account in scaling for intensity: the degree of deprivation imposed, and their equality of application. The "degree of deprivation" scale values are: small = 1, moderate = 2, substantial = 3, most or all = 4. The "equality of application" scale values are: uniform = 1, discriminatory = 2. The intensity score is the product of values on these two scales. The most intensely depriving policies are assumed to be those intentionally discriminatory and designed to deprive the affected group of most or all the relevant value, e.g. seizure of all property of absentee landlords without compensation (score = 8). Deprivation is inferred to be least intense if the policy is uniformly applicable to all the affected class of citizens and deprives them of only a small part of the value, e.g. a five percent increase in corporation tax rates (score = 1). The extent measure is a crude estimate of the proportion of the adult population likely to be directly affected, the permissible values being .01, .02, .05, .10, .20, .40, .60, .80 and 1.00. The score for each policy identified is the product of the intensity and extent scores; the annual polity score the sum of "policy" scores; and the summary index the sum of annual scores for 1960-63. The sources are the same as for (6) and (7).26

Three summary short-term deprivation scores were calculated for each polity from these seven indices. The five economic variables were multiplied by constants so that their means were approximately equal and averaged to circumvent the missing-data problem. This is the "short-term economic deprivation" index referred to below. The summary measures of politically-related deprivation were similarly combined to obtain a summary "short-term political deprivation" measure. The two measures were then added to comprise a single "short-term deprivation" measure for the purposes of some subsequent analyses.

Measures of the Mediating Variables

Coercive Potential and Size of Coercive Forces: A composite index was constructed to take into account four aspects of the regime's apparent potential for controlling strife. Two of the component indices represent the manpower resources available to the regime, namely military and internal security forces participation ratios, i.e., military personnel per 10,000 adults ca. 1960 (n=112), and internal security forces per 10,000 adults (n=102). The two distributions were normalized and their means brought into correspondence by rescaling them using 10-interval geometric progressions. The other two component indices deal respectively with the degree of past loyalty of coercive forces to the regime, and the extent of illicit coercive-force participation in strife in the 1960-65 period.

²⁶ The annual scores for (5), (6), and (7) are being used in a series of time-lagged and crosspanel correlation analyses, not reported here, in further tests of causal relationships.

The rationale for the five-point coerciveforce loyalty scale, below, is that the more recently coercive forces had attacked the regime, the less efficacious they would be perceived to be by those who might initiate strife—and the more likely they might be to do so again themselves. Countries were scored on the basis of information from a variety of historical sources.

Loyalty Score Regime Status and Military Attempts to Seize Control of the Regime

- 5 As of 1960 the polity or its metropolitan power had been autonomous for 25 years or more and had experienced no military intervention since 1910.
- As of 1960 the polity or its metropolitan power had been autonomous for 5 to 24 years and had experienced no military intervention during that period; or had been autonomous for a longer period but experienced military intervention between 1910 and 1934.
- The polity last experienced military intervention between 1935 and 1950, inclusive.
- The polity last experienced military intervention between 1951 and 1957, inclusive.
- 1 The polity last experienced military intervention between 1958 and 1960, inclusive.

For 28 polities that became independent after 1957 no "loyalty" score was assigned unless the military or police did in fact intervene between independence and the end of 1960. For purposes of calculating the summary score, below, a military loyalty score for these polities was derived from the "legitimacy" score.

Insofar as the military or police themselves illicitly initiated strife in the 1961-65 period, they lost all deterrent effect. To quantify the extent of such involvement, all military or police participation in strife was determined from the data bank of 1100 events and for each polity a "coercive forces strife participation" score calculated, by weighting each involvement in a mutiny or a turmoil event as one and each involvement in any other event (typically coups and civil wars) as two, and summing for each country.

All four of the "coercive potential" measures were correlated in the predicted direction with several preliminary measures of strife levels. The participation ratios had low but consistently negative correlations with strife; the "loyalty" and "strife participation" indices had correlations of the order of -40 and +40with strife respectively.27 The composite "coercive potential" score was calculated by the following formula:

Coercive potential =
$$10 \cdot \sqrt{\frac{L[2(HiR) + 1(loR)]}{1 + P}}$$ where

L="loyalty" score:

HiR = the higher of the scaled military and security forces participation ratios:28

loR = the lower of the participation ratios;

P="coercive forces strife participation" score.

The effect of the formula is to give the highest coercive potential scores to countries with large coercive forces characterized by both historical and concurrent loyalty to the regime. The more recently and extensively such ²⁷ These are product-moment correlation coefficients, the strife measures including measures of duration, pervasiveness, intensity, and total magnitude of strife for 1961-65. The last two strife measures are defined differently from those employed in the present analysis, but are derived from the same 1100-event data bank.

28 If one or the other ratio was missing, it was assumed equal to the known ratio. Internal security force ratios for 94 polities are reported in Gurr, New Error-Compensated Measures for Comparing Nations, 111-126.

forces have been involved in strife, however. the lower their coercive potential score.

A second coercion measure was included in the final analysis to permit a further test of the curvilinearity hypothesis. The measure used is the expression in brackets in the coercive potential formula above, i.e., a weighted measure of the relative sizes of military and internal security forces (coercive force size).

Institutionalization: Indices of institutional strength and stability which I found in previous analyses to be negatively associated with strife are the ratio of labor union membership to nonagricultural employment, central government budgeted expenditure as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product, ca. 1962, and the stability of the political party system.29 A ten-interval geometric progression was used to normalize the first of these indices, the second was multiplied by 100 and rounded to the nearest 10. To index characteristics of party systems two scales were used, one relating to the number of parties, the other to party system stability per se:

No. of parties score Characteristics

0	no parties, or all parties illegal or ineffective
1	one or several parties, mem- bership sharply restricted on ascriptive bases (typi- cally along ethnic lines) to less than twenty percent of the population
2	one party with no formal or substantial informal re- strictions on memberships
3	one party dominant
4	two-party (reasonable ex- pectation of party rota- tion)
5	multi-party

Party system

stability score Party System Characteristics

no parties, or membership restricted on ascriptive bases to less than twenty percent of population

1 unstable

29 The first two indices are reported in ibid., 33-66, 91-110. Correlations among all three and strife measures are reported in Gurr and Ruttenberg, The Conditions of Civil Violence, passim. The party characteristics are recoded from Arthur S. Banks and Robert B. Textor. A Cross-Polity Survey (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1963), raw characteristics 41 and 43.

Party system stability score	Party System Characteristics
2	all parties relatively new (founder after 1945), long-range stability not yet ascertainable
3	moderately stable

Scores on these two scales were combined on an 8-point scale using party stability as the primary indicator of institutionalization but giving highest scores at each stability level to systems with larger numbers of party structures.

The summary institutionalization measure was constructed using this formula:

Institutionalization = 3 (hiI) + 2 (midI) + loI, where hiI=the highest of the three institutionalization scores, etc. This procedure gives greatest weight to the most institutionalized sector of society on the assumption that high institutionalization in one sector compensates for lower levels in others. The highest scores are attained by the Eastern European Communist states while the scores of the Western European democracies are slightly lower. The lowest-scoring polities are Ethiopia, Haiti, Nepal, and Yemen.

Facilitation: Two aspects of facilitation were indexed separately: past levels of civil strife and "social and structural facilitation" per se. The "past levels of strife" measure was derived from the Eckstein data on frequency of internal wars of various types in the period 1946-59; although its reliability is only moderate it covers a longer period and a larger number of polities than other available data.30 Data were collected for those of the 114 polities not included in the Eckstein tabulation, using the same procedure, a New York Times Index count, and recollected for a few others. Weights were assigned to events in various categories, e.g. riots=1, coups=5, and a summary score for each polity calculated. The distribution was normalized with a log (X+1) transformation.

The terrain and transportation network of a country constitute a basic structural limitation on the capabilities of insurgents for maintaining a durable insurrection. A complex "inaccessibility" index was constructed taking account of the extent of transportation networks related to area, population density, and the extent of waste, forest, and mountainous terrain; the highest inaccessibility scores were received by polities like Bolivia, Sudan, and Yemen, which have limited transportation networks and large portions of rugged terrain.³¹

²⁰ Harry Eckstein, "Internal War: The Problem of Anticipation," in Ithiel de Sola Pool et al., Social Science Research and National Security (Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution, March 5, 1963).

A crucial "social" variable that facilitates strife is the extent to which the discontented can and do organize for collective action. The relative strength of Communist Party organizations was used as a partial index, taking into account both the number of party members per 10,000 population and the status of the party. Unfortunately no comparable data could be obtained for extremist parties of the right. Party-membership ratios were rescaled to an 11-point scale based on a geometric progression of 2. The party status scale, below, is based on the premise that illegal parties are more facilitative of strife because their membership is likely, because of the exigencies of repression, to be more dedicated, better organized, and committed to the more violent forms of conflict. Factionalized parties are assumed to be more facilitative because they offer more numerous organizational foci for action.

Score Communist party status and characteristics

- 0 In power or nonexistent.
- Out of power; no serious factionalization or multiple organization; party permitted to participate in electoral activities.
- 2 Out of power; multiple factions or organizations; party permitted to participate in electoral activities.
- 3 Out of power; party excluded from electoral activities but other party activities tolerated.
- 4 Out of power; no serious factionalization or multiple organization; party illegal and/or actively suppressed.
- 5 Out of power; multiple factions or organizations; party illegal and/or actively suppressed.

The score for each polity is the scaled membership ratio times the party status score.

The third measure of facilitation is the extent of external support for initiators of strife in the 1961-65 period. Each strife event in the 1100-event data bank was coded for the degree of support for initiators (if any) and for the number of nations supporting the initiators in any of these ways. The scale points for "degree of support" are provision of arms and supplies (=1), refuge (=2), facilities and training (=3), military advisors and mercenaries (=4), and large (1,000+) military units (=5). The event support score is the "degree" score times the "number of nations" score. these scores then being summed for all events for each polity to obtain a polity score. This measure alone has a relatively high correlation with strife level measures, ranging from .3 to .4; its two extreme outliers, South Vietnam and the Congo, are also among the three extreme outliers on the total magnitude of strife distribution.

³¹ Inaccessibility appears to be an almost-butnot-quite necessary condition for protracted internal wars. With one exception all such internal wars in the post-1945 period occurred in polities with high or very high scores on this index; the exception, a notable one, is Cuba.

The three social and structural facilitation measures were weighted to bring their means into approximate correspondence, several missing-data items estimated, and the weighted measures added to obtain the composite index.

Legitimacy: The legitimacy of a regime can be defined behaviorally in terms of popular compliance, and psychologically by reference to the extent to which its directives are regarded by its citizens as properly made and worthy of obedience. In lieu of evidence on compliance or allegiance necessary to operationalize the concept directly, I combined one indicator of an inferred cause of legitimacy, the circumstances under which the regime attained its present form, with an indicator of an inferred effect, the durability of the regime. The "character" of the regime was scored on a seven-point scale:

Character Score Origins of national political institutions

- 7 Institutions are wholly or primarily accretive and autochthinous; reformations, if any, had indigenous roots (although limited foreign elements may have been assimilated into indigenous institutions).
- 6 Institutions are a mixture of substantial autochthinous and foreign elements, e.g. polities with externally-derived parliamentary and/or bureaucratic systems grafted to a traditional monarchy.
- 5 Institutions are primarily foreign in origin, were deliberately chosen by indigenous leaders, and have been adapted over time to indigenous political conditions. (By adaptation is meant either the > modification of regime institutions themselves or development of intermediate institutions to incorporate politically the bulk of the population.)

Character Score Origins of national political institutions

- 4 Institutions are primarily foreign in origin, have been adapted over time to indigenous political conditions, but were inculcated under the tutelage of a foreign power rather than chosen by indigenous leaders of their own volition.
- 3 Institutions are primarily foreign in origin, were deliberately chosen by indigenous leaders, but have not been adapted over time to indigenous political conditions.
- 2 Institutions are primarily foreign in origin, were inculcated under the tutelage of a foreign power, and have not been adapted to indigenous political conditions.
- Institutions are imposed by, and maintained under threat of sanctions by, foreign powers (including polities under colonial rule as of 1965).

A similar scale, based on the number of generations the regime had persisted as of 1960 without substantial, abrupt reformation, was constructed for durability:

Durability Score Last major reformation of institutions before 1960

7	More	than	eight	generations
	befo	re 196	0 (bef	ore 1800).

- 6 Four to eight generations (1801-1880).
- 5 Two to four generations (1881–1920).
- 4 One to two generations (1921–1940).
- 3 One-half to one generation (1941-1950).
- 2 One-quarter to one-half generation (1951-1955).
- 1 Institutions originated between 1956 and 1960, or were in 1960 in the process of transition.

Examples of coding decisions about "major reformations" are that France experienced such a change in 1957; that most French tropical African polities date their basic institutional structures from the 1946 reforms, not the year of formal independence; that the Canadian regime dates from 1867, when dominion status was attained; and that many Latin American regimes, despite performance of musical chairs at the executive level, attained their basic institutional structures at various (historically specified and coded) points in the mid- or late nineteenth century.

The summary legitimacy index was constructed by summing and rescaling the "character" and "durability" scores.³²

III. RESULTS OF CORRELATION AND REGRESSION ANALYSIS

The results of four multiple regression analyses are discussed in this paper, one of them in detail. The dependent variables in the four analyses are, respectively, total magnitude of civil strife, magnitude of conspiracy, magnitude of internal war, and magnitude of turmoil. The correlations between the ten summary independent variables and these four strife measures are given in Table I. The independent variables all correlate with the dependent variables in the predicted direction, with the exception of coercive force size. The r's for the remaining nine independent variables are significant at the .01 level except for four correlates of internal war, three of which are significant at the .05 level.

The hypothetical curvilinear relationship between coercive force size and total magnitude of strife (TMCS) is examined graphically in Figures 2 and 3, each of which is a smoothed curve of deciles of the independent variable plotted against TMCS. Figure 2, based on all 114 polities, suggests an apparent tendency, among countries with relatively small forces, for strife to increase with the size of those forces, and also a slight increase in TMCS at very high levels of coercive forces.³³ It is quite likely that countries with protracted political violence expand their coercive forces to meet it. It also seems likely that armies in countries facing foreign threats cause less dissatisfaction—by their presence or actions—than armies in states not significantly involved in international conflict. Both factors might contaminate the proposed curvilinear relationship, so countries with either or both characteristics were removed and the relationship plotted for the remaining 69 countries; the results, in Figure 3, show curvilinearity even more distinctly. Figure 4 indicates that the measure of coercive force potential, in which size is weighted for military loyalty to the regime, is essentially linear, as predicted. The latter measure is used in the multiple regression analyses, below.

32 The following rescaling was used, the sum of the "durability" and "character" scores being given on the upper line, the final legitimacy score on the lower:

Sum: 3,4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13,14 Legitimacy: 0 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

33 The S-shape of this relationship is considerably more pronounced when coercive-force size is related to total magnitude of turmoil; see Ted Gurr, "Why Urban Disorder? Perspectives from the Comparative Study of Civil Strife," American Behavioral Scientist, 10 (March-April 1968).

Eight of the ten independent variables (excluding coercive force size and short-term deprivation, the sum of the two specific shortterm deprivation measures) are included in the multiple regression analyses summarized in Table 2. The variables yield considerable and significant multiple correlation coefficients (R), including a high R of .806 for total magnitude of strife ($R^2 = .650$); a moderately high R for conspiracy of .630 ($R^2 = .397$); a similar R for internal war of .648 ($R^2 = .420$); and a somewhat lower R for turmoil of .533 ($R^2 = .284$).³⁴ There are several possible explanations for the finding that total magnitude of strife is accounted for nearly twice as well as the several forms of strife. One technical factor is that all the class-of-strife measures have greater distributional irregularities than does TMCS.

34 Significant computational errors in internal war and TMCS scores of several countries were identified and corrected after completion of the analyses reported here. Robert van den Helm of Princeton University has analyzed the corrected data, using the combined short-term deprivation measure in lieu of the two separate measures, with these multiple regression results: for TMCS. $R^2 = .638$; conspiracy, $R^2 = .391$; internal war, $R^2 = .472$; and turmoil, $R^2 = .284$. The significant increase in the degree of explanation for internal war is the result of increased correlations between magnitude of internal war and short-term deprivation (from .28 in Table 1 to .34); facilitation (from .57 to .61); and legitimacy (from -.23 to -.26). The r between magnitudes of turmoil and internal war increases from .17 to .23, the r between TMCS and internal war from .79 to .86. No other results of the analyses reported here are significantly affected by the reanalysis. The actual TMCS scores shown in Table 3 are corrected ones.

TABLE 1. CORRELATES OF CIVIL STRIFE²

												_			_
Variable ^b	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14
1 Economic deprivation (+)		48	83	-02	-17	-16	- 36	-09	26	32	34	31	25	44
2 Political			88	08	-18	03	-37	-20	. 33	27	44	18	30	38
deprivation (+) 3 Short-term				04	-20	-07	-42	-17	34	34	46	28	32	48
deprivation (+)° 4 Persisting							14			17	29	26	27	36
deprivation $(+)$ 5 Legitimacy $(-)$						25	48	02	-05	-15	-29	-23	-29	-37
6 Coercive force size ((±))					53	27	31	04	-23	-11	-01	-14
7 Coercive potential ((-))						41	-14	-37	-44	-39	-35	- 51
8 Institutionalization	(-	-)							-19	-40	İ		-26
9 Past strife levels (-	+)									41	24	16	30	30
10 Facilitation (+)											42	57	30	67
11 Magnitude of consp	nira	LCX										30	32	59]
11 Magmidae of comp	,,,,,,	ooy.										-
12 Magnitude of inter	nal	war		•									17	79
13 Magnitude of turm	oil													61
14 Total magnitude of	f st	rife

^a Product moment correlation coefficients, multiplied by 100. Underlined r's are significant, for n=114, at the .01 level. Correlations between 18 and 23, inclusive, are significant at the .05 level.

hence TMCS should be somewhat better explained. It is also possible that the categorization employed has less empirical merit than other work has suggested, i.e., that conspiracy, internal war, and turmoil are not sharply distinct forms of civil strife. To qualify this possibility, the correlation matrix in Table 1 suggests that the forms of strife are only weakly related in magnitude—the highest r among the three is .32—but it may still be that they are more strongly related in likelihood, and hence that the universe of strife is more homogenous than the typology suggests. The least-predicted class of strife—turmoil—might be better accounted for if turmoil events in the context of internal wars, e.g., riots and localized rebellions in such polities as the Congo and South Vietnam, were categorized as aspects of the internal wars in these countries rather than turmoil per se. The most likely substantive interpretation of the relatively low predictability of turmoil, however, is that much turmoil is a response to a variety of locally-incident deprivations and social conditions of a sort not represented in the indices used in this study.

The multiple regression equation for total magnitude of strife was used to calculate predicted magnitude of strife scores. Only ten polities have predicted scores that differ from ^b The proposed relationships between the independent variables, nos. 1 to 10, and the strife measures are shown in parentheses, the \pm for coercive force size signifying a proposed curvilinear relationship. Examination of the r's between the independent and dependent variables, in the box, shows that all are in the predicted direction with the anticipated exception of coercive force size, and that all but one are significant at the .05 level.

[•] Short-term deprivation is the sum of scores on the short-term economic and short-term political deprivation measures. The separate short-term deprivation measures were used in the regression analyses reported below; the summary measure was used in the causal inference analysis.

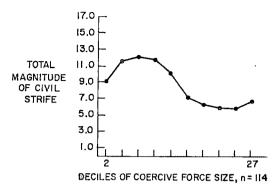

Fig. 2. Magnitude of civil strife and coercive force size, 114 polities.

their actual scores by more than one standard deviation (7.70 units of TMCS). These polities, and three others that have discrepancies approaching one standard deviation, are listed in Table 3.

In five of the thirteen polities—the Congo. Indonesia, Zambia, Rwanda, and Yementhere is probably systematic error from dataestimation procedures. All of these countries had intense but inadequately-reported civil violence for which only rough and quite possibly exaggerated estimates of deaths were available. When estimates of "wounded" were added to deaths estimates, using a ratio of about twelve to one based on better-reported but smallerscale events (see above), the result was almost certainly a gross inflation of actual casualties, and hence inflation of TMCS scores. The high actual TMCS score for Israel is the result of a questionable coding judgment about the extent and duration of extremist Orthodox religious conflict. More substantive questions are raised by some of the countries. Paraguay, Argentina, Ecuador, and Volta all could be argued to have had an unrealized potential for strife: in fact both Argentina and Ecuador experienced coups in the mid-1960's that according to their initiators were preventive or protective in nature, and early in 1966 the government of Volta succumbed to rioting followed by a coup. In the Dominican Republic, the Congo, and Rwanda the unexpectedly high levels of violence followed the collapse of rigid, authoritarian regimes; one can infer a time-lag effect from the deprivation incurred under the old regimes. These are special explanations rather than general ones however. The lack of apparent substantive similarities among the thirteen poorly-predicted polities suggests that the analysis has included measures of most if not all the general determinants of magnitudes of civil strife.

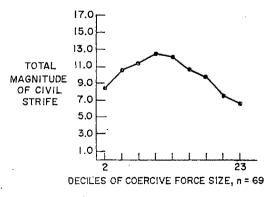

Fig. 3. Magnitude of civil strife and coercive force size, 69 low-conflict polities.

IV. A REVISED CAUSAL MODEL

One striking result of the regression analyses is that the partial correlations of several of the variables tend to disappear when the other variables are introduced (see Table 2). The short-term deprivation measures consistently decline in consequence, in most instances falling below the .05 level of significance. Institutionalization is in all analyses controlled for by

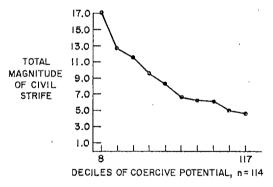

Fig. 4. Magnitude of civil strife and coercive potential.

Note: The vertical axes in Figures 2, 3 and 4 give the average magnitude of civil strife scores for deciles of countries with coercive forces of increasing size (Figures 2 and 3) and for deciles of countries with increasingly large coercive forces relative to their loyalty. The range of TMCS scores for the 114 polities is 0.0 to 48.7, their mean 9.0, and their standard deviation 7.7. Units on the horizontal axes represent numbers of cases, not proportional increases in force size/loyalty; the figures represent the scores of the extreme cases. Eleven rather than ten groupings of cases were used in computations for Figures 2 and 4; the curves of all three figures were smoothed by averaging successive pairs of decile scores.

TABLE 2. MULTIPLE LINEAR REGRES	SSION RESULTS:
SIMPLE CORRELATIONS, PARTIAL CORRELATIONS	, AND STANDARD WEIGHTS

Dependent	Independent Variables
Variables	Econ. Dep.	Pol. Dep.	Per. Dep.	Coerce	Instit.	Past CS	SS Facil.	Legit.	R, R2
Total Magnitude
of Strife:	44		36] -	33	30	-67	-37
Simple r's Partial r's	24	(09)	39	-51 -17	(07)	(04)	55	-37 -26	R = .806
Constant	- 3.11	(09)	09	-17	(07)	(04)	95		R ==.800
Weights	.177	.066	.271	140	.056	.024	.481	184	R= =.650
Magnitude of	•
Conspiracy:		1					į
Simple r's	34	44	29	-44	-35	24	42	-29
Partial r's	(10)	24	22	(-11)	(-09)	(03)	19	(-15)	R = .630
Constant	1.10
Weights	.094	.238	.194	120	088	.026	.181	135	$R^2 = .397$
Magnitude of Internal War:	Ì
Simple r's	31	18	26	-39	-23	16	57	-23
Partial r's	(14)	(-08)	22	-17	(11)	(-07)	48	(-07)	R = .648
Constant	- 3.66
Weights	.128	073	.186	179	. 102	066	.513	063	R= .420
Magnitude of
Turmoil:						Ì
Simple r's	25	30	27	-35	-26	30	30	-29
Partial r's	(07)	(08)	23	(-09)	(05)	21	(04)	-19	R = .533
Constant	1.37	`=-/			,,		` ′	1	_
Weights	.072	.085	.223	102	056	.205	.043	192	R2 = .284

a Simple correlations from Table 1 are repeated here to facilitate comparisons. Partial correlations in parentheses have standard (beta) weights that are significant at less than the .05 level, using the one-tailed T test with n =114. Since this analysis is concerned with what is, effectively, the entire universe of polities, all the correlations are in one sense "significant," but those in parentheses are of substantially less consequence than the others. The weights are reported to facilitate comparisons of the relative importance of the independent variables; because of the use of a variety of scaling and combination procedures for both independent and dependent variables, the weights do not permit direct interpretations, for example, of the effects of a one-unit decrease in intensity of economic discrimination on extent of turmoil.

the other variables. One or the other of the two facilitation variables declines to zero in each analysis, "past levels of strife" vanishing in three of the four. Coercive potential and legitimacy also decline in their relation to strife rather sharply. The only variable that is consistently unaffected by the introduction of the control variables specified by the model is persisting deprivation. A preliminary analysis of the behavior of first- and second-order partials suggests what causal interactions and sequences may be involved in these results. The causal path analysis is concerned principally with the sources of the total magnitude of strife, examining the causal sequences of the the specific forms of strife only when they appear to deviate from that of all strife.

A basic supposition for the evaluation of causal models is that, if X_1 is an indirect cause of X_3 whose effects are mediated by an intervening variable X_2 , then if X_2 's effects are controlled the resulting partial correlation between X_1 and X_3 should be approximately zero. Similarly, if several intervening variables are specified, controlling for all of them or for the last in a causal chain should, if the causal model is not to be falsified, result in a partial correlation not significantly different from zero.³⁵ about causal inference are well summarized in Blalock, Causal Inferences..., Chapters 2 and 3. A partial correlation coefficient can be most easily regarded as the correlation between X and Z after the portions of X and Z that are accounted for by Y are removed, or held constant. The results discussed below are based on the use of only one of a variety of related causal inference techniques and are open to further, more refined analysis and interpretation. For other applicable approaches see, for example, Hayward R. Alker, Jr., Mathematics and Politics (New York: Macmillan, 1965), Chapters 5 and 6.

The initial model of the causes of civil strife (Figure 1) postulated that all the mediating

variables intervened separately and simultaneously between deprivation and strife. The results indicate that this supposition is only partly correct: none of the mediating variables appear to affect the relationship between persisting deprivation and strife, i.e., there is a certain inevitability about the association between such deprivation and strife. Persisting deprivation is moreover equally potent as a source of conspiracy, internal war, and turmoil. With the partial and weak exception of institutionalization, no patterns of societal arrangements nor coercive potential that are included in the model have any consistent effect on its impact.

The effects of short-term deprivation on strife are substantially different—and, it should be added, uncorrelated with persisting deprivation. The intervening variables do tend to control for short-term deprivation's effects. To determine which one or ones exercise primary control, first-order partials were calculated for the several postulated intervening variables, with these results.

- The simple r between short-term deprivation and strife = .48³⁶
- 2) The partial r between short term able is: deprivation and strife is:

.46	Institutionalization
.45	Legitimacy
.42	Past strife
.36	Facilitation
.34	Coercive potential

Only the last two constitute a significant reduction, and moreover when they are combined, the second-order partial, $r_{ds} \cdot f_{cs} = .27$, i.e., coercive potential and facilitation are the only consequential intervening variables affecting the outcome of short-term deprivation. Short-term deprivation taken alone accounts for $(.48)^2 = .23$ of the magnitude of strife; controlling for coercive potential and facilitation reduces the proportion of strife directly accounted for to $(.27)^2 = .07$, a relatively small but still significant amount.

The same controlling effects of coercive potential and facilitation on short-term deprivation occur among the three generic forms of strife. It is worth noting that when the mediating variables are controlled, short-term economic deprivation still accounts directly for a portion of strife, internal war in particular, while political deprivation contributes significantly to conspiracy. These relationships may reflect contamination of the independent and dependent variables because of their partial temporal overlap. Some short-term economic deprivation in the early 1960's may be attributable to protracted internal wars, and successful conspirators may impose politically-depriving policies once they are in power. The relationship between short-term deprivation of both types and the magnitude of turmoil, however, is effectively mediated or controlled by characteristics of the society and its response to strife.

³⁶ To simplify evaluation of the effects of the control variables, the summary short-term deprivation variable was employed rather than its economic and political components separately.

The relationships among the mediating variables remain to be examined. Institutionalization has no significant relation to any measure of strife when the other variables are controlled, and in the case of magnitude of total strife and of internal war a weak positive relationship emerges, i.e., there is a slight though not statistically significant tendency for high institutionalization to be associated with higher levels of strife. A computation of partials between institutionalization and the other three mediating variables indicates that institutionalization has a preceding or causal relationship both to coercive potential and to the facilitation variables, as shown in the

TABLE 3. POLITIES WITH LEAST-PREDICTED TOTAL MAGNITUDE OF CIVIL STRIFE^a

			A-100.
Polity	Predicted TMCS	Actual TMCS ^b	Residual Congo-
Kinshasa	31.6	48.7	+17.1
Rwanda	12.7	28.2	+15.5
Yemen	9.4	23.6	+14.2
Indonesia	23.8	33.7	+9.9
Dominican
Republic	12.1	21.9	+ 9.8
Italy	3.1	12.3	+9.2
Belgium	2.4	10.5	+ 8.1
Zambia	8.1	15.5	+7.4
Israel	6.9	14.0	+ 7.1
Argentina	20.5	13.2	-7.3
Ecuador	18.6	10.1	-8.5
Volta	9.3	0.0	-9.3
Paraguay	17.2	5.0	-12.2

^a See text. A negative residual indicates that a polity had less strife than would be predicted on the basis of the characteristics it shares with other polities; a positive residual indicates more than predicted strife.

^b Corrected scores. See footnote 34.

revised model in Figure 3. Polities with high Mevels of institutionalization tend to have high coercive potential and to have few of the conditions that facilitate strife.

Legitimacy apparently has a causal relationship with strife independent either of deprivation or the other intervening variables. About half of the initial correlation between legitinacy and strife is accounted for by the apparent causal relation between legitimacy and coercive potential, i.e., legitmate regimes tend to have large and, most importantly, loyal nilitary and police establishments. Separately rom this, however, high legitimacy is signifieantly associated with low levels of strife, a inding consistent with the postulate that political legitimacy itself is a desired value, one whose absence constitutes a deprivation that ncites men to take violent action against their egimes. The relationship is relatively strongst for total magnitude of strife, less so for urmoil and conspiracy, and inconsequential or internal war.

Coercive potential appears in several repects to be a crucial variable in the revised ausal model: it is evidently attributable in art to both levels of institutionalization and f legitimacy, and has a major mediating effect n short-term deprivation. Nonetheless, when Il variables are controlled (see Table 2), the artial r between coercive potential and strife sharply reduced, in two instances below the)5 level of significance. This is in part due to he effects of legitimacy, which is causally nked to both strife and coercive potential.³⁷ he other major intervening variable is faciliution $(r_{cs} = -.52; r_{cs-f} = -.40, \text{ where } c =$ percive potential, s=strife, and f=social and ructural facilitation), i.e., whether or not -cilitative conditions exist for civil strife is artly dependent upon the coercive potential the regime, and thus indirectly dependent oon legitimacy as well. (The relationship is ridently between coercive potential on the Analysis of the correlation coefficients does of indicate definitively that legitimacy contriites to coercive potential rather than vice versa; or would it be impossible to argue, on the basis of e partial r's alone, that short-term deprivation a weak intervening variable between coercive of on the other. It is the plausibility of the eoretical arguments, in each case, that gives reciding force to the interpretation proposed. For comparable argument see Hugh Donald Forbes id Edward R. Tufte, "A Note of Caution in ausal Modelling," elsewhere in this issue of this

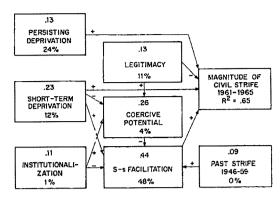

Fig. 5. Revised causal model of the determinants of magnitude of civil strife. The proportion at the top of each cell is the simple r² between the variable and civil strife, i.e. the proportion of strife accounted for by each variable separately. The percentages are the proportion of explained variance accounted for by each variable when the effects of all others are controlled, determined by squaring each partial r, summing the squares, and expressing each as a percentage of the sum. The explained variance, R², is .65.

one hand and the "Communist party status" and the "external support for initiators" components of facilitation on the other; coercive potential cannot have any consequential effects on "physical inaccessibility.")

This completes the revision of the causal model with the exception of the second component of facilitation, past strife levels. This variable has a consistently lower relationship with strife than other variables, with the exception of the turmoil analysis. Moreover its partial correlation is reduced to zero in these analyses, with the same exception, the sole significant controlling variable being social and structural facilitation. Among the causes of turmoil, however, social and structural facilitation is controlled for by several variablesprincipally past strife, coercive potential, and institutionalization-whereas past strife remains significant when other effects are partialled out. Both findings support the theoretical argument that suggested the "past strife" measure: a history of chronic strife apparently reflects, and contributes to, attitudes that directly facilitate future turmoil, and indirectly acts to facilitate general levels of strife.

The revised model, with proportional weights inserted, is sketched in Figure 5. The most proximate and potent variable is social and structural facilitation, which accounts for nearly half the explained variance. The deprivation variables account directly for over one-third the magnitude of strife, legitimacy and institutionalization for one-eighth. But these proportions refer only to direct effects, and in the case of both coercive potential and facilitation part of that direct effect, i.e., the illicit participation of the military in strife and the provision of foreign support for initiators, can be determined only from the characteristics of strife itself.38 The more remote causes of strife, namely deprivation, institutionalization, legitimacy, and prior strife, are the more fundamental and persisting ones. Some additional regression analyses provide some comparisons. Four of the independent variables relate to inferred states of mind: the two short-term deprivation measures, persisting deprivation, and legitimacy. The R based on these variables is .65, compared with .81 when the remaining four variables are added. The R based on the three deprivation variables alone is .60. These analyses show that all "states-of-mind" conditions contribute significantly to magnitude of strife, but that long-term deprivation has a partial controlling effect on political deprivation. The inference is that short-term political deprivation, as indexed in this study, is most likely to lead to strife if it summates with conditions of persisting deprivation.

We can also ask, and answer, the question, To what extent do the remaining four mediating conditions alone account for magnitude of strife? The variables coercive potential, facilitation, institutionalization, and past strife give a multiple R of .73, with almost all the explained variance accounted for by the first two variables. This result should provide aid and comfort to those concerned with "levels of analysis" problems: research of this sort can focus on aggregative, societal characteristicswhich the mediating variables represent—and the (inferred) psychological level can be ignored with relatively little loss of statistical explanatory power. Why these variables are strongly operative and others, like levels of development and type of political system, are relatively weak still needs answering; the answer may be to treat psychological variables as unoperationalized assumptions, or to replace them with variables whose rationale is strictly in terms of effects of social structure or processes on stability.

³⁸ Tanter has examined time-lag effects between a number of measures of foreign economic and military assistance for the regime and magnitude of civil violence in 1961-63 for Latin American nations and finds generally weak relationships. The only consequential positive relationship, an indirect one, is between levels of U.S. military assistance and subsequent strife. Raymond Tanter, "Toward A Theory of Conflict Behavior in Latin America." (Paper read to the International Political Science Association, Brussels, September, 1967).

A further problem is identification of the set of variables that provides the most parsimonious account of magnitude of civil strife As one approach to the answer, Figure ! implies that three variables can be eliminated coercive potential, institutionalization, and past strife, all of which have no consequentia direct effects on TMCS. The remaining five variables—the "state of mind" variables and facilitation-give an R of .80 and R2 of .64 results almost identical to those obtained whe all eight variables are included.39 Four of the five variables included contribute substantiall to the regression equation; as expected, th effects of short-term deprivation, politicadeprivation in particular, are partially controlled. One important observation is than social and structural facilitation, though it is substantially the strongest explanatory vari able,40 has here, as in Figure 5, only a moderat direct controlling effect on short-term depr. vation. One interpretation is that some of the effects of facilitation on TMCS are indeper dent of deprivation. Two of its three con ponent measures, Communist Party statu and external support for initiators, have is common a "tactical" element, i.e., one cainfer that underlying them are calculation about gains to be achieved through the er ployment of strife. This tactical element is no wholly independent of deprivation, ina much as three of the four correlations betwee facilitation and deprivation measures a significant, ranging from .17 to .34 (see Tab 1). The basic proposition of this study, the relative deprivation is a necessary precondition for strife, is not challenged by these obse vations. They do, however, suggest th tactical motives for civil strife are of sufficie: importance that they deserve separate ope ational attention comparable to the co ceptual attention given them by confli theorists.41

³⁹ In a reanalysis using corrected data (ε footnote 34), four variables—the combined shower deprivation measure, persisting deprivation legitimacy, and facilitation—given an R² of .62

⁴⁰ The partial r's for these five variables as economic deprivation, .27; political deprivation.13; persisting deprivation, .39; legitimacy, .3 facilitation, .61.

41 For example Kenneth E. Boulding, Confi and Defense: A General Theory (New York: H.» per and Row, 1962); Lewis Coser, The Function A number of additional causal inference analyses can be made which might lead to modifications of these conclusions, and of the causal model in Figure 5. Other articles will report the results of causal analyses of various subsets of the universe of polities, and of the causal sequences that can be identified for the several forms of strife.⁴²

V. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

Quantitative comparative research cannot flourish in a theoretical vacuum, even if it makes use of an armamentarium of techniques of causal inference. This article may not be proof of that assertion, but it should suggest the usefulness of beginning with a theoretical model based on previous substantive work. The theoretical model of the causes of civil strife employed here dictated the construction of a number of aggregate indicators of noteasily-operationalized variables for 114 polities. Eight summary indicators proved to account mointly for two-thirds the variance among nations in relative magnitudes of civil strife luring 1961-65 ($R^2 = .65$). Of greater theoetical consequence, the initial analysis of partial correlation coefficients makes possible a number of more precise statements about the causal interactions among the theoretical rariables.

The fundamental proposition that strife aries directly in magnitude with the inensity of relative deprivation is strongly upported; the three deprivation variables Ione provide an R of .60 ($R^2 = .36$), and when . fourth state-of-mind variable, legitimacy, is dded the R2 increases to .43. One criticism of is research, and of other cross-national budies of strife that make inferences about *ollective manifestations of psychological ariables, is that the results are not a "direct" est of the relevance of such variables, since ie indices of psychological variables are erived from aggregate data rather than being btained, for example, from cross-national sureys. It is unquestionably necessary to test all ypotheses, including psychological ones, in a ariety of ways, for example to determine whether the inferentially-deprived groups are those most likely to engage in strife, and to ask highly frustrated individuals whether they would, or have, taken part in collective violence. No scientific proposition is ever directly confirmed or disconfirmed, but some tests are less indirect than others. However, there is only one scientifically acceptable alternative to regarding the results reported here as strong indirect evidence for the psychological propositions relating deprivation and legitimacy to civil violence. That is to provide some reasonably parsimonious, alternative explanations (substantive or technical) of the fact that indices of inferred collective states of mind account for two-thirds of the explained variance (43 percent compared with 65 percent for all variables) in total magnitude of strife.

The effects of the intervening or mediating variables on the disposition to civil violence proved considerably more complex than those of the deprivation variables. Regime legitimacy apparently has no consequential mediating effect on deprivation but acts much as deprivation itself does: low levels of legitimacy, or by inference feelings of illegitimacy, apparently motivate men to collective violence. Levels of institutionalization, as reflected in high levels of unionization, party system stability, and large public sectors, have no direct mediating effect on deprivation; they are however important determinants of coercive potential and of social facilitation, variables which in turn crucially affect the outcome of short-term deprivation. Social and structural facilitation is the most potent of the intervening variables and appears to have some independent effect on magnitudes of strife. One inference is that the index of this variable reflects tactical decisions to engage in strife as a means of goal attainment. The measure of past levels of strife, 1946-1959, provides a partial test of what might be called the null hypotheses of human conflict, that the best predictor of future conflict is the level of past conflict.43 The measure has relatively weak relationships with magnitude of strife measures for 1961-65 and is an important mediating variable only among the causes of turmoil.

One striking finding is that nations' levels of persisting deprivation are consistently and directly related to their levels of strife. Depri-⁴³ The test is less than precise because the measures are not comparable; the past strife measure is based on an arbitrary weighting of counts of number of events, whereas the magnitude of strife measures reflect levels of participation, duration, and intensity.

Social Conflict (New York: The Free Press,)56); and Thomas C. Schelling, The Strategy of conflict (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University ress, 1960).

⁴² See Gurr, "Why Urban Disorder?" for a susal inference analysis of the sources of turmoil. ■he turmoil model differs principally in that past strife levels" has the primary mediating le that facilitation has in the TMCS model.

vation attributable to such conditions as discrimination, political separatism, economic dependence, and religious cleavages tends to contribute at a relatively moderate but constant rate to civil strife whatever may be done to encourage, deter, or divert it, short only of removing its underlying conditions. One other result has important implications for theory, and also for policy, if it is supported by further research. The relation between coercive force size (the relative size of military and internal security forces) and the magnitude of civil violence is distinctly curvilinear: as the level of resources devoted to coercive forces increases, the magnitude of violence also tends to increase up to a certain point, and only at relatively high levels of coercive force does strife tend to decline. Moreover at the outer limit the relationship again tends to change direction: countries with the very largest coercive forces tend to have more strife than those with somewhat smaller forces. When one eliminates from analysis the countries that have experienced protracted internal or external conflict, the basic curvilinear relationship remains. The adage that force solves nothing seems supported; in fact force may make things worse.

MEASURING SOCIAL AND POLITICAL REQUIREMENTS FOR SYSTEM STABILITY IN LATIN AMERICA*

ERNEST A. DUFF
Randolph-Macon Woman's College

JOHN F. McCAMANT University of Denver

This article considers the social and political factors that influence the stability/instability of the political system and attempts to measure some of these factors in the political systems of Latin America.

I. INTRODUCTION

The world-wide trends of urbanization. industrialization, and increased communiecations impel all political systems to change. whatever their level of development or the state of their institutions. A stable political system may be defined as one which can manage change within its structures. In a stable system, the pattern of interactions is not subject to large or radical change, and the political actors can depend upon certain prosedures and relationships, which adjust to the changing requirements of the society. Stapility results, on the one hand, from the views that the population have of their political system and, on the other hand, from the trength of the system itself. In a stable politcal system, the members of the system consider t to be both legitimate and effective, and the ystem, in turn, must have the power and bility to meet the demands and needs of the ociety as well as the flexibility to adjust to hanging circumstances. An unstable political vstem is simply the converse of the stable ystem. It has difficulties in managing change, nd when instability becomes extreme, it is ubject to profound and radical changes in its tructures. Instability is brought about by a opulation that considers the political system o be illegitimate and/or ineffective, and by olitical institutions which cannot meet the eeds and demands of the society and which ick the capacity to adjust.

Stability/instability is a condition of the olitical system at a particular time which lay manifest itself differently in different systems. Stability is manifested simply by the absence of those interesting events that are reported by the news media. Instability may be reflected in increased repression by the authorities, by violent or non-violent demonstrations, by runaway inflation, by coups d'etat, by civil war, or ultimately by social revolution. The nature of the manifestation depends on the political culture, the peculiar balance of political forces, the sequence of events, and the decisions of key actors. Violent social revolution is the most definite and unambiguous manifestation of system instability, but it is an event which has occurred in few countries. The precise meaning of other manifestations in terms of system instability is less clear. A coup d'etat will take place in Ecuador, with its tradition of military intervention, under less provocation than it will in Colombia. Instability produces pressures which in a democracy will be met by a policy that gives in to all demands and leads to inflation while in a dictatorship the demands are suppressed, coming to the surface only in the form of anomic demonstrations. On other occasions instability may remain latent or unexpressed. The criteria for and manifestations of political stability/instability in democratic and authoritarian systems are shown in Table 1.

The degree of system stability/instability changes continuously over time, but the manifestations of instability move discontinuously. That is to say the various manifestations will erupt for a period and then die down. A country may be apparently quiet when in fact it is ripe for revolution. Nevertheless a society cannot bear a state of violence for very long before it exhausts itself and calms down—even though it may remain basically unstable because the dissatisfactions and incapacities remain. It is important to know whether a country has manifested its instability, whether it contains more instability than it has manifested, or whether it is, in fact,

Two examples from recent Latin American history demonstrate the value of an estimation of the basic stability/instability present in a political system. The Dominican Republic

^{*} This article is a by-product of cooperation of ne authors in the Rockefeller Foundation Uniersity Development Program at the Universidad et Valle, Cali, Colombia in 1966-1967.

¹ Seymour Martin Lipset, Political Man (New ork: Doubleday and Co., 1959), Chapter 3.

TABLE 1. CRITERIA FOR AND MANIFESTATIONS OF SYSTEM STABILITY/INSTABILITY

Stable
Criteria	Manifestations
Welfare > Social Mobilization. High rate of economic growth. Equal income distribution. High political capability. Broad-based institutionalized political parties.	Democracy Continue as democracy.	Dictatorship No increase in coercion, with option available for evolution to democratic system
	Unstable
Criteria	Manifes	stations
Welfare < Social Mobilization. Low rate of economic growth. Unequal income distribution. Low political capability. Narrow personalistic political parties.	Democracy Inflation. Personnel changes. Increasing support of extremist solutions. Decentralized violence. Military intervention. Guerrilla warfare. Social Revolution.	Dictatorship Inflation. Increase in level of coercion. Decentralized violence. Coup d'etat. Guerrilla warfare. Social Revolution.

manifested little instability for thirty years under the dictatorship of Rafael Trujillo. His assassination led to a succession crisis because the procedures and institutions for promoting new leadership were undeveloped. In April, 1965, after a number of coups, fighting broke out between rival military factions. Under such chaotic conditions a small organized group could easily take control and make a social revolution if the conditions were ripe for revolution. The United States intervened to prevent such a possibility on the assumption that a social revolution adverse to the national interests of the United States was a definite possiblity. The evidence developed in this article indicates that the conditions of stability/instability in the Dominican Republic in 1965 were entirely different than they were in Cuba in 1958 and there was little danger that the small conflict would escalate.

Panama underwent a succession crisis in 1968 due to peculiar personality circumstances, and at one time commentators were making some dire predictions about the future course of events in that country. In the end, Panama settled its crisis with little violence which never went out of control. Similar circumstances in other countries might have brought an explosion. The seriousness of these crises depends upon the instability present in the system, and knowledge of this condition will allow one to predict the probable seriousness of future manifestations and to understand past manifestations.

An analysis of political stability/instability requires two types of data: the attitudes of the population and the capabilities of the political system. The capabilities of the political systemcan be estimated from the public information about the actions of the system. The attitudes of the population present a more difficult problem. Both the theory and the empirica data are lacking. When the theory is developed it will still be a Herculean task to carry ou the empirical investigation in a large number o' countries.2 However, we can assume that the attitudes result from real social condition that we do have knowledge of, and by mea suring these conditions we can have a rough estimate of these attitudes. We have nsophisticated psychological theory but wirely on the simple proposition that if peopl want something and cannot obtain it, they become dissatisfied.3

² In addition to the work involved, politicaresistance may prevent survey work. See Irvin L. Horowitz, "The Life and Death of Projec Camelot," and Kalman H. Silvert, "America Academic Ethics and Social Research Abroad, both reprinted in U.S. Congress, House of Representatives, 89th Cong. 2nd Sess., International Education: Past, Present, Problems, and Prospective (Washington: GPO, 1967).

The demands that the population places on its political system are of two types: political-political for a form of political system that fits their ideas of authority and allows them the type and amount of participation desired, and political-economic for goods and services to be delivered by the political system and more general welfare conditions for which they hold the political system responsible.

The demands for a legitimate form of government and participation are most difficult to ascertain. Although democratic forms have been considered legitimate in Latin America for more than a century and a half by many intellectual leaders, it is not altogether certain that the uneducated majorities really desired these forms. Furthermore, the liberal democratic model has received challenges from both the left and the right. In no cases are the desires uniform within a country and the divisions are as important as the majority desires. The correspondence between demands and the forms of the political system is a question that we will not be able to explore empirically in the latter part of this article because our ignorance is still too great on these matters. The later analysis will therefore focus on more readily quantifiable -aspects.

Information on economic conditions, although still inexact and incomplete, is more readily available than information on political conditions. Both political and economic factors are important in determining system stability, but in Latin America the economic problems are futher from being resolved than are the political, and therefore are more crucial in the stability/instability equation. The purely poitical factors are not ignored completely, lowever, as they are an important part of political capabilities, which will be discussed. Nevertheless, we admit to a materialistic bias n this essay, which is due to two causes: our belief that economic factors are most important a Latin America today, and the absence of aformation on political-political demands.

A developed economic system manages to atisfy the material demands of the population hereby lessening the number and intensity of lemands directed against the political system. Development also allows the political system to obtain additional resources from the society to enable it to respond to demands. As the political system meets more of the material demands placed upon it, it develops supports within the society. The logic of this simple proposition is such that one would expect not only a strong correlation between the level of economic development and system stability, but a perfect correlation. This is not, however, the case in developing systems.4 In Latin America, for example, Cuba, Argentina, and Venezuela are among the leaders in economic development, but both their history of democratic government and political stability leave much to be desired. The reason for this imperfect correlation is that the economic development thesis can only be applied ceteris paribus.

³ Our proposition finds considerable justification in the discussion of Ted Gurr in "Psychologial Factors in Civil Violence," World Politics, 20 Jan., 1968), 245–278. See also his article in the resent issue of this REVIEW.

The most important reason why economic development sometimes fails to produce political stability is that while the economy is making it possible for the political and economic systems to satisfy the demands of the population, it is also raising the level of expectations. As men pass from the traditional society they come widely to believe that the external world is sytematically capable of productive manipulation.5 Not only do they learn to control their material environment, but they also learn to control their social and political environment. With economic growth and the passing of the traditional society both the objective needs and the population's consciousness of these needs increase. The process that brings this increase in the level of political demands is called social mobilization.6 Both the increase in societal welfare and in social mobilization move in the same direction, but they often increase at different rates. It is important to measure them separately and to attempt to measure the relative development of each. The higher the level of societal welfare the better the prospects for political stability, while the higher the level of social mobilization (and consequently of

⁴ The correlation is much better on a world-wide basis. See Lipset, op. cit., Chapter 2; Bruce M. Russett, Trends in World Politics (New York: Macmillan Co., 1965), Chapter 8; and Gabriel Almond and James C. Coleman, Politics of the Developing Areas (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1959).

⁶ Walt W. Rostow, The Stages of Economic Growth (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1960), pp. 4-6.

⁶ Karl W. Deutsch, "Social Mobilization and Political Development," this Review, 55 (Sept., 1961), 493-514. demands upon the political system), the poorer the prospects for political stability. Therefore, one of the probabilistic determinants of political stability within a political system will be the disparity between the level of societal welfare and social mobilization.

Social mobilization continues at a steady pace while the rate of growth of societal welfare fluctuates and may even be negative. Thus a sustained and substantial rate of economic growth is necessary in order to keep societal welfare ahead of social mobilization. The economic growth rate also has some directly political connotations. Whether or not a political system is responsible for economic growth, people in the post-World War II world have decided that lack of economic growth is the fault of the government. Stagnation or recession thus increases the demands on the government but does not increase the resources available to meet those demands. On the other hand, a dynamic economy leads to higher employment, greater economic mobility, new opportunities for the ambitious within the economic system and lower demands on the political system. Moreover, since government revenues expand roughly in proportion to economic growth, the government in a growing economy has increasing resources to perform services and make investments.

A relatively equal distribution of income also tends to promote political stability. The poor provide the potential for extraordinary political instability. As they have no commitments to any of the society's institutions, they make excellent potential followers for those who would overthrow the system. The size of this "culture of poverty," then, is an indication of the stability/instability of the system. Disparity of income among those who more fully participate in the society may also generate dissatisfaction with the performance of the political system.

The relative difference of a society's wealth and political mobilization, the distribution of the wealth, and the rate of change in the economy establish the environmental limits within which the political system operates. Nevertheless, the political system has its own sphere of autonomy and can respond to the environment in a variety of ways. The ways in which it reacts depend upon its political capabilities, while at the same time an effective party system and capable leadership are also important in organizing demands, eliciting supports, and generating loyalty to the system. Each of these factors results from a long history of political interaction and requires a concentrated effort of many years to change.

7 Oscar Lewis, "The Culture of Poverty," Scientific American, 215 (Oct., 1966), 19-26. The "culture of poverty," in the terms of our discussion, is the culture belonging to the uprooted and poor population in a socially mobilized society. The participants in this culture, while themselves only partially mobilized, can be swept quickly into political movements that appeal to their objective and psychological needs.

The taxing power of the government is a key factor in measuring system stability. It indicates, on one hand, the level of material support being received by the political systems, while on the other hand, it indicates the extent of resources available to the system for the satisfaction of demands. Today the developing countries can also turn to the international environment for material resources in the form of public loans and grants. A system that can extract at a high level from both the domestic and international environments can buy support with benefits and jobs, give more general services to the population, and maintain police and military forces which give credence to its authority.9

The way in which a government distributes its services is also important. A government that spends a large proportion of its budget oneducation, health, and housing for the general population develops long-range support of the society while investing in human resources which is probably the best way to promote sustained economic development.10 The extractive and distributive capabilities of the political systems must, therefore, also be included in any measurement of system stability The regulative, symbolic, and responsive capabilities of a political system are also im portant, but they are more difficult to measure In the analysis of Latin American politics. systems that follows, we assume that the ex tractive and distributive capabilities reflec the general range of the total capability of th political systems.

The most important political structur

⁸ Gabriel Almond, "A Developmental Approac to Political Systems," World Politics, 18 (Jan 1965), 183-214.

⁹ Russett, op. cit., pp. 121-135.

¹⁰ Theodore W. Schultz, The Economic Value of Education (New York: Columbia Universit Press, 1963). A discussion of the importance of education in the economic development of Certral America is presented in John F. McCaman Development Assistance in Central America (New York: Praeger, 1968), Chapter 7.

outside of the formal institutions of government that may influence the level of system stability is the political party. In the developing countries many political parties are little more than the campaign organization of presidential aspirants. Even when the leader has great popular appeal, it cannot be said that such a political party has a stabilizing effect. To produce this effect, a political party must be institutionalized—that is, have a life independent of its leader-and must be capable of integrating different sectors of the population.11 Although it is most difficult to quantify these characteristics, they are as real as any of the measurable items discussed earlier. Samuel P. Huntington suggests the following criteria to test the extent of institutionalization of an organization: adaptability, complexity, autonomy, and coherency.12 Additionally, parties which serve as instruments of national integration can be identified through a study of their ideology and organization, as well as an examination of their past -record in this area.

The institutionalized party of national integration serves a number of functions important to the stability of the system. The party organizes and reinforces the commitment of individuals to the political process. The leaders soon develop a vested interest in ■the system through the perquisites that they obtain from the system as representatives of a moditical party. In turn, the leaders devote considerable energy and time to maintain a ollowing, and in so doing develop satisfying symbols and provide opportunities for expression of demands and complaints. An institutionalized party also recruits membership and searches for competent and attractive eadership. At the same time the institutionalzed party is continuously developing and lefining policy alternatives that will be enlorsed by its following and attract new supporters. In an operative democratic system, the commitment to the party overflows into a commitment to the system in which the party ias a stake. In a non-democratic system the ffect holds only for the party or parties that hare the power of the government.

Thus, far, the relationship of political tability/instability to the balance between ocietal welfare and social mobilization, income distribution, economic growth, system capabilities and political organization has been presented with no attempt to implement the theory. It should be possible, however, to utilize available social, political, and economic indicators to predict, on a comparative basis, the prospects for political stability of a group of political systems. In order to demonstrate the theory, while at the same time demonstrating the facility and practicability of this type of political measurement we propose to measure the relative prospects for political stability of nineteen Latin American political systems. Although a precise measure of the Cuban situation is not possible because of missing data, the relative stability of the political system in 1958 is also considered.

II. METHODOLOGY

No attempt has been made to find an absolute value of probability of system stability. Rather, the analysis is limited to measuring the relationship of the Latin American political systems with each other. In order to compare and combine the position of each country within the different criteria, it is necessary to establish a common index or scale for the various statistics used. Then it is necessary to make some decisions as to the importance of each factor within each combined index and in the final score of relative system stability.

The information available allows us to do more than simply establish the rank of each country within each factor; it allows us to establish the interval between countries. One method of putting all the statistics on a common scale would be to give the highest statistic within each factor a score of one hundred, the lowest zero, and give each other 13 It is usual at this point to make an apology for Latin American statistics. Without a doubt the statistics used in this essay are not entirely reliable, but they have been gathered through standardized procedures developed by the Organization of American States and the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and other United Nation Agencies. The emphasis on planning since 1960 has given considerable impulse to the improvement of the statistical procedures. Therefore we think that whatever inaccuracies exist are not of such magnitude as to discredit their use. For a fuller discussion of the use of aggregate data see, Ronald V. McGranahan, "Comparative Social Research in the United Nations," in Richard L. Merritt and Stein Rokkan (eds.), Comparing Nations (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1966).

¹¹ Joseph LaPalombara and Myron Weiner, ² olitical Parties and Political Development (Prince-on: Princeton University Press, 1966).

¹² Samuel P. Huntington, "Political Development and Political Decay," World Politics, 18 April, 1965), 386-430.

statistic the score of its relative position between one hundred and zero. The principle weakness of this method is that the length of the interval between country scores is completely determined by the two extremes. If one country were extremely low in one factor. all the other countries would have a high score, whereas, if one country were extremely high, it would depress the score of all the others. If there were both high and low scores, the interval between the other would be small, and and the extreme positions would not be reflected in the score because no score could surpass one hundred or be less than zero. Therefore, we decided to use a more complicated mathematical method that would avoid these distortions. On each factor, the Latin American mean and the average variation measured in standard deviation were found, and the score given to each country was its distance, either negative or positive, from the mean measured in number of standard deviations.14

After the statistics in each factor were translated into the common index of standard deviations from the Latin American mean, it was still necessary to determine the importance of each factor in the combined indexes and in the final score of sytem stability. No mathematical solution would help solve this methodological problem. 15 It was necessary to make more or less arbitrary decisions based on our judgment. In the combined indexes of social mobilization and societal welfare, the decisions were not overly crucial as all the factors were highly correlated with each other, and the weight of each or even the exclusion of one would not make a great deal of difference. In combining the various indexes into the final score, the decisions were all important because

¹⁴ The population standard deviation was used in preference to the sample standard deviation. The formula for the mean is:

$$M = \Sigma \times i/N$$

The formula for the standard deviation is:

$$s\sqrt{=\Sigma(Xi-M)^2/N}$$

¹⁵ A multiple regression analysis could be made if there were available system stability scores arrived at independently of the analysis here. Unfortunately none are available, and even if a multiple regression were possible it would not identify the real causal relationships. At this point, one can only judge whether the correct weight has been given the factors by whether the final score fits the historical qualitative data on Latin American politics.

the score of a country differed greatly from one criterion to the next. For instance, Uruguay has a better-than-average record on the collection of taxes but it has had a very poor economic growth record in recent years. How much is domestic extractive capability worth relevant to economic growth in the determination of system stability? The authors decided that the political capabilities should be given equal weight to the environment scores. The societal welfare minus social mobilization score was given twice the weight of the score on recent economic growth. The formula for the final score is:

System Stability =
$$\frac{4x_1 + 2x_2 + 3x_3 + 3x_4}{12}$$ where: System Stability is given as an average number of standard deviations from the Latin American mean;

- x₁ is societal welfare minus social mobilization:
- x2 is recent economic growth;
- x₃ is extractive capability measured in per cent of GDP collected in taxes plus foreign grants and loans measured in percentage of GDP;
- x₄ is distributive capability measured by percentage of GDP spent on public education.

Two of the factors discussed in the previous section, income distribution and institutionalized parties, could not be given quantitative scores, and therefore could not be included in the final system stability score. These factors however, are discussed and used in the political system profiles.

III. APPLICATION TO LATIN AMERICA

Effects of Environment on the Political System
The authors selected as indexes for the level of societal welfare within the nineteen societies. The following: gross domestic product percapita for 1965, a combined index representing the level of health services, a combined index representing the level of educational opportunities, and a combined index representing the level of nutrition for the society. Per capit GDP was chosen and given a weight of fifty per cent on the combined welfare scale because it, more than any other single figure, representate level of goods and services available for distribution within a society. 16

In view of some of the limitations in translating GDP measured in respective nations currencies into a common international star

¹⁶ Russett, op. cit., pp. 112-114.

dard and because the GDP does not measure the distribution of the goods and services throughout a society, the welfare index also includes components which measure the extent to which the society fulfills some more basic human needs. First, the level of health services has been measured by medical doctors per 10,000 inhabitants and hospital beds per 1,000 inhabitants. Second, the level of educational opportunities and services was measured by the percentage of population fifteen years and older classified as literate and the percentage of population between the ages of thirteen and nineteen enrolled in secondary schools. The secondary school figure was chosen because of its close relation with figures for university education and because primary education figures are, in many cases, distorted by inclusion of adult education, vocational education, and the like. The final modifier of the GDP scale is the nutrition index, composed of daily calorie intake per capita and average daily protein intake per capita. Each of these non-GDP indexes was given a weight of sixteen and two-thirds of the total welfare index, thus making their combined weight equal to that of the GDP index. The results of the societal welfare measurement are shown in Table 2. After the indexes were combined, the result was again converted to the standard deviation scale.

The social mobilization index was constructed in a similar manner, utilizing data considered to be sound, converting this data to a standard deviation scale, and then combining the various indexes into one. The combined index is composed of three factors: Exposure to mass media (itself composed of three fac-

TABLE 2. SOCIETAL WELFARE

Country	Gross domestic product per capita (U. S. $)	Per cent of Literacy ^a	Per cent of Popu- lation aged 13-18 in school	Daily calories per capita	Daily proteins per capita (grams)	Doctors per 10,000 persons	Hospital beds per 10,000 persons	score in
Argentina	$645	91.4	40	2,660	77.2	14.6	6.4	1.95
Uruguay	560	90.3	39	2,970	94.5	11.9	6.7	1.85
Venezuela	835	79.3	28	2,360	58.2	8.1	3.2	1.68
Chile	410	83.6	33	2,370	79.4	7.3	4.5	.70
Panama	495	80.3	33	2,270	59.3	5.0	3.8	.63
Mexico	435	72.1	17	2,640	73.4	6.9	2.2	.44
Costa Rica	405	84.0	$^{\cdot}25$	2,460	53.8	4.7	4.5	.39
Brazil	220	61.5	22	2,850	68.6	4.5	3.0	20
Paraguay	205	77.0	15	2,580	66.0	5.2	2.2	35
Nicaragua	305	49.7	12	2,325	62.0	3.8	2.2	37
Dominican
Republic	300	60.0	11	2.040	49.7	5.2	2.9	 , 43
Colombia	265	62.3	22	2,130	48.6	4.0	2.7	 . 46
Peru	285	60.2	23	2,240	57.1	4.4	2.4	- . 53
Guatemala	315	38.0	9	2,160	58.0	1.5	2.6	55
El Salvador	260	44.0	16	2,120	58.0	2.7	2.3	66
Ecuador	215	67.5	15	1,890	48.5	2.7	2.3	78
Honduras	215	44.6	7	2,070	53.0	1.6	2.0	93
Bolivia	145	37.0	18	1,810	47.3	3.0	2.4	-1.12
Haiti	63	20.0	5	1,875		0.7	0.6	-1.78
Mean ≺Standard	346	63.9	21	2,306	61.8	5.2	3.1
Deviation	186	19.7	10	321	12.3	3.1	1.3

Sources:

Inter-American Development Bank. Socio-Economic Progress in Latin America. Social Progress Trust Fund: Sixth Annual Report, 1966. Washington, D. C., 1967. Calorie intake figures for Haiti and Nicaragua: Progreso '67. Vision, Incorporated. New York, 1967.

^a Year varies from 1960 to 1965, depending on year of latest census.

tors), membership in labor unions as a percentage of economically active population, and percentage of population living in urban areas. The combined mass media index registers the number of daily newspapers delivered per 1,000 inhabitants, radio receivers per 1,000 inhabitants, and television receivers per 1,000 inhabitants. Our aim was to develop separate indexes of welfare and social mobilization and we restricted the two indexes as far as possible to criteria that were distinct. Even so the correlation coefficient between the two indexes is

.92. Table 3 shows the data and the index of social mobilization.

A measurement of the difference between the society's position on the two indexes produces the basic measurement of the effects in terms of prospective political stability. The results of this measurement are shown in Figure 1. Costa Rica stands alone with by far the greatest positive differential, and therefore a greater probability of political stability. In descending order the countries with a positive measure are: Panama, Paraguay, Guatemala,

TABLE 3. SOCIAL MOBILIZATION

Country	Newspapers delivered per 1,000 persons	Radio receivers per 1,000 persons	T.V. receivers per 1,000 persons	% Economically active population in labor unions	% Urbani- zation	Social Mobilization score in standard deviations
Venezuela	78ª	196	70	67°	67	2.07
Uruguay	314	309	65	21°	73	1.94
Argentina	146a	282	68	34	72	1.82
Chile	1184	187	7	21	68	.81
Mexico	112	184	33	20	55	.61
Peru	47	169	15	19°	47	.10
Panama	75ª	198	41	5	47	.07
Brazil	54	95	29	11	50	02
Colombia	52	183	17	7°	53	10
El Salvador	47 ^b	140	11	5⁰	39	45
Bolivia	26	137	0	14°	35	49
Costa Rica	77a	89	25	7	34	50
Ecuador	52	104	2	7°	38	55
Nicaragua Dominican	4 9ª	63	6	4 º	42	56
Republic	27	40	6	23	30	57
Guatemala	31	54	12	1	34	85
Paraguay	12	86	0	40	33	87
Honduras	19ª	58	š	40	26	-1.09
Haiti	6	13	1	õ	16	-1.52
Mean Standard	71	131	22	14	45
deviation	66	80	22	20	16

Sources:

- 1. Newspapers delivered, radio receivers, and TV receivers. United Nations, Economic Commission for Latin America, Statistical Bulletin for Latin America, New York: September, 1966.
- 2. Labor union membership: Latin American Center, University of California at Los Angeles Statistical Abstract of Latin America: 1964. Los Angeles: 1965.
- 3. Urbanization: Inter-American Development Bank. Socio-Economic Progress in Latin America Washington, D. C.: 1967.
- · Partial data.
- ^b Provisional data.
- Economically active population estimated for 1960 from figure reported at latest census on assumption that economically active population changed in proportion to change in total population.

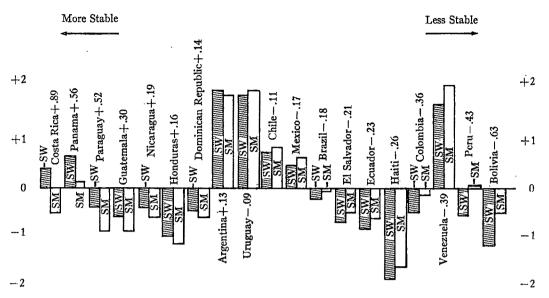

Fig. 1. Societal welfare-social mobilization differential

Nicaragua, Honduras, Dominican Republic, and Argentina. Countries where social mobilization is relatively higher than societal welfare and hence have a negative measure are: Uruguay, Chile, Mexico, Brazil, El Salvador, Haiti, Ecuador, Colombia, Venezuela, Peru, and Bolivia. The differentials were converted into a standard deviation scale to be combined with the other criteria.

A necessary modification of environmental effects was introduced through the construction of an index of economic growth over the last ten years. In the index the growth during the period 1961-1966 was given twice the weight of the period 1955-1960 as the more recent period will produce greater results in terms of dissatisfaction or satisfaction with the performance of the society, increase the ability of the government to respond to demands and ultimately ameliorate the destabilizing effects of any disequilibrium between social mobilization and societal welfare. The results of the comparison of rates of recent economic growth are shown in Table 4. Panama, Mexico, Chile, El Salvador, Peru and Nicaragua, according to the weighted average, have grown at more than the 2.5 per cent per capita called for by the Alliance for Progress. Brazil, Venezuela, Guatemala, Costa Rica and Bolivia have all achieved a higher than 2.0 per cent growth rate, similarly weighted. At the other extreme, Paraguay has had zero per capita growth, and Uruguay and Haiti have had negative rates.

Unfortunately, the data on income distribution are not sufficiently complete to allow us to include them in the numerical indexes on system stability. The information available is presented here and will be used in the stability profiles given in the conclusion, as omission of the factor entirely would leave a valuable piece of information unexploited. The best measure of income distribution is the percentage of persons, ordered in income groups, and this information has been estimated for six countries.

Table 5 presents the data on the six countries in order of their relative equality of income distribution. The range of inequality is great. According to the data, Ecuador has the most equitable distribution of income, with the richest five-per cent of the population receiving only ten times as much income, on the average, as the lowest fifty per cent. Argentina, Chile, and Colombia have almost identical distribution profiles. Mexico and Venezuela appear to have very inequitable income distributions.

Characteristics of the Political System. "The extractive capability of a political system refers to the range of system performance in drawing material and human resources from the domestic and international environment." Our interest is in capability which means potential as well as actual performance. The potential for drawing human resources from the environment is essentially untested because the Latin American states have not been

¹⁷ Gabriel Almond and Bingham Powell, Comparative Politics: A Developmental Approach (New York: Little, Brown and Co., 1966), p. 195.

TABLE 4. ECONOMIC GROWTH

Country	Annual increase in per cap- ita GDP: 1955-1960 (%)	Annual increase in per capita GDP: 1961– 1966 (%) (double weight)	Economic growth score in standard deviations
Panama	1.7	4.8	1.21
Mexico	3.0	2.8	.72
Chile	1.9	3.1	.63
El Salvador	1.3	3.4	.63
Peru	2.1	3.0	.63
Nicaragua	-1.2	4.4	.54
Brazil	2.8	2.2^{a}	.47
Venezuela	2.8	2.0	.40
Guatemala	2.4	2.2	.39
Costa Rica	1.5	2.6	.38
Bolivia	-2.5	4.4	.31
Honduras	1.4	1.8	.07
Ecuador	1.4	1.6	.00
Argentina	0.9	1.6	- .09
Colombia	1.2	1.2	→ .18
Dominican
Republic	-0.4	0.7	→ .65
Paraguay	-0.3	0.2	- .79
Uruguay	-1.3	-0.3	-1.17
Haiti	0.6^{b}	-7.7	-3.50

Sources:

- 1955-1960 economic growth. Naciones Unidas. Comision Economica para America Latina. La Economia de America Latina en 1965.
- 1961-1966 economic growth. Inter-American Development Bank. Socio-Economic Progress in Latin America. Washington, D. C.: 1968
- * 1960-1965 growth rate from Naciones Unidas, Estudio Economico de America Latina: 1965.
- ^b Data not available. Estimate of Caribbean area growth from Economic Comission for Latin America, Economic Development of Latin America in the Post-War Period.

involved in any situation where general mobilization was required to defend the state. On the other hand, each government has pushed close to its political limits in the extraction of material resources from the domestic environment. Present performance in taxation, then, is a good estimate of the domestic extractive capability. The same is true concerning the international extractive capability; the present level of economic cooperation is as high as the present international political system will support.

Precise data on tax revenues is obtainable only for the central governments, but that figure considerably distorts the total because the Latin American countries vary greatly in the taxation powers each leaves to the regional and municipal governments. Therefore, rougher estimates of total tax revenue are better reflections of extractive capability than are more exact reports of central government tax revenue. Fortunately, the Inter American Development Bank's report, Socio-Economic Progress in Latin America, makes estimates or provides the information from which estimates can be made in order to obtain the percentage of total revenue in gross domestic product for 1966. Brazil with its strong state governments has the largest percentage of tax revenue outside of the central government. Non-central government entities in Ecuador possess thirty per cent of that country's domestic extractive capability. Regional and local governments in Argentina and Colombia also have sizeable taxation powers. The federal system in Mexico, on the other hand, leaves only ten per cent of the extractive capability to other than the central government.

TABLE 5. DISTRIBUTION OF INCOME

Country	Per cent of Income to Population Sectors			Ratio of Upper Range Income to Lower
	50%	45%	5%	Range Income
Ecuador	24	51	25	10.0
Argentina	20	49	31	15.5
Chile	16	59	25	15.6
Colombia	18	53	29	16.0
Mexico	16	47	37	23.0
Venezuela	11	59	30	27.0

Sources:

- Per cent of national income received by population sectors; Venezuela, Ecuador, Chile, Mexico. United Nations, The Economic Development of Latin America in the Post-War Period, New York, 1964.
- Per cent of income received by population sectors; Argentina. Naciones Unidas, Boletin Economico de America Latina. Vol. XI, No. 1, April, 1966. New York.
- 3. Per cent of income received by population sectors; Colombia. Joint Tax Program of the Organization of American States and the Inter-American Development Bank. Fiscal Survey of Colombia. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1965.

The results of the statistics on taxation as a percentage of gross domestic product found in Table 6 show a group of countries—Chile, Brazil, Ecuador, Dominican Republic, and Uruguay with a relatively high domestic extractive capability from 20.2 per cent to 14.0 per cent, and then break to Venezuela at 12.5 per cent. The second group of countries is spaced evenly down to Guatemala which manages to extract only 8.3 per cent of the production of the country in taxes. It is difficult to find any societal conditions that can explain

TABLE 6. GOVERNMENT EXTRACTIVE CAPABILITY

Country	Total taxes col- lected by all govern- ment lev- els 1966, as % GDP	Average annual grants and loans from U.S. and International Agencies 1962–1966 as % of 1965 GDP	and inter- national extractive	in
Chile	20.2ª	5.3	25.5	2.44
Dominican		5.5	-5.5
Republic	$14.5^{ m b}$	6.1	20.6	1.27
Ecuador	15.8e	4.2	20.0	1.12
Brazil	17.4 ^d	2.2	19.6	1.02
Bolivia	8.8ª	10.7	19.5	1.00
Costa Rica	11.2°	4.9	16.1	.19
Nicaragua	11.5°	4.6	16.1	. 19
Panama	11.4ª	4.3	15.7	.10
Uruguay	14.0^{a}	1.5	15.5	.05
Peru	12.3ª	3.0	15.3	.00
Paraguay	9.3	5.3	14.6	17
Venezuela	12.5^{a}	1.3	13.8	36
Colombia	10.0°	3.7	13.7	38
El Salvador	9.8^{a}	3.5	13.3	48
Honduras	9.9^{a}	3.2	13.1	53
Argentina	11.0 ^f	0.7	11.7	86
Mexico	8.9°	1.7	10.6	-1.12
Guatemala	8.3^{c}	1.1	9.4	-1.41
Haiti	5.9ª	1.4	7.3	-1.91

Sources:

- Domestic extractive capability. Inter-American Development Bank. Socio-Economic Progress in Latin America. Washington, 1968.
- International extractive capability. U. S. Agency for International Development. Statistics and Reports Division.
 U. S. Overseas Loans and Grants and Assistance from International Organizations. Washington, 1967.
- a Central government tax revenue only. Other tax revenue known to be small.
- ^b 1966 central government revenue plus 2.1 per cent estimated as municipal taxes.
- ^c Reported total revenue for 1965 with change in central government revenue in 1966.
 - ^d Total government revenue for 1964.
- ^e Central government revenue increased by percentage of local and departmental taxes reported for 1960 in Joint Tax Program of the Organization of American States and the Inter-American Development Bank. Fiscal Survey of Colombia. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1965.
- f Estimated from 1966 central government tax revenue with adjustment for proportion of other tax revenue reported for 1964.

the distribution. The top of the list includes both rich and poor countries, countries with local autonomy, Brazil and Ecuador, and countries highly centralized. Chile. Uruguay, and the Dominican Republic. The distribution seems to reflect purely political phenomena: certain countries have developed a higher degree of governmental authority than have others. Brazil and Ecuador have used the authority of state and local governments to increase the authority of the whole political system. Chile and Uruguay have developed their authority through a long tradition of responding to the wishes and needs of their citizens. The Dominican Republic has a record of strong authoritarian government backed by a unified military.

At the low end of the range are the two extremely poor countries, Haiti and Bolivia, which undoubtedly find economic as well as political limits to their taxation power because such a large proportion of their population is near subsistence level. Honduras, Paraguay, and Guatemala are less poor, but are low in their level of political mobilization. However, Guatemala holds on to its low position by virtue of a totally disorganized and divided body politic, which is the result of partial revolution and counter revolution. The position of Mexico seems inexplicable on the basis of its reputation.

The Latin American nations have found another source of material resources in the last fifteen years which has significantly altered their total extractive capability. Nowhere is this better exemplified than in Bolivia, where the government extracts only 8.8 per cent of its gross domestic product in taxes, but extracts from the international environment a sum equivalent to 10.7 per cent of its gross domestic product. The data from which this international extractive capability is calculated is the annual average loans and grants from public United States and international economic and military assistance programs between fiscal years 1962 and 1966. This sum represents the material resources which the government can draw upon in the short run to augment the domestic material resources at its disposal.

As the international extractive capability does not correlate with the domestic capability, it has the affect of reordering the ranking considerably. Bolivia rises from the rank of of seventeenth to fifth. Ecuador, Chile, and the Dominican Republic have high scores on both categories. Argentina, Mexico, and Guatemala with low scores on both accounts are pushed further to the bottom. In the Central Ameri-

TABLE 7. GOVERNMENT DISTRIBUTIVE CAPABILITY

Country	Total Govern- ment Expendi- tures on Educa- tion as per cent of national income	Distributive Capability in Standard Deviations
Peru	4.9	1.90
Panama	4.7	1.70
Costa Rica	4.6	1.60
Venezuela	4.3	1.30
Chile	3.5	. 50
Colombia	3.3	.30
Argentina	3.3	.30
Uruguay	3.1	.10
Dominican
Republic	3.1	.10
Brazil	3.0	.00
El Salvador	2.9	- .10
Mexico	2.8	20
Paraguay	2.4	60
Ecuador	2.4	60
Honduras	2.3	70
Bolivia	2.2	80
Nicaragua	1.8	-1.20
Guatemala	1.6	-1.40
Haiti	1.1	-1.90
Mean	3.0
Standard Deviation	1.0

Source: United Nations. UNESCO. UNESCO Statistical Yearbook 1965. New York, 1966.

can countries and Paraguay a strong international extractive capability compensates for a mediocre domestic capability.

The distributive capability of the government lends itself much less easily to a quantitative formulation than does the extractive capability. The extractive capability limits the size of the distributive capability, but we are interested in further information on how the funds that the government obtains are used in the society.

Education is a public service which is rendered more widely than any other service except the police service. It is an investment with a high economic return, and tends to equalize opportunities. Thus expenditures on public education as a percentage of national income seem to be the single best index of the capability of the government to distribute benefits widely and in a manner that will promote economic development and a more equal distribution of income.

It is necessary to find more than central government statistics here too because education is often a local responsibility. UNESCO reports the total expenditures on public education at all levels as a percentage of national income, and this is used as the index of governmental distributive capability. It is important to note that educational expenditures are not highly correlated with extractive capability. Countries that bring in the highest percentage in taxes do not necessarily spend a larger percertage of the national product on education. Thus, the index chosen for distributive capability measures something quite distinct from the measure chosen for extractive capability even though both are given as a percentage of the society's production or income.

The index on the distributive capability is found in Table 7. Peru, Panama, Costa Rica and Venezuela are spending more than four per cent of their national income on public education. At the other end of the scale are Paraguay, Ecuador, Honduras, Bolivia, Nicaragua, Guatemala, and Haiti which are spending half as much or less. All countries are spending close to twice the percentage in the 1930's than they did a decade before. There is a higher correlation between this index and societal welfare than was the case in extractive capability, but the correlation is still low. Political characteristics seem more important than economic. All of the countries with some tradition in democratic government are near the top of the scale and those with a tradition of dictatorship are toward the bottom. The Dominican Republic in ninth position and Mexico in twelfth position are a partial exception to this rule.

Peru and Panama, the two countries that are spending most on education in relation to their income, present an interesting question to students of Latin American politics because both are countries where the established oligarchy purportedly still plays an important role in politics, and where well organized reformist parties have yet to take power. Parties are frankly personalist in both countries. However, the oligarchy is competing openly and vigorously for the votes of the population. Education appears to be a policy which all classes favor and also one that is a popular votegetter.

Great differences in political party development exist among the political systems of Latin America, and to fail to give consideration to this factor would greatly distort our conclusions. However, the matter is too complex to present in any detail in this article, and our observations are limited by the lack of detailed research. Latin American political party systems are classified in Table 8.

The political systems of Mexico, Venezuela, and Costa Rica clearly have produced institutionalized parties of the first rank which are capable of integrating the major sectors of the population. One or several parties in each country have proved adaptable, complex. autonomous, coherent, and capable of producing regenerative political leadership. The Party of the Institutional Revolution in Mexico has the oldest history, proving its adaptability, but it is less autonomous than the others, being very closely tied on one hand to peasant and industrial labor groups and on the other to the formal institutions of government. The two principal parties in Costa Rica, the Party of National Liberation and the National Union Party are less complex in their organization, but are more autonomous. The Democratic Action Party and COPEI in Venezuela are both well organized, but they both have yet to prove that they can bring on new generations of leaders.

The parties in Chile, Uruguay, Colombia, and Peru are in a second echelon because of various weaknesses. Chile until very recently lacked a party that could effectively integrate the nation, but the ascendance of the Christian Democratic Party has filled this gap. When the Christian Democratic Party proves its adaptability in changing leadership, Chile will pass into the first rank. Uruguay has two old institutionalized parties in the Colorados and the Blancos, but the peculiar constitutional arrangements of Uruguay have encouraged

TABLE 8. POLITICAL PARTY ORGANIZATION IN LATIN AMERICA

Group I.

Institutionalized Parties of National party splintering into personalist factions. If the constitutional changes of December, 1966. bring about greater coherence in these two parties, Uruguay, too, will have to be placed at the top. Colombia also has two old and durable parties in the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party. Both, however, are split into factions, again in part due to a peculiar constitutional arrangement, and at the local level organization is more personalist than institutional. Peru lacks traditional parties, but APRA must certainly be considered an institutional party and the Popular Action of Belaunde and the Christian Democrats seem to be on their way to developing as institutional parties. Nevertheless, Peru must still be placed in the second rank because of the tendency of parties to be organized around their leaders, rather than for leaders to be brought up within the party.

Integration A. Mexico, Costa Rica, Venezuela B. Uruguay, Chile, Colombia, Peru Group II. Parties Weak in Complexity, Autonomy, Adaptability or Integration Traditional: Honduras, Nicaragua, Paraguay Army Oriented: El Salvador, Brazil, Bolivia No Integration: Argentina Group III. No Institutionalized Parties Guatemala, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Panama, Haiti

Bolivia, Brazil, El Salvador, Honduras, Paraguay, Nicaragua, and Argentina fall in the middle ranks, but it is difficult to order them. Each suffers from its own particular difficulties, and one cannot say which difficulty is the more serious. Argentina, for instance, has had institutionalized parties for half a century until they were dissolved by decree in 1966, but no party had been able to integrate the major sectors of the country; and today the Peronist labor groups remain as much out of the system as they did before Peron organized them. In Paraguay, Honduras, and Nicaragua, the traditional parties of the 19th century still exist but tend to be dominated by caudillos. Bolivia, since 1952, has been dominated by one institutionalized party which has integrated major groups in the country, but it is now split and the labor groups are outside the fold. The feuding of the original leaders has torn the seams of the party, and it is yet to be seen if new leaders will rise from within the party to mend the tears or whether it will fall apart. Parties in Brazil and El Salvador have never become institutionalized, and each now has a leadership of military officers who have established official parties.

In all of the above countries at least a semblance of party structure exists, but in the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Ecuador, Panama, and Haiti, political parties are yet to organize the struggle for power. The Dominican Republic has had feuding leftist, moderate, and rightist factions, which are only beginning to coalesce into permanently organized groups. Guatemala may have emerged from a chaotic situation in the elections of 1966, when Julio Cesar Mendes Montenegro came to power under the banner of the Revolutionary Party.

Ecuador and Panama at the moment have nothing but personalist groupings. However, certain potential for organization exists in these two countries, which is not true in Haiti, where thugs and mystics group themselves around the person of François Duvalier and destroy all potential opposition.

IV. SYSTEM STABILITY PROFILES

The following system stability profiles are presented in the order of their quantitative measurements shown in Table 9. The non-quantifiable factors—the distribution of income within each society and the political party system—have not been used to reorder the final standings. However, where a country's ranking might be affected by a particularly high or low score in both of these factors, it is so indicated in the text.

1. Costa Rica

Score: With a final score of 1.28 s.d. above the Latin American mean, Costa Rica is more stable than all other political systems. Its institutionalized political parties would place it even further above its only rival, Panama. Except for a mediocre score on domestic extractive capability, Costa Rica is strongly positive on all indexes.

Manifestations: Since 1949 the Costa Rican government has changed hands four times through free elections. The country has little

TABLE 9. SYSTEM STABILITY SCORES⁸

Factor Weigh	nt 4	2	3	3
Country	Welfare Minus Social Mo- bilization	Eco- nomic Growth	Extrac- tive Capa- bility	Distrib- utive Capa- bility	System Sta- bility
Costa Rica	+2.30	+ .38	+ .19	+1.60	+1.28
Panama	+1.45	+1.21	+ .10	+1.70	+1.13
Chile	28	+ .63	+2.44	+ .50	+ .75
Dominican
Republic	+ .36	65	+1.27	+ .10	+ .35
Brazil	46	+ .47	+1.02	.00	+ .18
Paraguay	+1.34	79	17	60	+ .12
Peru	-1.63	+ .63	.00	+1.90	+ .04
Nicaragua	+ .49	+ .54	+ .19	-1.20	+ .01
Venezuela	-1.01	+ .40	- :36	+1.30	— .03
Argentina	+ .34	09	- 186	+ .30	04
Ecuador	59	.00	-1.12	60	07
Honduras	+ .41	+ .07	53	`70	16
El Salvador	54	+ .63	- :48	10	22
Uruguay	23	-1.17	+ .05	+ .10	23
Mexico	44	+.72	-1.12	20	36
Colombia	93	18	36	+ .30	36
Guatemala	+ .77	+ .39	-1.41	-1.40	38
Bolivia	-1.63	+ .31	+1.00	80	44
Haiti	67	-3.50	-1.91	-1.90	-1.76

^a All scores given in standard deviations.

inflation, and few strikes or political demonstrations. Even the university students show no animosity toward North Americans.

Prediction: Continued democratic stability.

2. Panama

Score: Panama's score of .15 s.d. below Costa Rica is due to Panama's relatively greater social mobilization. A moderate extractive capability is balanced by the distribution of large sums on education. The lack of institutionalized political parties is Panama's greatest weakness.

Manifestations: Students have shown some signs of alienation and have expressed their discontent through anti-United States demonstrations. Political freedom has been continuously maintained, however, and power has changed hands through free, if somewhat turbulent, elections. No inflation.

Prediction: Continued democratic stability with minor difficulties until the development of institutionalized political parties.

3. Chile

Score: Chile scores .38 s.d. below Panama, primarily because its social mobilization is greater than its societal welfare. Recent per capita economic growth has been satisfactory, and combined domestic and international extractive capability is considerably higher than that of all other Latin American countries. Institutionalized parties integrate various sectors of the population.

Manifestations: Political freedom and free elections enjoy a long tradition in Chile, and the system has instituted reforms through its democratic structures. Chile has thus far experienced little of the rural and urban violence endemic to some other Latin American countries, but it has had a high rate of inflation.

Prediction: Continued democratic stability with inflation and electoral strength of extreme left wing parties lessening if rapid economic growth continues.

4. Dominican Republic

Score: Both the welfare and the social mobilization indexes are somewhat below the Latin American mean, but welfare is slightly ahead of mobilization. The overall index is plus .35 s.d. primarily because of high domestic and international extractive capabilities, which allow the government to maintain a large, well-trained army and still provide funds for social welfare projects. Political parties are relatively disorganized.

Manifestations: A long period of dictatorial stability came to an end in 1961, and the system has only begun to restabilize itself under a new order, partly because it lacks institutionalized means of changing and maintaining power. Civil war broke out in 1965, but participation in it was concentrated in the capital. Election of a president who has links with the past dictatorship indicates that dissatisfactions do not run deep.

Prediction: The surface manifestations of discontent of 1965 will diminish. The military will continue to play a large political role but without need for extensive repression of political freedoms.

5. Brazil

Score: Brazil's plus .18 score stems primarily from an extremely strong domestic extractive capability. Other items appear to be average, except for a low international extractive capability. The political party system in Brazil is weak.

Manifestations: Democratic government took an intermission in 1964 when the political party system proved incapable of ordering democratic choices. Little blood was shed, however, and it was possible to take away some political freedom without resorting to large scale repression. Inflation has been very high, but is decreasing.

Prediction: A semi-democratic system should be able to survive the minor manifestations of discontent, with future stability depending in large part upon development of broad-based institutionalized political parties.

6. Paraguay

Score: Paraguay is a poor country, but it is even less mobilized, which gives it a positive environmental score. Its political capabilities are below average.

Manifestations: The population shows little manifest discontent under the strong rule of General Alfredo Stoessner. Dissatisfaction is expressed by high rates of emigration and inflation, which now seem to be under control. The system's capacity for reform is reflected in a large improvement in extractive capability, and continued political liberalization.

Prediction: If the progress of the last few years continues, and economic growth accelerates, there should be no increase in coercion, and the option of peaceful evolution toward a democratic system should present itself.

7. Peru

Score: Radios and labor unions have produced social mobilization at a rate faster than increases in welfare, and the result is a potentially tense social situation. The score on the environmental indexes is offset by the highest score on distributive capability of any Latin American government. New institutionalized parties seem to be taking hold.

Manifestations: Guerrilla activity has been brought under control. Moderate inflation continues. In 1962 a military takeover proved to be of short duration, and democratic government has been re-established.

Prediction: Continued democratic government with a strong probability of lessening military interference if present high rate of economic growth is maintained.

8. Nicaragua

Score: Environment indexes are fifth highest in the area, due to a relatively low level of social mobilization; but political capabilities are low, primarily because of low distributive capability. A high international extractive capability makes up for some of the deficiencies.

Manifestations: The Liberal party under the leadership of the Somoza family has dominated the system for thirty years. Suspicion of electoral manipulation exists, but some observers claim that the Liberal Party could win free elections. The spring 1967 elections were marked by several outbreaks of violence.

Prediction: The situation will remain uneasy, but improvements in political capabilities and continued economic growth should make it unnecessary to increase the present level of coercion.

9. Venezuela

Score: Although Venezuela's welfare is third highest in Latin America, its social mobilization is highest, primarily because of the almost total organization of labor. Extractive capability is low because the national population resists taxation, but the distributive capability is high. A negative factor not recorded in Venezuela's final score is a poor distribution of income, but an important positive factor, also not recorded, is the existence of institutionalized political parties.

Manifestations: After one hundred years of military rule and dictatorship, democratic government appears to have been finally established, but it has been subjected to attempted coups and guerrilla activity. These uses of violence to influence the political system have, however, been declining. Venezuela has experienced little inflation.

Prediction: Continued decline of violence and continuance of an uneasy democratic system. If economic growth slows to a point where social mobility diminishes, inequality of income will cause difficulties for the system.

10. Argentina

Score: Argentina is less mobilized than the otherwise similar society of Uruguay and enjoys a higher level of welfare. Recent economic growth has been low. The political capabilities of Argentina are low, especially in the collection of taxes. The final score is .04 s.d. below the Latin American mean. The lack of any political party which integrates organized labor into the political system, plus a worsening distribution of income would lower Argentina's score.

Manifestations: Since 1930 the Argentina political system has been subject to repeated military intervention and suppression of political liberties. The present situation is similar to that of thirty years ago, except that labor is better organized and is more persistent in asking for a voice in government. The latest military intervention seems to be increasing the amount of coercion in the system.

Prediction: Continued instability without deteriorating into a revolutionary situation.

11. Ecuador

Score: The one mitigating factor in an otherwise difficult situation in Ecuador is the system's high extractive capability. Ecuador is low on every other index, and without this high capability, which brings its average to minus .07 s.d., it would have placed below Mexico. The political party situation, not included in the final score, is quite poor. On the other hand, the distribution of income is quite a bit better than in most other Latin American countries.

Manifestations: Ecuador seems to be maintaining its historical record of governmental instability. More than any other country of Latin America, Ecuador seems to have institutionalized the coup d'etat as a means of changing government, and perhaps a coup in Ecuador is less an indication of political instability than in some other countries. Civil violence has been minimal.

Prediction: A continuation of institutionalized instability.

12. Honduras

Score: A moderate level of economic growth, coupled with a low level of mobilization, produces a positive environment index in Honduras despite a low level of welfare. Low political capabilities give Honduras a score of minus .16 s.d. The distribution of income in Honduras is probably better than average, and would raise the score somewhat if it were included.

Manifestations: After one change of political parties in power through free elections in 1958, Honduras reverted to its more traditional form of change by coup d'etat in 1963 and it appears that the level of coercion is increasing. Little inflation.

Prediction: System instability will continue to be expressed in an occasional coup d'etat with subsequent exile and repression of opposition groups.

13. El Salvador

Score: The population of El Salvador is more highly mobilized than the rest of Central America, but its welfare is lower than any of its neighbors except Honduras. The result is more tension within the society. Although its political capabilities are better than those of all its neighbors except Costa Rica, it comes out .22 s.d. below the Latin American mean. A recent rapid increase in educational expenditures has not, however, been counted in this score.

Manifestations: Political freedom has been restricted in El Salvador and leftist groups can operate only within limits. The military has been the strongest force in controlled but progressive developments since 1932. Coups d'etat alternate with electoral methods to bring about turnovers in military leadership. Little inflation.

Prediction: A limited amount of coercion must be applied in order to prevent latent instability from manifesting itself. If progressive governments continue with the modifications of recent years, it may be possible to lower the level of coercion in the future.

14. Uruguay

Score: The Uruguayan population is more highly urbanized and has a greater exposure to mass media than that of any other Latin American country, but although nutrition, health, and education services are high the national production of goods and services has stagnated. Per capita production has actually declined over the past ten years. A fairly capable political system does not compensate for the low environment score, and Uruguay's final score is .23 s.d. below the Latin American mean.

Manifestations: Instability has thus far been expressed through strikes, demonstrations, and inflation rather than through subversion. In December of 1966, Uruguay demonstrated the continued vitality of its political system by adopting a radical constitutional change using democratic procedures.

Prediction: Until the rate of economic growth improves, the solid democratic tradition of Uruguay will encounter increasing manifestations of instability in the form of a rising level of protest.

15. Mexico

Score: Even a high rate of economic growth has not overcome the excess of social mobilization over societal welfare in Mexico. Mexico's low political capabilities bring its final score down to minus .36. Mexico's distribution of income is also unequal—probably very similar to the situation in Guatemala—but Mexico has an institutionalized party of national integration, which makes it more stable than Guatemala. In the last few years Mexico has made some progress in improving its low level of political capabilities.

Manifestations: The situation seems to remain under control in Mexico in spite of what seems to be a potentially unstable situation. An important reason for this under-manifestation of instability is undoubtedly pride in the Mexican Revolution. 18 There are increasing outbreaks of decentralized violence.

Prediction: Instability, under-manifested in the past, would break out if the delicate political equilibrium were disturbed through an increase in opposition power or a breakdown in the unity of the government party.

16. Colombia

Score: Colombia's high level of urbanization is the primary factor which upsets the equilibrium between welfare and social mobilization. A low score on the environment index indicates a number of severe problems which the government must face, and unfortunately the political system does not have sufficient capability to deal with this difficult situation. Although Colombia is ahead of the Latin American mean on education expenditures, it is behind on taxation. Colombia has strong institutionalized parties but, unlike Mexico, it lacks the myth of the Revolution.

Manifestations: Colombia has been racked by rural violence for nearly twenty years. A military dictatorship ruled from 1953 to 1957. Rural violence although declining continues, and leftist groups appear to be attempting to exploit the situation. Colombia has experienced a moderate amount of inflation.

18 This was brought out in Gabriel Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (New York: Little, Brown and Co., 1965), pp. 66-67. Almond and Verba found "... a pattern of high system affect coupled with a rejection of actual performance of the government," and that, "Mexican pride in nation, thus, does seem to depend to some extent on the continuing symbolic identification with the Mexican Revolution."

Prediction: Continued difficulties for the democratic system, but the system has presently exhausted its capacity for civil violence, and the party coalition has taken advantage of the situation to introduce reforms, which should reduce future instability.

17. Guatemala

Score: Guatemala is prosperous compared to its neighbors. This, coupled with a good rate of economic growth, gives it a mark of plus .64 s.d. on the societal index. However, the political capabilities of Guatemala are almost as low as those of Haiti. The unequal distribution of income would further lower its average score of minus .38 if it were included. The political party system is chaotic.

Manifestations: Since the overthrow of the Arbenz government in 1954, leftist groups have been suppressed, and the coup d'etat has been the most common means of choosing governors. A new government was elected in 1966, but it is faced with rightist pressures, the strongest guerrilla movement in Latin America, and an outbreak of political assassinations.

Prediction: Unless government capabilities improve (and there are some signs in that direction) and economic growth continues, the Guatemalan government will continue to face the choice of applying increased amounts of coercion or being overthrown. The situation is unstable.

18. Bolivia

Score: Bolivia is above the Latin American mean both in number of radios and percentage of economically active population in labor unions, but it is far below the mean in societal welfare. Only Bolivia's large international extractive capability prevents a much lower score. The ruling party has been unable to increase political capabilities to any great degree.

Manifestations: Bolivia has experienced all the indicators of system instability: revolution in 1952, runaway inflation, breakdown in the governing coalition, takeover by military in a coup d'etat, a guerrilla movement, and a large number of deaths from civil violence.

Prediction: The situation is so difficult that any government will be forced to chocse between coercion and intense demonstrations of dissatisfaction. If the high level of development assistance were to drop, the situation would become even more more serious.

19. Haiti

Score: Social mobilization has increased over welfare less rapidly than in Peru or Bolivia, but Haiti is last on every other index. It has suffered both natural and man-made economic disasters that have drastically reduced its already low standard of living.

Manifestations: Rule is by coercion. All political opposition is either in exile, imprisoned, or has been killed. Nevertheless, new revolts continue to erupt.

Prediction: A revolutionary situation exists in Haiti.

20. Cuba in 1958

The Cuban government of the 1950's kept worse statistics than any other Latin American government with the possible exception of Haiti, and it is impossible to develop a complete index on the Cuban situation of 1958. However, Cuba presented such an extreme situation that it is possible to come to some firm conclusions about its degree of system instability. Cuba's welfare index was higher than most other Latin American countries. A welfare index that takes into account all but nutrition gives Cuba in 1958 a score of +.29 s.d. or about the same level of societal welfare as Costa Rica in 1965.19 However, its social mobilization was much higher than that of most other countries. Sixty per cent of the economically active population was organized into labor unions, an extreme situation found in very few countries of the world and rivalled only by Venezuela in Latin America. Exposure to public media was also very high; but urbanization was low, a factor perhaps offset by a heavy concentration of the rural population close to urban areas. When put in terms of our indexes, these circumstances mean that the difference between societal welfare and social mobilization was negative by a sum of minus 1.11, twice the difference of Bolivia, which gives a score in standard deviations of minus 3.42, an extreme deviation not found in any other instance in Latin America. Reliable data on economic growth are not available, but estimates indicate that growth was in the range of 2.5 per cent annually during the 1950's at about the same rate as population increase. In 1958 the gross national product actually declined.

The very serious tensions produced by societal conditions were reinforced by a poor situation in the political system. Again, much data is unavailable. Bank of Cuba figures indicate that total central government revenues were about 13 per cent of GDP, but data is not available to show how much of this was tax revenue.²⁰ In the period prior to 1959, international extractive capability was negligible. Reports that illiteracy was increasing and that fewer children of primary age were in school than before indicate a low distributive capability.²¹ The personalist political parties of the 1930's and 1940's had been destroyed by Batista, and he had developed nothing to replace them.

¹⁹ Data taken from same sources as for Tables 2 and 3 except that per capita gross domestic product was figured from data in United Nations Statistical Yearbook 1963.

All of the evidence, then, forces us to the conclusion that the situation in Cuba in 1958 would have produced a final score in system stability somewhat lower than Haiti's. Our prediction, then, would be extreme system instability; in short, revolution.

V. CONCLUSION

No independent numerical index of the manifestations of system stability/instability exists with which to compare the system stability score, and therefore it is not possible to test the theory developed here. However, some indicators do exist. Social revolution, the clearest manifestation of severe system instability, has occurred in three Latin American countries-Mexico, Bolivia, and Cuba-all of which appear very low in the system stability scores. Mexico must have had a much lower score when it experienced its revolution because it has enjoyed the best economic growth record in Latin America since 1930. At the other extreme, Costa Rica with the highest system stability score in Latin America is the one country which all commentators agree has no chance of undergoing a social revolution.

Generally, the qualitative discussion of manifestations developed in the country profiles indicate that the system stability scores do measure a condition that is expressed in manifestations of one kind or another. Two obvious deviations exist—the Dominican Republic and Mexico—which have been interpreted to mean that the Dominican Republic has in recent years overmanifested its degree of instability and will settle down in the future, and Mexico has undermanifested its degree of instability and will become more unsettled in the future.

Other authors have developed indexes of some of the manifestations of instability. For instance. Charles Ruttenberg has developed an index of the total magnitude of civil violence, which measures the duration, pervasiveness, intensity and amplitude of civil violence of nearly all non-communist countries of the world for the years 1961-1963.22 The short time period plus the underreporting in some countries places severe limitations on the index. A rank correlation analysis between Ruttenberg's index of civil violence and the system stability score produces a correlation of only .12. Bruce M. Russett and associates have calculated the number of deaths from group violence per million population which covers a wider time span, 1950 to 1962,23 and which has a higher correlation with the system stability score with a coefficient of .26. Indexes of inflation show no correlation with the system stability score because the countries which appear low in system stability are also the ones most likely to suppress popular demands. Until more complete evidence is available on all the manifestations of system instability, the theory presented here must be considered neither invalidated nor supported by independent measures of manifestations.

^{2•} José M. Illán, Cuba-Datos sobre una Economia en Ruinas (Florida, 1963, privately published).

² For a fuller description see Dudley Seers et al., Cuba: The Economic and Social Revolution (Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1964).

²² Charles Ruttenberg, "Measures of Civil Violence," in Ted Gurr, The Conditions of Civil Violence: First Tests of a Causal Model (Princeton: Center of International Studies, 1967).

²³ Bruce M. Russett, et al., World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964).

The concept of system stability/instability does appear to be useful in understanding political systems. It is independent of the democratic-authoritarian dimension of the system but affects the direction of change of the political structures. Only a relatively stable system can control its structural change. At least in Latin America where a system can control its structural change, it will move toward a democratic system because the predominant political values support personal liberty. On the other hand, an unstable system is caught in difficult circumstances in which it loses its freedom of choice. External assistance can help these countries, but they lack the domestic resources to make gradual and controlled changes. Recognition and knowledge of this dimension of stability/instability thus adds to the understanding of the unfolding of events within a political system.

PROTEST AS A POLITICAL RESOURCE*

MICHAEL LIPSKY
The University of Wisconsin

The frequent resort to protest activity by relatively powerless groups in recent American politics suggests that protest represents an important aspect of minority group and low income group politics. At the same time that Negro civil rights strategists have recognized the problem of using protest as a meaningful

* This article is an attempt to develop and explore the implications of a conceptual scheme for analyzing protest activity. It is based upon my studies of protest organizations in New York City, Washington, D.C., Chicago, San Francisco, and Mississippi, as well as extensive examination of written accounts of protest among low-income and Negro civil rights groups. I am grateful to Kenneth Dolbeare, Murray Edelman, and Rodney Stiefbold for their insightful comments on an earlier draft. This paper was developed while the author was a Staff Associate of the Institute for Research on Poverty at the University of Wisconsin. I appreciate the assistance obtained during various phases of my research from the Rabinowitz Foundation, the New York State Legislative Internship Program, and the Brookings Institution.

1 "Relatively powerless groups" may be defined as those groups which, relatively speaking, are lacking in conventional political resources. For the purposes of community studies. Robert Dahl has compiled a useful comprehensive list. See Dahl, "The Analysis of Influence in Local Communities," Social Science and Community Action. Charles R. Adrian, ed. (East Lansing, Michigan, 1960), p. 32. The difficulty in studying such groups is that relative powerlessness only becomes apparent under certain conditions. Extremely powerless groups not only lack political resources. but are also characterized by a minimal sense of political efficacy, upon which in part successful political organization depends. For reviews of the literature linking orientations of political efficacy to socioeconomic status, see Robert Lane, Political Life (New York, 1959), ch. 16; and Lester Milbrath, Political Participation (Chicago, 1965), ch. 5. Further, to the extent that group cohesion is recognized as a necessary requisite for organized political action, then extremely powerless groups, lacking cohesion, will not even appear for observation. Hence the necessity of selecting for intensive study a protest movement where there can be some confidence that observable processes and results can be analyzed. Thus, if one conceives of a continuum on which political groups are placed according to their relative command of political instrument,² groups associated with the "war on poverty" have increasingly received publicity for protest activity. Saul Alinsky's Industrial Areas Foundation, for example, continues to receive invitations to help organize low income communities because of its ability to mobilize poor people around the tactic of protest.³ The riots which dominated urban affairs in the summer of 1967 appear not to have diminished the dependence of some groups on protest as a mode of political activity.

This article provides a theoretical perspective on protest activity as a political resource. The discussion is concentrated on the limitations inherent in protest which occur because of the need of protest leaders to appeal to four constituencies at the same time. As the concept of protest is developed here, it will be argued that protest leaders must nurture and sustain an organization comprised of people with whom they may or may not share common values. They must articulate goals and choose strategies so as to maximize their public exposure through communications media. They must maximize the impact of third parties in the political conflict. Finally, they must try to maximize chances of success among those capable of granting goals. The tensions inherent in manipulating these four constituencies at the same time form the basis of this discussion of protest as a political process. It is intended to place aspects of the civil rights movement in a framework which suggests links between protest organizations and the general political processes in which such organizations operate.

I. "PROTEST" CONCEPTUALIZED

Protest activity as it has been adopted by elements of the civil rights movement and others has not been studied extensively by resources, the focus of this essay is on those groups which are near, but not at, the pole of powerlessness.

- ² See, e.g., Bayard Rustin, "From Protest to Politics: The Future of the Civil Rights Movement," Commentary (February, 1965), 25-31; and Stokely Carmichael, "Toward Black Liberation," The Massachusetts Review (Autumn, 1966.)
- ³ On Alinsky's philosophy of community organization, see his Reveille for Radicals (Chicago, 1945); and Charles Silberman, Crisis in Black and White (New York, 1964), ch. 10.

social scientists. Some of the most suggestive writings have been done as case studies of protest movements in single southern cities.4 These works generally lack a framework or theoretical focus which would encourage generalization from the cases. More systematic efforts have been attempted in approaching the dynamics of biracial committees in the South.5 and comprehensively assessing the efficacy of Negro political involvement in Durham, N.C. and Philadelphia, Pa.⁶ In their excellent assessment of Negro politics in the South. Matthews and Prothro have presented a thorough profile of Southern Negro students and their participation in civil rights activities.7 Protest is also discussed in passing in recent explorations of the social-psychological dimensions of Negro ghetto politics8 and the still highly suggestive, although pre-1960's. work on Negro political leadership by James Q. Wilson. These and other less systematic works on contemporary Negro politics, 10 for all of their intuitive insights and valuable documentation, offer no theoretical formula-

⁴ See, e.g., Jack L. Walker, "Protest and Negotiation: A Case Study of Negro Leadership in Atlanta, Georgia," Midwest Journal of Political Science, 7 (May, 1963), 99-124; Jack L. Walker, Sit-Ins in Atlanta: A Study in the Negro Protest, Eagleton Institute Case Studies, No. 34 (New York, 1964); John Ehle, The Free Men (New York, 1965) [Chapel Hill]; Daniel C. Thompson, The Negro Leadership Class (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1963) [New Orleans]; M. Elaine Burgess, Negro Leadership in a Southern City (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1962) [Durham].

⁵ Lewis Killian and Charles Grigg, Racial Crisis in America: Leadership in Conflict (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1964).

⁶ William Keech, "The Negro Vote as a Political Resource: The Case of Durham," (unpublished Ph.D. Dissertation, University of Wisconsin, 1966); John H. Strange, "The Negro in Philadelphia Politics 1963-65," (unpublished Ph.D. Dissertation, Princeton University, 1966).

⁷ Donald Matthews and James Prothro, Negroes and the New Southern Politics (New York, 1966). Considerable insight on these data is provided in John Orbell, "Protest Participation among Southern Negro College Students," this Review, 61 (June, 1967), 446–456.

- ⁸ Kenneth Clark, Dark Ghetto (New York, 1965).
 - 9 Negro Politics (New York, 1960).
- ¹⁰ A complete list would be voluminous. See, e.g., Nat Hentoff, The New Equality (New York, 1964); Arthur Waskow, From Race Riot to Sit-in (New York, 1966).

tions which encourage conceptualization about the interaction between recent Negro political activity and the political process.

Heretofore the best attempt to place Negro protest activity in a framework which would generate additional insights has been that of James Q. Wilson. Wilson has suggested that protest activity be conceived as a problem of bargaining in which the basic problem is that Negro groups lack political resources to exchange. Wilson called this "the problem of the powerless." 12

While many of Wilson's insights remain valid, his approach is limited in applicability because it defines protest in terms of mass action or response and as utilizing exclusively negative inducements in the bargaining process. Negative inducements are defined as inducements which are not absolutely preferred but are preferred over alternative possibilities.¹³ Yet it might be argued that protest designed to appeal to groups which oppose suffering and exploitation, for example, might be offering positive inducements in bargaining. A few Negro students sitting at a lunch counter might be engaged in what would be called protest, and by their actions might be trying to appeal to other groups in the system with positive inducements. Additionally, Wilson's concentration on Negro civic action, and his exclusive interest in exploring the protest process to explain Negro civic action, tend to obscure comparison with protest activity which does not necessarily arise within the Negro community.

Assuming a somewhat different focus, protest activity is defined as a mode of political action oriented toward objection to one or more policies or conditions, characterized by showmanship or display of an unconventional nature, and undertaken to obtain rewards from political or economic systems while working within the systems. The "problem of the powerless" in protest activity is to activate "third parties" to enter the implicit or explicit bargaining arena in ways favorable to the protesters. This is one of the few ways in which they can "create" bargaining resources. It is intuitively uncon-

¹¹ "The Strategy of Protest: Problems of Negro Civic Action," Journal of Conflict Resolution, 3 (September, 1961), 291-303. The reader will recognize the author's debt to this highly suggestive article, not least Wilson's recognition of the utility of the bargaining framework for examining protest activity.

¹² Ibid., p. 291.

¹³ Ibid., p. 291-292.

vincing to suggest that fifteen people sitting uninvited in the Mayor's office have the power to move City Hall. A better formulation would suggest that the people sitting in may be able to appeal to a wider public to which the city administration is sensitive. Thus in successful protest activity the reference publics of protest targets may be conceived as explicitly or implicitly reacting to protest in such a way that target groups or individuals respond in ways favorable to the protesters.¹⁴

It should be emphasized that the focus here is on protest by relatively powerless groups. Illustrations can be summoned, for example, of activity designated as "protest" involving high status pressure groups or hundreds of thousands of people. While such instances may share some of the characteristics of protest activity, they may not represent examples of developing political resources by relatively powerless groups because the protesting groups may already command political resources by virtue of status, numbers or cohesion.

It is appropriate also to distinguish between the relatively restricted use of the concept of protest adopted here and closely related political strategies which are often designated as "protest" in popular usage. Where groups already possess sufficient resources with which to bargain, as in the case of some economic boycotts and labor strikes, they may be said to engage in "direct confrontation." Similarly, protest which represents efforts to "activate reference publics" should be distinguished from "alliance formation," where third parties are induced to join the conflict, but where the value orientations of third parties are sufficiently similar to those of the protesting group that concerted or coordinated action is possible. Alliance formation is particularly desirable for relatively powerless groups if they seek to join the decision-making process as participants.

¹⁴ See E. E. Schattschneider's discussion of expanding the scope of the conflict, The Semisovereign People (New York, 1960). Another way in which bargaining resources may be "created" is to increase the relative cohesion of groups, or to increase the perception of group solidarity as a precondition to greater cohesion. This appears to be the primary goal of political activity which is generally designated "community organization." Negro activists appear to recognize the utility of this strategy in their advocacy of "black power." In some instances protest activity may be designed in part to accomplish this goal in addition to activating reference publics.

¹⁵ For an example of "direct confrontation," one might study the three-month Negro boycott of white merchants in Natchez, Miss., which resulted in capitulation to boycott demands by city government leaders. See The New York Times, December 4, 1965, p. 1.

The distinction between activating reference publics and alliance formation is made on the assumption that where goal orientations among protest groups and the reference publics of target groups are similar, the political dynamics of petitioning target groups are different than when such goal orientations are relatively divergent. Clearly the more similar the goal orientations, the greater the likelihood of protest success, other things being equal. This discussion is intended to highlight, however, those instances where goal orientations of reference publics depart significantly, in direction or intensity, from the goals of protest groups.

Say that to protest some situation. A would like to enter a bargaining situation with B. But A has nothing B wants, and thus cannot bargain. A then attempts to create political rescurces by activating other groups to enter the conflict. A then organizes to take action against B with respect to certain goals. Information concerning these goals must be conveyed through communications media (C. D. and E) to F. G. and H. which are B's reference publics. In response to the reactions of F, G, and H, or in anticipation of their reactions, B responds, in some way, to the protesters' demands. This formulation requires the conceptualization of procest activity when undertaken to create bargaining resources as a political process which requires communication and is characterized by a multiplicity of constituencies for protest leadership.

A schematic representation of the process of protest as utilized by relatively powerless groups is presented in Figure 1. In contrast to a simplistic pressure group model which would posit a direct relationship between pressure group and pressured, the following discussion is guided by the assumption (derived from observation) that protest is a highly indirect process in which communications media and the reference publics of protest targets play critical roles. It is also a process characterized by reciprocal relations, in which protest leaders frame strategies according to their perception of the needs of (many) other actors.

In this view protest constituents limit the options of protest leaders at the same time that the protest leader influences their perception of the strategies and rhetoric which they will support. Protest activity is filtered through the communications media in influencing the perceptions of the reference publics of protest targets. To the extent that the influence of reference publics is supportive of protest goals, target groups will dispense symbolic or material rewards. Material rewards are communicated directly to protest constituents. Symbolic rewards are communicated in part to protest constituents, but primarily are communicated to the reference publics of target groups, who provide the major stimuli for public policy pronouncements.

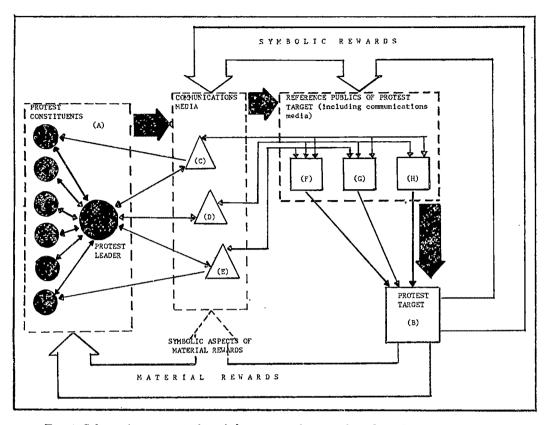

Fig. 1. Schematic representation of the process of protest by relatively powerless groups.

The study of protest as adopted by relatively powerless groups should provide insights into the structure and behavior of groups involved in civil rights politics and associated with the "war on poverty." It should direct attention toward the ways in which administrative agencies respond to "crises." Additionally, the study of protest as a political resource should influence some general conceptualizations of American political pluralism. Robert Dahl, for example, describes the "normal American political process" as one in which there is a high probability that an active and legitimate group in the population can make itself heard effectively at some crucial stage in the process of decision.¹⁶

Although he agrees that control over decisions is unevenly divided in the population, Dahl writes:

When I say that a group is heard "effectively" I mean more than the simple fact that it makes a noise; I mean that one or more officials are not only ready to listen to the noise, but expect to suffer in some significant way if they do not placate the group, its leaders, or its most vociferous members. To satisfy the group may require one or more of a great variety of actions by the responsive leader: pressure for substantive policies, appointments, graft, respect, expression of the appropriate emotions, or the right combination of reciprocal noises.¹⁷

These statements, which in some ways resemble David Truman's discussion of the power of "potential groups," 18 can be illuminated by the study of protest activity in three ways. First, what are the probabilities that relatively powerless groups can make themselves heard effectively? In what ways will such groups be heard or "steadily appeased"? Concentration on the process of protest activity may reveal the extent to which, and the conditions under which, relatively powerless groups are likely to prove effective. Protest undertaken to obstruct policy decisions, for example, may enjoy greater success probabilities than protest undertaken in an effort to evoke constructive policy innovations. 20

¹⁶ A Preface to Democratic Theory (Chicago, 1956), pp. 145-146.

¹⁷ Ibid.

Second, does it make sense to suggest that all groups which make noises will receive responses from public officials? Perhaps the groups which make noises do not have to be satisfied at all, but it is other groups which receive assurances or recognition. Third, what are the probabilities that groups which make noises will receive tangible rewards, rather than symbolic assurances?²¹ Dahl lumps these rewards together in the same paragraph, but dispensation of tangible rewards clearly has a different impact upon groups than the dispensation of symbolic rewards. Dahl is undoubtedly correct when he suggests that the relative fluidity of American politics is a critical characteristic of the American political system.22 But he is less precise and less convincing when it comes to analyzing the extent to which the system is indeed responsive to the relatively powerless groups of the "average citizen."23

¹⁸ The Governmental Process (New York, 1951), p. 104.

 19 See Dahl, A Preface to Democratic Theory, p. 146.

²⁰ Observations that all groups can influence public policy at some stage of the political process are frequently made about the role of "veto groups" in American politics. See Ibid., pp. 104 ff. See also David Reisman, The Lonely Crowd (New Haven, 1950), pp. 211 ff., for an earlier discussion of veto-group politics. Yet protest should be evaluated when it is adopted to obtain assertive as well as defensive goals.

²¹ See Murray Edelman, The Symbolic Uses of Politics (Urbana, Ill., 1964), ch. 2.

²² See Dahl, Who Governs? (New Haven, 1961), pp. 305 ff.

²³ In a recent formulation, Dahl reiterates the theme of wide dispersion of influence. "More than other systems, [democracies]... try to disperse influence widely to their citizens by means of the suffrage, elections, freedom of speech, press, and

The following sections are an attempt to demonstrate the utility of the conceptualization of the protest process presented above. This will be done by exploring the problems encountered and the strains generated by protest leaders in interacting with four constituencies. It will be useful to concentrate attention on the maintenance and enhancement needs not only of the large formal organizations which dominate city politics,24 but also of the ad hoc protest groups which engage them in civic controversy. It will also prove rewarding to examine the role requirements of individuals in leadership positions as they perceive the problems of constituency manipulation. In concluding remarks some implications of the study of protest for the pluralist description of American politics will be suggested.25

II. PROTEST LEADERSHIP AND ORGANIZATIONAL BASE

The organizational maintenance needs of relatively powerless, low income, ad hoc protest groups center around the tension generated by the need for leadership to offer symbolic and intangible inducements to protest participation when immediate, material rewards cannot be anticipated, and the need to provide at least the promise of material rewards. Protest leaders must try to evoke responses from other actors in the political process, at the same time that they pay attention to participant organizational needs. Thus relatively de-assembly, the right of opponents to criticize the conduct of government, the right to organize political parties, and in other ways." Pluralist Democracy in the United States (Chicago, 1967), p. 373. Here, however, he concentrates more on the availability of options to all groups in the system, rather than on the relative probabilities that all groups in fact have access to the political process. See pp. 372 ff.

²⁴ See Edward Banfield, Political Influence (New York, 1961), p. 263. The analysis of organisational incentive structure which heavily influences Banfield's formulation is Chester Barnard, The Functions of the Executive (Cambridge, Mass., 1938).

²⁶ In the following attempt to develop the implications of this conceptualization of protest activity, I have drawn upon extensive field observations and bibliographical research. Undoubtedly, however, individual assertions, while representing my best judgment concerning the available evidence, in the future may require modification as the result of further empirical research.

prived groups in the political system not only receive symbolic reassurance while material rewards from the system are withheld, 26 but protest leaders have a stake in perpetuating the notion that relatively powerless groups retain political efficacy despite what in many cases is obvious evidence to the contrary.

The tension embraced by protest leaders over the nature of inducements toward protest participation accounts in part for the style adopted and goals selected by protest leaders. Groups which seek psychological gratification from politics, but cannot or do not anticipate material political rewards, may be attracted to militant protest leaders. To these groups, angry rhetoric may prove a desirable quality in the short run. Where groups depend upon the political system for tangible benefits, or where participation in the system provides intangible benefits, moderate leadership is likely to prevail. Wilson has observed similar tendencies among Negro leaders of large, formal organizations.27 It is no less true for leadership of protest groups. Groups whose members derive tangible satisfactions from political participation will not condone leaders who are stubborn in compromise or appear to question the foundations of the system. This coincides with Truman's observation:

Violation of the "rules of the game" normally will weaken a group's cohesion, reduce its status in the community, and expose it to the claims of other groups.²⁸

On the other hand, the cohesion of relatively powerless groups may be strengthened by militant, ideological leadership which questions the rules of the game and challenges their legitimacy.

Cohesion is particularly important when protest leaders bargain directly with target groups. In that situation, leaders' ability to control protest constituents and guarantee their behavior represents a bargaining strength.²⁹ For this reason Wilson stressed the bargaining difficulties of Negro leaders who cannot guarantee constituent behavior, and pointed out the significance of the strategy of projecting the image of group solidarity when the reality of cohesion is a fiction.³⁰ Cohesion is less significant at other times. Divided leadership may prove productive by bargaining in tandem,³¹ or by minimizing strain among groups in the protest process. Further, community divisions may prove less detrimental to protest aims when strong third parties have entered the dispute originally generated by protest organizations.

The intangible rewards of assuming certain postures toward the political system may not be sufficient to sustain an organizational base. It may be necessary to renew constantly the intangible rewards of participation. And to the extent that people participate in order to achieve tangible benefits, their interest in a protest organization may depend upon the crganization's relative material success. Frotest leaders may have to tailor their style to present participants with tangible successes, or with the appearance of success. Leaders may have to define the issues with concern for increasing their ability to sustain organizations. The potential for protest among protest group members may have to be manipulated by leadership if the group is to be sustained.32

The participants in protest organizations limit the flexibility of protest leadership. This obtains for two reasons. They restrict public actions by leaders who must continue to solicit active participant support, and they place restraints on the kinds of activities which can be considered appropriate for protest purposes. Poor participants cannot commonly be asked to engage in protest requiring air transportation. Participants may have anxieties related to their environment or historical situation which discourages engagement in some activities.

³¹ This is suggested by Wilson, "The Strategy of Protest," p. 298; St. Clair Drake and Horace Cayton, Black Metropolis (New York, 1962, rev. ed.), p. 731; Walker, "Protest and Negotiation," p. 122. Authors who argue that divided leadership is dysfunctional have been Clark, p. 156; and Tilman Cothran, "The Negro Protest Against Segregation in the South," The Annals, 357 (January, 1965), p. 72.

32 This observation is confirmed by a student of the Southern civil rights movement:

Negroes demand of protest leaders constant progress. The combination of long-standing discontent and a new-found belief in the possibility of change produces a constant state of tension and aggressiveness in the Negro community. But this discontent is vague and diffuse, not specific; the masses do not define the issues around which action shall revolve. This the leader must do.

Lewis Killian, "Leadership in the Desegregation Crises: An Institutional Analysis," in Muzafer Sherif (ed.), Intergroup Relations and Leadership (New York; 1962), p. 159.

²⁶ As Edelman suggests, cited previously.

²⁷ Negro Politics, p. 290.

²⁸ The Governmental Process, p. 513.

²⁰ But cf. Thomas Schelling's discussion of "binding oneself," The Strategy of Conflict (Cambridge, Mass., 1960), pp. 22 ff.

^{30 &}quot;The Strategy of Protest," p. 297.

They may be afraid of job losses, beatings by the police, or summary evictions. Negro protest in the Deep South has been inhibited by realistic expectations of retribution.³³ Protests over slum housing conditions are undermined by tenants who expect landlord retaliation for engaging in tenant organizing activity.³⁴ Political or ethical mores may conflict with a proposed course of action, diminishing participation.³⁵

On the other hand, to the extent that fears are real, or that the larger community perceives protest participants as subject to these fears, protest may actually be strengthened. Communications media and potential allies will consider more soberly the complaints of people who are understood to be placing themselves in jeopardy. When young children and their parents made the arduous bus trip from Mississippi to Washington, D.C. to protest the jeopardizing of Head Start funds, the courage and expense represented by their effort created a respect and visibility for their position which might not have been achieved by local protest efforts.³⁶

Protest activity may be undertaken by organizations with established relationship patterns, behavior norms, and role expectations. These organizations are likely to have greater access to other groups in the political system, and a demonstrated capacity to maintain themselves. Other protest groups, however, may be ad hoc arrangements without demonstrated internal or external relationship pat-

³³ Significantly, southern Negro students who actively participated in the early phases of the sit-in movement "tended to be unusually optimistic about race relations and tolerant of whites [when compared with inactive Negro students]. They not only were better off, objectively speaking, than other Negroes but felt better off." Matthews and Prothro, op. cit., p. 424.

³⁴ This is particularly the case in cities such as Washington, D.C., where landlord-tenant laws offer little protection against retaliatory eviction. See, e.g., Robert Schoshinski, "Remedies of the Indigent Tenant: Proposal for Change," Georgetown Law Journal, 54 (Winter, 1966), 541 ff.

Wilson regarded this as a chief reason for lack of protest activity in 1961. He wrote: "... some of the goals now being sought by Negroes are least applicable to those groups of Negroes most suited to protest action. Protest action involving such tactics as mass meetings, picketing, boycotts, and strikes rarely find enthusiastic participants among upper-income and higher status individuals": "The Strategy of Protest," p. 296.

³⁶ See The New York Times, February 12, 1966, p. 56.

terns. These groups will have different organizational problems, in response to which it is necessary to engage in different kinds of protest activity.

The scarcity of organizational resources also places limits upon the ability of relatively powerless groups to maintain the foundations upon which protest organizations develop. Relatively powerless groups, to engage in political activity of any kind, must command at least some resources. This is not tautological. Referring again to a continuum on which political groups are placed according to their relative command of resources, one may draw a line somewhere along the continuum representing a "threshold of civic group political participation." Clearly some groups along the continuum will possess some political resources (enough, say, to emerge for inspection) but not enough to exercise influence in civic affairs. Relatively powerless groups, to be influential, must cross the "threshold" to engage in politics. Although the availability of group resources is a critical consideration at all stages of the protest process, it is particularly important in explaining why some groups seem to "surface" with sufficient strength to command attention. The following discussion of some critical organizational resources should illuminate this point.

Skilled professionals frequently must be available to protest organizations. Lawyers, for example, play extremely important roles in enabling protest groups to utilize the judicial process and avail themselves of adequate preparation of court cases. Organizational reputation may depend upon a combination of ability to threaten the conventional political system and of exercising statutory rights in court. Availability of lawyers depends upon ability to pay fees and/or the attractiveness to lawyers of participation in protest group activity. Volunteer professional assistance may not prove adequate. One night a week volunteered by an aspiring politician in a housing clinic cannot satisfy the needs of a chaotic political movement.37 The need for skilled professionals is not restricted to lawyers. For example, a group seeking to protest an urban renewal policy might require the services of architects and city planners in order to present a viable alternative to a city proposal.

²⁷ On housing clinic services provided by political clubs, see James Q. Wilson, The Amateur Democrat: Club Politics in Three Cities (Chicago, 1962), pp. 63-64, 176. On the need for lawyers among low income people, see e.g., The Extension of Legal Services to the Poor, Conference Proceedings (Washington, D.C., n.d.), esp. pp. 51-60; and "Neighborhood Law Offices: The New Wave in Legal Services for the Poor," Harvard Law Review, 80 (February, 1967), 805-850.

Financial resources not only purchase legal assistance, but enable relatively powerless groups to conduct minimum programs of political activities. To the extent that constituents are unable or unwilling to pay even small membership dues, then financing the cost of mimeographing flyers, purchasing supplies, maintaining telephone service, paying rent, and meeting a modest payroll become major organizational problems. And to the extent that group finances are supplied by outside individual contributions or government or foundation grants, the long-term options of the group are sharply constrained by the necessity of orienting group goals and tactics to anticipate the potential objections of financial supporters.

Some dependence upon even minimal financial resources can be waived if organizations evoke passionate support from constituents. Secretarial help and block organizers will come forward to work without compensation if they support the cause of neighborhood organizations or gain intangible benefits based upon association with the group. Protest organizations may also depend upon skilled non-professionals, such as college students, whose access to people and political and economic institutions often assist protest groups in cutting across income lines to seek support. Experience with ad hoc political groups, however, suggests that this assistance is sporadic and undependable. Transient assistance is particularly typical of skilled, educated, and employable volunteers whose abilities can be applied widely. The die-hards of ad hoc political groups are often those people who have no place else to go, nothing else to do.

Constituent support will be affected by the nature of the protest target and whether protest activity is directed toward defensive or assertive goals. Obstructing specific public policies may be easier than successfully recommending constructive policy changes. Orientations toward defensive goals may require less constituent energy, and less command over resources of money, expertise and status.³⁸

III. PROTEST LEADERSHIP AND COMMUNICATIONS MEDIA

The communications media are extremely powerful in city politics. In granting or withholding publicity, in determining what information most people will have on most issues, and what alternatives they will consider in response to issues, the media truly, as Norton Long has put it, "set... the civic agenda." To the extent that successful protest activity depends upon appealing to, and/or threatening, other groups in the community, the communications media set the limits of protest action. If protest tactics are not considered significant by the media, or if newspapers and television reporters or editors decide to overlook protest tactics, protest organizations will not succeed. Like the tree falling unheard in the forest, there is no protest unless protest is perceived and projected.

³⁸ An illustration of low income group protest organization mobilized for veto purposes is provided by Dahl in "The Case of the Metal Houses." See Who Governs?, pp. 192 ff.

A number of writers have noticed that the success of protest activity seems directly related to the amount of publicity it receives outside the immediate arena in which protest takes place. This view has not been stated systematically, but hints can be found in many sources. In the literature on civil rights politics, the relevance of publicity represents one of the few hypotheses available concerning the dynamics of successful protest activity.⁴⁰

When protest tactics do receive coverage in the communications media, the way in which they are presented will influence all other actors in the system, including the protesters themselves. Conformity to standards of newsworthiness in political style, and knowledge of the prejudices and desires of the individuals who determine media coverage in political skills, represent crucial determinants of leadership effectiveness.

The organizational behavior of newspapers can partly be understood by examining the maintenance and enhancement needs which direct them toward projects of civic betterment and impressions of accomplishment.⁴¹ But insight may also be gained by analyzing the role requirements of reporters, editors, and others who determine newspaper policy. Reporters, for example, are frequently motivated by the desire to contribute to civic affairs by their "objective" reporting of significant events; by the premium they place on accuracy; and by the credit which they receive for sensationalism and "scoops."

³⁹ Norton Long, "The Local Community as an Ecology of Games," in Long, The Polity, Charles Press, ed. (Chicago, 1962), p. 153. See pp. 152–154. See also Roscoe C. Martin, Frank J. Munger, et al., Decisions in Syracuse: A Metropolitan Action Study (Garden City, N.Y., 1965) (originally published: 1961), pp. 326–327.

⁴⁰ See, e.g., Thompson, op. cit., p. 134, and passim; Martin Oppenheimer, "The Southern Student Movement: Year I," Journal of Negro Education, 33 (Fall, 1964), p. 397; Cothran, op. cit., p. 72; Pauli Murray, "Protest Against the Legal Status of the Negro," The Annals, 357 (January, 1965), p. 63; Allan P. Sindler, "Protest Against the Political Status of the Negroes," The Annals, 357 (January, 1965), p. 50.

41 See Banfield, op. cit., p. 275.

These requirements may be difficult to accommodate at the same time. Reporters demand newsworthiness of their subjects in the short run, but also require reliability and verifiability in the longer run. Factual accuracy may dampen newsworthiness. Sensationalism, attractive to some newspaper editors, may be inconsistent with reliable, verifiable narration of events. Newspapers at first may be attracted to sensationalism, and later demand verifiability in the interests of community harmony (and adherence to professional journalistic standards).

Most big city newspapers have reporters whose assignments permit them to cover aspects of city politics with some regularity. These reporters, whose "beats" may consist of "civil rights" or "poverty," sometimes develop close relationships with their news subjects. These relationships may develop symbiotic overtones because of the mutuality of interest between the reporter and the news subject. Reporters require fresh information on protest developments, while protest leaders have a vital interest in obtaining as much press coverage as possible.

Inflated reports of protest success may be understood in part by examining this relationship between reporter and protest leader. Both have role-oriented interests in projecting images of protest strength and threat. In circumstances of great excitement, when competition from other news media representatives is high, a reporter may find that he is less governed by the role requirement of verification and reliability than he is by his editor's demand for "scoops" and news with high audience appeal.⁴²

On the other hand, the demands of the media may conflict with the needs of protest group maintenance. Consider the leader whose constituents are attracted solely by pragmatic statements not exceeding what they consider political "good taste." He is constrained from making militant demands which would isolate him from constituents. This constraint may cost him appeal in the press.⁴³ However, the leader whose organizing appeal requires militant rhetoric may obtain eager press coverage only to find that his inflamatory statements lead to alienation of potential allies and exclusion from the explicit bargaining process.⁴⁴

⁴² For a case study of the interaction between protest leaders and newspaper reporters, see Michael Lipsky, "Rent Strikes in New York City: Protest Politics and the Power of the Poor," (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Princeton University, 1967), pp. 139–49. Bernard Cohen has analyzed the impact of the press on foreign policy from the perspective of reporters' role requirements: see his The Press and Foreign Policy (Princeton, N.J., 1963), esp. chs. 2–3.

News media do not report events in the same way. Television may select for broadcast only thirty seconds of a half-hour news conference. This coverage will probably focus on immediate events, without background or explanatory material. Newspapers may give more complete accounts of the same event. The most complete account may appear in the weekly edition of a neighborhood or ethnic newspaper. Differential coverage by news media, and differential news media habits in the general population, 45 are significant factors in permitting protest leaders to juggle conflicting demands of groups in the protest process.

Similar tensions exist in the leader's relationships with protest targets. Ideological postures may gain press coverage and con-

⁴³ An example of a protest conducted by middle-class women engaged in pragmatic protest over salvaging park space is provided in John B. Keeley, Moses on the Green, Inter-University Case Program, No. 45 (University, Ala., 1959).

44 This was the complaint of Floyd McKissick, National Director of the Congress of Racial Equality, when he charged that "... there are only two kinds of statements a black man can make and expect that the white press will report.... First ... is an attack on another black man. . . . The second is a statement that sounds radical, violent, extreme—the verbal equivalent of a riot. . . . [T]he Negro is being rewarded by the public media only if he turns on another Negro and uses his tongue as a switchblade, or only if he sounds outlandish, extremist or psychotic." Statement at the Convention of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, April 20, 1967, Washington, D.C., as reported in The New York Times, April 21, 1967, p. 22. See also the remarks of journalist Ted Poston, ibid., April 26, 1965, p. 26.

⁴⁵ Matthews and Prothro found, for example, that in their south-wide Negro population sample, 38 percent read Negro-oriented magazines and 17 percent read newspapers written for Negroes. These media treat news of interest to Negroes more completely and sympathetically than do the general media. See pp. 248 ff.

stituency approval, but may alienate target groups with whom it would be desirable to bargain explicitly. Exclusion from the councils of decision-making may have important consequences, since the results of target group deliberations may satisfy activated reference publics without responding to protest goals. If activated reference publics are required to increase the bargaining position of the protest group, protest efforts thereafter will have diminished chances of success.

IV. PROTEST LEADERSHIP AND "THIRD PARTIES"

I have argued that the essence of political protest consists of activating third parties to participate in controversy in ways favorable to protest goals. In previous sections I have attempted to analyze some of the tensions which result from protest leaders' attempts to activate reference publics of protest targets at the same time that they must retain the interest and support of protest organization participants. This phenomenon is in evidence when Negro leaders, recognized as such by public officials, find their support eroded in the Negro community because they have engaged in explicit bargaining situations with politicians. Negro leaders are thus faced with the dilemma that when they behave like other ethnic group representatives they are faced with loss of support from those whose intense activism has been aroused in the Negro community, yet whose support is vital if they are to remain credible as leaders to public officials.

The tensions resulting from conflicting maintenance needs of protest organizations and activated third parties present difficulties for protest leaders. One way in which these tensions can be minimized is by dividing leadership responsibilities. If more than one group is engaged in protest activity, protest leaders can, in effect, divide up public roles so as to reduce as much as possible the gap between the implicit demands of different groups for appropriate rhetoric, and what in fact is said. Thus divided leadership may perform the latent function of minimizing tensions among elements in the protest process by permitting different groups to listen selectively to protest spokesmen.46

Another way in which strain among different groups can be minimized is through successful public relations. Minimization of strain may depend upon ambiguity of action or statement, deception, or upon effective inter-group communication. Failure to clarify meaning, or falsification, may increase protest effectiveness. Effective intragroup communication may increase the likelihood that protest constituents will "understand" that ambiguous or false public statements have "special meaning" and need not be taken seriously. The Machiavellian circle is complete when we observe that although lying may be prudent, the appearance of integrity and forthrightness is desirable for public relations, since these values are widely shared.

It has been observed that "[t]he militant displays an unwillingness to perform those administrative tasks which are necessary to operate an organization. Probably the skills of the agitator and the skills of the administrator . . . are not incompatible, but few men can do both well."47 These skills may or may not be incompatible as personality traits, but they indeed represent conflicting role demands on protest leadership. When a protest leader exhausts time and energy conducting frequent press conferences, arranging for politicians and celebrities to appear at rallies, delivering speeches to sympathetic local groups, college symposia and other forums, constantly picketing for publicity and generally making "contacts," he is unable to pursue the direction of office routine, clerical tasks, research and analysis, and other chores.

The difficulties of delegating routine tasks are probably directly related to the skill levels and previous administrative experiences of group members. In addition, to the extent that involvement in protest organizations is a function of rewards received or expected by individuals because of the excitement or entertainment value of participation, then the difficulties of delegating routine, relatively uninteresting chores to group members will be increased. Yet attention to such details affects the perception of protest groups by organizations whose support or assistance may be desired in the future. These considerations add to the protest leader's problem of risking alienation of protest participants because of potentially unpopular cooperation with the "power structure."

In the protest paradigm developed here, "third parties" refers both to the reference publics of target groups and, more narrowly, to the interest groups whose regular interaction with protest targets tends to develop into patterns of influence. We have already discussed some of the problems associated with activating the reference publics of target groups. In discussing the constraints placed upon protest, attention may be focused upon the likelihood that groups seeking to create political resources through protest will be included in the explicit bargaining process with other pressure groups. For protest groups, these constraints are those which occur because of class and political style, status, and organizational resources.

⁴⁸ See footnote 31 above.

⁴⁷ Wilson, Negro Politics, p. 225.

⁴⁸ See Wallace Sayre and Herbert Kaufman, Governing New York City (New York, 1960), pp. 257 ff. Also see Banfield, op. cit., p. 267.

The established civic groups most likely to be concerned with the problems raised by relatively powerless groups are those devoted to service in the public welfare and those "liberally" oriented groups whose potential constituents are either drawn from the same class as the protest groups (such as some trade unions), or whose potential constituents are attracted to policies which appear to serve the interest of the lower class or minority groups (such as some reform political clubs).49 These civic groups have frequently cultivated clientele relationships with city agencies over long periods. Their efforts have been reciprocated by agency officials anxious to develop constituencies to support and defend agency administrative and budgetary policies. In addition, clientele groups are expected to endorse and legitimize agency aggrandizement. These relationships have been developed by agency officials and civic groups for mutual benefit, and cannot be destroyed, abridged or avoided without cost.

Protest groups may well be able to raise the saliency of issues on the civic agenda through utilization of communications media and successful appeals or threats to wider publics, but admission to policy-making councils is frequently barred because of the angry, militant rhetorical style adopted by protest leaders. People in power do not like to sit down with rogues. Protest leaders are likely to have phrased demands in ways unacceptable to lawyers and other civic activists whose cautious attitude toward public policy may reflect not only their good intentions but their concern for property rights, due process, pragmatic legislating or judicial precedent.

Relatively powerless groups lack participation of individuals with high status whose endorsement of specific proposals lend them increased legitimacy. Good causes may always attract the support of high status individuals. But such individuals' willingness to devote time to the promotion of specific proposals is less likely than the one-shot endorsements which these people distribute more readily.

⁴⁹ See Wilson, The Amateur Democrats, previously cited. These groups are most likely to be characterized by broad scope of political interest and frequent intervention in politics. See Sayre and Kaufman, op. cit., p. 79.

Similarly, protest organizations often lack the resources on which entry into the policymaking process depends. These resources include maintenance of a staff with expertise and experience in the policy area. This expertise may be in the areas of the law, planning and architecture, proposal writing, accounting, educational policy, federal grantsmanship or publicity. Combining experience with expertise is one way to create status in issue areas. The dispensing of information by interest groups has been widely noted as a major source of influence. Over time the experts develop status in their areas of competence somewhat independent of the influence which adheres to them as information-providers. Groups which cannot or do not engage lawvers to assist in proposing legislation, and do not engage in collecting reliable data, cannot participate in policy deliberations or consult in these matters. Protest oriented groups, whose primary talents are in dramatizing issues, cannot credibly attempt to present data considered "objective" or suggestions considered "responsible" by public officials. Few can be convincing as both advocate and arbiter at the same time.

V. PROTEST LEADERSHIP AND TARGET GROUPS

The probability of protest success may be approached by examining the maintenance needs of organizations likely to be designated as target groups.⁵⁰ For the sake of clarity, and because protest activity increasingly is directed toward government, I shall refer in the following paragraphs exclusively to government agencies at the municipal level. The assumption is retained, however, that the following generalizations are applicable to other potential target groups.

⁵⁴ Another approach, persuasively presented by Wilson, concentrates on protest success as a function of the relative unity and vulnerability of targets. See "The Strategy of Protest," pp. 293 ff. This insight helps explain, for example, why protest against housing segregation commonly takes the form of action directed against government (a unified target) rather than against individual homeowners (who present a dispersed target). One problem with this approach is that it tends to obscure the possibility that targets, as collections of individuals, may be divided in evaluation of and sympathy for protest demands. Indeed, city agency administrators under some circumstances act as partisans in protest conflicts. As such, they frequently appear ambivalent toward protest goals: sympathetic to the ends while concerned that the means employed in protest reflect negatively on their agencies.

Some of the constraints placed on protest leadership in influencing target groups have already been mentioned in preceding sections. The lack of status and resources that inhibit protest groups from participating in policymaking conferences, for example, also helps prevent explicit bargaining between protest leaders and city officials. The strain between rhetoric which appeals to protest participants and public statements to which communications media and "third parties" respond favorably also exists with reference to target groups.

Yet there is a distinguishing feature of the maintenance needs and strategies of city agencies which specifically constrains protest organizations. This is the agency director's need to protect "the jurisdiction and income of his organization [by]...[m]anipulation of the external environment." In so doing he may satisfy his reference groups without responding to protest group demands. At least six tactics are available to protest targets who are motivated to respond in some way to protest activity but seek primarily to satisfy their reference publics. These tactics may be employed whether or not target groups are "sincere" in responding to protest demands.

1. Target groups may dispense symbolic satisfactions. Appearances of activity and commitment to problems substitute for, or supplement, resource allocation and policy innovations which would constitute tangible responses to protest activity. If symbolic responses supplement tangible pay-offs, they are frequently coincidental, rather than intimately linked, to projection of response by protest targets. Typical in city politics of the symbolic response is the ribbon cutting, street corner ceremony or the walking tour press conference. These occasions are utilized not only to build agency constituencies,52 but to satisfy agency reference publics that attention is being directed to problems of civic concern. In this sense publicist tactics may be seen as defensive maneuvers. Symbolic aspects of the actions of public officials can also be recognized in the commissioning of expensive studies and the rhetorical flourishes with which "massive attacks," "comprehensive programs," and "coordinated planning" are frequently promoted.

City agencies establish distinct apparatus and procedures for dealing with crises which may be provoked by protest groups. Housingrelated departments in New York City may be cited for illustration. It is usually the case in these agencies that the Commissioner or a chief deputy, a press secretary and one or two other officials devote whatever time is necessary to collect information, determine policy and respond quickly to reports of "crises." This is functional for tenants, who, if they can generate enough concern, may be able to obtain shortcuts through lengthy agency procedures. It is also functional for officials who want to project images of action rather than merely receiving complaints. Concentrating attention on the maintenance needs of city politicians during protest crises suggests that pronouncements of public officials serve purposes independent of their dedication to alleviation of slum conditions.53

Independent of dispensation of tangible benefits to protest groups, public officials continue to respond primarily to their own reference publics. Murray Edelman has suggested that:

Tangible resources and benefits are frequently not distributed to unorganized political group interests as promised in regulatory statutes and the propaganda attending their enactment.⁵⁴

His analysis may be supplemented by suggesting that symbolic dispensations may not only serve to reassure unorganized political group interests, but may also contribute to reducing the anxiety level of organized interests and wider publics which are only tangentially involved in the issues.

2. Target groups may dispense token material satisfactions. When city agencies respond, with much publicity, to cases brought to their attention representing examples of the needs dramatized by protest organizations, they may appear to respond to protest demands while in fact only responding on a case basis, instead of a general basis. For the protesters served by agencies in this fashion it is of considerable advantage that agencies can be influenced by protest action. Yet it should not be ignored that in handling the "crisis" cases, public officials give the appearance of response ⁵¹ Sayre and Kaufman, op. cit., p. 253.

⁵² See ibid., pp. 253 ff.

⁵³ See Lipsky, op. cit., chs. 5-6. The appearance of responsiveness may be given by city officials in anticipation of protest activity. This seems to have been the strategy of Mayor Richard Daley in his reaction to the announcement of Martin Luther King's plans to focus civil rights efforts on Chicago. See The New York Times, February 1, 1966, p. 11.

⁵⁴ See Edelman, op. cit., p. 23.

to their reference publics, while mitigating demands for an expensive, complex general assault on problems represented by the cases to which responses are given. Token responses, whether or not accompanied by more general responses, are particularly attractive to reporters and television news directors, who are able to dramatize individual cases convincingly, but who may be unable to "capture" the essence of general deprivation or of general efforts to alleviate conditions of deprivation.

3. Target groups may organize and innovate internally in order to blunt the impetus of protest efforts. This tactic is closely related to No. 2 (above). If target groups can act constructively in the worst cases, they will then be able to pre-empt protest efforts by responding to the cases which best dramatize protest demands. Alternatively, they may designate all efforts which jeopardize agency reputations as "worst" cases, and devote extensive resources to these cases. In some ways extraordinary city efforts are precisely consistent with protest goals. At the same time extraordinary efforts in the most heavily dramatized cases or the most extreme cases effectively wear down the "cuttingedges" of protest efforts.

Many New York City agencies develop informal "crisis" arrangements not only to project publicity, as previously indicated, but to mobilize energies toward solving "crisis" cases. They may also develop policy innovations which allow them to respond more quickly to "crisis" situations. These innovations may be important to some city residents, for whom the problems of dealing with city bureaucracies can prove insurmountable. It might be said, indeed, that the goals of protest are to influence city agencies to handle every case with the same resources that characterize their dispatch of "crisis" cases. 55

But such policies would demand major revenue inputs. This kind of qualitative policy change is difficult to achieve. Meanwhile, internal reallocation of resources only means that routine services must be neglected so that the "crisis" programs can be enhanced. If all cases are expedited, as in a typical "crisis" response, then none can be. Thus for purposes of general solutions, "crisis" resolving can be self-defeating unless accompanied by significantly greater resource allocation. It is not self-defeating, however, to the extent that the organizational goals of city agencies are to serve a clientele while minimizing negative publicity concerning agency vigilance and responsiveness.

4. Target groups may appear to be constrained in their ability to grant protest goals. This may be directed toward making the protesters appear to be unreasonable in their demands, or to be well-meaning individuals who "just don't understand how complex running a city really is." Target groups may extend sympathy but claim that they lack resources, a mandate from constituents, and/or authority to respond to protest demands. Target groups may also evade protest demands by arguing that "If-I-give-it-to-you-I-have-to-give-it-to-everyone."

The tactic of appearing constrained is particularly effective with established civic groups because there is an undeniable element of truth to it. Everyone knows that cities are financially undernourished. Established civic groups expend great energies lobbying for higher levels of funding for their pet city agencies. Thus they recognize the validity of this constraint when posed by city officials. But it is not inconsistent to point out that funds for specific, relatively inexpensive programs, or for the expansion of existing programs, can often be found if pressure is increased. While constraints on city government flexibility may be extensive, they are not absolute. Protest targets nonetheless attempt to diminish the impact of protest demands by claiming relative impotence.

5. Target groups may use their extensive resources to discredit protest leaders and organizations. Utilizing their excellent access to the press, public officials may state or imply that leaders are unreliable, ineffective as leaders ("they don't really have the people behind them"), guilty of criminal behavior, potentially guilty of such behavior, or are some shade of "left-wing." Any of these allegations may serve to diminish the appeal of protest groups to potentially sympathetic third parties. City officials, in their frequent social and informal business interaction with leaders of established civic groups, may also communicate derogatory information concerning protest groups. Discrediting of protest groups may be undertaken by some city officials while others appear (perhaps authentically) to remain sympathetic to protest demands. These tactics may be engaged in by public officials whether or not there is any validity to the allegations.

6. Target groups may postpone action. The effect of postponement, if accompanied by symbolic assurances, is to remove immediate pressure and delay specific commitments to a future date. This familiar tactic is particularly effective in dealing with protest groups because of their inherent instability. Protest groups are usually comprised of individuals whose intense political activity cannot be sustained except in rare circumstances. Further, to the extent that protest depends upon activating reference publics through strategies which have some "shock" value, it becomes increasingly difficult to activate these groups. Additionally, protest activity is inherently unstable because of the strains placed upon protest leaders who must attempt to manage four constituencies (as described herein).

⁵⁵ See Lipsky, op. cit., pp. 156, 249 ff.

⁵⁶ On the strategy of appearing constrained, see Schelling, op. cit., pp. 22 ff.

The most frequent method of postponing action is to commit a subject to "study." For the many reasons elaborated in these paragraphs, it is not likely that ad hoc protest groups will be around to review the recommendations which emerge from study. The greater the expertise and the greater the status of the group making the study, the less will protest groups be able to influence whatever policy emerges. Protest groups lack the skills and resource personnel to challenge expert recommendations effectively.

Sometimes surveys and special research are undertaken in part to evade immediate pressures. Sometimes not. Research efforts are particularly necessary to secure the support of established civic groups, which place high priority on orderly procedure and policy emerging from independent analysis. Yet it must be recognized that postponing policy commitments has a distinct impact on the nature of the pressures focused on policy-makers.

IV. CONCLUSION

In this analysis I have agreed with James Q. Wilson that protest is correctly conceived as a strategy utilized by relatively powerless groups in order to increase their bargaining ability. As such, I have argued, it is successful to the extent that the reference publics of protest targets can be activated to enter the conflict in ways favorable to protest goals. I have suggested a model of the protest process which may assist in ordering data and indicating the salience for research of a number of aspects of protest. These include the critical role of communications media, the differential impact of material and symbolic rewards on "feedback" in protest activity, and the reciprocal relationships of actors in the protest process.

An estimation of the limits to protest efficacy, I have argued further, can be gained by recognizing the problems encountered by protest leaders who somehow must balance the conflicting maintenance needs of four groups in the protest process. This approach transcends a focus devoted primarily to characterization of group goals and targets, by suggesting that even in an environment which is relatively favorable to specific protest goals, the tensions which must be embraced by protest leadership may ultimately overwhelm protest activity.

At the outset of this essay, it was held that conceptualizing the American political system as "slack" or "fluid," in the manner of Robert Dahl, appears inadequate because of (1) a vagueness centering on the likelihood that any group can make itself heard: (2) a possible confusion as to which groups tend to receive satisfaction from the rewards dispensed by public officials; and (3) a lumping together as equally relevant rewards which are tangible and those which are symbolic. To the extent that protest is engaged in by relatively powerless groups which must create resources with which to bargain, the analysis here suggests a number of reservations concerning the pluralist conceptualization of the "fluidity" of the American political system.

Relatively powerless groups cannot use protest with a high probability of success. They lack organizational resources, by definition. But even to create bargaining resources through activating third parties, some resources are necessary to sustain organization. More importantly, relatively powerless protest groups are constrained by the unresolvable conflicts which are forced upon protest leaders who must appeal simultaneously to four constituencies which place upon them antithetical demands.

When public officials recognize the legitimacy of protest activity, they may not direct public policy toward protest groups at all. Rather, public officials are likely to aim responses at the reference publics from which they originally take their cues. Edelman has suggested that regulatory policy in practice often consists of reassuring mass publics while at the same time dispensing specific, tangible values to narrow interest groups. It is suggested here that symbolic reassurances are dispensed as much to wide, potentially concerned publics which are not directly affected by regulatory policy, as they are to wide publics comprised of the cowntrodden and the deprived, in whose name policy is often written.

Complementing Edelman, it is proposed here that in the process of protest symbolic reassurances are dispensed in large measure because these are the public policy outcomes and actions desired by the constituencies to which public officials are most responsive. Satisfying these wider publics, city officials can avoid pressures toward other policies placed upon them by protest organizations

Not only should there be some doubt as to which groups receive the symbolic recognitions which Dahl describes, but in failing to distinguish between the kinds of rewards dispensed to groups in the political system, Dahl avoids a fundamental question. It is literally fundamental because the kinds of rewards which can be obtained from politics, one might hypothesize, will have an impact upon the realistic appraisal of the efficacy of political activity. If among the groups least capable of organizing for political activity there is a history of organizing for protest, and if that activity, once engaged in, is rewarded primarily by the dispensation of symbolic gestures without perceptible changes in material conditions, then rational behavior might lead to expressions of apathy and lack of interest in politics or a rejection of conventional political channels as a meaningful arena of activity. In this sense this discussion of protest politics is consistent with Kenneth Clark's observations that the image of power, unaccompanied by material and observable rewards, leads to impressions of helplessness and reinforces political apathy in the ghetto.57

Recent commentary by political scientists and others regarding riots in American cities seems to focus in part on the extent to which relatively deprived groups may seek redress of legitimate grievances. Future research should continue assessment of the relationship betweer riots and the conditions under which access to the political system has been limited. In such research assessment of the ways in which access to public officials is obtained by relatively powerless groups through the protest process might be one important research focus.

⁵⁷ Clark, op. cit., pp. 154 ff.

The instability of protest activity outlined in this article also should inform contemporary. political strategies. If the arguments presented here are persuasive, civil rights leaders who insist that protest activity is a shallow foundation on which to seek long-term, concrete gains may be judged essentially correct. But the arguments concerning the fickleness of the white liberal, or the ease of changing discriminatory laws relative to changing discriminatory institutions, only in part explain the instability of protest movements. An explanation which derives its strength from analysis of the political process suggests concentration on the problems of managing protest constituencies. Accordingly, Alinsky is probably on the soundest ground when he prescribes protest for the purpose of building organization. Ultimately, relatively powerless groups in most instances cannot depend upon activating other actors in the politica process. Long-run success will depend upon the acquisition of stable political resources which do not rely for their use on third parties.

MOTIVATION, INCENTIVE SYSTEMS, AND THE POLITICAL PARTY ORGANIZATION*

M. MARGARET CONWAY University of Maryland

AND

FRANK B. FEIGERT Knox College

I. MODELS OF LOCAL PARTY ORGANIZATION

Several different models of local political party organization can be found in the accumulating studies of American local politics. One model is typified by the research of Forthal, Gosnell, Kent, and Salter, and presents a picture of the party organization as attracting and disciplining workers through material incentives, non-ideological in its appeals, and oriented toward obtaining votes for securing or maintaining the party in political control of the government. An alternative model has been described in more recent research by Wilson, Hirschfield. and Carney.2 They portray the party activist as being more ideologically oriented, responding to ideological rather than material incentives, and seeking governmental reform or im-

* Acknowledged are the financial support of the Computer Science Center, University of Maryland, the contributions of students in a survey research course to one of the studies on which this is based, and the assistance of Fran Feigert. Also acknowledged are the financial support provided to the senior author by the General Research Board of the Graduate School, University of Maryland, and to the junior author from the Faculty Research Fund of Knox College. The cooperation of the county chairmen and precinct chairmen of the two counties is appreciated by the proved governmental services. Changes in the environment have been identified as the causal forces for this change in political party organizational style. For example, Greenstein points out that urban party machines developed to provide required services for which demand was generated by rapid urbanization, disorganized governmental structures, and the needs of recent immigrants.3 The research describing the material-incentive-motivated political chines was produced primarily during the 1920's and 1930's when the need for accommodation to urban problems of the type described existed to a greater degree than at present.

¹ Sonya Forthal, Cogwheels of Democracy: A Study of the Precinct Captain (New York: William-Frederick Press, 1946); Harold F. Gosnell, Machine Politics: Chicago Model (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1937); Frank R. Kent, The Great Game of Politics (New York: Doubleday Doran, 1923); J. T. Salter, Boss Rule: Portraits in City Politics (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1935).

² James Q. Wilson, The Amateur Democrat: Club Politics in Three Cities (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962); Robert S. Hirshfield, Bert E. Swanson, and Blanche D. Blank, "A Profile of Political Activists in Manhattan," Western Political Quarterly, 15 (September, 1962), 489-506; Francis Carney, The Rise of the Democratic Clubs in California, Eagleton Foundation Case Studies in Practical Politics (New York: Henry Holt and Company, Inc., 1958).

The social characteristics of the activists as well as the political style of the two types of party organizations described in the professional and amateur models also differ. The professional model presents a party organization whose members are male, oriented toward material rewards or a career in government, and exhibit little concern for issues. The amateur model presents a pattern of workers who are not oriented toward material rewards, tend to be of higher status in occupation, income, education, and life style, and who participate in politics in large part as a response to concern for particular issues.4 Women are much more likely to be active in the amateur style party organization.5

Wilson suggests that over a period of time amateurs may assimilate the political style and motivational patterns of professionals.6 Evidence of this is present in other studies. Eldersveld found in his study of Detroit party organizations that 74 per cent of the Democratic and 85 per cent of the Republican precinct committeemen began their party activity with impersonal or purposive motivations of moral, philosophical, or ideological satisfactions. However, only 7 per cent of the Democrats and 20 per cent of the Republicans reported those satisfac-

- 3 Fred I. Greenstein, The American Party System and the American People (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.; Prentice-Hall, 1963), pp. 39-41.
 - 4 Wilson, op. cit., pp. 2-16.
- ⁵ Ibid., pp. 62-63.
- 6 Ibid., p. 5.

tions as being currently derived from party activity. The predominant satisfaction had become that derived from social contacts.

Wilson argues that the sharp distinction between professionals and amateurs is continued through the amateur clubs, with additional evidence for his assertion being presented in Carnev's study of the Democratic clubs in California and Blaisdell's study of the liberal reform movement in New York City.8 One can argue that a particular environment might contribute to the retention of the amateur style in politics within the formal party organization. Party politics in an affluent community might tend toward an issue-oriented style of politics attractive to the amateur, with this style being maintained within the organization and retained by the organization worker over a considerable period of time.

Clark and Wilson, in an examination of the incentives available to organizations, indicate three types are possible: material or monetary; solidary, deriving from the act of participation itself through the conferring of status, prestige, etc.; and purposive, attained through achievement of organizational goals. The type of incentive used by a party organization has implications for the internal functioning of the organization itself, for the relationship between the political party and the political system of which it is a part, and the interactions between the political system and the general social system.

Joseph Schlesinger has pointed out that a party organization using material incentives has the greatest flexibility both in establishing goals to be sought by the organization and in selecting the means to attain them. ¹⁰ As an organization moves from material to solidary to purposive incentives, it reduces flexibility in goal definition and strategy. Inflexibility within the organization due to the rigid adherence of organizational members to particular issue stands limits the ability of the political party to

- ⁷ Samuel J. Eldersveld, Political Parties: A Behavioral Analysis (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1964), pp. 277–292.
- ⁸ Carney, op. cit.; Donald C. Blaisdell, The Riverside Democrats, Eagleton Institute Cases in Practical Politics (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1960).
- ⁹ Peter B. Clark and James Q. Wilson, "Incentive Systems: A Theory of Organizations," Administrative Science Quarterly, 6 (September, 1961), 134-137.
- ¹⁰ Joseph A. Schlesinger, "Political Party Organization," in James G. March (ed.), Handbook of Organizations (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1965), p. 768.

perform its functions within the political system¹¹ or act in its interactive role with the environmental social system.

A third model of party organization has been summarized by Schlesinger.12 He argues that the basic unit of party organization is that evolving around a collective effort to capture a single public office; in other words, party organization at the local level often means an organization formed around a candidate for public office. The predominant orientation of the organization is seizing control of public office at some time, however far distant in the future that might be. Contributions to the nucleus may not be openly identifiable as organizational activity, and may be of a minimal (i.e., absolutely essential) or connective nature, such as the provision of leadership, issue formulation, communications functions, recruitment to party work and nomination for office, provisions of technical services, and the securing of funds. Whether effective party leadership is exercised by the public office holder or organizational leader is viewed by Schlesinger as a function of the degree of interparty competition and formal or traditional restraints on leadership. However, Schlesinger does not indicate the relationship between the locational focus of effective party leadership and the incentive which predominates in the party system of a locality. In what type of system are those who surround a potential candidate and form the nucleus of the party organization more likely to be motivated by material, solidary, or purposive incentives?

One may easily conceive of these three broad models of party organization as counterpoised, in effect, to the major orientations of the voter. Campbell et al. have repeatedly stressed that voters are oriented in three veins, toward the party, toward issues, and toward candidates.13 While some voters are "pure types," most may be thought of as being somewhat mixed in their orientations. Similarly, the material, issue (purposive), and office-oriented organizations are "pure types," but in the typological sense only. Hence, when we specify a label for either a voter or a party organization we do not insist on a single orientation which necessarily excludes all others. Rather, we are speaking of the dominant tendency of that voter or organization. The interaction of the organizational and voter

- ¹¹ For a discussion of party functions, see, for example, Neil A. McDonald, The Study of Political Parties (New York: Random House, 1955), pp. 22–26.
 - ¹² Schlesinger, loc. cit., pp. 767-769, 774-786.
- ¹³ Angus Campbell, Gerald Gurin, and Warren E. Miller, The Voter Decides (Evanston, Ill.: Row, Peterson and Company, 1954), pp. 88-143.

typologies remains a rich field for further exploration.¹⁴

Several recent studies have examined the social and behavioral characteristics of party activists. Robert Salisbury, in a study of six clubs in St. Louis and St. Louis County, found that neither the professional nor amateur model fits his sample. 15 In social characteristics, club members interviewed more approximated the professional type, while in terms of primary group membership those interviewed fit neither the amateur nor the professional model. Club members tended to specialize in politics rather than being members of a number of organizations. Stimulus to participation was party related, of an habitual nature, and deriving perhaps from family socialization. Althoff and Patterson in a study of rural, Southern Illinois precinct committeemen found a pattern more in consonance with the professional than amateur in terms of occupational status, education, and income.16 The precinct committeemen also had a high level of political aspirations. Motivations to party work were ignored, however, in an attempt to derive prevailing orientations of committeemen. These were found to be of either the campaign or organization type.

Another study of precinct committeemen conducted by Bowman and Boynton in selected non-metropolitan communities examined the political and social characteristics of the party officials. They found that party workers in the communities studied tended to come from white collar occupations, and forty per cent had a college education.¹⁷ In terms of reasons for becoming active in politics, from 20 to 30 per cent of the individuals in their four sub-samples indicated purposive motivations.¹⁸

In his study of political party officials in Detroit, Eldersveld found distinct differences between the two parties in the social characteristics of precinct leaders. Republicans tended ¹⁴ See, for example, Murray B. Levin and Murray Eden, "Political Strategy for the Alienated Voter," Public Opinion Quarterly, 26 (Spring, 1962), 47-62.

¹⁵ Robert H. Salisbury, "The Urban Party Oraganization Member," Public Opinion Quarterly, 29 (Winter, 1965–1966), 553–561.

¹⁶ Phillip Althoff and Samuel C. Patterson, "Political Activism in a Rural County," Midwest Journal of Political Science, 10 (February, 1966), 80. 42.

¹⁷ Lewis Bowman and G. R. Boynton, "Recruitment Patterns Among Local Party Officials: A Model and Some Preliminary Findings in Selected Locales," this REVIEW, 60 (September, K966), 670-71.

18 Ibid., p. 674.

to draw precinct leadership from white collar occupations while the Democrats were more likely to be craftsmen or blue collar workers. However, the Detroit parties were relatively open and clientele-oriented, with attempts made to recruit persons from groups predominantly within the opposition party's coalition to serve as party precinct leaders. This was done through both conscious party effort and informal extra-party activity, although much induction to party activity was self-generated. 20

Which, if any, of these three models of party organization is appropriate? We shall concentrate on analyzing the conditions under which activists with particular patterns of social characteristics and motivations are to be found in the party organization at the precinct leader level.

What variables might account for differences in the personal characteristics of precinct leaders and in organizational style as they are reflected in the incentive systems to which party activists respond? Several can be suggested. One would anticipate that in a predominantly suburban, middle class area the incentive to political activity would not be solidary or material but would tend more toward purposive rewards. In an area with a less prosperous socioeconomic base, one might anticipate greater emphasis on material and also on solidary incentives for initial party activity. In other words, we hypothesize that the amateur style in politics tends to predominate in a particular type of social system, with both greater initial entry for purposive reasons and greater retention of initial purposive motivation among activists in the more affluent environment. This contrasts with Wilson's hypothesis that the activists entering the party for purposive satisfactions generally experience a decline in this incentive and an increase in the importance of solidary and material incentives.21

Another variable influencing differential patterns of incentives and personal characteristics might be the normal majority or minority status of the party within the effective political unit. The majority party would be more likely to be staffed with persons entering party activity for material reasons. Access to state patronage through being a member of the normally dominant party in a state might also result in differential degrees of the importance of material incentives within a county's political parties.

Eldersveld found a much greater emphasis on purposive reasons for originally becoming active in politics than did Bowman and Boynton.

¹⁹ Eldersveld, op. cit., pp. 54, 58.

²⁰ Ibid., pp. 59-72.

²¹ Wilson, op. cit., pp. 4-5.

Perhaps size or population density of the political unit is in some way related to the reasons for becoming active in politics; the increased size and complexity of the modern party organization in metropolitan areas may obscure the opportunities for material and solidary rewards. Another variable may be the degree to which non-partisan elections are used for the election of local officials, and, if they are used, the type of non-partisan system which exists. Use of the non-partisan system may inhibit recognition of opportunities for material reward or reduce access to this type of incentive.

II. THE DATA

We examine the hypothesized differences in personal characteristics and patterns of incentives by using survey data collected in two quite different political units, one an agricultural and industrial county located in northwest Illinois, the other a large suburban county outside Washington, D. C. populated primarily by commuters to the national capital and by workers in the research and development organizations located in the area. The survey of Montgomery County, Maryland, leaders was conducted during May, 1966; a response rate of 64 per cent was obtained. The Knox County study was conducted in the period from mid-April to mid-May, 1967, with a response rate of 62 per cent.22 The research instrument included questions on social background, political socialization, recruitment to political activity, motivations, and role definition was well as a series of ideological and personality inventory questions.

Knox County, Illinois, is traditionally overwhelmingly Republican in its voting behavior, but also has a recently energized Democratic party organization. Scandinavian descendents have acquired a position of preeminence in local Republican politics. Republicans tend to be oriented toward a concern with local politics, while Democrats, with little hope of gaining local elective offices, concentrate on state, congressional, and other federal offices. In 1959 the ²² The Montgomery County leaders were personally interviewed; the Knox County leaders responded to the same research instrument administered as mail questionnaires. Two problems generally exist in the use of mail questionnaires, these being the obtaining of an adequate response rate and the obtaining of a representative sample. The response rate for the Knox County leaders was sufficient and examination of the pattern of returned questionnaires indicated that representativeness in terms of party affiliation, socio-economic characteristics, and residential patterns was obtained.

median family income of Knox County was $5755, below the state median of $6566.

Montgomery County, Maryland, formerly was dominated by the Democratic party, and while voter registration still heavily favors the Democrats, the Republicans have had control of the county council since 1962, although they do not present a united stand in council votes on major issues. The Democrats traditionally have elected a majority of the county's legislative delegation. The primaries of both parties have had well organized and ideologically structured factions engaging in battle for nomination to local and state offices in recent years. In 1959 the county had the highest median family income in the United States, with a very high level of educational attainment and a preponderance of professional and other white collar occupations among its residents. In 1959 the the median family income in the county was $9317, compared with a state median of $6309. The two counties appear well suited for a test of the various models of party organization, for we can compare social characteristics and motivations to see if any consistent differences exist between party organizations operating in different environmental contexts.

III. FINDINGS

The amateur type in politics has been descriped as varying from the professional in his social characteristics as well as in his motivational drives. Table 1 indicates that the social characteristics of party precinct leaders are different in the two counties. A statistical test was used to assess the degree of association between type of county and each social characteristic of precinct leaders and between party affiliation within each county and each social characteristic.23 Comparing the two counties, precinct chairmen differ in income, age, occupation, sex, and educational characteristics but not in race. Knox County activists are more likely to be affiliated with lower status religious denominations, to be older, to have lower income, to have considerably less education, and to be males than precinct leaders in Montgomery County. The precinct leaders differ in their occupational composition with far more in Montgomery County being professional men, employed asmanagers, officials, or proprietors of business

The statistical measure of association used is Kendall's tau. For a discussion of tau, see M. G. Kendall, Rank Correlation Methods (London Charles Griffin and Company, 1955). In the analysis of social characteristics, Episcopal, Presbyterian and Congregational faiths are classified as high-status Protestant religions; all other Protestant religions are classified as low-status

TABLE 1. DEMOGRAPHIC CHARACTERISTICS OF PRECINCT CHAIRMEN, BY PARTY AND COUNTY

	$\mathbf{Montgom}$	ery County	Knox County
Characteristic	Democrat	Republican	Democrat	Republican
Marital Status	1 1 2 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1
Married	95.0%	89.4%	87.1%	86.4%
Single	5.0	4.6	5.1	5.5
Widowed	-	3.0	3.7	8.1
Divorced		3.0	5.1	_
	100.007	100.000	100.007	100.00
Religion	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%
Jewish	20.0%	1 5 07	2.6%
	, ,	1.5%
Catholic	8.3	18.2	28.2	5.4%
Protestant:	10.0	4 PP - A	18 0	10.0
High Status	18.3	47.0	17.9	16.2
Low Status	33.3	27.3	43.6	78.4
Other or None	20.0	6.1	7.7
	99.92%	100.1 %	100.0%	100.0%
Age	• •	, ,	• •
21-30	1.7%	9.1%	5.1%	5.4%
31-40	26.7	36.4	12.8	2.7
41-50	38.3	28.8	30.8	21.6
51-65	31.7	19.7	48.7	62.2
Over 65	1.7	6.1	2.6	8.1
	100.1°%	100.10%	100.0%	100.0%
	$\tau = .179$	$\tau = .317$	$\tau = .223$	100.0%
Income
Under $3,000		1.5%	2.6%	10.8%
$ 3,000- 4,999	5.1%	1.5	2.6	10.8
$ 5,000-6,999	1.7	13.6	12.8	8.1
$ 7,000- 9,999	15.3	27.3	35.9	32.4
$10,000-14,999	33.9	31.8	28.2	32.4
$15,000-19,999	37.3	19.7	7.7	2.7
$20,000 and over	6.8	1.5	10.3	2.7
	0.0		10.9	4.1
No response		3.0
	100.1°%	99.92%	100.1 %	99.90%
	$\tau =290$	$\tau =294$	$\tau =199$
Education
Less than 8th	1 50	4 200	0.07	w 407
grade Eighth grade	1.7%	4.5%	2.6%	5.4%
completed		1.5	10.3	2.7
Some high school		1.5	12.8	24.3
	8.5			40.5
Completed h.s.		6.1	41.0
Some college	11.9	25.8	12.8	13.5
Completed college Work on advanced	30.5	37.9	10.3	10.8
degree	11.9	4.5	2.6	2.7
Completed advanced degree	35.6	18.2	7.7
advamou wegice			-	00.0.0
	$100.1^{a}\%$ $\tau =284$	100.0% $\tau =629$	$100.1^{\circ}\%$ $\tau =083$	99.9*%

TABLE 1—(Continued)

	Montgome	ery County	Knox (County
Characteristic	Democrat	Republican	Democrat	Republican
Occupation	A CONTRACTOR OF THE CONTRACTOR
Professional	41.7%	36.4%	12.8%	5.4%
Farmers		1.5	7.7	16.2
Managers, Officials
or Proprietors	8.3	10.7	2.6	2.7
Clerical	5.0	4.5	5.1	10.8
Sales	8.3	9.1	5.1	27.0
Craftsmen, Fore-	•
men and kindred	1.7	1.5	38.5	2.7
Operatives	*	3.0	10.3	2.7
Private household workers
Service workers	-		_	8.1
Farm laborers
and Foremen	1.7	_		2.7
Laborers	6.7	1.5	12.8
Students	3.3	1.5		2.7
Housewives	20.0	16.7	2.6	5.4
Retired or
Unemployed	3.3	9.1	2.6	5.4
Not reported	QUANTITION	4.5	-	8.1
	100.0%	100.0%	100.10%	99.9 %
	$\tau = .0846$	$\tau = .122$	$\tau = .105$, -
Sex
Male	60.0%	68.1%	89.8%	87.2%
Female	40.0	32.9	10.2	12.8
	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%
Race	,0	, .	,
White	96.7%	98.5%	100.0%	97.3%
Negro	3.3	1.5		2.7
	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%
N	60	66	39	37

a Totals in all tables may not equal 100.0% because of rounding.

enterprises, or unemployed housewives. Certainly, in their socio-economic characteristics, the composition of the precinct leaders in Montgomery County approximates the amateur model, and we conclude that the county with the stronger economic base does more closely approximate this model.

Assuredly, differences do exist between the two parties in each county. Within Knox County, Republican and Democratic activists differ in religious affiliation and age but not in other characteristics examined. In Montgomery County, Republican and Democratic activists differ in age, income level, and educational development. While both parties have precinct chairmen drawn from relatively high income families, the Democrats appear to constitute a more affluent group than the Republicans. In both counties, activists in the traditional minority party tend to be younger than their counterparts in the majority party.

Several questions were asked which make it possible to evaluate the motivations perceived by the precinct leaders themselves as effective stimuli at various key points in their political careers. The activists were asked questions about their motivations for initial entry into political activity and for becoming a precinct committeeman. Each was also asked what satisfactions he believed the average precinct leader derived from his role and what he himself would miss most if he quit his post as a precinct

TABLE 2. REASON WHICH BEST EXPLAINS WHY BECAME ACTIVE IN POLITICS

	Montgome	ery County	Knox County
Reason	Democrat	Republican	Democrat	Republican
Personal Friendship for a
Candidate	6.6%	1.5%	10.3%	10.8%
Way of Life	11.7	4.5	20.5	8.1
Attachment to Party	10.0	16.7	23.1	18.9
Enjoyment of Social
Contacts			2.6	10.8
Enjoyment of Campaign
Excitement	1.7		_	8.1
Build Personal Position
in Politics			2.6
Influence Policies	30.0	42.4	17.9	16.2
Be Close to People Doing			-	-
Important Things			2.6	2.7
Business Contacts		1.5
Community Recognition		4.5
Civic Duty	40.0	28.8	20.5	16.2
No Response		_		8.1

	100.0%	99.9%	100.1%	99.9%
N	60	66	39	37
	$\tau = .089$	$\tau = .281$	$\tau = .011$

chairman. From these questions we can evaluate the activist's motivations for political activity at three key points in his political career, these three being initial entry, accepting the post of precinct leader, and current or on-going satisfactions. In this manner we can evaluate if in fact the leaders in two different socio-economic environments differ in their motivations at these three career stages.

The data in Table 2 indicate some interesting differences in the motivational patterns for initial entry into political work between precinct leaders in the two counties. Attachment to party, personal friendship with a candidate, and enjoyment of social contacts are cited by more activists in the rural county. Politics being regarded as part of a way of life is more likely to be given by Democrats as a reason for political activity, and more frequently in the rural county. However, the key differences are in the frequency with which the activists cited civic duty and desire to influence governmental policies as the principal reasons for their becoming politically active, with suburban county activists more frequently citing these reasons for initial party activity. Grouping explanations cited as most important into the motivational categories of ideological, other impersonal, social contacts, and other personal reasons, we find the distribution of major types of motivation for the best explanations of the activists' initial entry into politics as presented in Table 3.24 Ranking the party organizations in terms of the frequency with which ideological and other impersonal reasons are given, the rankings are as follows:

Suburban County Republicans 87.9% Suburban County Democrats 80.0% Rural County Democrats 61.5% Rural County Republicans 41.3%

24 Social contacts consist of positive responses to desire to be close to people doing important things, friendship for a candidate, community recognition, enjoyment of campaign excitement. and enjoyment of social contacts. Other personal includes desire to build a personal position in politics, business contacts, and politics as a part of the respondent's way of life. Ideological consists of desire to influence governmental policy, and other impersonal consists of desire to fulfill civic responsibility and attachment to one's political party. Ideological and other impersonal satisfactions are roughly equivalent with Clark and Wilson's purposive category and social contacts with the solidary category. Other impersonal is loosely equivalent to material rewards, although building a personal position in politics undoubtedly includes ego-satisfying rewards as well as material rewards to be derived from the eventually attained political position.

TABLE 3. TYPE	OF	MOTTVATTON	CITED BO	TATOTAT	POLITICAL.	A CONTRITORY
TADDE O. TIPE	Ur	MOTIAVITON	CITED BO	TO THATTACE	LODITIONE	ACTIVITI

	Montgome	ery County	Knox County
Motivation	Democrat	Republican	Democrat	Republican
Ideological	30.0%	42.4%	17.9%	16.2%
Other Impersonal	50.0	45.4	43.6	35.1
Social Contacts	8.3	6.1	15.5	32.4
Other Personal	11.7	6.1	23.1	8.1
Not Ascertained				8.1
	100.0%	100.0%	100.1%	99.9%
Ň	60	66	39	37
	$\tau =156$	$\tau = .305$	$\tau \stackrel{\sim}{=} .021$

If the party is an organization formed around a candidate with members motivated by the purpose of electing the actual or potential candidate to office, we would expect to find a sizable number of party activists stating this as a principal reason for becoming active in politics. However, as Table 2 indicates, this factor appears minimal; approximately 11 per cent of the activists in Knox County indicated this was the principal reason for their becoming active in politics. Even fewer cited it in Montgomery County.

We cannot, for the two counties studied, reject the hypothesis that the set of motivations for initial entry into political party work is far more likely to be ideological or impersonal in nature in an affluent community. In the rural county, motives for initial political entry tend more to be purposive among leaders of the party which is traditionally subordinate electorally in the county but competitive in the state-wide contests. Further, both rural parties' activists are far more likely to have been stimulated in their original entry into party work by solidary or material motives than are the suburban activists. This may be due in part to the strong patronage powers available within the state. Illinois is second only to Pennsylvania in terms of this factor, as the gubernatorial party may have up to 21,000 positions available for appointment.25 As a consequence, the Knox Democrats, although a decided minority at the polls, can "distribute" jobs among a broad variety of state agencies within the county.

The second stage of the precinct leaders' political career for which motivations to political activity was queried was reasons for accepting the post of precinct leader. Precinct committeemen from the two counties could be said to differ to a degree. In both counties they tended to give heavy emphasis to the same reasons, namely, concern with issues, desire to elect a particular candidate, or a generalized response of fulfilling citizen responsibilities. The one exception to this is the Knox County Republicans, where the third most frequently cited reason for activity was the prompting of friends. Table 4 indicates the per cent responding in each category. In each party in both counties, the most frequently cited reason for taking the precinct leader's post is civic duty. One must question whether or not this might be a rationalization of other motives. In all four sets of precinct leaders, the second most frequent response is a concern with issues, with approximately onethird of the Knox County leaders in both parties and the Democrats in the suburban county giving this response. For only one-fifth of the Republicans in Montgomery County is this the most important reason.

²⁵ Austin Ranney, Illinois Politics (New York: New York University Press, prepared under the auspices of the Citizenship Clearing House, 1960), pp. 33-34; Frank J. Sorauf, "State Patronage in a Rural County," this Review, 50 (December, 1956), 1046-1056.

At the second stage in the precinct leaders' political careers for which we have information about motives, we find once again an indication of the inadequacy of the model viewing the party organization as a candidate-oriented social system. While for three of the four sets of leaders it is the third most frequently stated reason for accepting the post, the proportion citing it ranged from only one-twelfth to one-fifth. As a stimulus for taking the precinct leader post, cancidate orientation appears to be a minor factor when viewed in relation to other stimuli.

Groups in the community have the opportunity to contribute to the recruitment process by initiating the idea of seeking the precinct chairman's office or supporting an alreadymade decision by an individual. We can inquire

TABLE 4. SINGLE FACTOR MOST IMPORTANT IN THE DECISION TO BECOME A PRECINCT CHAIRMAN

77 - 4 - 11	$\mathbf{Montgome}$	ery County	Knox County
Factor —	Democrat	Republican	Democrat	Republican
Concern with Issues	30.0%	18.2%	30.8%	32.4%
Elect a Candidate	13.3	16.7	20.5	8.1
Family Influence	1.7	3.0	2.6	2.7
Friends' Influence	*	3.0	2.6	16.2
Employer's Influence		3.0	2.6
Union Influence		manure	2.6
Civic Duty	45.0	50.0	33.3	40.5
Don't Know			5.1
Not Ascertained	6.7	6.1	Q enterator
	100.0%	100.0%	100.1%	99.9%
N	60	66	39	37
	$\tau = .085$	$\tau = .128$	$\tau = .003$

if the individual's perception of group support in his seeking the post was related in any way to his major motivation for becoming a precinct leader. As Table 5 indicates, in Knox County those who report seeking the post because of a sense of civic duty are somewhat less likely to report the influence of party faction than those who indicate seeking the post for other reasons.

TABLE 5. RELATION OF REASON FOR ACCEPTING PRECINCT POST TO GROUP SUPPORT FOR ACCEPTING POST

					710 21003
					Type o	of Grou	ıp Support
Why Accepted		Mo	ntgomery	County				К	nox Co	unty
Precinct Post	Party Faction	Friends	Other	None	Total	N	Party Faction	Friends	Other	None	Total	N
7	1		(per cent)						(per c	ent)
Republicans Issues Elect a Candidate Family Influence Friends' Influence Employer Influence Union Influence Union Influence Civic Responsibility Don't Know Not Ascertained	75.0 90.9 50.0 50.0 50.0 	8.3 50.0 ——————————————————————————————————	12.1	16.7 9.1 — 50.0 50.0 — 9.1	100 100 100 100 100 100	12 11 2 2 2 2 0 33 0 4 —	46.6 ———————————————————————————————————	15.4 — 40.0 — 14.3 —	7.1	38.0 100.0 100.0 20.0 — 42.9 —	100 100 100 100 — — 100 —	13 3 1 6 0 0 14 0 0 -
Democrats Issues Elect a Candidate Family Influence Friends' Influence Employer Influence Union Influence Civic Responsibility Don't Know Not Ascertained	64.7 62.5 	5.9 100.0 50.0 — 11.1		29.4 37.5 — — — — 18.5	100 100 100 100 ———————————————————————	18 8 1 2 0 0 27 0 4	33.3 62.5 100.0 			66.7 37.5 — 100.0 — 61.5 —	100 100 100 100 100 100 100	12 8 1 1 1 1 13 2
Total			-			60						39

TABLE	6.	TAHW	${\tt WOULD}$	MISS	MOST	IF	QUIT	PRECINCT	CHAIRMAN	POST,
				BY CO	TINTY	AI	ND PA	RTY

Factor	Montgom	ery County	Knox County
	Democrat	Republican	Democrat	Republicar
Ideological	10.0%	6.1%	23.1%	21.6%
Other Impersonal	6.7	3.1	2.6	10.8
Social Contact	31.6	42.3	56.4	43.2
Other Personal	29.9	34.7	12.8	10.8
None	8.3	6.1	2.6	5.4
Not Ascertained	13.3	7.6	2.6	8.1
Total	99.8%	99.9%	100.1%	99.9%
N	$60 \\ \tau = .038$	66 $\tau = .211$	39 $\tau = .063$	37

In contrast, in Montgomery County party factional support is indicated to a somewhat greater degree among those citing civic duty as their reason for accepting the precinct post than tends to be given by persons becoming precinct leaders for some other reason.

The activists were asked what they would miss most if they were to relinquish their precinct post; through this we can obtain an assessment of the rewards they perceive themselves to be receiving from their political office. In Montgomery County, the two parties are similar in their responses, with approximately twothirds of the Democrats and three-fourths of the Republicans citing social contacts or other personal satisfactions as those which would be missed most if they were to quit their precinct post. The Democrats in Knox County show a similar response pattern, with the Republicans tending slightly more to cite ideological or impersonal factors. However, precinct leaders in the two counties do exhibit somewhat different patterns of current satisfactions. Three times as many in the suburban county as in the rural county indicate that other personal satisfactions, including business contacts and building a personal position in politics, would be missed most. Other research has indicated that the precinct post is a stepping stone to running for elective office in the suburban county.26 In both counties, social contacts are cited as the satisfaction which would be missed most frequently by all parties, but especially by the minority party.

²⁶ A recent study indicates that a very large proportion of both parties' candidates for the Maryland legislature in 1966 had previously served as precinct chairmen. Allen J. Cigler, unpublished research, University of Maryland, 1967.

It must be pointed out that the high level of disillusionment with party precinct work found by Eldersveld in Detroit does not exist in any of the four party organizations studied. In Detroit, 15 per cent of the Democratic leaders and 22 per cent of the Republicans stated that they currently received no satisfactions from their work in the party.27 In Knox County, 5.4 per cent of the Republicans and 2.6 per cent of the Democrats took a similar position; in Montgomery County 8.3 per cent of the Democrats and 6.1 per cent of the Republicans also state that no rewards are being received from their current party work. Why would the proportion of precinct leaders receiving no rewards from party work be so much lower in the two counties studied than in Detroit? It may be a function of the size of the political unit, with the rewards of a social nature being more within reach in the smaller unit.

Our hypothesis states that precinct leaders in the more affluent county who enter party work for ideological or other impersonal reasons will be better able to maintain this orientation than those who enter for solidary or material reasons. Eldersveld, in his study of Detroit precinct leaders, found that 68 per cent of the Democratic leaders and 57 per cent of the Republicans who entered political work with impersonal motivations changed to personalized motivations while 20 per cent of the Democrats and 21 per cent of the Republicans became disillusioned and indicated no current satisfactions received from their party work.28 Political analysts have frequently indicated that the so-called reformers are unable to maintain their idealistic zeal, hence the eventual downfall of reform move-

²⁷ Eldersveld, op. cit., p. 278.

²⁸ Ibid., p. 287.

TABLE 7. RELATION OF WHAT WOULD MISS MOST IF QUIT PRECINCT POST TO REASON WHY FIRST BECAME ACTIVE IN POLITICS

						Why	Wou	ld M	iss M	lost :	If Qu	ıit	,
·			Mon	tgom	ery (Coun	ty				F	Cnox	Cou	nty
Why First Became Active in Political Work	Ideological	Other Impersonal	Social Contacts	Other Personal	Nothing	N.A.	Total	N	Ideological	Other Impersonal	Social Contacts	Other Personal	Nothing	N.A.	Total	N
				'-	cent	,							cent	,
T. 1 . 1	00		00		ocra		101	10	00		-0		iocra		0.0	-
Ideological	22	11	28	28	6	6	101	18	28		53	14		14	99	7
Other Impersonal	7	7	23	30	13	20	100	30	18	12	52	12	6		100	17
Social Contacts Other Personal			$\frac{40}{72}$	40 28		20	100 100	5 7	34 22	16	34 78	16	*	-	100 100	6 9
Not Ascertained			12	40			100	0.	22	_	10				100	0
Not Ascertained							_	· · · · ·		_
						7	otal	60				•		Г	otal	39
			i	Repu	blica [,]	ns					i	Repu	blica	ns
Ideological	11	7	35	35	3	7	100	28	16	—	34		16	34	100	6
Other Impersonal	3		46	40	3	7	99	30	15	23	54			8	100	13
Social Contacts	—		.25	25	50	_	100	4	33	8	50	8			99	12
Other Personal	_		75		_	25	100	4	33	— ,		33	33		99	3
Not Ascertained			*		_			0		_	_	33	66		99	3
						r	otal	66						Г	otal

ments.²³ Table 7 presents the findings for the precinct leaders studies; a considerable change between original satisfactions and current perceived rewards occurred among the activists whose initial activity was motivated by purposive reasons.

In all four organizations approximately twothirds or more of the precinct chairmen who entered for purposive reasons report that the satisfactions which would be missed most are other than purposive. The evolution away from purposive motivation is perhaps of greater importance to the functioning of the parties in Montgomery County, because a larger proportion of those entering party work did so for purposive reasons. Table 8 indicates the degree to which purposive motives originally stimulated political activity, the percentage in each party who declare purposive satisfactions to be their preeminent current reward for precinct leader activities, and the proportion of those who originally entered for purposive reasons and would miss most that type of incentive if they were to resign their post. Contrary to our hypothesis, the party leaders in the affluent county are less retentive of their initial purposive motivational pattern. Taking both ideological and other impersonal reasons for initial entry into political work, we find the lowest retention in the affluent county, and particularly in the traditional minority party in that county.

²⁹ The most colorful statement along these lines ("reformers only morning glories") is contained in William L. Riordon, Plunkitt of Tammany Hall (New York: E. P. Dutton and Co., Inc., 1963), pp. 17–20.

Several differences are apparent in the patterns of perceived satisfactions of other precinct chairmen, as presented in Table 9. The chairmen from the two counties differ to a considerable degree in their pattern of perceptions of the satisfactions derived by others from precinct work. Within Montgomery County, but not in Knox County, Republican and Democratic precinct leaders differ significantly in their perceptions of the satisfactions obtained by others from their political party office. In the

TABLE 8. RELATIVE IMPORTANCE OF PURPOSIVE MOTIVATIONS OVER TIME²

	Purposive Single Most Important Reason for Initial Activity	Would Miss Purposive Most if Quit	Initial Purposive Minus Current Purposive Satisfaction	Entered for Pur- posive Reason and Would Miss Pur- posive Most
		(per	cent)
Montgomery County
Democrats	80.0	16.7	63.3	20.9
Republicans	87.9	9.1	78.8	12.5
Knox County
Democrats	,61.5	32.4	29.1	29.1
Republicans	51.3	25.9	25.4	34.6

^a Purposive is identified as being ideological and other impersonal.

suburban Maryland county, precinct leaders of the two parties are slightly more similar in their evaluation of the degree to which their colleagues were stimulated to serve in the precinct organization as a result of ideological or other impersonal concerns, with 61.6 per cent of the Democrats and 43.8 per cent of the Republicans so perceiving their fellow precinct captains. However, Democrats much less frequently than Republicans concluded that social contacts were a primary motivation of their colleagues, and Republicans three times as frequently cite other personal satisfactions.

In Knox County, 62.1 per cent of the Democrats and only 36.3 per cent of the Republicans perceive other precinct leaders as being motivated by ideological or other impersonal drives.

One can explain this in part as a result of the minority party position of the Democrats; material rewards in terms of patronage are not available from local politics and have just recently become more available as a reward for the county organization's increased effectiveness in state electoral contests. Why are the Democrats more likely to cite ideological factors or satisfactions? In Montgomery County one explanation could be the higher degree of largely ideologically-based factionalism within the Democratic party, which managed to produce three highly organized and ideologicallyoriented slates for local and state offices during the 1966 primary. In Knox County, the scarcity of local as contrasted with state patronage could reduce the incidence of citing other personal satisfactions by a Democrat.

Eldersveld pointed out that two types of psychological processes may be found in the evaluation of others' satisfactions. One is projection, ascribing to others one's own satisfactions. The second is incorporation, whereby the individual takes as his own the perceived satisfactions of others. Eldersveld found minimal projection and incorporation, with leaders not tending to misperceive why others were in politics.³⁰ The pattern found in Detroit was a tendency to ascribe to others a greater degree of ideological motivation and commitment, with a pluralism of motivation actually existing. The same pluralism was found in the two sets of party organizations examined in this study.

A comparison can be made between the individual's motivation and his assessment of the motivations of others by comparing what the precinct leader states he would miss most if he

TABLE 9. PRECINCT LEADERS' PERCEPTIONS OF SATISFACTIONS DERIVED FROM PRECINCT WORK BY OTHER PRECINCT LEADERS

Satisfactions Derived by Other		ved By ery County	Perceived By Knox County
Precinct Leaders	Democrat	Republican	Democrat	Republican
Ideological	36.6%	27.2%	48.6%	33.7%
Other Impersonal	25.0	16.6	13.5	2.6
Social Contacts	13.4	9.1	21.6	40.4
Other Personal	25,0	42.3	8.1	20.7
None		1.5	8.1	2.6
Not Ascertained		3.0		_
Total	100.0%	99.7%	99.9%	100.0%
N	$60 \\ \tau =243$	66 $\tau =138$	39 $\tau =166$	37

¹⁰ Eldersveld, op. cit., pp. 281-283.

TABLE 10. RELATION OF PERCEIVED SATISFACTIONS OF AVERAGE PRECINCT LEADER TO WHAT WOULD MISS MOST IF QUIT PARTY PRECINCT POST

	Perceived Satisfactions of Other Leaders
•	Montgomery County							Knox County
What Would Miss Most if Gave Up Precinct Post	Ideological	Other Impersonal	Social Contacts	Other Personal	None	N.A.	Total	N	Ideological	Other Impersonal	Social Contacts	Other Personal	None	N.A.	Total	N
	(per cent)						(per cent) Democrats
T	67	16	16	Den	ocra	ts	99	6	67	11	11	Den 11	iocra	ts	100	9
Ideological	50	25	25	_			100	4	0.	67	33				100	3
Other Impersonal Social Contacts	26	31	21	21	_		99	19	23		59	14		4	100	21
Other Personal	44	28	6	22	_		100	18	25		25	50	_	_	100	4
None	20	40	_	40			100	5	100		_		-	_	100	1
Not Ascertained	25		25	50			100	8				100	_	_	100	1
																-
						7	otal	60						7	otal	39
I	Republicans						Republicans
Ideological	100		_	_			100	4	100		_	_	_	_	100	8
Other Impersonal				100			100	2	25	25	25	_		25	100	4
Social Contacts	21	21	14	43	_	_	99	28	38	12	44	6	—	_	100	16
Other Personal	26	13	9	47		4	99	23	25	25	_	50		_	100	4
None		25	_	50	25	20	100 100	4	50 33	50		_	_	67	100 100	2 3
Not Ascertained	40	20	_	20		20	100	5	35			_		01	100	. 3
•						r	otal	66						r	otal	37 resigned his position with what he perceives the satisfactions of others to be. In Knox County,

- the Republicans who would miss most ideological or impersonal satisfactions tend to perceive others as enjoying most these same rewards. However, half of those Knox Republicans en-
- mioying social or other personal rewards perceive others as motivated by the drive for purposive rewards. Knox County Democrats are much more likely to perceive others as deriving the same type of satisfactions from politics as the perceiver.

In Montgomery County, among the Democrats, the same pattern exists as among Knox Republicans. Those who would themselves nost miss purposive rewards tend to perceive others as deriving this type of satisfaction from party work, while those who would miss most ocial or other personal rewards tend to perceive others as being motivated by ideological or other impersonal drives. Approximately two-shirds of those stimulated by social or other personal rewards perceive the satisfactions of the average precinct chairman to be ideological.

The Democrats in both counties indicate a high degree of projection. Examining Table 10 inversely in order to determine what proportion of those who thought other leaders are motivated by a particular satisfaction and who also themselves respond that they would miss most that particular satisfaction, we also find incorporation occurring. Examining the left-to-right diagonals in Table 10, this process of incorporation appears more prevalent among Knox County activists, particularly among the Democrats.

Only one precinct leader perceives the average leader as deriving no satisfactions from his party activities, and twelve state they would miss no satisfactions if they would quit their party post. Three from Knox County are so disillusioned with party work; all three perceive the average precinct leader's satisfactions to be purposive. Among the Montgomery County leaders who state that they would lose no rewards by leaving their precinct post, five are Democrats and four are Republicans. Three of the five Democrats and one of the four Republicans perceive the average precinct leader as deriving ideological or other impersonal satisfactions from his party work.

IV. CONCLUSION

We can draw several conclusions from this examination of motivations. Ideological motivation is significantly more frequently cited as being the most important reason for entry into political activity among both parties' precinct chairmen in the more affluent community, and less frequently cited by activists of the rural county party almost invincible in local elections. In the rural county, the initial motivation is more likely to be the purposive ideological or other impersonal types among the Democratic party activists who are less likely to capture local offices.

The reason for accepting the precinct post tends to be predominantly purposive among all four sets of precinct leaders. At least 45 per cent of the responses by each party group indicate ideological or other purposive satisfactions are perceived to be the principal rewards of other precinct leaders, but the leaders in the two counties, when grouped by county, do differ significantly in the patterns of explanations given as the single most important reason for their taking the precinct post.

In terms of what they would miss most if they quit the precinct chairmanship, the rural county activists are most likely to respond with ideological or other impersonal rewards. The response patterns indicate that sustaining motivations do differ significantly between precinct chairmen in the two counties; however, for all except the rural county Republicans, approximately two-thirds or more of the responses to the question of what they would miss most if the post were given up are of the personal, social, or material nature.

We conclude that the affluent community is more likely in both socio-economic characteristics and initial motivational patterns to approximate the amateur model. In terms of reasons for accepting the precinct post, there is a slight tendency for precinct leaders of the traditional majority party in each county to cite more frequently a purposive reason as being the single most important factor in the decision to accept the precinct office. Significant differences do exist in the pattern of sustaining motivations as measured by what the leaders state they would miss most if they resigned the precinct chairmanship. However, rural county leaders are more likely to cite ideological or other impersonal motivations, which is contrary to the hypothesized difference.

The hypothesis that the traditional majority party in the locality tends more toward initial and sustaining motivations of a solidary or material type is not confirmed by the comparisons between majority and minority parties. In both counties, the majority party activists indicate somewhat greater current satisfactions of a purposive type than do the minority party activists in the respective county.

Schlesinger expressed concern that purposive motivations inhibit the flexibility of the party organization and argued that material rewards which can be given to or withheld from individuals are more useful in inducing specific actions from workers to attain desired goals and also allow the party decision-makers the greatest flexibility in selecting party goals.31 Sorauf has argued that parties in recent times have found it necessary to be more concerned with programs.32 Our data indicate that programmatic appeals are a major basis for inducing initial entry into political activity, but ideological or other impersonal appeals generally do not sustain activists in their performance of the party precinct leader role.

Our findings lead us to reject the notion of a candidate-based party. This does not detract from the idea of the party as an organization with at least one of its major goals the election of candidates to party office. The function of electing a particular candidate can exist and workers can be motivated by presentation of rewards and sanctions even though the rewards most sought are not derived in terms of deliberately entering or continuing party work in order to elect a particular candidate.

In Montgomery County, Maryland, a very sizable shift from deriving purposive to social and material satisfactions is found to have occurred. We have argued that this increases the flexibility of the formal party organization in choice both of goals and of methods to be used to attain the goals. However, this should not be interpreted as leaving the party unbounded in the type of policies it may pursue or the candidates it may nominate.

Wilson argues that "the principal reward of politics to the amateur is the sense of having satisfied a felt obligation to participate ," while "the principal reward to the professional is to be found in the extrinsic satisfactions of participation—power, income, status, or the fun of the game."33 The leaders of the amateur clubs must appear to be motivated by a desire for purposive satisfactions even if this type of motivation has been supplanted by others. In the long run, the amateur either loses interest or plays the game by professional rules.34 Wilson suggests that the same process of change in motivational structure occurred among club members, with the initial motivation for joining being replaced by a secondary or supplementary motivation.35 He suggests that amateur club members originally enter politics out of a sense of civic duty and then evolve toward the derivation of satisfactions from influencing policy or enjoyment of the political game. We suggest that there is no parallel in the motivations of precinct leaders. The range in the proportion of activists who state that the best explanation for their originally entering political work was their sense of civic obligation varied from 40.5 per cent among Montgomery County Democrats to 16.2 per cent among Knox Republicans. It does rank as the most frequently cited best explanation among Montgomery County Democratic activists, and civic duty was cited with great frequency as being very important in the decision to enter politics by the other sets of leaders. However, Knox County Democrats stated that attachment to party or other basic attachment to political activity was more important for their originally becoming active in party work. Republicans in Knox County more often respond that attachment to party was the basic or major factor in stimulating party activity. Among Montgomery County Republicans an interest in influencing governmental policies was more important than civic duty. We must conclude that while civic duty is cited with some frequency as the primary motivation for originally becoming politically active, a preponderant majority of the party activists in the counties studied do not enter politics for that reason. Wilson suggests that the shift in motivation is away from civic duty toward a desire to influence policy or enjoyment of the political game. We have found instead an initial emphasis in the suburban county on a desire to influence governmental policy and a shift to a wish for social or other impersonal rewards, with enjoyment of the political game, per se, only one of several types of social or personal rewards.

³¹ Schlesinger, op. cit., pp. 769-772.

³² Frank J. Sorauf, Political Parties in the American System (Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1964), pp. 85, 151.

We find that the amateur model is more appropriate to the suburban county in describing the social characteristics and initial motivations of precinct leaders, but the model does not hold for sustaining motivations. Majority-minority status and the relative degree of competition appear useful for accounting for some motivational differences, particularly in the rural county. Although the factor has not been examined in this study, the nature of the party organization's top leadership may also contribute to the relative degree to which purposive satisfactions sustain precinct leaders' political activity.

³³ Wilson, op. cit., p. 4.

³⁴ Ibid., p. 5.

³⁵ Ibid., p. 171.

COALITION POLITICS IN NORTH INDIA*

PAUL R. BRASS University of Washington

The years 1964 and 1967 stand as two crucial landmarks in the democratic development of India's political systems both at the center and in the several states. In the three years since Nehru's death in May, 1964, Indian politics entered fully into a major test of legitimacy.1 Since 1964, the national leadership of the Indian National Congress has three times demonstrated its ability to handle smoothly the first stage of India's process of legitimizing democratic political authority—that of transferring power from a charismatic leader to his successors within the dominant party.2 After the 1967 General Elections, Indian politics moved to a second stage to confront the problems of transferring power from the previously dominant Congress to diverse parties and party coalitions in more than half the Indian states.3

* This paper is part of a larger project, on which the writer is presently engaged, on party systems and policy making in Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, and Puniab. Research for the paper and the project as a whole was carried out in India during 1966-67 under grants from the American Institute of Indian Studies, the American Council of Learned Societies, and the University of Washington, An earlier draft of the paper was presented at the Punjab Studies Conference in East Lansing in February, 1968 and a later version at the APSA meetings in September. I have also benefited from comments on the paper by Mr. Harry Blair and by Professors Bruce Graham, Morris Morris and W. H. Morris-Jones. Frances Svensson assisted in the research.

¹ The analysis here has been influenced by Joseph La Palombara and Myron Weiner (eds.), Political Parties and Political Development (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1966), esp. pp. 407-412.

² The successions have been amply documented by Michael Brecher in Nehru's Mantle: The Politics of Succession in India (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1966) and in "Succession in India 1967: The Routinization of Political Change," Asian Survey, 7 (July, 1967), 423-443.

³ A transfer of power at the state level took place as early as 1957 in Kerala. However, Kerala has always been considered an exceptional state and its politics have been considered an aberration in a general pattern of Congress dominance. The change in 1967 is far more massive and is widely believed in India to presage the defeat of the Congress at the center. When and if this oc-

The purpose of this paper is to examine the implications for party development in India of the ways in which power has been transferred from the Congress to multi-group coalitions in the three north Indian states of Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, and Punjab. Specifically, I am concerned with the structural characteristics of thedeveloping party systems in the three states; with the roles played in the systems by parties, factions, and individuals; and with the impact of the ways in which the systems function upon government formation and stability. I will argue that north Indian political parties operatein systems in which inter-party ideological divisions are less decisive in the formation and breakup of governments than intra-party divisions. Under these conditions, opportunities. exist for independents and party defectors tohold the balance and dictate terms to the established parties. The activities of such political entrepreneurs impart fluidity and flexibility to party politics in north India. They also raise the question whether the minimum conditions of stable government provided by the Congress in the first two decades of independent government in India can be provided in multi-party systems in which the Congress monopoly of power is broken.

I. NORTH INDIAN PARTY SYSTEMS

Until now, the predominant model used todescribe the Indian party system has been that of one-party dominance. The model, developed by Rajni Kothari and W. H. Morris-Jones had two prominent features. The first was that the system provided inter-party competition but no alternation of power. The second was that the usual functions of opposition parties in a curs, Indian democracy will enter its third test, that of transfer of power at the center.

⁴ Rajni Kothari, "The Congress 'System' in India," Asian Survey, 4 (December, 1964), 1161-1173.

⁶ Morris-Jones' views on the one-party dominant system are presented most systematically in his "Dominance and Dissent: Their Inter-relations in the Indian Party System," Government and Opposition 1 (August, 1966), 451-466. See also his Government and Politics of India (London: Hutchinson University Library, 1964), ch. V, and "Parliament and the Dominant Party," Parliamentary Affairs, 17 (Summer, 1964), 296-307.

democracy were in India shared between opposition parties and groups within the Congress. That is, opposition parties acted essentially as catalysts for groups within the Congress to articulate discontent and bring about leadership changes in the dominant party.

All models are simplifications of reality, which emphasize the factors considered to be determining forces in a system. The dominant party model emphasized the amorphousness of the Congress and its absorptive capacity. It paid less attention to contrary patterns of political behavior which have now become decisive. Before 1967, the alternations in power which had occurred in P.E.P.S.U. and in Kerala and the coalition governments which had existed in Orissa and in Andhra Pradesh might have been viewed as deviant cases. After 1967, transfers of power to non-Congress parties or coalitions occurred in more than half the Indian states.

Second, the model properly emphasized the importance of patterns of communication and interpenetration between the Congress and non-Congress organizations, which continue to exist in important respects. However, there have been two important features of those patterns of communication which now work against the maintenance of Congress dominance. First, inter-party communication has always been a two-way process. Factions in the Congress have sometimes capitalized upon issues raised by opposition parties to gain advantage in struggles for power within Congress. However, factional rivalry has often been sufficiently intense within the Congress and party loyalties so weak that opposing factions have been willing to carry their conflicts to the point of defeating the Congress organization or defecting from it.6 Second, some opposition parties have been serious about taking power from the Congress and have been unwilling to act only by applying pressure on the "margin" of Congress power. During and after the 1967 elections, the opportunity came in many states for dissident factions in the Congress to win power outside the Congress by joining with opposition parties which were making a determined bid for power.

Third, the Congress "system" was never a single one-party dominant system. Rather, it consisted of a national party system with links to the states and seventeen regional multiparty systems in which the Congress was dominant. Each multi-party system had its own distinctive features, despite a common pattern

⁶ See Paul R. Brass, Factional Politics in an Indian State: The Congress Party in Uttar Pradesh (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1965). of Congress dominance. In Kerala, Congress "dominance" existed only in the sense that the Congress continued to poll the largest number of votes in the state.

Finally, all the systems have contained not only parties and factions within parties, but significant non-party elements—both independents and individuals who have passed from one party to another in search of individual power and prestige.

In the aftermath of the 1967 elections, the Congress-dominated multi-party systems have been replaced in north India by highly complex systems in which parties, factions, and individuals all play important roles. The kinds of coalitions which emerged after the 1967 elections and which are likely to emerge in future depend upon the interactions of these three kinds of forces, which do not act in a random fashion, but according to the logic inherent in the particular balance of forces which exists at a given moment. The ability of the Congress to form a government now depends on its own internal cohesion and factional structure at the moment of opportunity, as well as upon the cohesion of the forces arrayed against it. Similarly, the ability of a non-Congress coalition to form a government depends upon the willingness of the parties to compromise their differences and to maintain greater cohesion than Congress. Finally, independents and defectors come into prominence whenever the balance between the Congress and alternative coalitions is close.

Congress Factions. After the elections, the Congress was reduced to a minority in the legislatures of the three north Indian states. Nevertheless, as the largest single party in each of the three states (see Table 1), it was open to the Congress to attempt either to form a minority government or to form a government with the support of independents or other parties. A brief review of the structure of factional conflict in the Congress in these three states at the time will show how variations in patterns of factional organization influenced the ability of the Congress to form a government.

In all three states, the Congress was affected by a continuing decline in organizational coherence and an intensification of internal factional strife. In the Punjab, the Congress organization was in complete disarray, still struggling to reacquire some organizational coherence in the aftermath of the dismissal in 1964 of a strong leader, Pratap Singh Kairon. The party was so fragmented that it could not select a leader before the opposition coalition was formed and had selected its leader. In a very delicately balanced house, where the first to act had the advantage, a diverse inter-party coali-

TABLE 1: PERCENTAGES OF TOTAL VALID VOTES AND SEATS WON BY PARTY IN THE 1967 ELECTIONS FOR THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES IN BIHAR, UTTAR PRADESH, AND PUNJAB

Party	Bih	ar	Uttar P	radesh	Punjab
	Votes %	Seats No.	Votes	Seats No.	Votes %	Seats No.
C.P.I. (M)	1.28	4	1.27	1	3.19	3
C.P.I.	6.91	24	3.23	13	5.27	5
S.S.P.	17.62	68	9.97	44	.72	1
P.S.P.	6.96	18	4.09	11	. 51	0
CONGRESS	33.08	128	32.20	199	36.56	47
Swantantra	2.33	3	4.73	12	. 51	0
Jan Sangh	10.42	26	21.67	98	9.84	9
Regional Parties
J.K.D.ª	3.33	13		_	_	_
Akali Dal (Sant)			-		04 605	24
Akali Dal (Master)					24.68b	2
Republican	0.18	1	4.14	10	1.79	3
Independents	17.88	33ª	18.69	37	16.94	10
Total	99.99	318	99.99	425	100.01	104

Source: India, Election Commission. Report on the Fourth General Elections in India, 1967, Vol. II (Statistical).

tion was able to move faster and form a government before the Congress could muster its forces for an attempt.

In Bihar, there were four Congress leaders who reputedly hoped to become chief minister after the 1967 elections by defeating during the elections as many as possible of the Congress candidates supporting their rivals. After the elections, a contest for the leadership of the Congress Legislature Party was held between two of the "big four," Mahesh Prasad Sinha and Binodanand Jha, in which the latter was defeated by one vote. Although the Congress was relatively far from power in Bihar, with only 128 seats out of 318, Pandit Jha and 34 other Congress legislators made it clear in a statement released to the press that even if Mahesh Prasad Sinha had any idea of making an attempt to form a government, they would not support him.7

In Uttar Pradesh, in addition to the two long-standing, rival Gupta and Tripathi groups contending against each other, a third group of ostensible supporters of the outgoing chief minister, Mrs. Kripalani, had been formed. However, the outgoing chief minister was "exiled" to Delhi, Kamalapathi Tripathi was defeated in the general elections, and C. B. Gupta was left as the clear choice for Leader. A situation of tri-group conflict had been transformed into single-group dominance, which made possible the unanimous election of C. B. Gupta as Leader of the Legislature party. Gupta, with what he thought was the backing of the whole party, succeeded in outwitting and outbidding an opposition coalition in gaining the support of the independents and in forming a government. However, that government was brought down within less than three weeks by a major defection from Congress ranks and was replaced by a non-Congress government.

groups in Uttar Pradesh, see Brass, op. cit., ch. III, and Bruce Graham, "The Succession of Factional Systems in the Uttar Pradesh Congress, 1937–1967," (unpublished paper). For Bihar and Punjab, see Ramashray Roy, "Intra-Party Conflict in the Bihar Congress," Asian Survey, 6 (December, 1966), 706–715 and Paul Wallace, "The Political Party System of Punjab State (India): A Study of Factionalism," (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of California, Berkeley, 1966).

[•] Thirteen independents in Bihar were actually associated with the J.K.D. so that the strength of the J.K.D. in the Bihar Assembly immediately after the elections was 26.

b Approximately 20% of the vote for the two Akali parties was won by the Sant Akali Dal.

⁷ Indian Nation, March 5 and 7, 1967.

⁸ On the origin and development of Congress

Thus, the patterns of internal competition in the Congress varied significantly in the three states. In Punjab, the pattern was one of multigroup competition so chaotic as to prevent early election of a leader. In Bihar, multi-group competition coalesced into a temporary evenly-balanced polarity which made the election of a leader possible, but prevented him from leading the party effectively. In Uttar Pradesh, one group emerged dominant after the election, a leader was unanimously elected, who acted skillfully in forming a government, but then could not maintain cohesion in his own party to provide stable support for the government.

Inter-Party Competition. The one-party dominant system covered a wide variety of regional variations in the structure and features of inter-party competition. In the three north Indian states, the one-party dominant system has now been replaced by multi-party systems. The practical and theoretical question now raised by the rise of multi-party systems in north India is whether the developmental tendencies are toward immobilism or fluidity in the systems. There is a superficial resemblance between the north Indian party systems and Giovanni Sartori's model of a polarized, multipolar, and centrifugal party system,9 but patterns of inter-party competition and coalition deviate significantly from what should be expected on the basis of the European precedents. Table 1 shows the 1967 election results for the legislative assemblies in north India. The Table, arranged loosely from Left to Right in the upper portion, with the CPI (Marxist) representing the extreme Left and Swatantra and Jan Sangh the extreme Right, shows that there is both extreme pluralism and a high degree of polarity (that is, in Sartori's use of the term "polarity," there is a very wide spectrum of opinion reflected among the legislative parties). The systems share with their European counterparts also the existence of a massive center, occupied by the Congress, and multiple lines of cleavage. The party system in each state is cleft by combinations of divisions of varying importance in each case along the following dimensions—socialism and conservatism, secularism and communalism, national orientation and regional orientation, pro-system and antisystem.

⁹ Giovanni Sartori, "European Political Parties: The Case of Polarized Pluralism," in La Palombara and Weiner, op. cit., ch. V. Sartori's model is derived from the party systems of contemporary Italy, the French Fourth Republic, and Weimar Germany. These systems are characterized by a "lack of basic consensus in which the distribution of opinion covers the maximum conceivable distance" (polarization), multiple lines of cleavage (multipolarity), and "growing radicalization" (centrifugal tendencies); see pp. 138-139. Sartori is not always clear and consis-Ment in his definitions, but the model is far more suseful than the conventional descriptions of European multiparty systems and is especially suseful for purposes of comparison of and distinction among multiparty systems, which may vary considerably from one political system to another.

In all three north Indian states, the Congress occupies the center position which, from an ideological point of view, can be described as moderate nationalism, national unity, constitutionalism, planned development, and secularism. On either side of the Congress are more or less strong tendencies towards aggressive nationalism (Jan Sangh), regional autonomy (Akali Dal [Master]), anti-constitutionalism (CPI [M]), laissez-faire liberalism (Swatantra), and communalism (Jan Sangh and the Akali parties). Moreover, the electoral trend has been towards radicalization. The strength of the center has decreased and that of the extremes has increased over the four general elections. 10

Despite the superficial resemblance of the north Indian party systems to the center-based European party systems, there are three distinctive features which differentiate them from their European counterparts. One is the absence of anti-system challenges from the Right and the decline of anti-system tendencies on the Left. There are no monarchical parties in north India nor can either Jan Sangh or the Akali Dal be considered fascist parties in the European sense. On the Left, the tendency in recent years has been towards increasing commitment of the CPI to the parliamentary system. Second, the formation of diverse multiparty coalition governments against the Congress after the elections distinguishes the north Indian party systems from the European systems, which have contained ideological rigidities limiting possible party coalitions. In the European systems described by Sartori, the extreme parties have been traditionally excluded from government while coalitions based on a dominant center party have enjoyed a monopoly of power. In north India, the extremes have been included and the center party at least temporarily excluded. Third, the north Indian party systems are characterized not only by extreme pluralism but by a very strong element of non-party voting for independents.

¹⁰ From 1952 to 1967, the Congress share of the popular vote has declined from 41.47% to 33.1% in Bihar, while the combined Communist vote has gone from 1.1% to 8.2% and the Jan Sangh has increased from 1.2% to 10.4%. In Uttar Pradesh, Congress has declined from 47.9% to 32.2% while the Communist vote has gone from .9% to 4.5%and that of the Jan Sangh from 6.4% to 2.7%. In Punjab, Congress secured 34.8% of the vote in 1952, rose to a high of 47.5% in 1957, and declined to 36.6% in the reorganized Punjab. The Communist vote has been transmuted since 1952 in the Punjab from 5.3% to 8.5% while that of Jan Sangh has gone from 5.0% to 9.8%. Figures from India, Election Commission, Report on the First General Elections in India, 1951-52 and Report on the Fourth General Elections in India, 1967.

Independents and Defectors. Table 1 shows that 33 independents were elected to the Bihar Assembly and that independents polled 17.9% of the total vote, more than any other single party except Congress and the Samyukta Socialist Party (SSP). Even this figure does not accurately reflect the extent of independent voting and the number of independents elected in Bihar, for the Jan Kranti Dal (JKD) was a party composed of independents supported by the Raja of Ramgarh and Congress defectors who left the party before the election. The JKD has since then broken up. In Uttar Pradesh and Punjab, independents play a similarly large role in the political systems. Thirtyseven independents were elected in Uttar Pradesh and ten in Punjab, with the total independent vote in the two states reaching 18.7% and 16.9% respectively. In Uttar Pradesh, the independent vote was larger than that for all parties except Congress and Jan Sangh. In Punjab, it was larger than the vote for all parties except Congress and the Akali Dal. After the elections, the fluidity of the systems was increased further by party defections from the SSP in Bihar, from the Congress and other parties in Uttar Pradesh, and from Congress and the Akali Dal in Punjab.

Clearly, neither the one-party dominant system model nor the European-derived model of a center-based multi-party system applies to the complex and fluid systems which exist in north India. The one-party dominant system model no longer applies because the era of Congress dominance has ended. The model of a polarized multipolar party system does not apply because ideology does not play the same rigidifying role which it plays in Europe and because opportunists in the shape of independents and party defectors play a decisive balancing role in the systems. In the remainder of this paper, the roles played by ideology and opportunism in the north Indian party systems will be demonstrated as they affected the formation and breakup of the non-Congress governments in the three states.

II. THE FORMATION OF THE NON-CONGRESS GOVERNMENTS: THE EXCLUSION OF IDEOLOGY

The ways in which the non-Congress governments were formed differed significantly in the three states in terms of the parties forming the coalitions and the weight of particular parties in each coalition, in terms of the roles played by independents, and in terms of the extent to which defections from Congress to the opposed coalitions were involved. However, the three initial non-Congress governments had in common the fact that diverse party coalitions were put together covering the entire political spectrum. There is no doubt that, at least in terms of the principles expressed in party manifestoes, many of the parties which formed these coalitions are incompatible partners. Moreover, some of the parties hesitated, for ideological reasons, before entering the coalitions. Yet, ultimately all non-Congress parties joined in all three states, if not in the government itself, in the legislature parties formed to provide support to the government.

In all three states, the procedure followed was similar. In the week following the announcement of the election results, united legislature parties were formed, comprising all non-Congress parties and some of the independents. Minimum common programs were framed, comprising 33 points in Bihar and Uttar Pradesh and 11 points in Punjab. The united legislature parties also elected leaders, who then began talks with the governors of their states preparatory to the formation of governments. In the meantime, the party leaders comprising the coalitions met together to discuss issues and problems as they arose and to negotiate on the distribution of portfolios. In all three states, "coordination committees" were formed which included the prominent organizational as well as legislative leaders of the various parties to coordinate both the views of the parties making up the coalitions and the views of the parliamentary and organizational wings of the mass parties.

The formation of diverse inter-party coalitions, involving in some cases alliances among parties which had till yesterday refused to cooperate against the Congress for ideological reasons, required some symbolic justification. Only the SSP leadership required no justification for their actions since they had consistently called for such alliances to defeat and remove the Congress from power both before and after the elections. The cynical view for the post-election alliances was simply that the "lure for office" had proved irresistible. However, there were many party leaders who were reluctant to join the coalitions for ideological and other reasons even after the elections. Discussions and interviews with party leaders and ministers in the three states and in Delhi indicated that, in addition to the desire for office, there were four main considerations and tendencies which influenced the decisions of the parties to coalesce-popular demand for such coalitions, the ability of the parties to formulate minimum common programs, pragmatic and accommodative tendencies in the parties, and the recognition of the necessity for adjustment to regional conditions.

Popular Demand. One of the most common reasons given by men from all parties in the three states for the formation of non-Congress coalition governments was that public opinion demanded it. While there can be legitimate grounds for skepticism about references to public opinion to justify party practices in an overwhelmingly rural and illiterate society, it is true that there was marked discontent against the Congress among articulate segments of public opinion in cities and towns throughout north India. There was, for example, widespread feeling among the middle classes that development programs had not proceeded at a sufficiently rapid pace during the twenty years of Congress rule and that corruption, fostered by venal Congress ministers, had become widespread in government and society. There were also more specific grievances—especially discontent over price increases on the part of students, teachers. and government employees; discontent among Muslims over their failure to achieve their demand for recognition of Urdu as the second official language in Uttar Pradesh and Bihar; and discontent among both Hindus and Sikhs in the Punjab over the reorganization of the state and the way in which it was implemented. In addition, the elections took place at a time of major crisis or transformation in all three states—the worst famine in a century in Bihar; an unprecedented strike of half a million government employees in Uttar Pradesh; the reorganization of the Punjab and its trifurcation among three states.

The combination of all these factors produced a marked atmosphere of antagonism towards the Congress in the cities and towns and a desire for an alternative government. It was not simply that opposition party leaders felt impelled toward unity by the demand for change, but that once it became clear that an alternative to the Congress was possible, many party leaders felt it would have been politically dangerous to oppose such a change.¹¹

The Common Programs. Although the party leaders, therefore, found a ready sanction in public opinion for the formation of non-Congress governments, they had still to face charges levelled by Congressmen and others that these coalitions represented unprincipled alliances among parties whose ideologies were incompatible. To such charges, the most frequent answer was that no compromise of basic principles was involved in the formation of the non-Congress governments because all parties had agreed upon minimum common programs which did not affect the ideologies of the parties. For example, ministers from the two most sharply opposed parties in the coalitions, Jan Sangh and the Communists, made comments such as the following in response to the question as to how such opposed parties could work together.

People wanted an alternative to Congress. We prepared an agreed minimum program. Keeping our respective ideologies apart, we decided to implement the program. [Bihar Jan Sangh minister]¹²

On many major issues, we differ, but that is the concern of the central government—foreign policy, socialism. So, I don't think for many years to come, there will be very big differences between Jan Sangh and Communists. [Uttar Pradesh Communist minister]¹³

¹¹ For example, an SSP minister commented upon the delay in the PSP's decision to join the non-Congress government in Bihar and their ultimate decision to do so in this way: "They [the PSP leaders! thought they would be nowhere if they went against the wishes of the people, who wanted non-Congress governments." A Jan Sangh minister in Bihar, asked how long he thought the non-Congress government would last, gave a reply which indicated a similar attitude towards public opinion: "I think it will last because we all are afraid of this public opinion. . . No party will dare to take the blame of deserting this government." A Jan Sangh minister in Punjab, asked why a non-Congress government had been formed instead of a coalition with the Congress, replied: "Everybody was opposed to Congress. The general swing is not with the Congress. If we go with the Congress, we are also doomed." Citations from interview documents BG 29: 13; BG 35: 27; PG 17: 3.

- ¹² Interview document BG 32: 5.
- 13 Interview document UPII 30: 1.

The programs varied in the three states in terms of the number of points and the emphasis given to problems specific to each state, but the points can be classified into a number of categories: 1) concessions to various interest groups -students, teachers, government employees, supporters of Urdu; 2) rectifications of alleged Congress misdeeds—release of political prisoners, institution of judicial enquiries into charges of corruption against Congress ministers and into police firings under the Congress regime; 3) withdrawal of unpopular measures and taxes -grain procurement orders, previous increases in taxation, the land revenue: 4) provision of various agricultural benefits; 5) promises to provide efficient administration, eliminate corruption, and check rising prices. There is very little in programs such as these which affects the basic ideological viewpoints of the parties and, in fact, with the exception of one point in the Uttar Pradesh and Bihar programs, no substantial disagreements arose initially on any of these issues.

On only one issue, that of recognizing Urdu as the second official language of Uttar Pradesh and Bihar, was there a stalemate. Several parties in the coalitions felt themselves committed by their previous statements to include this point in the common programs. Although the Jan Sangh joined the coalitions in these two states, the party refused to commit itself to this point and submitted a note of dissent. It is clear that this question touches Jan Sangh ideology and sentiment on a vital point, that of its view of national unity and integrity and its attitude toward the Muslim minority. Jan Sangh insistence on the issue supports the view long held of it that the party is more dogmatic on or at least more concerned with cultural and communal issues than with economic issues. Although Jan Sangh leaders indicated willingness to make specific concessions toward the encouragement of the Urdu language, they were not willing to provide the symbolic satisfaction to the Muslim minority of having Urdu declared as a second official language. Inter-party divergence on the issue also indicates the continued importance in north Indian politics of a major ideological cleavage between Jan Sangh and other parties. At the same time, the inclusion of the point on Urdu in the programs did not prevent the Jan Sangh from joining the coalitions nor did it prevent other parties from joining with the Jan Sangh even though this meant that the point could not be implemented by the coalition governments.

Pragmatic and Accommodative Tendencies in the Parties. Insofar as the parties joined together only because of popular demand and only on the basis of rather limited common programs, it is possible that the non-Congress governments may represent only a brief transition which may be followed by an ultimate ideological polarization. However, interviews with the ministers revealed pragmatic and accommodative strains in the parties which make it equally likely that future coalitional politics will retain their present fluidity. These strains were revealed both on specific policy issues confronting the state governments and in the general attitudes of party leaders toward accommodation with other parties. A Communist minister in Uttar Pradesh questioned about his views on state trading in foodgrains—a major plank in the Communist party platform replied: "There is no other way but state trading but none of us want to hasten our theories. Let's experiment even with free open market for two years; but, if we fail, let's try state trading."14 A Jan Sangh minister in Bihar commented on the formation of the non-Congress government in Bihar and the attitude of Jan Sangh toward it in the following way: "So, all right and left have come together. We [Jan Sanghl are neither right nor left. We approach the problem straightaway."15 In Punjab, where politics have tended toward communal polarization between Hindus and Sikhs during the last twenty years, the leader of the Akali opposition in the Punjab Assembly, who became chief minister of the state after the 1967 elections, remarked in October, 1966, that even if the Akalis were in a position to form an exclusively Akali government after the election, he would not favor it. Asked why not, he replied:

Well, you see, to begin with, . . . the leaders in the center have already prejudiced people against the Akalis in spite of the fact that their behavior has been commendable throughout agitations, most non-violent. But still we would like to tell people in Punjab that we do not wish to form one-community government. Let everybody be satisfied with the government. . . so that we can unitedly work for prosperity of the state. 10

Statements such as these were made by many other ministers interviewed. They suggest the possibility that ideological differences among parties in north Indian politics occur in the context of a political culture in which tendencies toward ideological rigidification are softened by pragmatism and mitigated by desires for accommodation.

Adjustment to Regional Multi-Party Systems. In addition to the influence of pragmatic and accommodative tendencies mitigating ideological differences, many party leaders saw a necessity for putting aside national principles and national ambitions to adjust to local conditions For example, the Jan Sangh opposed the reorganization of the Punjab and continues to oppose in principle the existence of linguistic states in India. Yet, on the issue of the disposition of the predominantly Hindu, but Punjabispeaking city of Chandigarh, which remained a matter of serious controversy between Punjab and Hariana and among people in Chandigarh itself,17 the Jan Sangh adjusted to local sentiment in each area. The Jan Sangh in Punjab does not oppose the inclusion of Chandigarh in Punjab; the Jan Sangh in Chandigarh favors the continuance of a separate status for the -city; the Jan Sangh in Hariana favors its inclusion in Hariana.

¹⁴ Interview document UPII 30: 8.

¹⁵ Interview document BG 35: 25.

¹⁶ Interview document PG 6: 50.

One of the most thoughtful statements of the need to adjust to local conditions was provided by a PSP minister in Bihar, whose party engaged in considerable soul-searching and delay before entering the state party coalitions. The minister commented on the PSP decision to join in the following manner:

If the PSP thinks, as it thought in past years, where a day will come and it will sweep off the Congress rule from a state or states or the whole reaction, it would be wrong. No set formula in the iast-developing political situation can be applied throughout India. In the situations of Bihar and Bengal and also U.P. now, what is the picture? No one single party is able to gain a stable government. Monopoly of power enjoyed by the Congress is broken. A kind of power vacuum exists and Communists are very much on the scene. As we know the Communist party of either variety, t would not be a happy spectacle to see that the ool of administration is utilized to subvert democacy or national freedom. There are risks in oining a government run by so many parties pullng in different directions, but the PSP had to take these risks. It would be all right to take a purist stand, speak to the people about the party creed and programs and all that. But, according so me, this purism would be synonymous with pusillanimity and escape.18

This statement is noteworthy in three respects.

17 Under the reorganization, the old Punjab state was divided into four segments. A new dindi-speaking, predominantly Hindu state of Hariana was created; the capital city of Chandigarh was made into a union territory; the hill treas of the old state were transferred to Himschal Pradesh; and, the remaining Punjabispeaking, predominantly Sikh areas became the residual state of Punjab.

¹⁸ Interview document BG 33: 10.

It recognizes that an era has ended and that Indian politics are undergoing great changes whose ultimate direction is not clear and that the PSP as a party must play a role in the directing of those changes. There is, second, the presence of a strongly articulated ideological antagonism towards Communists. Third, despite this strong opposition to one party in the coalition, there is the reluctant recognition that the PSP is but one party among many, forced to operate in multi-party situations which vary from state to state.

Ideology and Party Politics in North India. There is no justification for concluding, on the basis of the rationales given by party leaders in north India for their participation in multiparty coalitions, that ideology is an insignificant force in north Indian politics. There is continued evidence of major ideological cleavages among the parties. Moreover, some of the parties believed that they would be able to implement portions of their programs even in the coalition governments and issue conflict between the parties played an important role after the formation of the non-Congress governments. The basic argument of this paper, however, is that political parties and party politicians showed a willingness either to ignore or to compromise on issues of principle, which they did not demonstrate on issues of power.

In the functioning of the non-Congress governments, two kinds of issues arose—those which divided parties and groups consistently over time on an intelligible basis, and those on which the lines of conflict were not entirely clear, but were proximately related to shifts of alignment affecting the fates of governments. The first category included such conflicts as those over the status of Urdu, over procurement of foodgrains, and over the abolition of the land revenue.

The Urdu issue continued to divide and distinguish the parties in the coalitions during the functioning of the non-Congress governments. The left parties, particularly, pressed for concessions to Urdu, including the declaration of Urdu as the second language in both Uttar Pradesh and Bihar. Reports in the press referred to a crisis in the Bihar cabinet in August 1967 on the Urdu issue. However, the Jan Sangh remained firmly opposed to the declaration of Urdu as a second language, while permitting certain concessions to be made, such as the printing of important government notices in Urdu. No defections of parties or significant groups from the governments occurred on the issue in either Uttar Pradesh or Bihar.

Another issue which early appeared to threaten the survival of the Uttar Pradesh government occurred over the decision of the cabinet to procure 500,000 tons of foodgrains. Two separate threats to the stability of the Uttar Pradesh government arose on this issue—one from the organizational wing of the Jan Sangh, the predominant party in the coalition, and the second from an ad hoc legislative inter-party interest group of big farmer members of the legislative Assembly and Council. The Jan Sangh ministers maintained cabinet responsibility on the issue and succeeded in persuading members of their organizational wing to refrain from making public announcements opposing procurement. However, the objections of the interparty legislative group, which itself included many Jan Sangh members, were satisfied only by a compromise whose effect was to reduce the amount of foodgrains to be procured from 500,000 tons to 200,000 tons. Again, however, no major defections from the government or from government supporters in the Assembly occurred on this issue.

The most serious and prolonged issue of this type, which divided the parties on clear lines, occurred again in Uttar Pradesh on the land revenue issue. The demand for land revenue abolition was a major public commitment of the SSP especially and one to which all other parties had committed themselves in the formation of the common programs. In Punjab, land revenue was not a serious issue. In Bihar, the land revenue was remitted without prolonged controversy in the government. In Uttar Pradesh, however, the chief minister, Charan Singh, was a man who had well-formed views on the issues of both land revenue and state financial resources in general. He refused to agree to abolish the land revenue completely until alternative resources could be found. The result was a stalemate and crisis in the Uttar Pradesh government which threatened to bring the government down. An initial decision on the issue was taken by the Uttar Pradesh government in July, by which it was agreed that 50% of the land revenue would be abolished on holdings up to 6.25 acres, beginning after the current kharif crop. Internal divisions in the SSP on the issue developed, however, and the SSP continued to insist on further concessions. The crisis in the government continued for several months, leading ultimately to an SSP-CPI alliance on the issue and their joint resignations from the government. Again, however, on the land revenue issue, as on the procurement issue, a compromise was reached which permitted the return of the two parties to the government at the end of October, 1967.

The resolution of these three crises in Bihar and Uttar Pradesh suggest again that there are differences of principle between the major parties. For the new system of coalition politics to function effectively, some issues, such as that over recognition of Urdu, must be sidestepped, whereas others must be compromised. In the first two years of coalition politics in north India, these methods of dealing with principled inter-party divisions were used frequently and effectively to resolve cabinet crises.

Issues which were not so easily resolved, however, were those which were connected with intra-party factional divisions and personal conflicts and which affected the interrelationship of groups within the parties and their position in the governments. Such issues frequently arose only after a split in one of the parties or in government had occurred and they provided a basis for building support to bring a government down rather than a cause for internal government division. Even more difficult tc resolve were those conflicts in which no discernible issue of principle could be detected, inwhich opportunists and political entrepreneurstraded their votes openly for ministerial office. In fact, the formation and fall of the non-Congress governments depended primarily on suchissues and forces.

III. THE FORMATION AND FALL OF THE NON-CONGRESS GOVERNMENTS: PROBLEMS OF OPPORTUNISM, INTRA-PARTY DIVI-SIONS. AND LOCAL POWER¹⁹

From the 1967 elections up to July, 1968. eight governments had been formed, and seven had fallen in the three north Indian states. Although the details of each cabinet crisis varied and the fall of the Charan Singh government ir Uttar Pradesh was uniquely complex, a fairly typical pattern of cabinet crisis developed After the formation of each government, it be came known that a prominent individual belonging to a faction in the Congress or in a non-Congress party was disaffected with the government because he was not satisfied with his place in the government or was not given a position in it. The disaffected leader then began to gather supporters, while criticizing the government in general terms for "corruption" or for failure to implement portions of the common program rapidly enough. Finally a prominen public event occurred or an issue was found which provided the leader with an immediatcause for defection with his loyal supporters

The defecting leader was then given the opportunity to form a government, which in the last two years was either a non-Congress coalition or a minority government with Congress support. In either event, the defecting leader became the new chief minister, many of those who defected with him received ministerial office, and a new crisis soon began. In the interim between two governments, the opposing forces in the legislature continually bargained for the support of independents and potential party defectors. The game came to an end in Uttar Pradesh and in Bihar when the governors became convinced that no stable coalitions were possible and that the Assembly should be dissolved and new elections should be called.

19 Except where otherwise cited, the information in this section has been derived from the Statesman, the Searchlight, the National Herald and the Tribune (Ambala).

Patterns of conflict and alliance which developed in the legislatures of the three north Indian states revealed three distinctive features affecting the stability of governments—the key roles of independents and individual poarty defectors, the importance of intra-party divisions and cross-party alliances of factions, and the significance of inter-party conflicts over local power outside the legislature in the districts. These patterns can best be illustrated by reference to specific cabinet crises.

Bihar. The first non-Congress government in Bihar came to power with greater ease and -more promise than its counterparts in either Uttar Pradesh or Punjab. It was an exclusively party coalition in which independents played no role and were not needed for support. Moreover the Congress was in a clear minority position with only 40% of the seats in the louse and was badly divided. The non-Congress government had a relatively sound maority of 169 in a house of 318 and functioned with little open disagreement on issues of prinsiple. Yet the government was brought down ov a no-confidence motion on January 26, 1968 and was replaced on February 1 by a minority lefectors' government with the support of the Congress. This ministry lasted until March 20 when it was replaced by a new non-Congress oalition government strengthened by the adition of 17 defectors from the Congress. This ast government fell on June 25, 1968, after a najor defection, and President's Rule was delared in the state.

All three cabinet crises were brought about "y large-scale defections, the first two involving the atra-party splits and the third involving the defection of an entire party from the government. In all three cases the precipitating causes f the crises were either non-principled factional divisions or questions of personal power and ambition. However, the three cases also eveal the diversity of social forces and cleaves which exist in the Bihar Assembly and round which factional groups can be built.

The first cabinet crisis involved a conflict between personal power and party interest in the SSP in which an attempt by the national party leadership to insist upon party interest failed against personal ambition and caste sentiment. The crisis arose when Bindeshwari Prasad Mandal, a prominent state SSP leader from a "backward caste," elected to the national parliament but not to the state Assembly, accepted a portfolio in the Bihar government. In order to remain in the ministry, Bindeshwari Prasad would have had to resign his parliamentary seat, which would then have had to be recontested by the SSP in a bye-election. When the induction of Bindeshwari Prasad Mandal into the Bihar cabinet came to his attention, it immediately annoyed the leader of the SSP, Dr. Rammanohar Lohia, who put the matter bluntly and publicly that Bindeshwari Prasad's action "amounted to using the party machinery to climb the ladder of power. 220

In response to Dr. Lohia's accusation, Bindeshwari Prasad went to Delhi, was sworn in as a member of Parliament, had a long conversation with Dr. Lohia (who advised him to resign from the Bihar cabinet),21 and then went back to Patna, where he showed no inclination whatsoever to resign his ministry. Moreover, his supporters from his own caste began sending telegrams to Dr. Lohia protesting the prospect of Bindeshwari Prasad's resignation and, privately, they informed the party leadership that there would be a split in the party on the part of Bindeshwari Prasad's supporters if he was forced to resign from the government.22 Ultimately, the latter happened. On August 28, 1967, Bindeshwari Prasac finally resigned, but claimed to be taking with him 25 defectors from the united legislature party (SVD), including 18 from the SSP, and he succeeded in forming an alliance between his newly-formed Soshit Dal and the Congress by means of which the government was ultimately brought down. In the end, Bindeshwari Prasad transformed a personal discomfiture into ultimate victory in state politics when he was sworn in as chief minister of the state on February 1, 1968.

In justifying his original resignation and in building the support necessary to bring down and replace the united front government, Bindeshwari Prasad emphasized caste and community issues, thereby turning SSP party policy against itself. He charged, as Dr. Lohia also had done, that the state SSP had not followed party policy in failing to see to it that 60% of the cabinet positions were provided for backward classes, scheduled castes, Muslims, tribals and women. The charge was true, but it is important to note that the question of Bindeshwari Prasad's political morality was raised before the representation issue and that there was nothing in SSP party policy which required that Bindeshwari Prasad himself should be in the cabinet.

²⁰ Indian Nation, March 12, 1967.

²¹ Interview document BG 31: 11.

²² Indian Nation, March 20, 1967.

The Bindeshwari Prasad Mandal ministry was short-lived. It depended for its majority on the support of the Congress. However, the formation of the Mandal government and Congress support for it immediately became an issue in internal Congress politics. The dominant factions in the Bihar Congress, especially the followers of the previous chief minister, K. B. Sahay, supported the Mandal ministry, while several minority Congress factions, especially that of former chief minister Pandit Binodanand Jha, opposed. On March 19, with the defection of seventeen prominent Congress MLAs, the Mandal ministry was defeated. Bhola Paswan Shastri acted as the spokesman for the Congress defectors, was elected the new leader of the SVD on the following day, and formed a new SVD government on March 21.

The fall of the two Bihar governments have in common their close association with inner party divisions, in the SSP and in the Congress. The fall of the Paswan ministry occurred in a somewhat different manner and was related to the interests of a cohesive "party" in the Assembly, whose interests were identical with the interests of one man, the Raja of Ramgarh. The latter had been one of the greatest zamindars in Bihar before zamindari abolition. He and his family had played an active role in Bihar politics since independence, leading a group of personal followers which varied in number in the Assembly from 17 or 18 to nearly 50. His closest family members and dependents followed the Raja from his original Janata party into the Swatantra party for a time, then into the Congress, from Congress to the JKD and into the first non-Congress government, from the JKD/ BKD to the Janata party again and into the Paswan ministry, and finally into opposition against the Paswan ministry causing its downfall.

The consistent bases of the Raja's actions in Bihar politics have been to maintain his group of personal followers and to find a position of prominence for himself in order to protect his interests and those of his family. Those interests include extensive mining properties and forest lands, the need for protection against the state government, which has long been prosecuting several cases against him in court on various charges, notably default of payments of his bills, for which the Raja is famous. In the first non-Congress government, the Raja insisted that he and his brother be given the portfolios of mines and minerals and forests. His demand was resisted by several parties in the coalition, but was ultimately conceded. The Paswan ministry accepted him into the cabinet but refused to give him Mines and Minerals On June 16, the Raja resigned from the ministry "on grounds of health," but the chief minister, who resigned ten days later, claimed that the issue was demands made by the Raja against the public interest which he as chief minister could not accept.

The ways in which the three Bihar governments fell indicate that there were three decisive factors affecting the stabilitity of cabinets—the personal ambitions of frustrated ministers, internal party divisions, and cross-party or single-party legislative interests, such as those of the middle castes or those of a great landlord-industrialist and his personal dependents. It is important to note that, on several occasions, the PSP and the SSP in Bihar resigned from government or refused to participate in governments until certain issues were agreed upon. However, none of the three cabinet crises could be attributed to the defection of a party on an issue of principle.

The importance of inner party divisions and legislative interest groups in the Bihar Assembly are reflected in the changes in party allegiance and the formation of new groups which occurred between March, 1967 and June, 1968, as shown below (Table 2).

The general tendency of the shifts is clear. Movement was predominantly from the established, relatively stable parties and from the independents to new legislative groups or revived parties such as Jharkhand (which had previously merged with Congress) and Janata (which had been the dominant force in the BKD). The legislative groups are either factional splinters from larger parties, united on appersonal or personal-cum-interest basis, or parties representing particular interests, such as Janata or Jharkhand (a party of tribals).

It is premature to draw any conclusions about the comparative cohesion of the larger parties. At one extreme, the two Communist parties lost no members, whereas the Congress lost 18% of its membership. The percentage losses for the SSP, the Jan Sangh, and the PSF were 16%, 12%, and 11% respectively. More important for purposes of my argument is the very significant fluidity in the house revealed by the total number of defections. Altogether 87 members in a house of 318 or more than 27% of the membership changed their affiliation in a little more than a year.

Uttar Pradesh. In Bihar, the first non-Congress coalition was brought down after the defection of a minister frustrated in his attempts to achieve personal power. In Uttar Pradesh, the non-Congress coalition was made possible only by a major defection from the Congress by a prominent Congressman of forty years' standing in the party who went over to the opposition with sixteen of his followers on April 1, 1967. Charan Singh had been known in Uttar Pradesh Congress politics for the previous twenty years as a man of considerable political skill, but also of integrity and principle. It was generally recognized that Charan Singh had well-formed views, which he expressed with intellectual clarity on most public issues, especially those affecting agriculture. He was also known to have been politically and intellectually dissatisfied with his colleagues in the Congress for many years, especially with the leader of the party, C. B. Gupta, for whom he had no respect.

Charan Singh's defection falls into the category of defections which arise out of inner party conflicts and are related to issues in a diffuse way, but very specifically to questions of power. The proximate cause of Charan Singh's defection was the failure of negotiations between him and C. B. Gupta on the composition of the Gupta ministry. The sources of conflict between Charan Singh and C. B. Gupta go back ten years and more. The justification for the defection was the alleged corruption and -administrative incompetence of the previous Congress regime and some of its members. The immediate consequence of the defection was to place Charan Singh and his closest followers in the seat of state power. Charan Singh and six -(of 16) of his supporters were taken into the —cabinet. The defectors were heavily overrepresented in the non-Congress government installed on April 5, 1967. Out of 28 ministers and leputy ministers, the 7 defectors who were taken into the ministry comprised 40% of the original defectors and 25% of the ministry compared, for example, to 8 Jan Sangh ministers representing only 8% of Jan Sangh strength in

Neither the Congress nor the SVD government in Uttar Pradesh ever had a safe majority. Both governments depended from the beginning not only on party defections but on the shifting allegiances of independents. Initially, the Congress by itself had 198 seats compared to 188 seats for the combined opposition parties, with 37 independents holding the balance. In the week preceding the formation of

TABLE 2. CHANGES IN PARTY AFFILIATION IN THE BIHAR ASSEMBLY FROM MARCH, 1967 TO JUNE, 1968

	Party Membershi
	March, 1967	June, 1968
Established Parties
Congress	128	105
SSP	68	57
Jan Sangh	26	23
CPI	. 24	24
CPM	4	. 4
PSP	18	16
Swatantra	3	1
RPI	1	1
New Parties and Legislative Groups
BKD (formerly JKD)	26	2
Soshit Dal	0	38
Lok Congress Dal	0	22
Janata	0	18
Independents	21	5
Jharkhanda	9	2

SOURCE: Statesman June 30, 1968.

^a In March, 1967, the Jharkhand party members were in the Congress party so that the 9 members listed then were actually at the time included in the Congress strength of 128.

the Congress government, there were hectic negotiations between the Congress and the SVD for the allegiances of the independents who frequently promised their support to both sides. Ultimately, the Governor determined through personal interrogation of party leaders and independents and through demands for clear indications from the independents of where they stood that the Congress had the better claim. Once the decision was made that the Congress would form the government, almost all the independents fell into line. In the first division in the Uttar Pradesh Assembly on March 17 on the election of the Speaker, the Congress secured 226 votes to 188 for the opposition, indicating either that 36 out of 37 independents had voted with the Congress or that the Congress had gained some votes from the opposition parties directly. The tables were, of course, turned on April 1 when Charan Singh crossed the floor with 16 of his supporters from the Congress. When the figures for independents and party defectors are added together, the extent of the fluidity revealed in the Uttar Pradesh Assembly up to that date comes to 54 members in a house of 424, not counting 5 defectors claimed at one stage by the Congress from the opposition.

Charan Singh's SVD government revealed a greater variety of internal stresses than any of the other governments discussed in this paper. There were issue conflicts over Urdu, procurement and the land revenue There were problems of intra-party cohesion within the large parties making up the coalition and there were inter-party conflicts over questions of local power, of party-building in the districts. In fact it is difficult to identify unequivocally the decisive factors which led to the fall of the Uttar Pradesh government both because of the variety of internal strains and because Charan Singh ultimately resigned without a vote of noconfidence.

Between the months of November 1967 and February 1968 a three-way split developed among the parties in the cabinet. Charan Singh continued to be supported primarily by the group of defectors who had crossed the floor with him and by the smaller parties and independents in the coalition. The leadership of the chief minister was, however, increasingly opposed and thwarted by the actions of the CPI and the SSP on the one hand and by the Jan Sangh on the other hand. The disaffection of the three large parties with the chief minister was closely interwoven with intra-party divisions in the SSP and with an inter-party struggle for power between the Jan Sangh and all other components of the SVD.

A central source of strain arose out of attempts by the Jan Sangh ministers to use their portfolios particularly those of the cooperation, local self-government, and education departments, to nominate members of the Jan Sangh party to powerful district cooperative, local government and educational institutions. Open dissatisfaction with the actions of the Jan Sangh ministers was expressed on several occasions by members of all parties in the SVD. A second source of strain related to the efforts of a faction in the SSP led by Raj Narain, a member of parliament, to assert a dominant role in state SSP politics and in the SVD government. In these efforts, the SSP adopted agitational tactics to pressure the SVD government while continuing to support the government in the legis-

The sequence of events which ultimately led to the resignation of Charan Singh began with the resignation of the CPI ministers on November 20, ostensibly because of differences with the chief minister on issues related to the use of the police in political agitations and the release of government employees and others who had been jailed for their activities in various agita tions in the past. Although the CPI minister withdrew from the government, they continued to support the government in the Assembly The SSP contingent continued in the government until January 6, but increasingly oriented its activities toward public agitations on the land revenue issue, on the release of government employees held in detention, and on the demand for elimination of English from use for government purposes.

On January 6, the SSP ministers also re signed on these issues, but like the CPI continued to vote with the SVD in the Assembly. Although both the CPI and the SSP related their withdrawels to public issues, one persuasive interpretation of their motives was that the public issues were secondary and that the primary factor was "the discomfiture of the two parties" which "arose from the fear that the Jan Sangh by exploiting the portfolios in its control was worsting them in the struggle for political influence at the district and lower levels."23 Under the circumstances, there was little profit for the two parties to remain in the government. Nom could they incur public displeasure and precipitate an undesired general election by bringing down the government. The only alternative therefore, was to continue to support the gov ernment, but to build their party strength and public appeal by agitational methods. The withdrawal of two of the three large parties in the cabinet was followed within a few days by a split between Charan Singh and the Jan Sangh The break came when the chief minister re shuffled the Jan Sangh portfolios without the consent of the party leaders, taking away from them both cooperation and local self-government, and replacing them with relatively lespowerful and more innocuous portfolios, such apublic works and animal husbandry. The Ja-Sangh accepted the reshuffling without with drawing from the government, but the part leaders now joined with some of the SSP leader in calling for the resignation of Charan Sing and his replacement by a new leader.

The demand for a new leader intensified bot inter-party and intra-party differences. Swetantra, the Republicans, the BKD, and the ir dependents continued to support Chara Singh, while the Jan Sangh insisted upon his replacement. The SSP, the PSP, and the CPI divided on the issue. Charan Sangh resigned o Fabruary 18 and President's Rule was declare on February 26. Attempts by the SVD and the

²³ "Charan Singh's Shrewd Politics," Economa and Political Weekly, 3 (January 20, 1968), 183

184.

Congress to build internal cohesion and win the support of a majority in the Assembly were made over the next two months, but the Governor ultimately decided that no stable government was possible and dissolved the Assembly on April 16.

Three factors seem to have been predominant in the resignation of Charan Singh—the disaffection of the three large parties with Charan Singh personally, conflict between the Jan Sangh and all other forces in the government over local power, and the adoption by a faction in the SSP of an agitational role in state politics. In his letter of resignation, Charan Singh stressed his dissatisfaction with the faction in the SSP led by Raj Narain and his right as chief minister to reshuffle portfolios. Issues of principle between the parties played only a secondary role in the disintegration of the SVD coalition. The SVD coalition lost its cohesion primarily through personal conflicts over the leadership; through intra-party divisions on the leadership question which affected most of the parties in the coalition; and through inter-party conflict for power, outside the cabinet and the Assembly, in the districts where local party activists maintain a continuing struggle for local power.

Punjab. The formation of the first non-Congress government in Punjab, its fall, and the strains affecting the stability of the minority defector's government which replaced it with Congress support illustrate sharply the key roles played by independents, individual defectors, and intra-party divisions in the major parties. In Punjab, the initial balance between the Congress and the united front coalition was so close that even independents had to be rewarded with government posts to win their support. The non-congress front was able to elect a lead--er faster than the Congress and, simultaneously, to win over the support of five independents to give it a majority of 53 members in a house of 104. In order to insure the allegiance of the in--dependents, four out of five were given ministerial positions. Even so, the majority of the -united front remained tenuous and was contin-·ually threatened by the efforts of the Congress to win over independents, by the efforts of the Maharaja of Patiala to form a third alternative government under his own leadership, and by the threat of defections from within the Akali Dal, the leading party in the front. To ward off the threat of a defeat, the united front ministry ielt obliged to offer a ministerial position to inyone willing to defect from the Congress. Six new supporters were acquired from the Congress in this way. In the process, two Akali legslators who were not taken in the ministry revolted and left the Akali Dal. Thus, the front leadership was caught in the position of being forced to offer ministries to independents and defectors from the Congress to maintain its majority, while it simultaneously lost the loyalty of party members who had not been similarly rewarded.

The early Akali defections proved to be a prelude to a more serious defection from within the government itself by the seniormost Akali minister in the cabinet after the chief minister. Lachhman Singh Gill had been a rival of Gurnam Singh, the chief minister, for leadership in the Akali party and was known to be dissatisfied with his own position and with the fact that his personal supporters had not received offices in the government. During the months from August through November, the united front government was affected by a variety of strains, including inter-party differences on policy issues as well as personal differences over portfolios. Inter-party conflict occurred on policies for scheduled castes, on the language issue, and on government policy toward labor agitations. The Republican party leaders expressed discontent on government policy toward scheduled castes, the Gill group in the Akali party demanded the elimination of Hindi from official use by the state government whereas the Jan Sangh favored continued use of Hindi, and the Communist party demanded a liberal policy toward labor agitations.

On November 23, Lachhman Singh Gill succeeded in combining a variety of discontented elements and in leading fifteen legislators out of the United Front, including five Sant Akalis, one Master Akali party member, six independents, and three Republicans. The Gill-led defection, therefore, combined the discontent of two minor parties, Republicans and Master Akalis, with discontent arising out of intra-party divisions and the personal discontent of independents. The decisive weight in the defection was, however, clearly with the dissident Akali faction and the independents, including among the latter several Congressmen who had previously defected from the Congress to the united front.

Gill combined his Akali and independent followers into a new legislative party, winning the support of the Congress for a new government under his leadership, and was sworn in as chief minister on November 26 with the support of the Congress, but without its participation in the government. The creation of the Gill government led to a new and complex division in the Punjab Assembly into four distinct groupings. The Gill ministry constituted one bloc in the Assembly and the remnant of the united front its bitter opponent. The Congress, however, divided internally into two inner party subcoalitions based on pre-existing groups in the party, now divided on the issue of support for the Gill ministry. Gian Singh Rarewala, the leader of the Congress legislative party and some of his allies and supporters began to express opposition to the Gill ministry. Rumors became increasingly common that the Rarewala group was interested in forming a Congress government with the support of some or all of the anti-Gill Akalis. However, a subcoalition in the Puniab Congress opposed to the leadership of the Gian Singh Rarewala group insisted upon continued support for the Gill ministry. In other words, the situation in the Puniab Congress was now similar to the position in the Bihar Congress at an earlier point. with a dissident group in the Congress opposed to a move toward power led by an opposing group in the party. In the middle of June 1968 the coalition pattern in the Punjab Assembly remained as described here, with the Gill ministry in an increasingly untenable position and division in the Congress moving toward a climax with a request by 23 out of 43 Congress MLAs to the Congress President for permission to remove Gian Singh Rarewala from his leadership of the Congress legislative party because of his moves to withdraw support from the Lachhman Singh Gill ministry.

Patterns of Coalition Politics in North India. The first two years of coalition politics in north India have revealed a complexity of patterns of conflict and alliance and a considerable diversity of political forces and interests in the legislative assemblies. There are, first, the large, organized parties which sought for the most part to provide stable governments in north India by putting aside their ideological differences. There were three main impediments which frustrated the attempts of the larger parties to dominate the assemblies. One was the limitation on the possible inter-party alliances imposed by the primary division in the assemblies between the Congress and the non-Congress parties. A second limitation followed from the first. The limitation of inter-party alliances to the non-Congress parties gave disproportionate weight in the governments to the newly formed legislative groups, which then sought to limit the dominance of the larger parties. Thus, in Utter Pradesh, Charan Singh and his Jan Congress came into conflict with the Jan Sangh in a struggle over portfolios, which finally contributed to the fall of the non-Congress government. The third impediment to the dominance of the large parties was the decisive importance of intra-party divisions, which affected coalition patterns in two ways. First, intra-party divisions frequently led to defections, most notably from the Congress, the SSP and the Akali Dal which brought down the Congress government in Uttar Pradesh and the initial non-Congress governments in Bihar and Punjab. Second intra-party divisions twice prevented the Congress from attempting to form coalition governments in Bihar and Punjab.

Thus, both inter-party and intra-party divisions placed limits on the possible coalitions which could be formed in the assemblies. It is worth stressing, however, that these limitations are variable. They are not the kinds of limitations which permanently restricted coalitions in the unstable party systems of Fourth Republic France, Weimar Germany, or contemporary Italy. Access to government power is open to all parties and groups in the Assembly provided the right barrains can be struck.

In addition to the large, organized parties, there is a wide variety of small parties and legislative groups in the assemblies of north India. Some of these smaller parties reflect social divisions, others reflect traditional bases of power, and still others are personal groups based upon factional association. In the first category of parties reflecting social divisions are parties such as Jharkhand in Bihar, representing the tribal peoples of Chota Nagpur, and the Republican party, which seeks to represent the low caste groups of north India. The best example of a party based on traditional influence is the Janata party of the Raja of Ramgarh in Bihar.

Then too, there are the ad hoc legislative groups of independents and party defectors, which are sometimes based on caste sentiment or on leader-follower ties or on alliances of mutual convenience. Under the regime of Congress dominance, the tendency in the assemblies was towards absorption of such groups into the Congress. In the new system of coalition politics, the tendency is towards proliferation of such groups, which are now in a position to bargain for portfolios with potential alliance partners among the bigger parties.

Finally, there are the independents and individual party defectors who are either local notables with ties only to their supporters in the constituencies or are men of little or no influence and stature who have nothing to lose and everything to gain by offering their votes in a closely balanced legislature in exchange for a minor portfolio in government. For such men, the stakes of political bargaining have also risen. When the Congress dominated the assemblies, independents might move into the Congress in order to receive the patronage of a faction leader in the party who might possibly provide benefits for his constituents and hopefully a Congress ticket for the next election. Now it is possible for any man in the assembly to become a minister.

In general, a comparison of the roles played by the large parties, on the one hand, and intraparty factions, small parties, and opportunists. on the other hand, suggests that the predominant influence of the large parties is toward stability whereas the predominant influence of intra-party and non-party forces is toward instability. In short, the stability of north Indian politics, parties, and governments is not threatened by ideological rigidities in the party systems but by looseness in the systems caused by the existence of large numbers of independents and the relative absence of strong party identifications. In any closely balanced legislature in north India, there will always be some independents or some party members who will be willing to change lovalties whether it be for the sake of principle, for the sake of a ministry or. in some cases, as one respondent put it, for the sake of a license to ply a truck.

IV. CONCLUSION

Many of the features of coalition politics which emerged in the aftermath of the decline of the Congress from its dominant position in north Indian politics existed during the hevday of Congress dominance. Intra-party divisions, party defections, shifting allegiances of independents, conflicts among Congress factions for local power through the control of key government departments, and the formation of legislative interest groups in the Assembly all occurred when Congress exercised a monopoly of power. Moreover, these kinds of strains frequently led to the toppling of Congress governments by dissident factions in the Congress. The difference then was that the arena of conflict and the diversity of interests and personal ambitions that could be expressed were limited to the Congress. Power at the state level was available only within the Congress. Movement into opposition was movement outside the arena of power. The arena has now become as broad as the legislative Assembly as a whole. The key change is now that all parties, groups, and organized interests have acquired access to power.

If we assume, as I believe we must, that the decline of the Congress is only partly reversible and that the return of Congress dominance throughout the Indian Union is the remotest of the possibilities to be considered for the future development of politics in India, then we are in need of new perspectives to deal meaningfully both with the complexity of the developing systems of coalition politics and with the variability of developing party systems in the Indian states generally. The pattern of coalition politics described here is simply too complex to be contained within the dominant party system model. Moreover, neither the patterns described here nor the dominant party system model are valid for some of the other Indian states, most notably Madras, where a single cohesive party, the DMK, has successfully replaced the Congress and where the development of a classic two-party system is a reasonable possibility. In brief, I am arguing that the Indian states provide a vast field for comparative studies of developing party systems, of which there are already a considerable variety in existence, and which can be compared both with each other and with party systems in other parts of the world. In this paper, I have attempted to describe the predominant tendencies and patterns of coalition politics in the developing party systems of north India. My argument can be summarized in the following points:

(1) Before the 1967 elections, the political regimes which dominated north Indian politics were best described as multi-party systems with one party, the Congress, dominant. Now that the Congress monopoly of power has been broken, the model of the one-party dominant system is no longer useful.²⁴ The formation of party coalitions and the stability of state party systems and state governments in north India have depended in the past two years and are likely to continue to depend in the immediate future upon the factional structure of the Congress, intra-party divisions in the other large parties, the relations among the parties, and the roles played by independents and party defectors.

Although north Indian state party systems resemble certain of the historical and contemporary European multi-party systems, they do not suffer from the rigidities of those systems. The predominant tendencies in the developing north Indian party systems are toward openness, fluidity, and inclusiveness. No parties have been excluded from the system or from government.

(2) The absence of rigidities in the systems does not mean that there are no anti-system parties in the states nor does it mean that ideology plays no role in party politics in these states. Ideological differences exist among the parties and each state party system varies in its ideological emphasis. However, ideology has not so far prevented the functioning of the systems. Ideological polarization in the state party systems cannot be ruled out in the long run, but the predominating tendencies do not lie in that direction at the moment. Inter-party conflicts on matters of principle were more easily reconciled in the past two years than inter-party conflicts which related to party power in the government and in the districts.

²⁴ For the contrary view that "the dominant party system is . . . only modified by fresh forms of competition, not replaced," see W. H. Morris-Jones, "From Monopoly to Competition in India's Politics," Asian Review, I 1 (November, 1967), 1–12.

(3) Far from suffering from ideological rigidity, the systems display a high degree of looseness and fluidity. In Sartori's terms, these are "structured party systems,"25 but the dominance of parties and party policies in the systems is limited by the key importance of nonprincipled intra-party divisions and by the presence of atomizing tendencies in the shape of large numbers of independents and political entrepreneurs. Until 1967, the Congress benefitted exclusively from the existence of such forces, which operated on the fringes of Congress power and were sometimes absorbed or used by factions in the Congress against each other. In the aftermath of the 1967 elections, the Congress is, as it were, suffering for its sins in this respect since the opportunists and entrepreneurs now have a wider field for maneuver and greater opportunities for achieving power.

The ways in which the north Indian party

²⁵ Sartori distinguishes between a "structured party system" in which "at least one or two of the existing parties have acquired . . . a national platform, a unified symbol, and some stable organization also at the local level, so that they are perceived by the country at large as the natural foci and channels of the political system" and a system in which there is "party atomization," that is, "a highly fragmented pattern in which parties are mostly a facade covering loose and shifting coalitions of notables. In this stage the party system is still evanescent qua system: parties have no real platform, hardly a national spread, no centralized or coordinated organization, and even less anything resembling a stable organization." Sartori, op. cit., pp. 167-168. What makes Indian party systems so interesting from a developmental point of view is that there are both structuring and tendencies toward atomization. My argument is that party development in India requires the consolidation of the predominance of the parties and the elimination of atomizing tendencies or at least the control of such tendencies so that they do not prevent the creation of conditions for stable and effective government.

systems functioned in the past two years can be represented conveniently in the form of the following diagram.

The diagram brings out the central role played in the contemporary north Indian party systems by independents and potential party defectors, whose activities affect all parties. Indeed, even groups within the Congress are affected; for, although an entire group may leave the Congress to find opportunities elsewhere, a Congress group is itself a loose structure, from which individuals may detach themselves. The model also recognizes the continued importance of the Congress in the system as a whole and the fact that the Congress contains within it sub-groups, which may vary in number and in the extent of their mutual antipathies. The arrows on the outer ring of both sides of the circle represent the tensions among groups in the Congress and among parties in the non-Congress coalitions. In general, the arrows in the diagram are meant to reflect the fluidity of the system and the fact that independents and defectors, Congress groups and non-Congress parties, may at any time change sides.

The diagram also leaves open two other possible patterns of coalition politics which did not occur in the past two years, but are likely to become feasible when the pariah status of the Congress wears off. One is that the Congress may decide to play the role of a European center party and attempt to reestablish a relative monopoly of power by bringing into coalition smaller parties with narrow interests or similar ideology. The other possibility is that Congress may be forced to accept a position as only one party among many and adopt a strategy of openness to all or most parties. In fact, it is possible that the first development may occur in some states, the second development in other states, depending upon the relative strength of the Congress and the ideological balance in individual party systems. The return of the Congress to power is, in fact, a real possibility in all three states, but it is highly unlikely that the Congress will ever again be able to dominate the systems in the same way as in the past either throughout the Indian Union or in any single state in north India.

The north Indian party systems which have replaced the Congress-dominant systems have proved incapable of providing stable, effective government in the first two years of coalition politics. The persistence of instability in the systems works against the interests of all the large parties and threatens to replace political leadership over policy making with bureaucratic rule. An alternative to chronic political instability and bureaucratic rule can arise only through the more effective organization of the large parties and increased coherence within them. Such a development is within the realm of possibility, but it is likely to be a labor of decades. The DMK in Madras has demonstrated that it is possible to build a disciplined, cohesive party organization in a developing society capable of taking power from the dominant party and ruling effectively. The nature and diversity of social divisions in north India make it unlikely that a single party will be able to emulate that feat. However, if the patterns of coalition politics which have been described in this paper are reliable guides to future political patterns in north India, then an increase in party organization and party ideology provides more likely conditions for government stability than a politics of power and personal ambition.

SOURCES OF LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT

ROBERT R. ALFORD University of Wisconsin

HARRY M. SCOBLE University of California, Los Angeles

Despite the legal norm of universal adult citizenship in the United States, and thus the legitimacy of participation by all strata of society, the actual level of political involvement in local communities is not high and differs greatly from group to group. Our task here is to spell out some of the conditions of group membership which contribute to local political involvement. Our broader purpose is to argue the need to re-expand the theoretical framework for analysis of political participation and thus to correct the present imbalanced focus upon participation as an individual act.¹

Thus we shall examine some structural, rather than psychological, conditions of local political involvement. In this we shall occasionally use some measures previously reported in other studies and conventionally regarded as tapping psychological attributes of individuals; but these we shall regard as defining sets of role-expectations or as locating categories of persons placed within a certain range of normative obligations; and, more importantly, we shall systematically compare the net effect (upon local political involvement) of such variables with that of the more conventionally defined structural variables.

¹ The theoretical discussion of political participation from the viewpoint of an individual act may be seen in Angus Campbell et al., The American Voter (New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1960); Robert A. Dahl, Who Governs? (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1961); and in the useful summary of the literture in Lester Milbrath, Political Participation (Chicago: Rand McNally and Company, 1965). The emphasis upon individual motivation is illustrated by Dahl's insistence (page 279) that "Instead of seeking to explain why citizens are not interested, concerned, and active, the task is to explain why a few citizens are." (His emphasis.) It is perhaps more fully illustrated by Milbrath's approach (e.g., page 6) where he states that "taking any political action generally requires two decisions: one must decide to act or not to act; and one must also decide the direction of his action." Milbrath then discusses people "making up their minds," making "choices," their "understanding," and other social-psychological aspects of political action. Given this orientation, level of information, degree of opinionatedness, intensity of feeling, rationality and quality of deliberation, consistency of ideological orientation, and other pyschological concomitants of participation become the primary focus of analysis.

I. DATA, ASSUMPTIONS, METHODS

Our data are drawn from an April, 1962 survey of the adult electorates of four middle-sized cities in Wisconsin. The overall response rate was 86 per cent; in no city did it fall below 83 per cent. Here we shall ignore inter-city differences and instead aggregate the four separate samples into a composite sample (technically defined as a probability sample of the electorate of middle-sized cities in Wisconsin in 1962).

From the survey responses to questions on local political interest, local political information, public-meeting attendance, and local electoral turnout, we have constructed an index of local political involvement and this is our dependent variable. But before discussing that index in further detail, it is necessary first to state the theoretical assumptions entailed in using the index and also to identify certain important research questions which we cannot treat here.

First, construction of an index of local political involvement is based on the assumption that one may usefully treat the "local community" as if it were a single political system. We admit that individual citizens may perceive otherwise, that such differential perceptions may importantly influence political behaviors, etc., but that raises different questions (from the ones here) to be treated elsewhere. Second, we shall ignore variations in the four components of our index of involvement. It would be possible and useful to create and explore typologies (e.g., Apathetics, or uninterested nonvoters, Ritualists, or uninterested voters, and so on) but that again raises different research questions for the future. Thirdly, we shall not be able to treat here the question of prime interest to Dahl and other pluralists, of the situational context within which a specific individual is active/influential in a particular decision or an apparently apathetic individual suddenly emerges as a "meteor," in Wildavsky's term. Finally, our concern here is with the sources of differential local involvement and we must reserve for the future questions of policy or systemic consequences. Thus, for present purposes, we assume only that it is empirically possible and theoretically useful to distinguish the generally highly involved from the generally uninvolved. Furthermore, since the dependent variable is based upon fourteen separate items (several of which involve reports of political behavior ranging over the lifetime, since maturity, of the individual), we assume we have isolated a category or "political stratum" of individuals more or less consistently involved and active in local affairs (i.e., we doubt we have misclassified many individuals because of situational peculiaritiesto them—at the time of interview).

² Further details of the study may be found in Robert R. Alford and Harry M. Scoble, "Community Leadership, Education and Political Behavior," American Sociological Review, 33 (April 1968), 259-272.

The composite index of local political involvement was constructed as follows. First, four separate indices were created: (1) an index of local political interest, evenly dividing the sample into "high" and "low" interest; (2) an index of local political information, again evenly dividing the sample into high/low; (3) an index of public-meeting attendance, dichotomized into "high" (25 per cent of the sample) and "low" (remainder); and (4) an index of local election turnout, also dichotomized into "high" (about 60 per cent of the sample) and "low" (remainder). Then these were combined

² See Aaron Wildavsky, Leadership in a Small Town (Totowa: The Bedminster Press, 1964).

4 To save space, the verbatim form of the items making up each index will not be presented here. (They may be obtained from the Wisconsin Survey Research Laboratory or from the authors.) Briefly, the index of local political interest is based on five items asking: general interest in city politics; perception of major local problem(s); number of these; interest in decision(s) by city government or school board "in the past year;" and number of these. The index of local political information is based on four items asking: correct names of mayor, city clerk, school superintenddent, and Republican Party (or Democratic Party) county chairman. The index of attendance is based on three questions asking, "within the past two years," if respondent had attended a public-issue discussion meeting, a political party meeting, and a city council (or school board) meeting. And the index of local electoral turnout is based on two items requesting reported frequency of voting in local general and in local primary elections "since you have qualified for voting . . . (and) wherever you have lived. . . . " into five types: Mobilized (high on all four indices); Potentially Mobilized (high on interest, information and turnout, but low on attendance); Moderate (a residual catch-all for all cases not defined by the other four combinations); Ritualistic (low on all except voting); and Apathetic (low on all four). The percentage distribution of the 1,635 cases is: 9, 18, 48, 12, and 12 per cents respectively. For convenience in analysis, we have collapsed the five types into a trichotomy and have focused on the extremes of "high" (Mobilized and Potentially Mobilized, 28 per cent of the sample) and "low" (Ritualistic and Apathetic, 24 per cent) in local political involvement.

Six categories of factors have been thought to be the principal sources of local political involvement: social status, organizational activity, community attachment, religion and ethnicity (relatively little studied independently of social status), political motivations or predispositions, and the sociopolitical environment within which one lives (which has also received little systematic attention). These are our independent variables, concerning which it is important to note that none logically reduces to another (although one may be caused by another and thus have no independent effect).

For each independent variable, employing either the survey data or electoral and census statistics for city blocks and wards, at least two different indicators have been selected (with the single, obvious exception of religion) as follows: for social status: income, education, occupation; organizational activity: memberships and activity in voluntary associations, local party membership; community attachment: home ownership, length of residence, geographic mobility, a composite index measuring respondent's objective stake in the community, and an index measuring subjective attachment to the community; religion and ethnicity: religion, original nationality, father's birthplace, and generation(s) in the United States; political predisposition: indices of sense of local civic duty, political efficacy, and political alienation; and sociopolitical environment: presidential and local voting turnout and home ownership and housing quality rates for the ward in which respondent lived. Each indicator is more specifically defined in its appropriate table; also, since cutting points on all variables, including involvement, are arbitrary, it should be remembered that the percentages to reported have only relative—and not absolute—meaning.

⁵ Assumptions underlying the types are, for example, that an uninterested, uninformed voter is not a conspicuous local participant, whereas a non-attender who is nonetheless highly interested, informed, etc., is likely to leap quickly into action if he perceives an issue of concern.

⁶ For a general survey of the literature using, with some terminological differences, these same six categories, see Milbrath, op. cit. In the analysis sections which follow, for reasons of space we cannot fully cite the literature (especially where repetitively replicative); we will, however, attempt to cite literature of both a complementary and a contradictory sort on the lesser-researched independent variables, especially social mobility, community attachment, religion and ethnicity, and political environment.

Finally, a brief description of our steps of procedure and mode of analysis is necessary. First, we computed the basic association between each indicator of each independent variable and the dependent variable (percentage high in local political involvement). These zero-order associations are familiar to all political scientists and are reported, serially, in the first six tables below.

Next, we made use of multivariate analysis (in part because we wished to avoid assumptions of normality and linearity normally required by more elaborate correlation and regression statistics) and for this we followed procedures recommended by James S. Coleman with regard to computation of "effect parameters." Thus, while we have computed multivariate contingency tables, we need not reproduce them here because we can economically verbalize them in terms of several different effect-parameter summaries which we will employ in two different ways. The effect parameters to be used are termed gross effect, net effect, and joint (also maximum or extreme) effect. The gross effect is simply the percentage difference observable in the dependent variable prior to introduction of a second or third independent variable; it is similar (but not always identical) to the original zero-order association.8 The net effect, defined as the mean difference obtaining among all relevant comparisons among all identical sub-categories created by intersections of two or more independent variables, is of greater theoretical importance because it is a measure of whether -and, if so, in what direction and by how much—the assumed "independent" variable indeed has an independent effect when simultaneously controlling for the effect(s) of one or more other independent variables. (But a "net effect" statistic is not "self-interpreting" for, as in any quantitative measure, "significance" has to be attributed in terms of more or less arbitrary conventions; ours—as "decision rules"-are stated below.) To illustrate with a concrete example, and to anticipate examination of social status indicators next, having demonstrated the obvious—that each is associated with the dependent variable—the question next arises as to mutual effects, of intercorrelation versus independence, of the indicators. The net-effect parameter is an aid for answering the question, when interpreted in terms of the following decision rules. First, if the direction of association (gross or net effect) is as expected, it is indicated by a plus sign. Second, if gross effect is greater than 15 percentage points but reduces, when controlled, to a net of five or less, we shall assume that the second or third factor accounts for the apparent influence of the first. Third, if signs are evenly split (positive and negative) and net effects are between zero and five, we shall assume there is no relation between the factors. Fourth, if one component difference is negative, but another has a magnitude of at least 20, we shall infer some kind of cancelling-out effect. And, finally, our basic rule: to assume that an indicator has an independent effect, the component differences must all be in the same (positive) direction and average to 10 or more percentage points. Used in accordance with these rules, gross- and especially net-effect parameters permit us to judge the relative importance of two or more indicators of the same independent variable (or of one or more indicators of two or more different variables).9

⁷ See James S. Coleman, Introduction to Mathematical Sociology (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1964), pp. 189–203. One reason Coleman advanced his alternative method may be simply stated: contingency tables, by the time one introduces three independent variables, become visually cumbersome, consume much space, and often elicit excessively subjective interpretation. An "effect parameter"—of the types defined and illustrated in our text—is a single, quantitative summary designed to avoid all three, interrelated problems.

⁸ It is only similar (not identical) because of the frequent need to change cutting points of the same indicator when moving from zero- to higher-order analysis.

⁹ Because the dependent variable was trichotomized (into "high," "moderate," and "low" local political involvement) rather than dichotomized, the use or arbitrary cutting points might unduly influence the relative association of independent variables with involvement. To check on precisely this, all multivariate analyses were run twice, using first "high" and then "low" involvement as the dependent variable. To save space in the text, effect parameters for "high" involvement only are reported—but in no case where these are "significant" (as defined) are they not also con-

Coleman's method also yields a third summary, termed joint (or maximum or extreme) effect. For example, in a four-variable table (with three independent variables), joint effect is measured by subtracting the "amount" of the dependent variable observed in the low-low-low cell from that in the high-high-high cell;but note that this is the logical extreme—if the maximum mathematical difference does not also occur between these two cells, then the method is inappropriate because the independent variables are not working in the presumed, cumulative fashion. Concretely, if one is interested in the relative importance of all motivational indicators compared with all social status indicators, joint effect is a simple, convenient yardstick for making such judgment; thus this measure will be employed later, in Table 7, when treating combined effects of indicators of the same and of different independent variables.

II. FINDINGS

Social Status

The expected, positive association of each of three indicators of social status with local political involvement is demonstrated in Table 1. To verbalize the obvious should be unnecessary, other than to point out that changes in the magnitude of the dependent variable in this table are among the very highest observed in our data; indeed two—those for occupation and especially education—rank among the three highest basic associations observed.

As computed from the multivariate analysis, gross effect parameters were: education +26, occupation +19, and income +12, and net effect parameters were: education +18, occupation +12, and income +14, That is, because of intercorrelations among the three status indicators, the basic association of each with involvement is reduced somewhat when controlled for the others; but none is wiped out or even substantially reduced. And, as indicated by the net effects interpreted with our rules, each indicator has an independent effect upon the dependent behavior.

Most striking in this multivariate analysis is the increasing importance of each status indicator as more of them are high. That is, there is firmed by effect parameters computed for 'low' involvement.

TABLE 1. LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT AND SOCIAL STATUS

Per cent l	nigh in lo	cal politi	cal involve	ement
Education:	Eleven or less years Hig Grad ate		Some College or More	Total
	13% (608)	23 % (596)	43 % (377)	24% (1581)
Occupation:	Manual Non- manual			Total
			7% 35)	25% (1478)
Income:	th	.an	,000 or Core	Total
			2% 79)	24% (1522)

Education is based on report of highest grade of school or year of college completed. Those reporting some vocational training in addition to high school are classed with high school graduates, even if they did not graduate from high school.

Occupation is that of head of household. Non-manual includes: professional, technical and kindred workers, post-high school students, managers, officials, and proprietors, clerical and kindred workers, and sales workers. Manual includes: craftsmen, foremen, operatives, laborers, and private household and service workers.

Income is estimated total family income from all sources "last year" (1961) and "high" income was defined as that exceeding the median family income for Wisconsin in 1960 ($6,000).

much less difference in political involvement among persons low in any two aspects than among those high in any two; and the greatest gap of all occurs between those with college education and nonmanual occupation and high income compared with persons in any other (two-high-only) category. This may indicate that both advantages and disadvantages conferred by social status are cumulative—"adding up" in combined effects on involvement. An alternative possibility is that as one "refines" crude survey analysis by defining variables by three indicators rather than one, he approaches much closer to the reality of status groups with established expectations of political participation for their members. Particularly in minority "categories" (e.g., 13 per cent of the sample falls into the highest status category), one may be delineating actual social groups, members of which are guided by norms of political behavior, not just statistical aggregates.

¹⁰ The net effect of income actually increases slightly over gross effect, due to concentration of the population in low education and manual occupation categories (a sub-total of 840 cases) plus the relatively small positive influence of having a high income if the other two aspects of social status are both low.

This possibility, that we are dealing with a status group with some historical continuity of socialization into political participation, raises the question of the influence of social mobility upon involvement. The multivariate analysis was rerun, now substituting father's occupation (nonmanual, manual, and farming) for the income indicator. Gross and net effects of education and present occupation remained as above; those for father's occupation were +5 and -1, respectively,11 indicating no consistent, independent influence on involvement. But introduction of "farming" into considerations of an industrial phenomenon obscures more than it clarifies. If attention is restricted to inter-generational mobility defined solely in terms of modern (blue and white collar) occupations, then social mobility has both a modest yet differential effect on political behavior. That is, controlling for both education and present occupation, the political involvement of downward mobiles is the same as that of the stratum to which they have descended (and, of course, greatly less than that of the level left); whereas the level of political involvement of upward mobiles is higher (a partial "net effect" of +5) than that of the level left yet still lower (a partial "net effect" of -8) than that of the highstationary stratum to which they are ascending. In a crude comparative sense, the political behavioral consequences of downward mobility are immediate and full (they have traversed 100 per cent of the "political distance" down); those of upward mobility are delayed and partial (for upward mobiles have climbed only about 40 per cent of the distance up). More theoretically, yet highly tentatively, we might infer two different processes at work: for downward mobiles, early adult resocialization effectively contradicts still earlier ("pro-participation") familial socialization; but for upward mobiles, earlier ("antiparticipation") familial socialization tends more to carry over into adult life and to retard new learning in the acquisition of political roles more appropriate to new social status.12

¹¹ Net effect was here calculated on the assumption that farming is lower in status than the manual category; if one reverses the assumption the net effect parameter is +2.

¹² Unfortunately, this is not the first time that inquiry into social mobility has yielded somewhat unsatisfactory results. Since World War II,

But, howevermuch the social mobility findings are in the expected directions, we wish to stress that they are small and of considerably analysts have been interested in the political consequences of vertical social mobility. Research results have been highly variable and often conflicting, in part because of great variation in operational definitions of "mobility" and probably also because geographical mobility, often thought to accompany social mobility, has rarely been separated out of the inquiry. (Early conflicting results, including his own, may be found in V. O. Key, Jr., Public Opinion and American Democracy [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1961]. pp. 145-148). It is also relevant to note that early inquiries focused primarily on direction, or ideological content, of political opinion as the dependent variable, whereas we are here concerned with the more neutral amount of political activity and involvement.

On what might be termed a para-political subject similar to ours, research has produced further confusion if not contradiction. On the one hand. socially mobile persons were found to be not as socially active as stationaries in studies by Gerhard E. Lenski, "Social Participation and Status Crystallization," American Sociological Review, 21 (Aug., 1956), 458-464, and by Peter M. Blau, "Social Mobility and Interpersonal Relations." American Sociological Review, 21 (June, 1956), 290-295. On the other hand, a third inquiry found no such relationship, for which see Richard Curtis, "Occupational Mobility and Membership in Voluntary Organizations: A Note on Research," American Sociological Review, 24 (Dec., 1959), 846-848.

More recently, we have found partial confirmation of our findings in the work of Jane H. Bayes. who made use of interview, mailed questionnaire, and aggregate electoral and census data on residents of Los Angeles County. (Bayes never explicitly specifies direction-including downward-of social mobility in her data; but because of the special demographic characteristics of the Los Angeles population, we assume that the greatest proportion of her cases of socially mobiles are upwardly mobile and thus that her findings lend support to that relevant portion of our data.) Having first established that socially active persons are also politically active, Bayes then demonstrated that: (1) in general, social mobility had no significant effect on organizational activity; (2) but when analysis was restricted to nongeographically-mobile residents, who had been raised in the county, then the social mobiles were significantly less active in organizations; (3) yet finally geographic mobility—alternatively defined by interstate movement, by intra-county resless importance than our replication of the well-established linkage between social status and political involvement independently for each of the three present-day indicators of status—a point to which we return in a later section.

Organizational Activity

Two of our measures of organizational activity (claimed number of voluntary memberships and reported levels of activity therein) are conventional, but the third measure is both unconventional and inherently ambiguous, because of the highly variable meanings of both "membership" and "local" party in American politics. Thus we claim for the latter only that it serves as an additional, specifically political measure either of organizational activity or at least of predisposition to identify oneself in organizational terms. See Table 2: as expected, each indicator initially exhibits quite a strong association with political involvement.

Multivariate analysis (involving dichotomizing both organizational memberships and activity) produced gross effect parameters of organizational activity +21, organizational membership +20, and party member +18; net effects-somewhat reduced as anticipated-were +12, +10, and +13 respectively. Again, each indicator had an important independent effect on political involvement. Moreover, persons organizationally active in two or more regards were considerably more highly involved than those less active—but this opens up discussion of joint effect, and comparisons among these, which we must defer until we have completed a a review of the six basic categories of independent variables. We will also defer to a subsequent section consideration of questions, which the reader may already have raised, as to whether social status, especially indicated by education, may not wholly account for organizational activity (whether sociologically or psychologically measured).

Community Attachment

We conceived of community attachment as having both objective and subjective dimensions. Home ownership, long residence in the community (and/or geographic mobility), or idential mobility, and by length of residence—" is more destructive to previous social and civic obligations than is social or occupational movement within one geographic area." (Page 164; emphasis added.) See Jane H. Bayes, "Political Participation and Geographic Mobility" (unpublished doctoral dissertation, Department of Political Science, UCLA, 1967), especially chapters 6 and 7.

TABLE 2. LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT AND ORGANIZATIONAL ACTIVITY

Memberships:	13010	Medium	111R11	Total
	13%		32%
	(697)	(371)	(515)	(1583)
Organizational Activity:	Low	Medium	High	Total
	10%	21%	47%	25%
	(487)	(659)	(409)	(1555)
Local Party		***************************************
Member:	N	o Y	Yes	Total

Organizational memberships are based on the question, "Which clubs and organizations like those on this card do you belong to?" (A flash-card was shown, listing eleven subject-matter categories plus a residual "other".) One (or no) membership was scored "low"; two as "medium"; and three or more as "high".

Organizational activity is based on reported frequency of attending meetings of each group belonged to (above); response categories were "usually, seldom, or never" (scored 2, 1, or 0 respectively); scores were summed; and "low" activity was defined as 1 or 0 (including no membership initially); "medium" was 2-4; and "high" activity a score of 5 or more.

Local Party Membership is from the question, "Do you consider yourself a member of a local political party?" (As noted in the text, this question is inherently ambiguous in at least two senses.)

having friends and relatives in the immediate area are considered objective indicators of community attachment, or integration. Their association with political involvement is shown in Table 3. It is evident that home ownership is the most unambiguously related to involvement. Length of residence exhibits a curvilinear relationship (to be anticipated because of the probable concealed correlation of age at the "high" end of the continuum). The combined index labelled "objective stake in the community" shows the expected effect in only modest amount and that of geographic mobility is even less.

TABLE 3. LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT AND COMMUNITY ATTACHMENT

Per cent high in local political involvement
Home Ownership:	:	No	Yes		Total
•	- (13% (524)	30% (1019)		24% (1543)
Length of Residence:	Less than 14 years	15 to 29 years	30 to 49 years	More than 50 years	Total
	15% (523)	26% (330)	33% (523)	23% (217)	24% (1593)
Objective Stake in Community:		Low	Medium	High	Total
		21% (559)	22% (452)	29% (493)	24% (1504)
Geo- graphic Mobility:	Born and brought up outside Wiscon- sin	Born or brought up in Wiscon- sin	All life in Wiscon- sin	All life in city	Total
	23% (427)	32% (88)	24% (590)	26% (461)	25% (1566)

Home ownership is based on "Do you own, are you buying, or do you rent this house you are living in?

Length of residence is based on "How long have you lived in this city?"

Objective stake in community is based on five questions (one of which repeats home-ownership above, it should be noted). Respondents were given a score of 1 each if they had close relatives living within 25 miles of them, had one or more "best friends" living in the community, owned their house, owned any (other) property in the city, and if their spouse had any relatives in the area. A "low" score was 0 to 2, "medium" was 3, and "high" 4 or 5.

Geographic mobility is based on two questions, "Where were you born?" and "Where did you live most of the time between the ages of 5 and 15?"

These findings may seem somewhat surprising because one traditional hypothesis concerning sources of local political involvement focused on just such community attachment or social integration. But available data for testing have been somewhat limited. 13 However, before concluding that community attachment (other than home-ownership) plays very little role in producing involvement, we examined the associations of Table 3 more closely, selecting geographic mobility and length of residence for multivariate comparison. In the resulting table, internal relationships were small in size and inconsistent in direction, yielding low effect parameters (net effects of -2 and +3, respectively), indicating no independent impact on involvement.

18 Early findings of general relevance may be seen in Gresham Sykes, "The Differential Distribution of Community Knowledge," Social Forces, 29 (May, 1951), 376–382. The population was white, male wage-earners in Plainfield, New Jersey. The dependent variable was knowledge of local community affairs. Among the hypothesized independent variables having positive effect were home-ownership, geographic mobility, and length of residence. One of the earliest theoretical gen-

We then devised an index of subjective attachment to the community, '4' on the possibility that it might be more important for local political involvement. The effects of both subjective attachment and objective stake were than compared by multivariate analysis, but both net effect parameters, while positive, were small (+4 and +3, respectively) and the result of internal inconsistencies. Again, eralizations of such community-attachment findings to explicitly political behavior may be found in Chapter 30, "The Psychology of Voting," by Seymour M. Lipset et al, in Gardner Lindzey (ed.), The Handbook of Social Psychology (Cambridge: Addison-Wesley Company, 1954). And Bayes, op. cit., more recently demonstrated that geographic mobility itself, regardless of length of residence, was the most destructive for social and political participation of all factors she surveyed. (In thinking about the far smaller impact of inter-state geographic mobility in our data than in Bayes', we note that two-thirds of our respondents had lived all their lives in Wisconsin whereas more than 60 per cent of the Los Angeles population had been born outside California, suggesting that the local political system may be able to absorb without much change small amounts of geographic mobility. Future research of a comparative sort thus might usefully focus on whether there is a threshold effect or a "critical mass" factor involved.)

14 The index of subjective attachment was based on three items: "In general, this is a very good community to live in," "I can hardly imagine myself moving out of this community at any time in the future," and "I could be just about as satisfied with life in another community as I am here." Agreements to the first two questions and disagreement to the third were each scored 1, producing an index ranging from 0 to 3 (high subjective attachment). The items were originally devised by Martin A. Trow for study of communication flows in Bennington, Vermont, and were based upon the discussion of "locals" and "cosmopolitans" in Robert K. Merton, Social Theory and Social Structure (Glencoe: The Free Press, 1957 edition).

TABLE 4. LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT, RELIGION AND ETHNICITY

Per cent high in local political involvement
Religion		Catl	holic Prot	estant		Total
	· · · · · · ·	22 (656	, .	6% 2)	-	24% (1551)
Original Nationality:	Mediterr. Europe	Eastern Europe	Central Europe	Northwest Europe	Great Britain	Total
	21% (67)	30% (166)	22% (492)	22 % (364)	33 % (383)	25% (1512
Father's Birthplace:	Mediterr. Europe	Eastern Europe	Central Europe	Northwest Europe	Great Britain	Total
	20 % . (65)	35% (113)	20% (141)	25% (122)	45% (33)	26% (499)
Generation in United States:	First	Second	Third	Fourth		Total
	20% (123)	28% (457)	27 % (543)	19% (369)		25% (1492)

Religion is based on "What is your religious preference or membership?"

Original Nationality is based on "What is the original nationality of your family on your father's side?" (If the answer was "American," this was probed—"What country did your family come from originally?")

Father's Birthplace is based on "Where was your father born?" (and this portion of the table excludes US-born fathers). For both original nationality and father's birthplace, "Mediterranean Europe" is defined by Italy, Portugal, Spain, and Greece; "Eastern Europe" includes Poland, Russia, and any other country east of Germany; "Central Europe" includes Germany, Austria, and Switzerland; "Northwest Europe" includes France, Belgium, Holland, and the Scandanavian countries; while "Great Britain" includes Ireland. Persons of mixed British and Northwest European background were classified as British. The few "other" countries of origin have been excluded from this table.

Generation in United States was determined by responses to questions about birthplace of the respondent, his parents, and all grandparents. "First generation" means all were foreign born, "second generation" that respondent was US-born but one or both parents foreign born, etc. Ninety persons were unclassifiable because they could not answer one or more questions.

by our test, neither variable demonstrated independent influence.

We conclude that—except for home owner-ship—neither subjective nor objective attachment to the community plays an important role in creating local political involvement. Whether this is a new historical development, to be expected in modern mass societies in which "attachment" as a social phenomenon has little general influence, is a question we cannot answer.

Religion and Ethnicity

Religion, nationality, and nativity are three aspects of the cultural origins of a population which may be related to local political involvement which have been little studied. Table 4 presents four basic associations in the context. Protestants are only slightly more likely to be involved than Catholics and the difference is not significant. Persons whose original nationality is British or whose father was born in Great Britain are slightly more likely to be highly involved than persons with other ethnic origins (with East Europeans an unexplainable exception). And the number of generations in the United States interestingly appears curvilinear, making no consistent difference in involvement.

Religion and original nationality were then examined in combination. In three of the four

TABLE 5. LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT AND POLITICAL PREDISPOSITIONS

Per cent hig	h in loc	al political	l involve	ment
Local Political
Efficacy:	Low	Medium	High	Total
·	24%	23%	33%	25%
	(514)	(664)	(295)	(1473)
Local Political
Alienation:	High	Medium	Low	Total
	15%	20%	32%	26%
	(114)	(597)	(781)	(1492)
Local Civic
Duty:	Low	Medium	High	Total
	12%	22%	32%	. 25%
	(224)	(672)	(649)	(1545)

Local Political Efficacy is based on three statements, "I don't think public officials in this city care much what people like me think," "I get as much satisfaction out of my political activity as I do from my other community activities," and "The way people vote is the main thing that decides how things are run in this city." Disagreement with the first statement and agreement with the second two were considered indicators of a high sense of local political efficacy, scored 1 each and summed. "Low" in this table is 0 or 1, "medium" is 2, and "high" is 3.

Local Political Alienation is based on two statements, "In most local elections there usually isn't enough information available for me to make an intelligent choice" and "To succeed in politics around here, a man has to be dishonest." Agreement with either was considered evidence of local political alienation and was scored 1. "High" in this table means 2, "medium" 1, and "low" 0 total score.

Local Civic Duty is based on two statements, "A good many local elections aren't important enough to bother with" and "If a person doesn't care how a local election comes out, he shouldn't vote in it." Disagreement in both cases was considered evidence of high local civic duty, scored 1 each, and summed. "Low" here is 0, "medium" is 1, and "high" a score of 2.

nationality groups with enough cases for comparison, Protestants were slightly more likely than Catholics to be highly involved in local politics. Also, persons originally from Britain were slightly more highly involved than persons from Northwest, Central, and Mediterranean Europe, whether Catholic or Protestant. But the patterns were not completely consistent, and it was evident from Table 4 that neither ethnicity nor religion is as strongly related to local political involvement as other independent variables previously examined. Furthermore, whatever apparent effect ethno-religious groupings exhibit might well be the effect of social status differences. And this was then exammined, using education as the indicator. Education retains a relatively large influence (net effect +14) but original nationality exhibits no independent influence when controlled (net effect +1).

In short, while there may be a special affinity for politics among particular ethno-religious groupings, this factor is probably not strong enough to offset the major effects of social status and organizational activity. When education and organizational activity are taken into account, we have probably controlled for the major part of the variation in involvement which might initially appear due to ethno-religious origins.¹⁵

Political Predispositions

Political predispositions have repeatedly been found to be associated with voting turnout and other forms of psychological or behavioral involvement in politics, especially in national studies.¹⁶ Here we present three different com-

15 See two M.A. theses based on the same data reported here for more detailed analyses of the religious bases of political behavior in the four Wisconsin cities: Patricia D. Cousens, "Religion and Class and Predictors of Political Involvement" (unpublished Master's Thesis, Department of Sociology, University of Wisconsin, 1964) and Luther B. Otto, "Catholic and Lutheran Folitical Cultures in Medium Sized Wisconsin Cities" (unpublished Master's Thesis, Department of Sociology, University of Wisconsin, 1963). The first study found that "with class controlled, there are no differences between Protestants and Catholics in levels of political involvement in the local community," although distinct religious differences remained in party identification and voting. The second study produced a similar finding for Lutherans and Catholics.

¹⁶ See Campbell, op. cit., pp. 103-107 for motivational factors involved in the 1956 presidential election. The original scales are presented in Angus Campbell, Gerald Gurin, and Warren E. E. Miller, The Voter Decides (Evanston: Row, Peterson and Company, 1954), pp. 187-199, which we have adapted with specifically local referents.

posite measures of a positive or negative predisposition to be involved in local politics: local political efficacy, civic duty, and political aliention. As indicated in Table 5 there is indeed a positive relationship between each indicator of political motivation and local political involvement, yet we note that the associations tend to be smaller than those of social status or organizational activity with involvement.

The three motivational measures were then combined, on the assumption that a stronger relationship might result if persons were scored on seven separate items (rather than only two or three) and that there might be something internally inconsistent about the items, in the context of local politics, which might account for the relatively weak relationship of these social-psychological attributes with local involvement. Such is not the case. Agreement on local political efficacy items has no independent effect (net effect +1) on local political involvement; local civic duty or political alienation retains almost exactly the same effect on involvement whether considered separately or simultaneously (that is, the gross and net effect parameters are both +12 and +11); and the explanatory power of all three together is clearly not substantially more than that of any one of the three separately.

We shall see later whether and how social status and home-ownership are related to the sense of local civic duty, selecting this measure of political predisposition for special analysis.

Political Environment

The concept of political environment or milieu has existed in the literature some forty years, dating from the Chicago social scientists' concerns with "urbanism as a way of life"; but political analysts have made less extensive use of the concept in their research than have social-area analysts. In this section, we are con-

17 The concept of political environment or milieu is essentially that of a subnational areal (e.g., "neighborhood") political culture persisting through time and social space. Five representative political studies making use of the concept are: (1) Harold F. Gosnell, Machine Politics: Chicago Model (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1939), pp. 91-125, where the author used electoral and census data on Chicago subcommunities to determine types of voter-support for Franklin D. Roosevelt and also to compare 1928-1936 voting consistency; (2) a study similar to Gosnell's by Bartelmann, as reported in R. C. Tryon, Identification of Social Areas by Cluster Analysis; A General Method with an Application to the San Francisco Bay Area, vol. 8, cerned with a limited aspect of political environment (in terms of its effect on amount of political behavior, rather than more traditional concern with effect on direction). Thus we are asking whether individual political involvement in the local community is associated with residence in a ward with a high level of voting turnout, housing quality, and/or home-ownership? The basic associations of these environmental indicators with the dependent variable are presented in Table 6, showing that there is indeed a slight positive association between local and presidential voting turnout in the ward and between housing quality and level of homeownership of the ward and the level of local political involvement. (But reversals occur with respect to both local turnout and home-ownership.)

The multivariate procedures previously described were than employed. The two aggre-

No. 1 (University of California Publications in Psychology, 1955), pp. 1-100, in which the author compared the 1940 Roosevelt vote with the 1947 Congressional vote for Havenner (an FDR-Truman supporter), showing that the neighborhood distribution of the vote was practically the same in the two elections in San Francisco; (3) Walter C. Kaufman and Scott Greer, "Voting in a Metropolitan Community: An Application of Social Area Analysis," Social Forces, 38 (Mar., 1960), 196-204, comparing 1952 presidential vote with a 1954 local referendum (to establish a Metropolitan St. Louis Sewer District) in terms of both direction of voting and level of turnout and by reference to census tracts classified by Shevky's indices of social rank, urbanization, and minority segregation; (4) Heinz Eulau, Betty H. Zisk, and Kenneth Prewitt, "Latent Partisanship in Non-partisan Elections: Effects of Political Milieu and Mobilication," in M. Kent Jennings and L. Harmon Zeigler (eds.), The Electoral Process (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall Inc., 1966), pp. 208-237, in which the researchers classified the city-wide partisan milieu-predominantly Democratic, competitive, or predominantly Republican, as defined by party registration data-of formally nonpartisan California cities and then demonstrated milieu effects on individual behavior (characteristics, perceptions, campaign activities, career expectations, etc., of incumbent councilmen); and (5) Bayes, op cit., chapter 8, in which Bayes arrayed Los Angeles County census tracts according to whether they were nationally-oriented in voting, state-local oriented, or mixed, and then demonstrated that the observable effect of political milieu was upon the behavior of the non-college educated respondents in her samples.

TABLE 6. LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT AND WARD CHARACTERISTICS

Per cent high in local political involvement
West Control of the C	Low	Medium Low	Medium High	High	Total
Presidential Vote Turnout:	21%	23%	26%	27%	24%
,	(337)	(352)	(435)	(471)	(1595)
Local Vote Turnout:	19%	23%	28%	26%	24%
	(340)	(381)	(413)	(461)	(1595)
Housing Quality:	13%	16%	25%	27%	24%
	(149)	(162)	(438)	(863)	(1592)
Home Ownership:	16%	24%	28%	24%	24%
	(204)	(478)	(473)	(437)	(1592)

Presidential Vote Turnout is based on the percentage of voters in the spring presidential primary of 1960. City election statistics were employed. Each of the 78 werds in the four cities was ranked, separately for each city, and then divided into four approximately equal groups. Cutting points thus differed for each city, because the overall turnout levels of the cities differed.

Local Vote Turnout is based on the aldermanic elections of 1961 or 1962 (and procedures similar to the above were used). Two successive years were necessary because of staggered elections in Wisconsin municipalities.

Housing Quality refers to the proportion of dilapidated housing units in each ward in 1960 and Home Ovenership to the proportion of housing units owned by their residents in 1960, again by wards. Both of the latter measures were derived from the block data of the 1960 Census of Housing. For further details on construction and interrelationships of these measures of ward characteristics, see Robert R. Alford, in collaboration with Harry M. Seoble, Bureaueracy and Mobilization in Urban Politics (Chicago: Rand McNally and Company, forthcoming), Chapters 8 and 9.

gate social characteristics of the wards were compared, but the net-effect parameters (of ownership +2 and of housing quality +4) indicated that neither had an independent effect on involvement when controlled for the other. The two political characteristics of the wards were then compared, with similar evidence of lack of impact (net effect +2 for both presidential and local voting turnout). From these two tests, it seemed entirely possible that the small, positive initial associations (in Table 6) were entirely the result of the status composition of the wards—that when individual characteristics of respondents were controlled the apparent contextual effects of wards would entirely disappear. Thus two further multivariate tests were conducted, to examine the mutual effects of social status-measured first by education alone and then by a combined index based on education, occupation, and income-and ward characteristics upon local political involvement. That is, in each test, a status characteristic of the respondent was combined with two ward characteristics—one social, one political—in order to produce two separate tests of the possible independence of ward influences upon involvement. The results of the first test were net-effect parameters as follows: ward home-ownership +3, ward local voting turnout +7, and combined social status +27. The results of the second (again net effects) were: ward presidential turnout +3, ward housing quality +4, and education +16. In short, no ward characteristic exhibited an independent effect (by our definition) on local political involvement; but social status (by both measures) retained a uniformly positive and high association with involvement, regardless of the political or social characteristic of the ward and regardless of which ward indicator was employed.

Contrary to earlier findings, the political environment—defined here in terms of the ward election district—does not exhibit independent influence upon political behavior. Whether a different (smaller or larger areal) definition of the political milieu might yield different (and positive) results is a question we cannot answer.

III. THE COMBINED EFFECTS OF VARIOUS FACTORS

Before summarizing findings and conclusions, we wish to examine the combined effects of various indicators, approaching this subject through the question (earlier deferred) of the joint or individual effects of education and organizational activity upon local political involvement. Does organizational activity account for the influence of education on involvement? There are at least three possibilities, two plausible and one implausible. First, if the path of recruitment to organizations is primarily through education (and organizational-belonging is class-related in this sense) and if local political involvement is primarily a function of social status, then organizational activity should prove an intervening variable which, when controlled, would eliminate the apparent influence of education on involvement (i.e., similarly active persons should be similarly involved in local politics, regardless of education). The contrary is implausible, that education is the primary determinant and organizational activity only incidental, for then college-educated persons should have the same level of local involvement whether belonging to four organizations or none. But, third, education and organizational activity may both independently influence involvement, not only because of the assumption that the local political system is accessible through various channels of participation but also because involvement (as defined) does not require that a person be active in organizations. The components of involvement do not depend upon membership or activity in associations of any kind; while such "unmediated" involvement may be of quite a different nature than that derived from organizational activity, it certainly need not be considered "lesser" in any sense. And home ownership may be another intervening variable, mediating both organizational activity and local involvement.

These possibilities were examined by multivariate analysis, first comparing education, individual home-ownership, and sense of local civic duty. The net effect parameters were: education +21, ownership +25, and civic duty +7. The independent influences of both education and home-ownership on involvement are clear and strong, regardless of each other or of civic duty. Civic duty, on the other hand, has small impact when controlled. Indeed, among renters, there was no relationship between high sense of civic duty and local involvement. among either highly or relatively less educated respondents. In this sense, a sense of civic duty simply does not "compensate" for not owning a home or not having a college education. Alternatively, home ownership may imply crossing a threshold of community attachment at which point local elections assume enough meaning that one's personal predispositions become engaged and influence one's involvement; but below that threshold, local politics apparently has little meaning and civic-duty questions may tap general ideological assumptions-but, whatever, these bear no relation to (low) local political involvement.

Therefore we turned to the three indicators of different independent variables which Tables 1-6 had indicated as having greatest impact on local political involvement: education, organizational activity, and home-ownership. In multivariate comparison, the respective net effect parameters of these three were: +17, +16, and +16. No one of these accounts for the "apparent" influence of the others; each retains a strong independent effect on involvement when simultaneously controlled for the other two.

What does it mean that home-ownership or organizational activity is a source of local political involvement independent of education? Home ownership apparently is a form of politically-relevant group membership, vesting the individual with tangible interests perceived as impinged upon by local politics quite apart from more conventional interests of high social status. So for organizational activity: persons become politically involved through channels other than that provided by elite social position. For membership and activity in a church, Rotary club, labor union, or recreational association brings one into contact with local affairs in ways exposing one to information, arousing interest, provoking attendance at meetings and voting in local elections whether or not one had the initial predisposition to repond to political stimuli implied by relatively high education.

Earlier, we referred to Coleman's "joint effect" parameter as a useful summary statistic by which one may readily judge whether, for example, the combined effects of three indicators of one independent variable are more or less than those of the indicators of another independent variable (or judge the relative importance of "mixed" indicators of two or more independent variables). Thus, in Table 7, we have summarized the major joint effects observed in the previous (unreproduced) multivariate tables. (We have ignored the indicators of community attachment-other than home-ownership-and of religion and ethnicity, for obvious reasons.) Another way to state the purpose of Table 7 is to say that it isolates categories of combinations exhibiting least-to-most probability of being associated with local political involvement.

Thus, personal predispositions to participate (senses of local political efficacy, civic duty, or lack of political alienation) had least combined influence on local political involvement, as defined here.

Political environmental indicators, even when "mixed" with social status indicators, had only intermediate effect.

Organizational activity and social status had approximately equal "maximum effects," when all three indicators of each were taken into account simultaneously in the extreme cells.

And when the joint effects of several different independent variables were taken into account, the degree of explanatory power of all indicators/variables was increased slightly. For example, 60 per cent of all persons of high education, owning their homes, and having high sense of civic duty were high in local political involvement, compared with only 8 per cent of those low in education, renters, and low in civic duty—leaving (as indicated in Table 7, sixth row) a net joint-effect of +52.

Table 8 shows even more graphically the structural sources of local political involvement, by classifying persons on the three most important indicators of different independent variables: home-ownership, organizational activity, and education. Table 8 presents three

TABLE 7. SUMMARY OF MAJOR JOINT EFFECTS OF INDICATORS ASSOCIATED WITH HIGH
LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT

· •	Joint Effect
Political Motivation Indicators:
Local political efficacy, civic duty,
political alienation	+23
Political Environment and Social Status
Indicators (Mixed):
Combined social status, ward home- ownership, ward local voting turnout.	+28
040	T20
Education, ward housing quality,	1.90
ward presidential voting turnout	+36
Organizational Activity Indicators:
Organizational memberships, organizational activity, local party membership	+39
Social Status Indicators:
Education, occupation, income	+42
Joint Effects of Mixed Indicators:
Education, individual home-ownership, sense of civic duty	+52
Education, organizational activity, individual home-ownership	+47

This table summarizes joint (maximum, extreme, or net) effect parameters for the extreme cells of the multivariate tables previously described in the text (but unreproduced). In each row of this table, the "joint effect" represents the maximum percentage-point difference between the two cells "highest" and "lowest" in each individual table with respect to their potential influence upon local political involvement. Thus, in row five of the table above, we summarize the fact that we found 55 per cent of those with some college education, a nonmanual occupation, and an income of more than $6,000 a year were highly involved in local politics, whereas only 13 per cent of those with less than college education, a manual occupation, and an income of less than $6,000 a year were highly involved. The difference between these two figures is +42, entered in row five in this table.

sets of related figures (from left to right): the proportion highly involved of each category (following "condition of involvement"), then the proportion each such category is of the total population, and finally the distribution of highly involved persons in each of the eight categories. For example, at one extreme, home owning, organizationally active, high-status persons constitute 22 per cent of the population; half are active, yet these constitute 44 per cent of all highly involved persons. At the other, 13 per cent rents, are inactive organizationally, low-status, and only 3 per cent are highly involved, constituting only 2 per cent of the total number of highly involved persons.

We divided the aggregate sample into four main groups, based on home ownership, organizational activity, education, and local political involvement. Of those high on the first three factors, half are involved—and probably from this group of stable middle-class activists is drawn most of the civic/political leadership of the communities. In the second (lower) category, the main group is that of organizationally-active home-owners with low education, constituting 29 per cent of the total population and 30 per cent of the "highly involved" population.

Finally, we may lump together as relatively uninvolved those persons lacking any two or more structual conditions for involvement—for these constitute a combined 39 per cent of the total population, but only roughly one-seventh of those highly involved in local politics.

In short, Table 8 isolates four different categories of persons defined by four main variables: home ownership, organizational activity, education, and local political involvement. (The first three are the key structural conditions leading to involvement itself.) The important fact is the high degree of correlation of these characteristics, illustrated by the fact that we have been able to classify fully 85 per cent of the total population. To state it differently, relatively few persons own a home, have high education, but are not also organizationally active; nor are there many who rent, are organizationally inactive, but also have high education. This shorthand summary of results is a verbal means of providing a quasi-demographic description of the "involvement composition" of the Wisconsin sample. But we must reserve to the future examination of variations in actual political roles played by persons with differing combinations of these attributes.

IV. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The above tables indicate that only some of the several factors presumably related to local political involvement are independently important and that some are much more important than others. Social status and organizational activity, not surprisingly, proved the most important personal characteristics associated with local political involvement. Local political predispositions—measured by indices of civic duty, political efficacy, and political alienation—are relatively less important. Local polit

TABLE 8. STRUCTURAL SOURCES OF LOCAL POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT

(Condition of Involvement		Per cent		Proportion	Proportion category is Home Owner- ship	Organizational Activity	Educa- tion	Highly Involved		Highly		category is of total population	of all highly involved persons
			%	(N)	%	, %
	ALL THREE HIGH			·		•
High	\mathbf{High}	High	50%	(309)	22%	44%
	ANY TWO HIGH
\mathbf{High}	\mathbf{Low}	\mathbf{High}	31%	(51)	4).	5
Low	High	High	28%	(85)	6}39	7 42
High	\mathbf{High}	\mathbf{Low}	26%	(406)	29	30)
	ANY TWO LOW
Low	High	Low	13%	(164)	11)	. 6
High	$_{ m Low}$	Low	11%	(184)	13 26	$6 \} 12$
Low	\mathbf{Low}	\mathbf{High}	10%	(21)	2)	— ј
	ALL THREE LOW				·
Low	Low	Low	3%	(178)	13	2
	TOTAL		25%	(1378)	100 % (1378)	100% (349)

The left-hand set of figures in this table simply rearranges those of tables previously reported (but unreproduced); the right-hand set takes these same figures and (1) presents the proportion each category (High, High, etc.) is of the total sample and (2) presents the proportion it is of the total of "highly involved" persons. (All measures here are based on dichotomies.) For example, in the first row above, 50 per cent of those 309 persons who owned homes, were organizationally active, and had high education were highly involved in local politics. These same 309 persons constituted 22 per cent of the total sample (aggregated across the four cities) but they also constituted 44 per cent of the 349 persons (in that total sample) who were scored as highly involved in local politics.

ical environment (as measured by the social status and voting turnout levels of the ward of residence) was even less important. Geographic mobility, length of residence, and subjective attachment to the community had no importance—but home-ownership was strongly related to local involvement. And evidence concerning religion, ethnicity, and nativity was inconclusive, at best.

What can one infer from such diverse findings? We feel both the positive and negative findings are important. The fact that neither mobility, residence, nor subjective attachment is significantly related to local involvement (whereas organizational activity and homeownership are) suggests that "traditional" ties to the community have lost whatever significance they might once have had. Rather, only concrete memberships in local groups and specific interests at stake produce high local involvement. Similarly, the trivial role played by neighborhood socio-political environment indicates that people "carry around" with them their predispositions to participate, and are not significantly influenced by "immediate" sociopolitical milieu. "Local" influences such as ward social-status level or turnout level no longer—if ever—have strong influence on involvement, apart from personal characteristics of individuals living in the ward. Religion, ethnicity, nativity seem similar: characteristics people "carry around" and perhaps more stable than influences deriving from geography and location (e.g., ward, residence, and/or mobility)—but we do not have space to examine these factors further.

It is surprising that the predispositional factors—efficacy, civic duty, alienation—do not exhibit greater influence than they do, in light of the considerable social-psychological literature stressing individual decision and choice in political behavior. Since we are unprepared to argue that the four Wisconsin cities are different from other communities as data sources, we suggest that previous studies have not taken into account a wide enough range of structural conditions affecting voting and political involvement.

It is formally possible for any person to become involved (as defined); but the fact that high-status, home-owning, organizationally-active persons provide half of all highly involved persons suggests that politics in American cities is probably disproportionately influenced by the norms and values characteristic of that group—if it is a group with distinctive norms and values.

The advantage of restricting inquiry to relatively "hard" structural conditions (such as the three prime indicators here) is that one avoids the easy assumption that "anyone can become involved if he wants to," that politics is a matter of will-power-entirely up to the individual to acquire or not. This assumption—a myth of "equal political opportunity" as it were-is analogous to that in economics: that involvement is merely a matter of desire and that any one who wishes to, by dint of hard labor, can become a fully participating member of the economic system. The difficulties with this view are perhaps more apparent with respect to the economy than the polity, but it can reasonably be argued that structural parriers to involvement are similar in both spheres.

Those persons drawn into organizational activity, having a certain stability of residence in the community, and having high status provide the bulk of those actively involved in local government and politics. These conditions, in turn, may be highly correlated with a sense of political confidence or efficacy, but surely primarily as causes, not consequences. Individual voting acts in particular elections constitute true "decisions" in the sense usually meant, but involvement rates are more than aggregates of decisions, to the extent that they are systematically correlated with the social structuring of group memberships, attachments, and stratification. If political involvement is thus linked with social structure, involvement rates are undoubtedly linked to the political role-structure of the society. To be specific, when we find that better-educated persons vote more frequently than less-educated, we have not explained this by asserting that better-educated people are more likely to "decide" to vote than less well educated. The level of explanation or understanding more appropriate to the empirical finding is to look to the definitions of appropriate behavior for particular categories of persons in the society, i.e., the norms governing political participation and involvement.

Political involvement may be a characteristic of a political "stratum" which, in a society like the United States, has much the same character as the social stratification system. High status (political or social) is formally accessible to all, but limited in fact—by background, training, and selection. Political involvement is an attribute of a politically-organized stratum which—like social class strata—need not be cohesive, but may be internally divided and represent only partially consistent interests and values.

Political involvement may thus be usefully conceived as a social role, with attached normative expectations for self and others, varying with group and community membership, containing the possibility of role conflict, role sets, and role change. Involvement thus is connected with social and political structures through processes of role definition and learning. (One asks, how do people come to see themselves as related to politics? How and when is political role fixed? How does it change? How is it related to other roles?) Viewing involvement thus, we attempt to avoid reifying a classification of individuals, something hard to do when analyzing survey data from one point in time. High level of involvement is not assumed to be a permanent characteristic of an individual, but only partial. segmentary, subject to pressures for change either for intensification or abandonment. When a political role becomes permanent and central, we normally refer to the "professional politician"-but this is not the central role for most persons and, therefore, the structural conditions under which political roles are played become important.

That there are several independent sources of local political involvement means that one can neither explain nor understand the course of controversial issues with reference to a single underlying dimension. Interest, information, meeting-attendance, voting turnout—these arise from a number of independently varying causes which cannot be reduced to a single origin.

¹⁸ Our article cited in footnote 2 above treats the formal leadership of the four Wisconsin cities as such a political stratum.

MALAPPORTIONMENT PARTY COMPETITION, AND THE FUNCTIONAL DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES*

ALLAN G. PULSIPHER Southern Illinois University

JAMES L. WEATHERBY, JR.
University of Minnesota

I. INTRODUCTION

Most students of American politics traditionally have argued that it is desirable that legislative apportionment systems conform as closely as possible to an ideal of numerical equality, and that it is desirable that major political parties actively compete for elective office. Admittedly this argument has been in

- * Some of the research reported in this paper was done while both authors were staff members of the Community Service Seminar and Research Program at Texas A&M University, an activity jointly funded by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare under Title One of the Higher Education Act of 1965 and the Coordinating Board of the Texas College and University System. The authors would like to acknowledge the assistance of this program in the preparation of their research. We would also like to acknowledge the helpful comments of Claude A. Bitner, Jr. of the University of Houston, Claude Davis of Texas A&M University, Neil Wallace of the University of Minnesota and a referee on earlier drafts of this paper.
- ¹ Numerical equality is, of course, merely one ideal, and it is certainly an ideal which is neither very confining nor demanding. It is in no way necessarily related to other characteristics which are normally considered to be desirable in a system of representation. Gerrymandering, for example, does not necessarily require deviations from numerical equality, and, given certain characteristics of the geographical distribution of the electorate, gerrymandering itself may be a force tending to produce numerical equality.
- ² We realize that competition between major political parties is not the only form of political competition which is important in the United States. Clearly in many states competition within one or the other of the major political parties is much more important than that between parties. A study with more ambitious objectives than ours would have to explore the influence of this and other types of political competition. Our investigation should be viewed as an attempt merely to explore the influence of strength of competition between the two major parties upon state and local expenditure patterns.

large part only implicit, but, since most theoretical argument in political science has been implicit,³ this does not imply that apportionment or party competition have not been considered to be important by students of politics. Indeed several recent articles in professional journals have been published which seem to derive at least a portion of their appeal and raison d'être from a "demonstration" that students of politics have been guilty of the sin of credulity by holding these implicit beliefs.

The tone of much of this work is aptly expressed by the title of a popularizing article by David Brady and Douglas Edmonds, "One Man, One Vote-So What?"4 Brady and Edmonds-after some extensive, but, unfornately not very discriminating statistical computations-concluded "that the whole Pandora's box of evil consequences which supposedly result from malapportionment—from right-towork laws to not spending enough on school children-really has little to do with malapportionment."5 Although somewhat more cautious in his approach, Thomas R. Dye reached the similar conclusion that "on the whole, the policy choices of malapportioned legislatures are not noticeably different from policy choices of well-apportioned legislatures." And Richard I. Hofferbert also concluded a non-parametric analysis in the same sceptical vein by writing, "structural characteristics and, if one prefers to give partisan variables a separate berth, the nature of the party system and its operation do not seem to go very far toward explaining the kind of politics produced in the states."7

- ³ For an excellent discussion of implicit theorizing in political science see Charles E. Lindblom's "In Praise of Political Science" World Politics, 24 (Jan., 1958).
 - 4 Trans-action, 4 (March, 1967), 41-46.
 - ⁵ Ibid., p. 46.
- 6 "Malapportionment and Public Policy in the States," Journal of Politics, 27 (August, 1965), 500
- 7 "The Relation Between Public Policy and Some Structural and Environmental Variables in the American States," this Review, 60 (March, 1966), 82.

The purpose of this paper is to attempt to furnish a grain of scholarly salt for assertions of this type. Rather than attempting to accomplish this objective by engaging in the necessarily tedious process of immanent criticism, we will present the results of a study which indicate that malapportionment and party competition are associated with policy choices in a statistically significant manner.

Specifically, this study has three principal objectives. They are:

- 1. To formulate some consistent, but only exploratory, hypotheses about the possible relationship between differences in the apportionment patterns and levels of major party competition among the American States and differences in per capita expenditure levels in these states for some selected governmental functions.
- 2. To organize these hypotheses in a manner which will allow multivariate statistical techniques to be used legitimately to test the explanatory usefulness of these hypotheses.
- 3. To statistically test these hypotheses and discuss some of the implications and limitations of these tests and their results.

II. THE CONSTRUCTION AND INTERPRETATION OF THE HYPOTHESES

The formulation of the Hypotheses. The hypotheses concerning the influence of malapportionment and party competition are formulated in the following manner.

Hypothesis I.—The greater the degree of apportionment in a state, the lower the level of per capita expenditure will tend to be for the governmental function in question.

We interpret this hypothesis to be consistent with the following two premises:

Premise I.1.—The greater the degree of malapportionment in a state, the greater will tend to be the divergence between the actual results of the political decision-making process and the "true" preferences of the electorate for the category of governmental expenditures in question.

Premise I.2.—The "true" preferences of the electorate call for a higher level of expenditure on the function in question than the actual level produced by the political decision-making process

We wish to postulate these two premises for two reasons. The first is that they make explicit how we will interpret an empirical affirmation of the validity of Hypothesis I. The second is that these premises will be used in our analysis of the second major hypothesis to insure consistency in our testing procedure.

The second hypothesis we wish to test concerns the influence of competition between the two major political parties within a state and expenditure levels within that state for the goverr mental functions which we have selected for study. This hypothesis is formulated in the following manner.

Hypothesis II.—The greater the degree of party competition in a state, the higher the level of per capita expenditures will tend to be for the governmental function in question.

We interpret this hypothesis to be consistent with the following two premises.

Premise II.1—The greater the degree of party competition in a state, the greater will be the degree of conformity between the actual results of the political decision-making process and the "true" preferences of the electorate for the governmental expenditure classification in quastion.

Premise II.2.—The "true" preferences of the electorate call for a higher level of expenditure on the function in question than the actual level produced by the political decision-making process.

The Procedure for Testing the Hypotheses. The procedure which we have used to test these two hypotheses can be outlined as follows. For each of the selected expenditure categories:

- 1. We test Hypothesis I using standard statisfical techniques.
- 2. If the criteria of these tests allow us to accept Hypothesis I, then we proceed to test Hypothesis II using the same techniques.
- 3. If Hypothesis II satisfies the criteria of the test it is accepted, if it does not it is rejected.
- 4. However, if the criteria of the tests used do not allow us to accept Hypothesis I we make no attempt to test Hypothesis II.

Although somewhat complex, this procedure is necessary if we wish to assign internally consistent and unambiguous meaning to the results of the statistical tests of our two hypotheses. Premises I.1 and I.2 make explicit how we wish to interpret Hypothesis I, and, likewise, Premises II.1 and II.2 indicate our interpretation of Hypothesis II; but, clearly, there are also many other sets of premises which are also consistent with these two hypotheses. We cannot directly test the validity of these premises by statistical methods, but, to us, the premises seem reasonable. We can, however, insure that our interpretation of our statistical tests is consistent with our premises. This is what our testing procedure is designed to do.

The design of our testing procedure incorporates the test of Hypothesis I as a necessary condition (to use mathematical terms) for the testing of Hypothesis II. There are two reasons we designed the procedure in this way. One is basically a value judgement that we have made and the other concerns the statistical relationships inherent in the data available to test the hypotheses. The value judgement is that, to us, the first hypothesis seems to be the simpler and more widely accepted of the two hypotheses. It should be emphasized, however, that this "judgement" is largely an intuitive affirmation, on our part, since, frankly, we do not feel that the a priori theoretical analysis devoted to either hypothesis has been adequate to warrant much confidence. The statistical reason for using Hypothesis I as a necessary condition in our procedure is that the measure we have used to quantitatively approximate the concept of malapportionment is much less highly correlated with the other independent variables in our regression equations than is our measure of inter-party competition. As will be explained later, when independent variables are highly correlated with one another a statistical problem called multicollinearity is created which causes some difficulty in interpreting results. In other words, we are slightly more confident about our measurement of the relationship between malapportionment and expenditure levels than we are about our measurement of the relationship between inter-party competition and expenditure levels.

Operationally, our use of the test of Hypothesis I as a necessary condition for accepting or rejecting Hypothesis II involves the following. If we reject Hypothesis I our testing procedure stops. We make no attempt to interpret the test of Hypothesis II for that expenditure category. We feel that if we attempted to do so we would introduce ambiguity into our analysis. The premises which we have assigned, a priori, to the two hypotheses indicates our interpretation of them. We feel more confident that our test of Hypothesis I is adequate, therefore, if we reject Hypothesis I we are, in effect, saying that for -that expenditure category Premise I.2 is subject to question. We are less confident that our test of Hypothesis II is adequate, and since Premise II.2 is identical to Premise I.2, we feel ■that it would be inconsistent to accept Hypothesis II if we have rejected Hypothesis I. If Hypothesis I is accepted, however, our procedure loes allow us to either accept or reject Hypothesis II as indicated by the results of our statistical tests.

The objective of our testing procedure is not to attempt to verify the hypotheses we have postulated for all or even most of the functional expenditure categories of state and local governments. They are not statements that we a priori expect to be universally descriptive of poitical processes. It would be naive to interpret ⁸ We do, of course, have a priori reasons for beieving apportionment patterns and party comour statistical tests as in any sense a rigorous test of the hypotheses which we have formulated or the familiar political concepts upon which these hypotheses rest. The procedure was designed merely to find those expenditure functions which are consistent with these hypotheses as we have interpreted them.

For those expenditure categories which are not empirically compatible with the hypotheses our method is inconclusive. In other words, our procedure will not divide the functions which we have selected for study into two mutually exclusive sets, one set composed of those functions which are compatible with the hypotheses and the other set composed of those which are not compatible with the hypotheses. The procedure only demonstrates that some functions are compatible. It is not powerful enough to demonstrate that (1) these are the only functions which are compatible or (2) that all the other functions are not compatible; i.e., the procedure only locates some members of the "compatible set," and some members of the "not compatible set."

III. VARIABLES SELECTED TO TEST THE HYPOTHESES

Dependent and Independent Variables. We have selected two groups of variables in order to explore the explanatory usefulness of our hypotheses. The first group are assumed to be the dependent variables, i.e., variables which react passively to changes in other variables. The dependent variables which we have chosen were selected from the categories of state and local expenditures as given in the 1962 Census of Governments. The full variable names and the reference abbreviations of the dependent variables selected are given in Table 1.

In order to explore the relationship between differences in per capita expenditures on the functions listed in Table 1 and differences in apportionment patterns and the degree of interparty competition, we will use two single equation regression models. The first model is:

petitiveness might influence the pattern of expenditures or we would not have undertaken this study. Two examples of the type of a priori argument which led us to believe that this is so are Anthony Downs' An Economic Theory of Democracy (New York: Harper and Row, 1957), especially pp. 21–74 and 114–141, and William Riker's, The Theory of Political Coalitions (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1962).

⁹ U. S. Bureau of the Census, Census of Governments: 1962, Vol. IV, No. 4, Compendium of Government Finances (Washington, D. C.: U. S. Government Printing Office, 1964), pp. 57-58.

TABLE 1. FULL VARIABLE NAME AND REFERENCE ABBREVIATION FOR DEPENDENT VARIABLES^a

Full Variable Name	Reference Abbreviation
1. Total General Expenditure of State and Local Governmental Units	1. Total Expenditure
2. Total Expenditure for Education	2. Total Education
2a. Expenditure for Institutions of Higher Education	2a. Higher Education
2b. Expenditure for Local Schools	2b. Elementary and Secondary
3. Total Expenditure for Public Welfare	3. Total Public Welfare
3a. Public Welfare Expenditure for Categorical Programs ^b	3a. Categorical Programs
3b. Public Welfare Expenditure for Other Cash Assistance Programs ^o	3b. Cash Assistance
3c. Other Public Welfare Expenditured	3c. Other Public Welfare
4. Expenditure for Hospitals and Health	4. Hospitals and Health
5. Expenditure for Highway Construction and Maintenance	5. Highways
 Expenditure for Police and Local Fire Protection^o 	6. Police and Fire
 Expenditure for Sewage and Other Sanitation^e 	7. Sanitation
8. Expenditure for Local Parks, Recreation	8. Recreation and and Natural Resources	Resources
9. Expenditure for Housing and Urban Renewal	9. Housing and Urban

^a All dependent variables are measured in per capita terms.

$$\frac{E}{P}=b_0+b_1\frac{Y}{P}+\epsilon,$$ where E stands for the expenditure category under consideration, P for total population, Y for total personal income received in the state, b_0 and b_1 are constants to be statistically estimated, and ϵ is the error term. The model posits a relationship between per capita personal income in a state and that state's per capita expenditure for the function in question. There are two reasons why one would expect that this posited relationship exists. In his pioneering work on inter-state variation in the functional distribution of expenditures Solomon Fabricant concluded that differences in per capita personal income was the most important factor

"causing" differences in expenditure levels.\"
Later writers have affirmed Fabricant's conclusion.\"
This is certainly not surprising. Casua-

¹⁰ Solomon Fabricant, The Trend of Government Activity in the United States Since 1900, (Nev York: National Bureau of Economic Research—Inc., 1952), Chapter 6.

¹¹ See, Glenn W. Fisher, "Interstate Variatior in State and Local Government," National Ta: Journal, 17 (March, 1964), 55-74; Seymour Sack and Robert Harris, "The Determinants of Stat and Local Government Expenditure and Inter Governmental Flow of Funds," National Ta: Journal, 17 (March, 1964), 75-85; Ray W. Bahler, and Robert J. Saunders, "Determinants of Change in State and Local Government Ex

b Includes total expenditure for the programs of Olc Age Assistance, (OAA); Aid to the Blind, (AB) Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled, (APTD); and Aid to Families with Dependent Children, (AFDC). Although these are jointly financial programs of the Federal, State, and Local Governments, the total per capita amount spent is the figure used in this study.

^c Cash assistance includes general relief payments made to those not qualifying for categorica programs and are wholly financed by state and local governmental units.

^d The category, "Other Public Welfare," is composed of expenditures for vendor payments, institutional care of the needy and welfare administration.

e Items consolidated from categories reported separately in the Census of Governments.

TABLE 2. SOCIAL VARIABLES INCLUDED IN REGRESSION EQUATION FOR EACH OF THE DEPENDENT VARIABLES¹²

		Social Va	riables
Dependent Variable	Population Density	Per Cent Population in Urban Areas	Per Cent Population Over 65	Per Cent Population Less Than 17
1. Total Expenditure	Included
2. Total Education	Included	*******
2a. Higher Education	Included
2b. Elementary and		,	•
Secondary	Included		· 	Included
3. Total Public Welfare	Included	·······	Included	Included
3a. Categorical Programs	Included		Included	Included
3b. Cash Assistance	Included		Included	Included
3c. Other Public Welfare	Included		Included,	Included
4. Hospitals and Health	Included	Included
5. Highways	Included	Included
6. Police and Fire	Included	Included	_
7. Sanitation	Included	Included	_
8. Recreation and Resources	Included	********
9. Housing and Urban	Included	Included	_

inspection of Table 1 leads one to the commonsense conclusion that most of the expenditure categories listed are closely related to general consumption activity. And hence, just as differences in income levels is the major factor which an income levels is the major factor which and the expect that these differences also would be a major factor influencing inter-state variation in expenditures in the categories in question.

This first model serves as a reference point.

We use it to ascertain how much of the variation which we observe in inter-state patterns of expenditure is due merely to differences in noome levels alone. We will then compare the enditures," National Tax Journal, 18 (March, .965), 50-57; and Elliot R. Morse, "Some 'houghts on the Determinants of State and Local Expenditures," National Tax Journal, 19 March, 1966), 95-103. Morse's article includes n excellent discussion of the problems involved in he selection of independent variables to "exlain" interstate variations in expenditure levels. 12 The social variables, as well as the per capita ersonal income figure, are taken from U.S. ■ureau of the Census, Statistical Abstract of the Inited States, 1964 (85th edition; Washington, 9. C.: U. S. Government Printing Office, 1964), . 11 and p. 329. Alaska and Hawaii are omitted om the analysis because data upon which the olitical variables are based are not available.

results obtained from fitting this model to the data with the results obtained with the second model which we postulate. This second model incorporates additional "social variables" which we would also expect to influence expenditure levels plus "political variables" which attempt to quantitatively approximate the concepts of apportionment and party competition contained in our hypotheses.

Formally, this second model is:

$$\frac{E}{P}=a_0+a_1\frac{Y}{P}+a_2Z+\epsilon^*,$$

where E, P, and Y are defined as in the first model, and a_0 and a_1 are constants to be statistically estimated, Z is the transpose of a l-by-m vector of social and political variables, a_2 is a 1-by-m vector of constants to be estimated and ϵ^* is the error term.

Verbally, this second regression model is simply the first model plus some social variables, which we also expect to be related to various expenditure categories, and the political variables whose influence, if any, we are seeking to ascertain. This model may be thought of as an attempt to "hold constant" income levels and some other social factors which might reasonably be expected to influence expenditure levels in order to explore the influence the political variables have upon expenditure levels. In other words, our method allows us to attempt to verify the hypotheses stated in section one while accounting for the influence of other factors which could also reasonably be expected to influence expenditure levels. If these other influences are not accounted for, one would, in effect be arguing that differences in political structure and process dominate all other factors which influence governmental expenditure levels. This is an argument which we would not like to make.

The Selection of Social Variables. The term "social variable" is used here to refer to a group of demographic measures which are used as independent variables in the second model postulated. The social variables which were incorporated into the second model for each of the selected expenditure categories are summarized in Table 2.

The selection of the particular set of social variables for each of the expenditure categories was the result of a compromise between two desires. The first was the desire to include in the analysis measures which would be capable of distinguishing different types of population structures and distributions among the states. The second was the desire to avoid statistical difficulties arising from the nature of the available data that would make the results of even a tentative and exploratory analysis, such as ours, difficult to interpret.

It is desirable to include in the analysis measures which would reflect differences in the structure of the population and its geographical distribution, because one would expect that such differences would be associated with differences in the "true" preference patterns of the corresponding electorate. To give an obvious example, the larger the proportion of the population of school-age children, the higher the level of per capita expenditures on education which tween the independent variables becomes more probable as the number of variables increases.

Multicollinearity is created when the independent variables in a regression equation are highly correlated with each other. When such a situation exists, it is difficult to ascertain the relationship which may exist between the dependent variable and the individual independent variables. If one is interested only in the relationship between the dependent variable and a combined set of independent variables, then multicollinearity causes no difficulties in interpretation. However, to test the hypotheses we have formulated meaningfully, we must be able to ascertain if statistically significant relationships exist between the dependent variables and our measures of political structure. Unfortunately, many of the available demographic measures are highly correlated with both per capita personal income and the political measures which we wish to use. Hence, we have deliberately limited the number of social variables, and tried to use only those social variables which are not highly correlated with other independent variables.13

The Choice of Political Variables. To test the hypotheses described in the first section of this paper, it was necessary to obtain quantitative approximations of the qualitative concepts of apportionment and political competition.

The quantitative measure of apportionment

¹³ We do not intend to imply that our analysis is completely free from multicollinearity difficulties. As can be seen below we still have a few independent variables which are correlated with one another in the same regression equation. These simple correlations are

Independent Variable	1	2	3	4	5	6
1. Income per capita
2. Per cent Urban	.68	-
3. Population Density	.45	.58	_
4. Per cent of Population
Greater than 65	.12	03	.13
5. Per cent of Population
Less than 18	58	54	54	59	eserción de la constante de la
6. Party Competition	.75	.47	.30	. 19	29	*****
7. Apportionment Score	.11	01	.13	.18	12	.23

the electorate could be expected to desire. To the extent that such factors are not accounted for by our statistical techniques, the tests of the hypotheses become weaker.

If, however, we attempted to strengthen the tests by including a larger and larger number of social variables into the regression model, we would encounter diminishing and, in fact, negative returns quite abruptly. The principal reason that this is so is that multicollinearity be-

As we have previously indicated, the simple correlation which gives us the longest pause for thought is the .75 correlation between persona income per capita and our index of party competition. We do not feel that this level causes serious problems of interpretation although undoubtedly it does dim the clarity of our results. We do not feel that any of the other correlationare of sufficient magnitude to introduce serious multicollinearity problems in our analysis.

chosen was the "apportionment score" constructed by Glendon Schubert and Charles Press. 14 This measure was chosen for the following reasons: (1) It is constructed from standard statistical measures whose characteristics are well known; (2) the political assumptions of the measure were made explicit and seem reasonable; and (3) The data used to construct the index were gathered prior to the decision in Baker v. Carr; hence, the "score" does not reflect the chaos of the aftermath of that decision.

The principal weakness¹⁵ of the measure for our purposes is that it is based upon a single set of cross-section data, i.e., the measure reflects apportionment patterns as they existed at a single point in time. A measure which was influenced by apportionment patterns as they existed in previous periods would be more suitable for our methods and objectives, but, unfortunately, is not yet available.

In an attempt to quantitatively approximate the concept of political competition, a numerical index was constructed from data and measures which Richard Hofferbert had used to construct an ordinal index inter-party competition. To construct his index Hofferbert used the votes cast for each of the two major political party candidates in the presidential, senatorial, and gubernatorial elections during the period 1932 through 1964. Because we were interested only in state and local expenditures we

¹⁴ The concepts upon which this score is based are presented in Glendon Schubert and Charles Press' article, "Measuring Malapportionment," this Review, 57 (June, 1964), 302-327, but the actual score used in this article is taken from a corrected version of their numerical results in "Malapportionment Remeasured," this Review, 57 (December, 1964), 578-580.

15 The measure only relates to the "ideal" of numerical equality, and as we have indicated in note 1, this "ideal" has limited theoretical appeal. We have explored the possibility of constructing a measure of "representativeness" which incorporated measurements of gerrymandering as well as deviations from numerical equality. We have, so far, been thwarted in our attempt to construct such a measure, not by difficulties in empirical measurement, but by inadequate specification by political theorists of what gerrymandering "really is." The statistical problems in measuring gerrymandering do not seem to be too serious, but it is impossible to "measure" something which has not been adequately described.

¹⁶ Richard I. Hofferbert, "Classification of American State Party Systems," Journal of Politics, 26 (August, 1964), 562–563. based our index solely upon the gubernatorial elections. Hofferbert used three different measures, based on this data, to construct his index. They were: (1) The "over-all score," (OV), which is simply the percentage of elections won by the party winning the majority of elections during the period; (2) the "cyclical score," (CY), which is simply the percentage of elections in which the party that was in power was defeated by its opposition; and, (3) the "mean percentage of the losing party vote," (\overline{V}) , which is self-explanatory.

Using the gubernatorial data, we combined these measures into a cardinal index of party competition (IPC) of the following form:

IPC =
$$1/3 \left[\left(\frac{100 \text{-OV}}{\text{OV}} \right) + \left(\frac{\text{CY}}{50} \right) \left(+ \right) \frac{\overline{\text{V}}}{50} \right] \right]$$

In this form the components of the index receive equal weight as each varies between zero and an upper limit of one, as does the index itself. The index assumes that the smaller OV (that is, the more closely it approaches its definitional minimum of 50%) and the larger that CY and \overline{V} become (that is the more closely they approach their definitional maximums of 50%) the greater the degree of political competition in the state.

No profound assumptions as to the relationship which may exist between these measures and the operational characteristics of public decision-making bodies form the basis for this index. Its construction is essentially arbitrary. A considerable amount of empirical effort has been expended in attempting to measure political competition, but the theoretical analysis upon which such work must rest is so embryonic as to create a preference, at least in our minds, for naked simplicity. 18

17 Certainly party competition in Presidential and Senatorial campaigns reflects competitiveness, but, we felt that perhaps these elections are more subject to the influence of issues unrelated to state and local spending decisions than was the gubernatorial election. Ideally we would like to use a measure which is influenced by a much wider range of elections at the state level (particularly state legislator elections) and also competition at the local level. The construction of such a measure, however, would be a major task in itself, and one much too heroic to be attempted in a paper with objectives as modest as the present ones.

¹⁸ The best description and criticism of this work is David G. Pfeiffer's article "The Measurement of Inter-Party Competition and Systematic Stability," this Review, 61 (June, 1967), 457–467. Our simple index was fabricated and the cal-

TABLE 3. COEFFICIENTS OF DETERMINATION OF CENSUS CLASSES OF STATE AND LOCAL PER CAPITA EXPENDITURE REGRESSED ON PER CAPITA PERSONAL INCOME AND SELECTED SOCIAL AND POLITICAL VARIABLES

	Regressed on:
Class of Expenditure Per Capita	(1) Personal Income Per Capita	(2) Personal Income Per Capita and Social and Political Variables
1. Total Expenditure	0.4148	0.5815
 Total Education Higher Education Elementary and Secondary 	0.2694 0.0075 0.4690	0.6230 0.4938 0.7318
3. Total Public Welfare 3a. Categorical Programs 3b. Cash Assistance 3c. Other Public Welfare	0.0007 0.0896* 0.2838 0.2026	0.2579 0.3618 0.4302 0.3569
4. Hospitals and Health	0.2355	0.3109
5. Highways	0.0059	0.4131
6. Police and Fire	0.6480	0.8335
7. Sanitation	0.3314	0.4498
8. Recreation and Resources	0.0593*	0.3379
9. Housing and Urban	0.2958	0.6377

^{*} Significant at the 90% level.  Significant at the 99% level.

The statistical analysis presented in this paper should be viewed as rudimentary and exploratory only. It is not intended to be, nor is it, definitive in any sense of the word. Its purpose is to see if statistically significant associations exist between the measures of malapportionment and party competition which we have described and the expenditure categories which we selected. The results of these tests suggest that some associations do exist.

The Regression Models. The technique which culations for the paper performed, unfortunately, prior to the appearance of Pfeiffer's article. Our measure does meet some of his objections to previous measures; but, more importantly—Pfeiffer's excellent analysis included—we think our assertion still stands. A theory of political or even party competition is yet to appear, and, until it does, most attempts at measurement are doomed to produce the sort of "ad hoc" results which existing measures do.

we have used is multiple regression analysis. Our analysis consisted of two basic steps. The first was to calculate a set of simple regression equations using the first model which we described above in which each of the selected expenditure categories is assumed to be the dependent variable. The results of this analysis are summarized in Column One of Table 3, which reports the significance level and coefficient of determination of this simple regression equation for each of the selected expenditure categories. Eleven of the fourteen regression equations calculated were significant at the 90 per cent level or greater and nine were significant at the 99 per cent level.

Column Two of Table 3 records the second

TABLE 4. TESTS OF THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE ADDITION OF SELECTED SOCIAL AND POLITICAL VARIABLES TO THE REGRESSION EQUATION FOR CENSUS CLASSES OF STATE AND LOCAL PER CAPITA EXPENDITURES⁴

Class of Expenditure Per Capita	(1) Variance Ratio	(2) Significance Level
1. Total Expenditure	5.70	99 per cent
	(3, 43)
2. Total Education	13.44	99 per cent
	(3, 43)	-
2a. Higher Education	14.02	99 per cent
	(3, 43)
2b. Elementary and Secondary	10.28	99 per cent
	(4, 42)
3. Total Public Welfare	2.84	95 per cent
	(5, 41)	-
Ea. Categorical Programs	3.49	95 per cent
	(5, 41)
5b. Cash Assistance	2.10	90 per cent
	(5, 41)
Sc. Other Public Welfare	1.96	b
	(5, 41)
4. Hospitals and Health	1.15	b
	(4, 42)
5. Highways	7.28	99 per cent
	(4, 42)	•
6. Police and Fire	11.69	99 per cent
	(4, 42)
7. Sanitation	2.25	90 per cent
,	(4, 42)	•
8. Recreation and Resources	6.03	99 per cent
•	(3, 43)
9. Housing and Urban	9.90	99 per cent
4.	(4, 42)

a Figures in parentheses under the variance ratios are the degress of freedom for the numerator and denominator respectively.

t Less than 90 per cent.

IV. THE STATISTICAL TESTS

step of the analysis. This was to calculate another regression equation using the second model which again uses the expenditure categories as the dependent variables but adds the social variables cutlined in Table 2 and the two political measures to form, with personal income, the set of independent variables. The regression equations so calculated were significant at the ninety per cent or higher level for all fourteen of the expenditure categories.

This result in column two is, however, misleading. As is shown in Table 4, if one tests the significance of the addition of the set social and political variables to personal income, for two of the categories, "Other Public Welfare" and "Hospitals and Health," this addition is not statistically significant. The first (expenditure category-personal income) regression model was statistically significant for both of these expenditure categories, and when the vector of social and political variables was added to this simple regression model the coefficient of multiple determination (R2) term did increase. However, this is always the result when additional independent variables are added to a regression equation—the R2 term always increases. Therefore, if one wishes to make any statements about the relationship between the independent variables added to the regression equation and the dependent variable, then one must ascertain whether or not these added variables are significantly related to the dependent variable, i.e., whether or not the increase in the R² term is due merely to chance. Because the addition of these social and political variables was not significant for the two expenditure categories are excluded from further analysis.

The complete regression equations for each of the remaining expenditure categories with which our analysis will be concerned (those expenditure categories for which the addition of the vector of political and social variables was found to be significant) are shown in Table 5.

Significance Levels. Table 6 records the significance levels of each of the individual regression coefficients appearing in the equation in Table 5. Each regression coefficient measures the relationship between the individual independent variable and the dependent variable. The significance level of a regression coefficient can be thought of as the level of probability with which one can stipulate that the relationship which the regression coefficient attempts to measure is not due to chance. In other words, the probability that the true regression coefficient is not equal to zero. To ascertain this probability we, formally, postulate two mutually exclusive statements concerning the regression coefficient. One of these statements postulates that the regression coefficient is not equal to zero and is called the null hypothesis. The other postulates that the regression coefficient is equal to zero and is called the alternative hypothesis.

If the null hypothesis were accepted when in fact the alternative hypothesis is true, this is described as the commission of a "type one error." The significance level is equal to one minus the probability of a type one error.

An important difference in the types of significance levels which are recorded in Table 6 should be noted. For all of the independent variables except the political variables we are merely interested in the probability that the relationship estimated by the regression coefficient exists, i.e., the probability that the coefficient is not equal to zero. However, in formulating the two hypotheses we stipulate not only that a relationship between the dependent variable and respective independent political variables exists, but, also, that this relationship is of a specified type. The hypotheses postulate that the relationship between malapportionment and the dependent variable will be inverse (this means that the coefficient will be less than zero) and that the relationship between party competition and the dependent variable will be direct (this means that the coefficient will be greater than zero).

This stipulation means that the relevant probabilities for testing the hypotheses are: (1) the probability that the coefficient of malapportionment variable exists and is less than zero, and (2) the probability that the coefficient of the party competition variable exists and is greater than zero. Therefore the significance level for these two variables is equal to one minus the probability that we have accepted the null hypotheses that the coefficients of the political variables are either positive or negative when in fact they are not.

In statistical terms this merely means that a "one-tailed" "t" test is appropriate for calculating the significance levels for the two political variables and a "two-tailed" "t" test is the appropriate one for the remaining variables.

Testing Procedure. The statistical criteria we have used in our testing procedure is that the significance of the relevant political variable equal or exceed a predetermined level. The significance level which one wishes to use depends upon the objectives of his study and the probable repercussions of erroneously accepting the hypothesis which he is testing. Since our study is admittedly exploratory and intended to be suggestive rather than definitive, we have used two different significance levels in reporting the results of our testing procedure.

TABLE 5. REGRESSION EQUATIONS FOR FOURTERN CLASSES OF PER CAPITA STATE AND LOCAL EXPENDITURES

				Social V	Social Variables	-	Pol	Political Variables
Class of Expenditure Per Capita	Constant	Personal Income Per Capita	Per cent Urban	Population Density	Per cent of Population Greater than Sixty-five	Per cent of Population Less than Seventeen	Malappor- tionment	Party Competition	R2
1. Total Expenditure	119.884	91.028	in	-0.123	Ħ	ia	-0.321	0.614	0.582
9 Potel Whinetion	(39.760)	(22.594)	.5	(0.035)	-;		(0.261)	(0.398)	60
z, lotal Education	(15.847)	(9.006)		(0.014)	=	III	-0.148 (0.104)	0.552 (0.159)	0.623
2a. Higher Education	21.649	-0.070	ni	-0.033	ni	n:	-0.076	0.221	0.498
9h Fllementary and	(7.067)	(4.016)		(0.006)			(0.046)	(0.071)
Secondary	-60.831	30.778	ni	-0.025	ni	2.218	-0.052	0.260	0.732
	(36.511)	(6.294)		(0.00)		(0.784)	(0.063)	(0.100)
3. Total Public Welfare	160.724	-15.646	ni	-0.010	-0.717	-2.644	-0.102	0.220	0.258
	(53.698)	(6.371)		(0.008)	(1.182)	(1.004)	(0.055)	(0.091)
3a. Categorical	156.822	-16.741	: II	-0.011	-1.271	-2.486	-0.106	0.152	0.362
Programs	(41.603)	(4.936)		(0.00)	(0.916)	(0.788)	(0.043)	(0.075)
3k. Cash Assistance	0.390	0.434	n:	0.001	0.017	-0.043	0.011	0.012	0.430
	(5.184)	(0.615)		(0.001)	(0.114)	(0.097)	(0.005)	(00.00)
3c. Other Public Welfare	0.143	3.553	ii	'ni	ni	ni.	ni	ni	0.203
	(2.351)	(1.039)			•
4. Hospitals and Health	(4.229)	(1.870)	TT.	TI TI	Ш	Ħ	Ξ	II	0.236
5. Highways	64.308	26.016	-0.976	-0.034	ni	'n.	-0.014	0.179	0.413
	(18.620)	(11.372)	(0.278)	(0.017)			(0.118)	(0.177)
6. Police and Fire	-10.095	6.832	0.168	0.005	ni	mi	0.011	-0.039	0.834
	(2.404)	(1.468)	(0.036)	(0.002)			(0.015)	(0.023)
7. Sanitation	-1.149	0.939	0.110	-0.002	ni	ni	-0.006	0.040	0.450
	(2.820)	(1.722)	(0.042)	(0.003)			(0.018)	(0.027)
8. Recreation and Resources	3.570	4.123	ni	-0.016	'n	n,	-0.021	0.061	0.338
	(4.750)	(2.703)		(0.004)			(0.031)	(0.048)
9. Housing and Urban	-5.353	4.271	0.029	0.011	n:	'n	-0.023	-0.050	0.638
	(2.616)	(1.589)	(0.039)	(0.002)			(0.017)	(0.025)
	And the second s	- Landanian - Land	the state of the s

TABLE 6. SIGNIFICANCE LEVELS OF THE INDIVIDUAL-COEFFICIENTS OF THE REGRESSION EQUATIONS IN TABLE 5.

Class of Expenditure Per Capita	Con- stant*	Personal Income Per Capita*	Social Variables*				Political Variables
			Per cent Urban	Popula- tion Density	than	Per cent of Population Less than Seventeen	Malap- portion- ment	Party Competi- tion
1. Total General	99	99	ni	99	ni	ni	85	90
2. Total Educational	99	95	ni	99	ni	ni	90	99.5
2a. Higher Education	99	a,	ní	99	ni	ni	90	99.5
2b. Elementary and Secondary	90	99	ni	99	ni	99	75	99
3. Total Public Welfare	99	98	ni	70	8.	99	95	97.5
3a. Categorical Programs	99	99	ni	80	80	99	99	95
3b. Cash Assistance	8.	a	ni	8.	а	a	8.	85
3c. Other Public Welfare	a	99	ni	ni	ni	ni	ni	ni
4. Hospitals and Health	70	99	ni	ni	ni	ni	ni	ni
5. Highways	99	95	99	90	ni	ni	a	80
6. Police and Fire	99	99	99	95	ni	ni	a	2
7. Sewage and Sanitation	8.	8.	98	a.	ni	ni	а	90
8. Recreation and Resources	a	80	ni	99	${f ni}$	ni	70	85
9. Housing and Urban Renewal	95	99	a	99	ni	ni	90	a a Less than 70 per cent

Table 7 summarizes the steps in our testing procedure and the results of these tests if a significance level of 80 per cent is used. In Table 8 the same procedure is summarized, but a significance level of 90 per cent is used. Although both of these tables are intended to be self-explanatory, it might be useful to trace some expenditure categories through the tables in order to summarize explicitly the assumptions and criteria of our testing procedure.

Consider expenditure category number one. "Total Expenditure," in Table 7. The second column of this table is taken from Table 4. It records whether of not the addition of the vector of social and political variables to the first simple regression model, (expenditure category-personal income), was significant at a level equal to or greater than 90 per cent. For "Total Expenditure" the addition of this vector was significant. If it had not been, we would not proceed with the testing procedure for this expenditure category because the vector of social and political variables did not increase the explanatory value of the regression model in a statistically significant manner. Column three is the next step in the testing procedure. It is taken from Table 5. It records whether or not the regression coefficient of the malapportionment variable is negative; if it is not the hypothesis is rejected. For "Total Expenditure" this was not the case; hence the analysis proceeds to column four. Column four is taken from Table 6 and records whether or not the significance level of the malapportionment term equals or exceeds 80 per cent. To reiterate, this means that the probability that we have not accepted the statement that the regression coefficient in question is less than zero, when in fact it is equal to or greater than zero equals or exceeds 80 per cent.

Because "Total Expenditure" satisfies each of the criteria described in columns two through four, we "accept" Hypothesis I for this particular expenditure category.

It should be recalled that in our testing procedure we use the test of Hypothesis I as a necessary condition which must be satisfied in order to proceed with the testing of Hypothesis II. Because we accept Hypothesis I for this expenditure category, we are able to continue with our testing procedure for either accepting or rejecting Hypothesis II. If our testing procedure had not permitted us to accept Hypothesis I we would not test Hypothesis II because we would not feel confident in assigning meaning to the empirical tests, for the reasons we have previously outlined.

Moving to columns six and seven in Table 7 we find that for "Total Expenditure" the sign of the inter-party competition coefficient is in the direction postulated by the hypothesis, and that the significance level of the coefficient exceeds 80 per cent. Hence, we also accept the Hypothesis II for this expenditure category.

^{*} Calculated using a "two-tailed" "t" test.

^{} Calculated using a "one-tailed" "t" test.

ni not included.

Table 7. Summary of procedure and results of testing hypotheses at significance level of $80\,\%$

(1) Expenditure Categories	(2) Addition of Political and Social Variables Signifi- cant (From Table IV)	Negative Sign for Malap- portionment Variable (From Table V)	(4) Significance Level for Malapportionment Variable Equal to or Greater than 80% (From Table		(6) Positive Sign for Party Competition Variable (From Table V)	-	Accept or Reject Hy- pothesis Two, (Columns 5- 7)
•	,		VI)			VI)
1. Total Expenditure	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	Yes	Yes	Accept
2. Total Education 2a. Higher Educa-	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	Yes	Yes	Accept
tion	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	Yes	Yes	Accept
2b. Elementary and
Secondary	Yes	Yes	No	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
3. Total Public Welfare	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	Yes	Yes	Accept
3a. Categorical Programs	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	Yes	Yes	Accept .
3b. Cash Assis- tance	Yes	No	N.A.	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
3c. Other Public				•	14,24,
Welfare	No	N.A.	N.A.	No Test	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
4. Hospitals and Health	No	N.A.	N.A.	No Test	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
5. Highways	Yes	Yes	No	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
6. Police and Fire	Yes	No	N.A.	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
7. Sanitation	Yes	Yes	No	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
8. Recreation and Resources	Yes	Yes	No	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
9. Housing and Urban	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	No	N.A.	Reject

To trace, briefly, an expenditure category for which different conclusions are required, consider the last expenditure category, "Housing and Urban." For this category the criteria described in columns two, three, and four are satisfied and we accept Hypothesis I. Making the same assumptions as before we then proceed to investigate Hypothesis II. In the case of "Housing and Urban," however, the sign of the coefficient for the inter-party competition term is negative. This is sufficient information to reject Hypothesis II without reference to the significance level of the coefficient.

We feel that we are able to reject this hypothesis for "Housing and Urban" because we had previously accepted Hypothesis I which we have interpreted as being consistent with the statement that the "true" preferences of the electorate indicate a higher level of per capita expenditure for "Housing and Urban" than the level actually produced. For those expenditure categories for which Hypothesis I is rejected, as in the case of "Highways" we cannot accept this proposition. As a result, we are unable to test Hypothesis II within the constraints which we have imposed upon our procedure. But it must be emphasized that in such cases where we are unable to test an hypothesis, there is no inference made about whether or not the hypothesis would have been accepted or rejected if we had been able to test it.

The narrative need not be extended by discussing the results of our tests for each expenditure category separately. At the eighty per cent significance level we accepted Hypothesis I for for six of the fourteen categories. We rejected the hypothesis in six cases and were unable to test the hypothesis for the remaining two expenditure categories. We were able to test Hypothesis II only for the six categories for which we had accepted Hypothesis I. For five of these six categories we were also able to accept Hypothesis II, and for the sixth the hypothesis was rejected. It is interesting to note that the categories for which both hypotheses were accepted comprise some of the more important categories of state and local expenditure, and the acceptance of the hypotheses would seem to suggest that apportionment patterns and levels of political competition are more potent influences

table 8. summary of procedure and results of testing hypotheses at significance level of $90\,\%$

(1) Expenditure Categories	(2) Addition of Political and Social Variables Significant (From Table IV)	(3) Negative Sign for Malap- portionment Variable (From Table V)	(4) Significance Level for Malapportionment Variable Equal to or Greater than 90% (From Table VI)	(5) Accept or Reject Hy- pothesis One, (Columns 2- 4)	Positive Sign for Party Competition Variable (From Table V)	(7) Significance Level for Party Competition Variable Equal to or Greater than 90% (From Table VI)	(8) Accept or Reject Hypothesis Two, (Columns 5-7)
1. Total Expenditure	Yes	Yes	No	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
2. Total Education 2a. Higher Educa-	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	Yes	Yes	. Accept
tion	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept .	Yes	Yes	Accept
2b. Elementary and Secondary	Yes	Yes	No	Reject	N.A.	Ń.A.	No Test
3. Total Public Welfare 3a. Categorical	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	Yes	No	Reject
Programs	Yes	Yes	Yes	Accept	Yes	Yes	Accept
3b. Cash Assis- tance 3c. Other Public	Yes	No	N.A.	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No'Test
Welfare	No	N.A.	N.A.	No Test	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
4. Hospitals and Health	No	N.A.	N.A.	No Test	Ν.Λ.	N.A.	No Test
5. Highways	Yes	Yes ·	· No	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
6. Police and Fire	Yes	No	N.A.	Reject	N.A.	. N.A.	No Test
7. Sanitation	Yes	Yes	No	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
8. Recreation and Resources	Yes	Yes	No	Reject	N.A.	N.A.	No Test
9. Housing and Urban	Yes	Yes	Yes .	Accept	No	N.A.	Reject

than some of the recent literature referred to above would lead one to believe.

In Table 8, where the significance level is increased to the ninety per cent level, Hypothesis I is accepted for five of the expenditure categories and rejected for the other seven categories. Of the five for which the hypothesis was accepted, Hypothesis II also was accepted in three cases and rejected in the remaining two.

v. conclusion

This paper has explored the relationship between malapportionment, party competition and some selected functional categories of governmental expenditures. A logical and statistical methodological procedure has been used to explore this relationship which was designed to be confining. The reasons for using a confining methodological procedure are to make the theoretical and statistical assumption of the analysis as clear and explicit as possible, to emphasize exactly what was and was not done, and to attempt to encourage further investigation by providing some exploratory, but carefully defined, results. It has been shown that within this confining methodological procedure it is possible to accept the hypotheses that malapportionment tends to depress and party competition tends to elevate some of the more important categories of state and local governmental expenditure.

We have tried to emphasize the tentative and exploratory nature of our study. Perhaps we have unduly belabored the point. But we do feel strongly that a study much more ambitious than ours, or than those which have reached conclusions dissimilar to ours, is required before definitive answers to questions such as those we have explored ought to be offered. In our view the principal obstacles which such a study would have to surmount are not statistical but theoretical and conceptual. More complete and disaggregative data would have to be assembled, but, at worst, this is merely an expensive and dull task. Both the data and the techniques of measurement and inference exist, but to be used intelligently the relevant relationships to measure must be stipulated.

AGENCY REQUESTS, GUBERNATORIAL SUPPORT AND BUDGET SUCCESS IN STATE LEGISLATURES*

IRA SHARKANSKY

University of Wisconsin

This is a study of the budget success of state administrative agencies. Although a number of recent studies provide valuable information about environmental influences on state and local government expenditures, relatively little is known about the factors that affect the budgets of individual administrative units.1 Existing studies typically focus on the state as the unit of analysis, and report findings about the correlates of state (or state plus local) government expenditures in total and by the major fields of education, highways, public welfare, health, hospitals et al. The United States Bureau of the Census provides an invaluable service for this scholarship by collecting state and local government data and ordering it into categories that permit state-to-state comparisons. When political scientists and economists rely exclusively on Census Bureau publications, however, they preclude an attack on certain aspects of the expenditure process. In order to report data by the comparable fields of education, highways, public welfare etc., the Bureau of the Census

* The author wishes to thank the Social Science Research Council's Committee on Governmental and Legal Processes, and the University of Georgia's Office of General Research for their financial assistance; and Patricia Owens for her help in gathering the data.

¹ See, for example, Thomas R. Dye, Politics, Economics and the Public: Policy Outcomes in the American States (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1966); Glenn W. Fisher, "Interstate Variation in State and Local Government Expenditures," National Tax Journal, 17 (March, 1964), 57-64; Seymour Sachs and Robert Harris, "The Determinants of State and Local Government Expenditures and Intergovernmental Flow of Funds," National Tax Journal, 17 (March, 1964), 75-85; Elliott R. Morss, J. Eric Fredland and Saul H. Hymans, "Fluctuations in State Expenditures: An Econometric Analysis," Southern Economic Journal (April, 1967); Richard E. Dawson and James A. Robinson, "Interparty Competition, Economic Variables, and Welfare Politics in the American States," Journal of Politics, 25 (May, 1963), 265-289; and Ira Sharkansky, "Economic and Political Correlates of State Government Expenditures: General Tendencies and Deviant Cases," Midwest Journal of Political Science, 11 (May, 1967), 173-192.

rearranges the expenditures made by individual state agencies.² As a result we know little about the factors that affect the budgets of individual agencies. And because it is the agency's budget that is the focus of budget-making, we have no systematic information about many of the influences that might affect government expenditures. Chief among the unknowns are the influence of each agency's budget request in the expenditure process, and the support given to the agencies by the governor.

Much of the existing literature on government budgeting suggests the importance of incremental decision rules. Officials who review agency requests in the executive and legislative branches are said to have too few resources for a comprehensive examination of each agency's program. Studies of federal budgeting reveal that appropriations committees generally accept each agency's "base" of previous expenditure, and focus their attention on the requests for new funds.3 Congress holds down the growth rate of most agency budgets, typically to within 10 percent of their existing budget.4 The common explanation for incremental budgeting cites the difficulties associated with a comprehensive review of each agancy. Legislatures have much else to do beside reviewing past and present expenditures. To reopen past budget decisions each year would broaden the scope of political controversy. Decision-makers can limit their task by accepting their own past evaluations about each existing program, and by focusing their current inquiries on those items that an agency seeks for the first time, or those which the agency hopes to increase well beyond the limit of past funding.5

- ² Most state governments have several administrative units with educational responsibilities, for example, and their titles and program responsibilities vary considerably from one state to another.
- ³ Otto A. Davis, M.A.H. Dempster, and Aaron Wildavsky, "A Theory of the Budgetary Process," this Review, 60 (September, 1968), 529–547.
- ⁴ Richard F. Fenno, Jr., The Power of the Purse: Appropriations Politics in Congress (Boston: Little Brown, 1966), Chapters 8 and 11.
- ⁵ Charles E. Lindblom "Decision-Making in Taxation and Expenditure," in Public Finances:

A principal task of this study is to identify and measure some likely mechanisms of incremental budgeting in state governments. By looking at the requests of 592 agencies in 19 states, the response of the governor to agency requests, and the action of the legislature, it will assess the importance of incremental routines in each of these states. Then it identifies certain characteristics of each state that influence the nature of its budget procedures. The study proceeds at two levels of analysis. It first reports the results of 19 separate within-state analyses that show relationships between measures of agency success in the legislature and measures of budget size, agency acquisitiveness and gubernatorial support. Secondly, it uses these 19 states as the units of analysis, and defines the importance of certain environmental conditions for these relationships among agencies, the governor and the state legislature.

I. TECHNIQUES AND EXPECTATIONS

The complexity and individuality of state government budgets represent formidable barriers to comparative analysis. Because state budgeting proceeds with a variety of separate funds whose labels and components vary from state to state, and because the official documents vary widely in the quality of information they contain, it is necessary to eliminate over half of the state governments from this analysis. The budget documents and financial reports of 19 state governments meet the essential criteria of providing an agency-by-agency record of current expenditures; the agencies' initial requests for the coming budget period; the amount rec-

Needs, Sources and Utilization (Princeton: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1961), pp. 295-333.

6 The states included in this study—and the nature of the findings-may be affected by the requirement of separate indications for the agency's budget request and the governor's recommendation. One tenet of certain administrative reformers prescribes that public agencies not submit their own budget requests to the legislature. Instead, they should submit their requests to the chief executive, who should then review each agency's budget in the light of his whole program, and submit his own recommendations for each agency to the legislature. Presumably the legislature will consider only these budget recommendations of the executive, and thereby force each agency to operate within the budget limits set by the leader of the "administration team." A number of states have adopted these budget procedures, and their budgets show only the governor's recommendation for each agency. Our sample, in ommended by the governor for each agency;⁷ and the sum appropriated by the legislature. The 19 states come from each major section of the country and range in population size from Texas and Illinois to Vermont and Wyoming. They range in economic well-being (measured in per capita personal income) from Illinois and Indiana to West Virginia and South Carolina. For each major agency in these states two measures of budget success are defined. These are the dependent variables for the within-state analysis of agency budgets:⁸ contrast, may be overly representative of states with "unreformed" budget procedures.

The "budget period" employed is the fiscal year or the biennium, depending upon the usage prevailing within each state. Although the use of a single year or a biennium varies from one state to another, this should not have a material effect on the findings insofar as the principal findings grow out of correlation coefficients that are calculated separately for each state. The particular years employed in the analysis of each state are indicated with the name of each state in Table 1. In each case, the most recent budget period was employed for which complete data was available. A small number of additional states publish budgetary information that would qualify them for this type of analysis. They are not included here, however, because the appropriate documents were not available.

⁷ In some cases it is a budget review board, rather than the governor per se, that is directly responsible for the recommendation to the legislature. In each case, however, it is reported by observers native to the state that the governor's role is critical in the recommendations.

8 All of the findings reported below for the within-state analysis of agency budgets reflects data about the "general fund" for those states that segregate the "general" fund from the "total" fund. For most states, the designation of "general" fund pertains to those moneys subject to state legislative appropriation. For those states showing both general and total fund accounts, the correlation analyses were performed twice: once with each account. However, the findings from the two analyses were not so different as to warrant separate reporting here. For each state, agencies requesting at least $500,000 were included. These are considered the "major" agencies. Supplementary appropriations are excluded from the legislature's appropriation due to lack of data. In the case of one state for which supplementary appropriations were available, the within-state analysis of agencies was run with and without the supplementals; the differences in findings appear inconsequential.

- Y_1 : the percentage of the agency's request for the coming budget period appropriated by the legislature (short-term success)
- Y₂: the percentage of current expenditures appropriated by the legislature for the coming budget period (success in budget expansion)

The first dependent variable is labelled short-term success because of its concern with one budget period. It simply measures the success of each agency in getting from the legislature what it announces as its goals. The second dependent variable measures the willingness of the legislature to provide each agency with an increase over its current budget. Thus, it measures the increment of growth enjoyed by each unit. In most of the states there is not a significant coefficient of simple correlation between the two measures of success, indicating that they are distinct aspects of the budgetary process.

The independent variables for the withinstate analysis of agency budgets are:

- X₁: agency request for the coming budget period (budget size)
- X₂: agency request for the coming budget period as a percentage of current expenditures (agency acquisitiveness)
- X₃: the governor's recommendation for each agency as a percentage of its request (short-term support)
- X4: the governor's recommendation for each agency as a percentage of its current expenditures (support for budget expansion)

Due to the alleged conservatism of governors and legislators who review agency budgets,9 it is expected that measures of budget size and acquisitiveness will show negative relationships with the measures of short-term support and legislative success; incremental budget reviewers should cut budgets that threaten to grow. But because an expansionist request is probably a requirement for an increase in appropriations, there are likely to be positive relationships between the measure of acquisitiveness and gubernatorial support and legislative success in budget expansion; it is probably the agencies that ask for the largest increases that receive the largest increases, even though their final appropriation is reduced substantially below their request. Because state legislators have limited investigatory resources and are poorly prepared by training or background for budget reviews,10

⁹ Cf. Thomas J. Anton, The Politics of State Expenditure in Illinois (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1966), Chapters 5, 6.

10 Malcolm E. Jewell and Samuel C. Patterson, it is expected that the governor's recommendation will serve as an important cue for their decisions. The measures of gubernatorial support should therefore relate closely to the measures of legislative appropriations.

Coefficients of simple correlation are computed separately for each of the nineteen states, and provide measures of association between the dependent and independent variables.¹¹ With these correlations, we shall also perform a causal analysis to test for the relative importance of the agencies' requests and the governor's recommendations in the decisions of the legislature.

Once we have correlation coefficients that express the prevailing relationships between agency acquisitiveness, gubernatorial support and budget success for each state, we shall employ these coefficients as dependent variables in another inquiry that focuses on the state as the unit of analysis. There we shall consider several aspects of governmental structure, political characteristics and economic resources as potential influences on relationships between agencies, the governor and the legislature. The independent variables for the state-by-state analysis are:¹²

S₁: Schlesinger's index of the Governor's potential for tenure in office¹³

The Legislative Process in the United States (New York: Random House, 1966), p. 251 ff.

¹¹ The data used in this study meet two of the primary assumptions of correlation analysis: the distribution of each variable approximates normality; and all two-variable relationships are linear

¹² Several other variables were considered, but excluded in this report because of their failure to add anything of importance to the findings reported below. Those excluded are:

- a. Schlesinger's index of the Governor's formal budget powers
- b. Schlesinger's index of the Governor's formal powers of appointment
- c. Schlesinger's aggregate index of the Governor's formal powers
- d. Ranney's measure of Democratic party strength
- e. biennial compensation paid to members of the state Legislature
- f. state expenditures per capita for personal services
- g. total population of the state
- h. rumber of state government departments with elected heads.

¹² Joseph A. Schlesinger, "The Politics of the Executive," in Herbert Jacob and Kenneth N. Vines, Politics in the American States (Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1965), p. 229.

TABLE]	ANNUAL PERCENTAGE CHANGES BY STAGES IN THE BUDGET PROCE	SS
	OF MAJOR AGENCIES, BY STATE

State, showing years of budget analyzed and number of agencies	Agency request as per cent of current expend- iture	Governor's recommendation as a per cent of agency request	Legislature's appropriation as a per cent of Gov's request	Legislature's appropriation as per cent of agency's current expenditure	Legislature's appropriation as a per cent of agency request
Florida 1965-67, n=39	120	90	93	109	84
Georgia 1965-67, $n = 26$	153	. 86	100	139	87
Idaho 1967–69, $n=23$	119	93	92	109	86
Illinois $1963-65*n=37$	118	83	102	108	85
Indiana 1965-67, $n = 47$	123	83	103	112	86
Kentucky 1966-68, $n = 28$	120	. 90	93	109	. 84
Louisiana 1966-67, n = 32	121	90	101.	110	91
Maine 1965-67, $n = 17$	114	85	108	109	92
Nebraska 1965-67, n=10	122	87	119	124	104
North Carolina 1965-67, $n = 61$	120	84	105	112	87 .
North Dakota 1965-67, $n = 21$	124	74	111	111	82
South Carolina 1966-67, $n = 29$	117	96	104	116	99
South Dakota 1967-68, n = 25	136	82	98	109	80
Texas 1965-67, $n = 41$	128	82	104	. 117	86
Vermont 1965-67, $n = 17$. 121	87	106	115	91
Virginia 1966-68, n=57	120	92	100	114	91
West Virginia 1966-67, $n = 43$	125	88	92	101	81
Wisconsin 1965-67, $n = 26$	115	96	98	111	94
Wyoming 1967-69, $n = 13$	133	69	109	112	75

^{*} The Illinois data comes from the Appendix of Thomas J. Anton's The Politics of State Expenditure in Illinois (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1966). All other data come from the official budgets and financial reports of the states.

- S₂: Schlesinger's index of the Governor's veto power¹⁴
- S₃: Ranney's measure of two-party competition¹⁵
- S₄: number of elected state executive officials
- S_5 : percentage of voting-age population casting ballots in a recent state-wide election¹⁶
- S₆: total state government expenditures per capita¹⁷
- S_7 : total state government debt per capita
- S_8 : per capita personal income of state residents

It is expected that a governor with long tenure potential and extensive veto powers will have a relatively strong position vis a vis the agencies and the legislature. Such governors may take a hard line in cutting agency budgets, and succeed in providing the legislature with its

- ¹⁵ Austin Ranney, "Parties in State Politics," in Jacob and Vines, op. cit., p. 65. The measure of competition used here equals the difference between each state's score on Ranney's index of Democratic Party strength and .5000, with the result inverted so that high scores indicate high interparty competition.
- ¹⁶ The data pertain to the 1964 election for U.S. Representative.
- ¹⁷ The figure used is total general state government expenditures per capita in 1966.

major budget cues. Intense party competition and high voter turnout often work in favor of high expenditures.18 Under conditions of high turnout and competition, therefore, acquisitive agencies should be able to elicit the most support from the governor and the legislature. Where there is a large number of separately elected executive officials, it is expected that acquisitive agencies will use them as allies and have a better chance of getting the governor and legislature to approve their budgets. And because independent executives may compete with the governor in supporting agency budgets, the states with numerous elected officials may be those where the governor's recommendations are least potent in the legislature. Where state resources are as-yet uncommitted, agencies may draw on the "slack" for their budgets.19 Therefore, the states with low per capita expenditures and debt, but high per capita personal income should offer the most hospitable environments for acquisitive agencies.

Recall that the dependent variables of the state-by-state analysis will be correlation coefficients determined by the within-state analysis of agency budgets. After describing the re-

¹⁴ Loc. cit

¹⁸ See the works of Dye and Dawson and Robinson, cited in note 1.

¹⁹ The concept of "slack" is explained in Richard M. Cyert and James G. March, A Behavioral Theory of the Firm (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1963), pp. 36 ff.

TABLE 2. COEFFICIENTS OF SIMPLE CORRELATION BETWEEN MEASURES OF BUDGET-SUCCESS IN THE STATE LEGISLATURE AND INDEPENDENT VARIABLES, BY STATE

	Correlat	ions between s success and:		Correlations between budget expansion and:
	Budget size	Agency acquisitive- ness	Governor's short-term support	Budget size	Agency acquisitive- ness	Governor's support for expansion
Florida	.03	63*	.77*	04	.50	.71*
Georgia	.02	82*	.93*	12	09	.92*
Idaho	.04	80*	.72*	14	.74*	.79*
Illinois	.03	51*	.79*	04	.81*	.81*
Indiana	.04	27	.86*	04	.99*	.99*
Kentucky	.06	77*	.80*	14	.07	.19
Louisiana	.00	48 *	.72*	09	.04	.54*
Maine	.24	.18	.75*	.25	.64*	.74*
Nebraska	09	. 51	54	06	.79*	.43
North Carolina	04	20	.99*	05	.93*	.99*
North Dakota	.17	- .80*	.94*	16	.42	.87*
South Carolina	.00	17	.36	05	.81*	.75*
South Dakota	.00	70*	.63*	15	.58*	.48*
Texas	25	06	.52*	10	.95*	.89*
Vermont	12	61*	.58*	.24	.37	. 46
Virginia	.07	27*	. 19	02	.81*	.60*
West Virginia	.01	65*	.61*	09	.22	.26
Wisconsin	08	28	.67*	06	10	.16
Wyoming	18	70*	.94*	13	.18	.92*

^{*} Significant at the .05 level (see note #20).

sults of the within-state analysis, we shall specify the dependent variables for the second inquiry.

II. FINDINGS: THE CORRELATES . . OF AGENCY BUDGET SUCCESS

Administrative agencies and the governor play more consistent roles than the legislature in the state budget process. In each of the 19 states the major agencies requested a sizable increase (15-53 per cent) over their current appropriations for the coming year, and the governor pared down the increase in his recommendations (by 4-31 per cent). Table 1 shows the percentage changes occurring at each major stage of the budget process by states; it indicates that major agencies requested an average 24 per cent increase over their current budgets, and that the governor's recommendation trimmed an average 14 per cent from their requests. The legislature's final appropriation for these agencies typically remained close to the governor's recommendation, but varied from a cut of 8 per cent below his recommendation to an increase of 19 per cent above his recommendation. Six of the legislatures cut agency budgets below the governor's figure, and 11 appropriated more than the governor asked. In only one case, however, did a legislature (in Nebraska) give more money to the agencies than they had requested themselves. The average legislative grant for the coming period was 13 per cent below the agencies' request, but 13 per cent above the agencies' current budget.

The governor's support appears to be a critical ingredient in the success enjoyed by individual agencies in the Legislature. In 16 states there is a significant positive correlation (shown in Table 2) between the governor's support and short term success, 20 and in 14 of the states there is a similar relationship between the governor's support and success in budget expansior. A contrary finding appears only in the case of Nebraska, where a negative coefficient of .54 links the governor's recommendation with the legislature's appropriation. In 1965, the Nebraska Legislature was unique in acting consistently in opposition to the recommendations of Governor Frank B. Morrison. A reading of Nebraska newspapers during that period suggests that gubernatorial-legislative antagonism over the budget was part of a larger dispute that grew out of a tax conflict. The conservative Democratic Governor opposed any new taxes. while the Republican leadership of the Legislature sought the establishment of a state income or sales tax. Perhaps in an effort to force the Governor's acceptance of a new tax, the legislators voted more funds than the governor recommended for the major agencies. (see Table 1). The legislature was especially generous with those agencies which had suffered a budget-cut in the Governor's office (see Table 2).

²⁰ A test for significance is not, strictly speaking, applicable because the units of analysis are not chosen at random to represent a larger population. Nevertheless, the tests for significance provide a convenient device to denote relationships that are "sizeable."

The acquisitiveness of agency requests plays an important role in the budget process. There is a significant negative relationship between acquisitiveness and short-term success in 12 states and a significant positive relationship between acquisitiveness and success in budget expansion in 11 states. The legislature is most likely to trim the budgets of agencies that ask for large increases, but it is only these acquisitive agencies that can hope for a large increase to remain after the legislature has acted. The acquisitiveness of the agencies is also a factor in the governor's recommendation. Table 3 shows

TABLE 3. COEFFICIENTS OF SIMPLE CORRELATION BETWEEN MEASURES OF GUBERNATORIAL SUPPORT AND INDEPENDENT VARIABLES, BY STATE

	aup	short-term oort and elations	expar	Between support for expansion and correlations
•	Budget size	Agency acquisitive- ness	Budget size	Agency acquisitive- ness
Florida	.04	80*	03	.22
Georgia	.08	86*	05	11
Idaho ·	.45*	−.70*	03	.99*
Illinois	.07	52	.00	. 85*
Indiana	.10	.13	04	.99*
Kentucky	.18	94*	.02	.04
Louisiana	.12	82*	05	.37*
Maine	.08	.22	.09	.75*
Nebraska	23	59	27	.76*
North Carolina	05	20	06	.94*
North Dakota	01	84*	34	.39
South Carolina	.06	30	02	.77*
South Dakota	02	75*	11	.71*
Texas	10	63*	04	.93*
Vermont	16	67*	.36	.85*
Virginia	.12	56*	05	.71*
West Virginia	.16	57*	.03	.57*
Wisconsin	03	- .61*	.07	.88*
Wyoming	15	82*	09	.28

^{*} Significant at the .05 level (see note #20).

significant negative relationships between acquisitiveness and the governor's short-term recommendation in 14 states, and significant positive relationships between acquisitiveness and the governor's recommendation for budget expansion in 14 states. Both the governor and the legislature may be using similar decision rules: do not cut the agencies that ask for little or no increase; but do not recommend a budget expansion for those agencies that ask for little or no increase. Short term cuts are made in the budgets of acquisitive agencies, but the acquisitive agencies stand the best chance of enjoying a substantial budget increase.

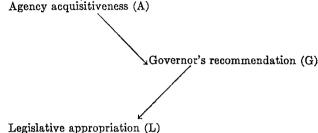

The absolute size of agency budget requests does not appear to influence the decisions made by the governor or legislature. Tables 2 and 3 show generally weak or inconsistent correlations between budget size and the governor's recommendations or the legislature's appropriations. Budget reviewers in the governor's office and the legislature are using procedures that serve to minimize the increments of budget growth; they are more likely to respond to the increment of change that is requested (i.e., agency acquisitiveness) than to the sheer size of the request.

Because agency acquisitiveness shows similar relationships with both the governor's recommendation and the legislature's appropriation. one is tempted to ask if the legislature responds directly to the agencies' acquisitiveness, or merely to the governor's recommendations. The alternate explanations are conveniently depicted and analyzed with the techniques of causal inference.21 The alternate linkages and the computations associated with them are reported in Figure 1 and Table 4. The results support the inference that the legislature responds more often to the governor's recommendations than directly to agency acquisitiveness. In the case of short-term success, the data support this for Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Louisiana, Nebraska, North Carolina, North Dakota, South 21 The techniques are explained in Hubert M. Blalock, Jr., Causal Inferences in Nonexperimental Research (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1964), pp. 64 ff.; and demonstrated in Donald J. McCrone and Charles F. Cnudde, "Toward a Communications Theory of Democratic Political Development: A Causal Model," this Review, 61 (March, 1967), 72–79. In this causal analysis, the author is following the convention of inferring a linkage to be absent if the difference between expected and actual findings are less than the difference for the alternative model, and if the difference between expected and actual findings is less than .10.

Fig. 1. Alternative causal models for relationships among administrative agencies, the governor and the legislature.

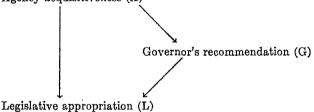

Model 1: No direct link between agency acquisitiveness and Legislature.

Model 2: No direct link between Governor's recommendation and Legislature

Model 3: Links from both agency acquisitiveness and Governor's recommendation to the Legislature Agency acquisitiveness (A)

Carolina and Wyoming. Only in the cases of South Dakota, and Virginia does the legislature seem to respond primarily to agency acquisitiveness. In the remaining states the findings suggest that the legislature is responding to a combination of gubernatorial recommendations and agency acquisitiveness. Similar findings appear in the causal analysis of budget expansion. Georgia, Idaho, Kentucky, Maine, North Carolina, North Dakota, Vermont, West Virginia and Wyoming show legislative reliance primarily on the governor's recommendation, while only South Dakota, Texas and Virginia show legislative response primarily to agency acquisitiveness.

For most of the 19 states, it is a combination of incrementalism and legislative dependence on the governor's recommendation that shapes the budgets of major agencies. Both the governor and the legislature respond to the agencies request for increments above their present expenditures, and their response serves to minimize budget growth. Also, most legislatures weigh the governor's recommendations heavily in their own decisions. Without a favorable recommendation from the governor, an agency is unlikely to enjoy any substantial increase in its appropriation.

III. THE CORRELATES OF AGENCY-GOVERNOR-LEGISLATURE RELATIONSHIPS

An examination of the correlation coefficients in Tables 2 and 3 indicates that states vary in the nature of budget relations among agencies, the governor and the legislature. Although agency acquisitiveness and the governor's recommendations generally show certain correlations with the legislature's appropriation, the strength (and occasionally the direction) of these relationships vary from state to state. By examining these variations it is possible to define the conditions under which the governor is severe or supportive in his review of agency budgets, and the conditions under which the

TABLE 4. DIFFERENCES BETWEEN RELATIONSHIPS EXPECTED ON THE BASIS OF CAUSAL INFERENCES AND ACTUAL RELATIONSHIPS

		Short-terr	n success			Program expansion
	Expected	Actual	Differ- ence	Model inferred	Expected	Actual	Differ- ence	Model inferred
Florida			A CONTRACTOR OF THE CONTRACTOR			**************************************
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$ $r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$	62 $.50$	63 $.77$.01 .27	#1	.16 .11	.50 .71	.34 $.60$	#3
Georgia					•	•
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	80	82	.02	#1	10	09	.01	#1
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.71	.93	.22		.01	.92	.91
Idaho	•
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	50	80	.30	#3	.78	.74	.04	#1
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.56	.72	.16		.73	.79	.06
Illinois
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	41	51	.10	#1	.69	.81	.12	#3
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.41	.79	.38		. 69	.81	.12
Indiana
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	· - .11	27	.16	#3	.99	.99	.00	indeter-
$r_{GL} = \tau_{AG} \tau_{AL}$.04	.86	.82		.99	.99	.00	minate
Kentucký
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	75	77	.02	#1	.01	.07	.06	#1
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.72	.80	.08		.00	.19	.19
Louisiana		•	,
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	- . 5 9	48	.11	#3	.20	.04	.16	#3
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.39	.72	.33		01	.54	. 53
Maine
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$. 17	.18	.01	#1	. 56	.64	.08	#1
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.04	.75	.71		.48	.74	.26
Nebraska						•
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$.32	. 51	. 19	#3	.33	.79	.46	#3
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$	30	50	.20		.60	. 43	.17
North Carolina
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	20	20	.00	#1	.93	.93	.00	#1
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.04	.99	.95		.87	.79	.12
North Dakota	•
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	79	80	.01	#1	.34	.42	.08	#1
$\tau_{GL} = \tau_{AG} \tau_{AL}$. 67	.94	.27		.16	.87	.71
South Carolina				,		-
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	11	17	.06	#1	.58	.81	.23	#3
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.05	.36	.31		.62	.75	.13
South Dakota				" ^	•			40
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	47	70	.23	#2 ·	.34	.58	.24	#2
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$. 53	.63	.10		.41	.48	.07

TABLE 4—(Continued)

		Program expansion
	Expected	Actual	Differ- ence	Model inferred	Expected	Actual	Differ- ence	Model inferred
Texas								adentica esta esta esta esta esta esta esta est
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	33	06	.26	#3	.83	.95	.12	#2
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.04	.52	.48		.88	.89	.01
Vermont
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	39	61	.22	#3	.39	.37	.02	#1
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.41	.58	.17		.31	.46	.15
Virginia
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	11	27	.16	#2	.43	.81	.38	#2
$r_{GL} = r_{A\hat{G}}r_{AL}$.15	.19	.04		. 58	.60	.02
West Virginia
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	35	65	.30	#3	.15	.22	.07	#1
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.37	.61	.24		.13	.26	.13	ū
Wisconsin
$r_{AL} = r_{AG}r_{GL}$	41	28	. 13	#3	09	. 16	.25	#3
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$.17	. 67	.50		.14	10	.24
Wyoming
$r_{AL} = r_{A}br_{GL}$	77	70	.07	#1 .	.26	.18	.08	#1
$r_{GL} = r_{AG}r_{AL}$. 57	.94	.37		.05	.92	.87

legislature is particularly responsive to agency acquisitiveness and the governor's recommendations. The dependent variables of this inquiry are certain correlation coefficients from Tables 2 and 3:

 $r_{X_2X_3}$: the stronger the negative correlation between agency acquisitiveness and the governor's short-term support, the more the governor appears to be restraining the agencies' budget development

 $r_{X_2X_4}$: the stronger the positive correlation between agency acquisitiveness and the governor's support for budget expansion, the more the governor appears to accept agency-initiated budget expansions

 $r_{X_2}v_1$: the stronger the negative correlation between agency acquisitiveness and short-term success in the legislature, the more the legislature appears to be restraining agency budget development

 $r_{X_2Y_2}$: the stronger the positive correlation between agency acquisitiveness and budget-expansion in the legislature, the more the legislature appears to accept agency-initiated budget expansions

r_{X₃Y₁}: the stronger the positive correlation between the governor's short-term recommendation and the legislature's short-term appropriation, the greater the gubernatorial-legislative rapport in short-term budget making

 $r_{X_4Y_2}$: the stronger the positive correlation between the governor's budget-expansion recommendation and the legislature's budget-expansion appropriation, the greater the gubernatorial-legislative rapport in budget-expansion

The independent variables for this analysis are introduced above. By examining correlation coefficients between the measures of agency-governor-legislature relationships and the measures of government structure, political characteristics and economic resources, it is possible to define certain state characteristics that support these behaviors.

Findings: The Environment of Agency-Governor-Legislature Budget Relations. The impact of the environment on agency-governor-legislature budget relations does not appear to be strong. Only a few of the correlation coefficients reported in Table 5 are strong enough to pass a test for statistical significance. However, by combining these significant relationships with

TABLE 5.	COEFFICIENTS	OF SIMPLE	CORRELATIO	N BETWEEN	MEASURES	OF AGENCY-
GO.	VERNOR-LEGISL	ATURE REI	ATIONSHIPS	ND INDEPE	NDENT VARI	ABLES

	S ₁ : Governor tenure	S2: Governor veto	S ₃ : party comp	S4: elected execs.	Ss: voter turnout	S6: expend/ capita	S7: debt/ capita	Sa: personal income/ capita rx.x3: agency acquisitiveness and
Gov short-term support	. 15	52*	.16	08	.16	34	05	.14
$r_{X_2X_4}$: agency acquisitiveness and
Gov support for expansion	04	20	.34	.07	.40	22	45	.33
rx, y,: acquisitiveness and Legis
short-term appropriation	17	21	.07	.34	09	45	21	.15
$r_{X_2}Y_2$: acquisitiveness and Legis		•
expansion appropriation	.09	27	. 14	.20	.10	51 ×	50*	.24
rx ₃ y ₁ : Gov support and Legis
short-term appropriation	-,32	05	11	31	.08	.34	.21	06
τχ ₄ γ ₂ : Gov support and Legis
expansion appropriation	.38	01	17	.18	11	07	45	.14

^{*} Significant at .05 level (see note #20).

those showing a magnitude of at least .30, it is possible to speculate about certain conditions that give some support to certain budget behaviors

Two environmental characteristics associated with the governor's restraint of agency budget development are substantial veto powers and high state government expenditures.22 Perhaps the threat of veto permits the governor to impose a severe review on the agencies when they submit requests to him. And the already-high expenditures may incline the governor against further large increases in state spending. Where the governor accepts agency requests for budget expansion, there tends to be a low state debt, high personal income, relatively intense party competition and high voter turnout.23 Perhaps low debt and high personal income permit the governor to support agency plans for expansion. And in a high participation-competitive party situation he may be inclined to seek electoral and legislative rewards by supporting innovative agencies.

Where the legislature restrains agency budget development there is relatively high state government expenditure and a low incidence of separately elected officials.²⁴ Like the governor, ²² The correlations indicate that high scores on veto power and expenditures correspond with high negative relationships between agency acquisitiveness and the governor's short-term support.

²³ The correlations indicate that low scores on debt, but high scores on party competition, voter turnout, and per capita personal income correspond with high positive relationships between agency acquisitiveness and the governor's support for budget expansion.

24 The correlations indicate that high state ex-

the legislature appears to resist an acquisitive agency in the face of already high expenditures. And with a scarcity of separately elected executives, agency heads may lack for politically independent allies who can promote their budget through the legislature. Where the legislature accepts agency-initiated budget expansions there tend to be low total state expenditures and state debt.²⁵ Thus, the condition of still-flexible resources seems to permit the legislature (like the governor) to give some support to acquisitive agencies.

Gubernatorial-legislative rapport on short-term success is high where the governor has considerable tenure potential, where there is a scarcity of separately elected executive officials, and where total expenditures are relatively high. ²⁶ With high tenure potential the governor may be able to elicit legislative cooperation on the expectation that he will remain in office for some time to come. The scarcity of separately elected executives may reduce the governor's competition with other power-holders for the legislature's attention. And the already-high expenditures may encourage the legislators to penditures and a low number of elected officials correspond with high negative relationships between agency acquisitiveness and short-term success in the legislature.

²⁵ The correlations indicate that low expenditures and debt correspond with high positive relationships between agency acquisitiveness and budget-expansion success in the legislature.

²⁶ The correlations indicate that high tenure potential and expenditures, but a low number of elected officials correspond with high positive relationships between the governor's short-term recommendation and the legislature's short-term appropriation.

accept the governor's cues on the agencies' budgets. Where the governor and legislature show rapport in budget-expansion there is a similar high tenure potential and there tends to be a low state debt.²⁷ Perhaps the low debt constraint permits the governor and legislature to cooperate in the support of agencies that seek to expand their budgets.²⁸

IV. SUMMARY AND DISCUSSION

By means of separate correlation analyses within each of 19 states this article has defined certain relationships between administrative agencies, the governor and the legislature in state government budgeting. A favorable recommendation from the governor seems essential for agency budget success in the legislature. The agency may influence both the governor's recommendation and the legislature's appropriation by the nature of its request. Acquisitive requests generally receive severe short-run treatment from the governor and the legislature, but an acquisitive strategy appears to be essential for a significant budget expansion. On the basis of separate causal analyses for each of the 19 states, it appears that the governor's recommendation is more directly important for the legislature of more states than is the acquisitiveness of agency requests.

²⁷ The correlations indicate that high tenure potential and low debt correspond with high positive relationships between the governor's recommendation and the legislature's appropriation for budget expansion.

 28 An examination of simple correlation coefficients among variables $\rm S_1{--}S_8$ suggests that the relationships which appear most strongly in Table 5 are independent. Except for the expected relationships among turnout, competition and personal income, few of the variables show strong relationships with each other. Thus, the relationships in Table 5 involving the governor's veto, and tenure potential, and total per capita state expenditures and debt are not the product of any of the other independent variables considered in this study. The coefficients of simple correlation among the independent variables are reported here:

The findings about the interaction of agency, gubernatorial and legislative behavior help to substantiate several observations that have been made previously about executive-legislative relations and the budgetary process in American governments.²⁹ The reluctance of governors and legislators to support an acquisi-

²⁹ See, for example, Arthur MacMahon, "Congressional Oversight of Administration: The Power of the Purse," Political Science Quarterly, 58 (June and September, 1943), 161–190; and 380–414; Warner Schilling, "The Politics of National Defense: Fiscal 1950," in Schilling et al, Strategy, Politics and Defense Budgets (New York: Columbia University Press, 1962), pp. 1–266; Elias Huzar, The Purse and the Sword (Ithaca; Cornell University Press, 1950); Aaron Wildavsky, The Politics of the Budgetary Process (Bos-

	S_1	S_2	S_3	S_4	S_6	S_{θ}	S_7	S_8
S ₁ governor's tenure	1.00	.06	34	32	.13	.19	.08	.30
S ₂ governor's veto		1.00	.20	.22	24	.20	28	.13
S ₃ party competition			1.00	.53*	187*	20	.15	65*
S ₄ # elected executives				1.00	 . 45	32	10	23
S ₅ voter turnout					1.00	.35	19	.50*
S ₆ expenditures/capita						1.00	.08	09
S7 debt/capita				•			1.00	27
Sa personal income/capita								1.00

^{*} Significant at the .05 level (see note #20).

A test with regression analysis lends support to the importance of many elected officials for the legislature's short-term support of acquisitive agencies and the importance of few elected officials for governor-legislative rapport on shortterm appropriations; this independent variable (S₄) shows a regression coefficient of at least 1.5 times the standard error with the appropriate dependent variables, in the presence of all other independent variables. ton: Little, Brown and Company, 1964); Rufus Browning, "Innovative and Non-Innovative Decision Processes in Government Budgeting," a paper delivered at the Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, September. 1963; Richard Fenno, The Power of the Purse op. cit.; John P. Crecine, "A Computer Simulation Model of Municipal Resource Allocation," a paper presented at the 1966 Midwest Political Science Association Meeting.

tive agency in the short term reveals the conservative bias that is built into incremental budgeting. Agencies that request little or no increase over their current budget are generally treated well by the governor and the legislature, while those seeking large increases suffer the greatest reductions in their requests. Yet an acquisitive strategy appears to be a prerequisite for a substantial budget increase. It is a rare occurrence for the governor or legislature to provide an agency with a sum larger than that it had requested. In part, this is a function of incremental budgeting. Executive and legislative budget-makers concentrate on the inspection and reduction of increments; they leave the development of increments to the agencies. At its heart, the reluctance of governors and legislators to innovate may reveal the difficult position of the generalists in their relations with agency specialists. The highly trained professional personnel in the agencies are most intimately aware of current programs and the new services that an expanded budget might produce. Chief executives and legislators have surrendered much of their innovative potential for a more limited role as reviewers of administrators' requests. And state legislators seem to have accepted a more limited supervisory role than the governors. The findings of greater importance for the governor's recommendation (rather than the agency's request) in the legislature's decisions indicates the legislature's dependence on the governor's budget cues. Perhaps this reflects the greater staff resources of the governor and the typically amateurish character of state legislatures. When they are compared to the professional analysts in the governor's office, legislators appear to have little experience in public budgeting, no professional training in a relevant discipline, an impossibly brief time to consider agency budgets and inadequate staff and clerical assistance.30 State legislators have a desperate need for cues that will guide their budget performance and the governor's recommendation is usually the best cue available.

 30 See Malcolm E. Jewell and Samuel C. Patterson, $op.\ cit.,\ p.\ 251$ ff.

When the 19 states are examined for the characteristics that support various styles of relationships between agencies, the governor and the legislature, the findings shed some new light on the influence of governmental and political characteristics of the states.31 The veto and tenure powers of the governor help to strengthen his position with both the agencies and the legislature. Because of formal prerogatives, the governor appears to be in a more secure position when he reduces agency requests and makes recommendations to the legislature; the governors that have these powers are more likely to be severe in cutting agency requests and they are more likely to be successful in their recommendations to the legislature. In contrast, the presence of numerous separately elected executives appears to benefit agencies at the governor's expense. In the states where there are many elected officials, agencies are more likely to get their acquisitive requests approved by the legislature, and the governor's recommendation is most likely to be altered in the legislature. Party competition and voter turnout also seem to strengthen the agencies' position. In states with heavy turnout and intense competition the governor is most likely to support the agencies' acquisitive requests, perhaps in an effort to assert his own identity as a program innovator. High levels of state government expenditure and debt work in opposition to agency budget aspirations. Where spending and debt is already high, both the governor and the legislature are severe in reviewing agency requests. This may be an outgrowth of incremental budgeting. The principal reviewers are conservative in their attitudes toward increases in expenditures, and they may be particularly wary of acquisitive agencies when existing state resources are already heavily committed.

³¹ See the works by Dye, Dawson and Robinson and Sharkansky cited in note 1; plus Richard I. Hofferbert, "The Relation between Public Policy and Some Structural and Environmental Variables in the American States," this Review, 60 (March, 1966), 73–82.

THE SOVIET CENTRAL COMMITTEE: AN ELITE ANALYSIS

MICHAEL P. GEHLEN AND MICHAEL McBride

Purdue University

This paper is a study of the backgrounds of the members of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. The purpose of its first part is to present and interpret certain quantitative material concerning the background characteristics of the members of the Central Committee. The conclusion elaborates premises regarding the function of co-optation in the higher Party organs and suggests possible relationships of this function to the education and career experiences of the Central Committee membership as discussed in the first part. To pursue an ideal study of this type, we recognize that extensive interviews and depth exploration of the sociological histories of the members would be desirable. In the case of the Soviet political elite such a course is obviously not possible at the present time. Nevertheless. sufficient data exist to make a modest beginning toward what we hope will help to lay a foundation for more extensive analysis of elites in the Soviet system in the future.

Two basic assumptions underlie our interest in the backgrounds of the Soviet political elite. First, and more important for this paper, is the premise that persons are co-opted into the Central Committee primarily, though not exclusively, as a result of the group associations they have made during the courses of their careers. These associations are largely career associations, and most of the members become part of the elite of important functional groups before they become members of the Party elite. Educational backgrounds, age, Party status, role associations, occupation, and other factors all converge to influence the development of the careers of the members. Our concern is with the general patterns of these and related variables among the total membership of the Central Committee.

A second and corollary premise is that the attitudes and value orientations of individual members are shaped in significant part by these background factors, especially by education, occupation, and role associations. This assumption, of course, opens the Pandora's box of how to determine ideological influence. More to the point here, however, the premise is intended to underscore the belief that many members are co-opted precisely because of their different backgrounds and career associations in order to bring people of varying experience, perceptions, and abilities toward the center of the decisional processes. This premise is predicated on the view that the Central Committee of the CPSU has become a composite of the representatives of key functional groups and is the principal medium, either through individual members or as a collective, through which the members of the Politburo regularly exchange information with the elites of the major interests in the system. Co-optation is viewed here as a rationl process of attaining group representation in order to facilitate the communications flow between the principal decision-makers and the functional groups of Soviet society and to integrate group elites into the Party-dominated system. Co-optation, therefore, is interpreted as having both representative and regulatory functions. In short, we see the membership selection and function of the Central Committee as an institutionalization of a high level communications network.

I. FINDINGS ON BIOGRAPHICAL CHARACTERISTICS

The empirical portion of this study consists of the examination of background factors of members of the Central Committee elected at the 23rd Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union held in 1966. The data were collected from written sources, primarily from Who's Who in the USSR, other information made available by the institute for the Study of the USSR in Munich, and official Soviet sources.1 Of the 195 full members sufficient information was obtained on 184. Of the 165 candidate members, similar information was available on 125. The basic total population of the sample therefore is 309, although in some categories information was available on a larger number of candidates.

¹ The most accessible source of biographical data is the Who's Who in the USSR, 1965-1966, compiled by the Institute for the Study of the USSR, Munich, Germany, and published by the Scarecrow Press, Inc., 1966. Additional information is available in the files of the Institute. Short but current biographical sketches are published in the Ezhegodnik of the Great Soviet Encyclopedia. Mcre extensive biographies, though sometimes less up-to-date, are found in Biograficheskii slovar', produced at different times by different professional groups (scientists, engineers, etc.) in the USSR.

The data collected on the 309 members were classified into twenty-eight variables. Among the more important were date of birth, level of education, source of education, the learned occupation, the practiced occupation, date of admission to the CPSU, date of admission to the Central Committee, record of Party work, occupational status before and after 1953, and regon of residency. Insufficient data made some variables impossible to use. These were population of place of birth, region of birth, social class of parents and recent technological education or re-tooling. Others, which will be considered later, proved of only limited value. After the data were assembled, frequency distributions were made of all variables and their subdivisions. Then, a correlation matrix was employed in order to ascertain patterns of inter-relationships between pairs of variables.

Age and Sex. Examination of age and sex of the members of the Central Committee (CC) reveals what one might expect. The full members were slightly older than the candidates. but the average age of both groups fell into the 54-60 age category. Thirty-eight and six-tenths per cent of the full members and 22.6% of the candidates were born in the decade 1900-1909. while 45.7% of the former and 52.4% of the latter were born between 1910 and 1919. Only one person in each group was born after 1930, and only 11 of the full members and 7 of the candidates were born before 1900. In 1967, the average age of the full member was 57 and that of the candidate was slightly under 55. These figures indicate that the newly elected members kept the average age at about the same level as it had been for the CC elected in 1961.2 (At that time 58.5% of the total membership had been born in the decade of 1900-1909.) The overwhelming number of both types of members were male. Only five full members and five candidates were women (two of the candidates for whom biographical data were unavailable were also women).

Education. The level of education of the CC membership continued to show a gradual increase as did the tendency to co-opt persons who had basically a specialized higher education. Table 1 indicates the level of education attained by the members. These figures may be compared with those representing the source of

TABLE 1. LEVEL AND TYPES OF EDUCATION

	-	Full mbers	Candidate Members
University	17	9.3%	11	8.8%
Party School only	8	4.4	15	12.0
Military Academy	15	8.1	10	8.0
Technical*	120	65.2	64	51.2
Secondary	4	2.2	2	1.6
Other	1	. 5	0	0.0
No data/or none reported	19	10.3	23	18.4
	184	100%	125	100%

^{*} Technical includes institutes, polytechnical schools, and specialized academies other than military ones.

the highest degree attained by the member (Table 2). These two tables indicate a slight decline in the number of persons educated at universities and military academies from the CC elected in 1961. There was a simultaneous increase in the number that had Party schools as their only source of higher education. In regard to the technically trained, there was an increase both in number and percentage in the ranks of the full members—from 58% to 61%. However, there was a substantial decrease in technical education among the candidates. This number dropped from 83 to 64, while the size of the candidate ranks was being increased. The percentage of those so classified declined from 53.4% to 38.8%. The reasons for this shift among the candidate membership toward more exclusive education in party schools and less technical education was probably to provide compensation to the so-called "reds" or more ideologically oriented members, while the "experts" were being rewarded with full membership.

Occupation. An important aspect of educa-

TABLE 2. SOURCE OF HIGHEST DEGREE

	Full Members		Candidat Member
University	14	7.6	9	7.2
Party Schools	32	17.4	28	22.4
Military Academy	16	8.7	10	8.0
Technical	100	54.4	49	39.2
Secondary No data/none	4	2.2	2	1.6
received	18	9.7	27	21.6
	184	100%	125	100%

² References to the background characteristics of the Central Committee membership between 1961 and 1966 are based on Michael P. Gehlen, "The Educational Backgrounds and Career Orientations of the Members of the Central Committee of the CPSU," The American Behavioral Scientist, 9 (April, 1966), 11–14.

TABLE 3. LEARNED OCCUPATION

	Full Members	Candi- dates	Total
Engineering	42.1%	30.3%	37.5%
Science &Mathematics	5.6	3.0	4.7
Agronomy	18.5	16.2	17.5
Military	8.3	14.1	10.6
Arts & Letters Other (mostly	12.7	16.2	14.0
Party training)	12.8	20.2	15.7
	100%	100%	100%

tion is the learned occupation. The frequency of this variable was also tabulated with the related. factor of the occupation practiced by the CC members during the early parts of their careers. Table 3 lists the percentages of the membership in the principal categories of learned occupations. The information in this table corresponds fairly closely with the occupations practiced by the members of the CC in the early parts of their careers. Table 4 provides the latter information, indicating the slightly higher percentage of people drawn immediately into Party work than were specifically educated for that purpose. This practice was quite probably the result of the need to fill Party posts that were associated with some productive function (eg. factory or kolkhoz management) that demanded technical competence.

It is suggestive from the principal occupational lines followed during the bulk of their careers that the "learned" occupations of the CC members were only selectively significant. Scientists had obviously been trained as scientists, for example, but Party workers came from a variety of educational backgrounds. In order

TABLE 4. PRACTICED OCCUPATION

	Full Members	Candi- dates	Total
Engineering Science & Mathe-	38.0%	26.7%	33.6%
matics	4.9	2.8	4.2
Agronomy	16.6	19.4	17.5
Military	9.2	13.2	10.8
Arts & Letters Other (mostly	15.3	16.1	15.6
Party work)	16.0	21.8	18.3
	100%	100%	100%

to ascertain the career orientations pursued by individuals over a longer term period than was indicated in Table 4, occupational status was examined in two parts: first, the career orientation of each member before 1953 and, second, the career orientation after 1953. The year 1953 was chosen as the dividing line between Stalinist and post-Stalinist Russia so that any significant variation in career patterns and in means of mobility might be more accurately assessed. Career orientation was determined by the number of years a CC member had spent in a particular type of occupation. Table 5 presents the data collected on occupational status before 1953 while Table 6 presents the corresponding information for the years 1953-1966.

The most striking difference between the occupational associations of the full members befor∋ and after 1953 is the sharp increase in apparatus assignments from 40.0% to 54.9%. This very strongly suggests the importance of ties with the apparatus for upward mobility in the higher levels of the Party. Since most of those moving into apparatus posts had devoted most of their careers to economic or cultural activities, the increase also underscores the emphasis placed on experience in a relatively broad range of economic and cultural areas as

TABLE 5. OCCUPATIONAL STATUS
OF FULL MEMBERS

Occupation -		pational tatus	Occupational Status
Occupation -		Before 1953		After 1953
Party apparatchiki	74	40.0%	101	54.9%
High level bureaucrats
(heavy industry)	25	13.6	23	12.5
(light industry)	1	.5	1	.5
(agriculture)	5	2.7	10	5.4
Low level bureaucrats
(heavy industry)	15	8.2	0	0.0
(light industry)	1	.5	0	0.0
(agriculture)	11	6.0	0	0.0
Other bureaucrats ¹	5	2.7	12	6.5
Indeterminate ²	3	1.6	5	2.7
Military Officers	15	8.2	14	7.6
Scientists	4	2.2	· 4	2.2
Writers	3	1.6	3	1.6
Journalists	.1	.5	1	.5
Trade Union Officers	4	2.2	6	3.3
Workers	3	1.6	2 .	1.1
Others	2	1.1	2	1.1
Nc data	12	6.5
_	184	100.0%	184	100.0%

¹ Other bureaucrats include those in the cultural, welfare, planning, and security ministries of the government.

² Indeterminate includes those who spent such equal portions of their careers in both party and state work as to make it impossible to place them in either category.

one condition for the co-optation of non-professional apparatchiki into important apparatus positions. The data indicate that about onethird of the members of the Party apparatus in the 1966 Central Committee had built their earlier careers in the economic or cultural bureaucracy or some related unit of Soviet society. In addition, many of those who had been professional apparatchiki from near the outset of their careers had been intensively trained in economic and technological matters in Party schools. As a consequence of these factors, a substantial proportion of the apparatchiki themselves had acquired some measure of expertise or specialization in one or more areas outside of Party administration. The co-optation of such experienced persons into the apparatus suggests an effort on the part of the apparatchiki to enrich their own numbers with highly competent individuals who have succeeded in careers outside the apparatus and to help assure the loyalty of such experienced persons to the role of the apparatus in the system.

The priority given to continuation of the influence of the Party apparatus and to the development of heavy industry is attested to by the paucity of formal representation accorded persons in light industry and in intermediate

TABLE 6. OCCUPATIONAL STATUS
OF CANDIDATE MEMBERS

Occumation		Occupational Status		Occupational Status
Occupation -		Before 1953		After 1953
Party apparatchiki	50	40.0%	63	50.4%
High level bureaucrats
(heavy industry)	9	7.2	14	11.2
(light industry)	· 4	3.2	5	4.0
(agriculture)	4	3.2	5	4.0
Low level bureaucrats
(heavy industry)	4	3.2	0	0.0
(light industry)	0	0.0	0	0.0
(agriculture)	4	3.2	1	.8
Other bureaucrats1	3	2.4	7	5.6
Indeterminate ²	3	2.4	4	3.2
Military Officers	11	7.2	11	8.8
Scientists	3	2.4	3	2.4
Writers	4	3.2	4	3.2
Journalists	3	2.4	2	1.6
Trade Union Officers	1	.8	4	3.2
Workers	2	1.6	2	1.6
Others	0	0.0	0	0.0
No data	20	16.0
Aces	125	100.0%	125	100.0%

¹ Other bureaucrats include those in the cultural, welfare, planning, and security ministries of the government.

and lower level bureaucratic positions. The fact that only one full member was associated with light industry both before and after 1953 indicates that careers in that sector of the economy have afforded little opportunity for upward mobility. On the other hand, it should be noted that a small number of the apparatchiki and of those now in the Council of Ministers have developed special competence in the light industry sector.

The same general pattern exists for the candidate membership as for the full members.

Prior Positions. A related point of particular importance is the relationship between the position occupied by an individual and his co-optation into the Central Committee. Examination of the compositions of the Central Committees elected in 1952, 1956, 1961, and 1966 reveals that at least eighty and possibly one hundred of the full members are chosen as a result of their holding particular positions. The figure cannot be more precise, for the size of the Central Committee has tended to increase with each election, thereby making it difficult to ascertain whether the holders of some posts will continue to serve in the CC regardless of their personal identities. In addition to the members of the CPSU Politburo and Secretariat, who are always members of the Central Committee, there are sixty-five or more posts that carry CC membership with them. These include all the first secretaries of the Union Republic Parties, thirty-five or more first secretaries of important provincial Party organizations (Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Stalingrad-Volgograd, etc.), and the first secretaries of the Moscow and Leningrad city Party organizations. From the government, the Chairman of the All-Union Council of Ministers, also a member of the Politburo, and at least two first deputy chairmen of the Council are members, along with the Ministers and First Deputy Ministers of Defense and Foreign Affairs. Besides these, the chairmen of the Republic Councils of Ministers of the RSFSR, the Ukraine, Byelorussia, and probably Georgia and Uzbekistan are Central Committee members. From the mass organizations, the first secretary of the Komsomols and the chairman of the Trade Union Council are members. Although supporting data come from a rather limited time span, it can be stated that the editor of Pravda, the president of the Academy of Sciences, and at least one deputy chairman of the Trade Union Council have probably become positions bringing automatic membership in the Central Committee. There have also regularly been other members of the Council of Ministers represented on the Central Committee but they have not been associated with any particular ministry.

² Indeterminate includes those who spent such equal portions of their careers in both party and state work as to make it impossible to place them in either category.

³ Compilations of the members and their positions at the time of election to the Central Committee are available in Current Soviet Policies, Volumes I-IV, published by Columbia University Press and by Frederick A. Praeger.

As yet, candidate membership appears to have no such strong associations with particular positions, although there are some indications of change in this regard. Perhaps as many as twenty-five provincial Party first secretarial posts have reached the point where they carry with them candidate membership. Some particular types of specialists may consistently be given candidate status but thus far there is no indication that they are chosen as a result of positions already held. In general, the Party leaders may be expected to have more flexibility in the selection of candidates.

The remaining members and candidate members of the Central Committee are not commonly associated with any special positions although the great majority of them also seem to be selected as a result of a combination of their reputations and positions. The co-optation of certain military officers, scientists, literary figures, journalists, economic planners and managers of sovnarkhozy and industrial and agricultural enterprises round out the representative significance of the institution. Some of these may achieve permanent membership. This is a distinct possibility for marshals in command of crucially stationed troops or the admirals of key fleets. It is certainly less likely for less highly institutionalized professional groups, such as writers and scientists.

The association of some positions with CC membership is undoubtedly a major reason for the relative stability of membership in recent years. Whereas there were at least two fairly sharp turnovers on the CC during the 1950's, the membership has been relatively stable since the election of the CC of 1961. In 1966, 79.4% of the 175 full members from the preceding Central Committee were re-elected, although the size was increased to 195 to allow for the cooptation of additional persons. Only 26 living members of the previous Central Committee were not returned. Seventy percent of the full members had never served as candidates, having been drawn directly into voting status. Twenty-two (12%) had served as candidates in the preceding committee. Seventy-eight per cent were elected in 1956 or later, over one-half of these in 1961.

The candidate membership experienced greater changes in 1966 than the full membership. Here it should be remembered that data were not available on 40 of the 165 candidates. The vast majority of these were new admissions. However, the data referred to in this paragraph consist of references only to 129 candidates for whom information could be collected on those variables dealing with candidate status. Of these, 51 were elected in 1966, 54 in 1961, and 6 in 1956. In short, over 84% of the 129 reached the Central Committee at or after the 20th Party Congress of 1956.

A related matter worthy of attention is that the proportion of apparatchiki and bureaucrats among the full members of the CC of 1966 did not differ significantly from that found in the CC selected in the 22nd Party Congress of 1961. Or the other hand, the number of bureaucrats in the candidate membership decreased from 29.0% to 25.6%, while the proportion of apparatchiki increased over 3%. Both the apparatchiki and bureaucrats who were full members immediately prior to the 23rd Party Congress were sufficiently entrenched to discourage a serious turnover. The pressure from the conservatives, who apparently were still anxious to prevent a resurgence of Khrushchev-type reformism, was felt more keenly in the candidate membership, where the percentage of bureaucrats and technocrats declined due to an increase in apparatchiki.

Occupational Changes. Of particular interest is the question of who changed occupational classifications after 1953. A total of 54 full members, 41 with technical education, changed job classifications in the post-Stalin years. These figures include 12 for whom there were no data for the years before 1953. Of these 12 nine had assumed career associations with the party apparatus after 1953. Sixteen of the others moved from positions in the lower and intermediary levels of the agricultural and industrial bureaucracies into the ranks of the apparatchiki. All but one of these had records of technical education. Six achieved upward mobility in their initial career areas, moving from low level to high level bureaucratic positions. No pattern existed among the remaining 20 full memberswho changed from one job classification to another.

Of the candidate members, 20 changed kinds of positions and another 20 moved from the unclassified (no data) category before 1953 to identifiable posts after that date. Twelve of the unclassified occupied positions in the apparatchik after 1953. Nine others moved from the low or middle level bureaucracy into the party apparatus, eight of these having had technical education. Eleven others changed kinds of positions without a pattern. Of the 40 candidates there was no information on the educational backgrounds of 19, while 19 others had technical training and two had non-technical higher education.

Of those whose occupational associations changed after 1953, there was a primary movement from specialized bureaucratic positions to the party apparatus and a secondary movement from low level to high level positions in the same general occupational category. The primary movement indicates a tendency of the party to recruit and promote at least partly on the basis of specialized education and experience. The secondary movement of promotion within the ranks of a particular organization is probably typical of non-party institutional processes. The primary movement is undoubtedly more important as a means of providing the apparatus with the intelligence necessary to exert effective control over non-party institutions by giving the apparatus groups of experts with previous or continuing association with those institutions.

Place of Residence. Although the place-of-residence factor did not have a significant correlation with the other variables considered, it does indicate the shifting living habits of the Soviet elite. Seventy-eight per cent of the full members and 63% of the candidates listed their current residences in cities of 500,000 or more. Of the total membership 91% lived in cities of 100,000 or above. Moscow was by far the most widely claimed residence, despite the fact that many who lived there were formally associated with republic Party organizations. Of the full membership, 46% had residencies in Moscow, while 44% of the candidates had the same. Also, 65% of the full members and 62% of the candidates resided in the RSFSR, with the Ukraine and the Central Asian republics following as the next most widely claimed places of residence.

Party Status. The status of each member in the CPSU is another major area of consideration. Factors examined here are date of admission to the CPSU, the tenure of each member in the Central Committee, and the record of service in the central, republic, and regional Party organs. Then attention will be focused on the backgrounds of the members who were newly elected at the 23rd Party Congress.

The record of the dates of admission to Party membership is found in Table 7. The large percentage of candidates for whom there is no information suggests that those individuals were admitted fairly recently (at least, post-war) and that they are probably younger than the members for whom there is information. Assuming this to be the case, well over one-half the candidates were admitted after the great purges of the 1930's. In contrast, about 45% of the full

TABLE 7. DATE OF ADMISSION TO THE CPSU

	Full I	Members	Can	andidates
Pre-1917	5	3.7%	0	0.0%
1918-1937	76	41.3	34	27.2
1938-1945	88	47.8	62	49.6
1946-1952	4	2.2	6	4.8
1953 or after	4	2.2	1	.8
No data	7	3.8	22	17.6
	184	100%	125	100%

members attained membership prior to or during the great purges. Nevertheless, the old Bolsheviks have almost entirely vanished, only five members of the CC having joined the Party prior to the revolution.

Another aspect of Party status concerns the records of those who had worked as apparatchiki in the Party before being co-opted into the Central Committee. Tables 8 and 9 indicate the Party status of the CC members before and after 1953. Party status here refers to the level of official positions held in the organs of the CPSU. Well over one-half of both the full members and candidates had no record of regular service in Party organs before 1953. In the post-Stalin period this situation was reversed with the reversal being most sharp among the candidates. This information suggests two important possibilities that tend to enforce the findings on occupational backgrounds presented in Tables 5 and 6. First, many members made themselves accessible to co-optation into the apparatchiki as a means of increasing their upward mobility after having already established themselves in other occupational endeavors. This means that a significant portion of the CC who would now be classified as apparatchiki would not have been so classified during most of their careers. For the most part, they appear to be specialists who demonstrated their abilities as engineers or administrators and were only later drawn into

TABLE 8. PARTY OFFICES HELD BY FULL MEMBERS

	Befo	ore 1953	Aft	er 1953
Central apparatus	6	3.4%	8	4.4%
Central & Republic apparati	1	.5	17	9.2
Republic apparati	13	7.1	16	8.7
Republic & Regional apparati	17	9.2	31	16.8
Regional apparati	42	22.8	43	23.4
All three levels	3	1.6	13	7.1
None	102	55.4	56	30.4
	184	100%	184	100%

TABLE 9. PARTY OFFICES HELD BY CANDIDATE MEMBERS

	Bef	ore 1953	Aft	er 1953
Central apparatus	5	4.0%	11	8.8%
Central & Republic apparati	0	0.0	6	4.8
Republic apparati	4	3.2	21	16.8
Republic & Regional apparati	6	4.8	17	13.6
Regional apparati	34	27.2	36	28.8
All three levels	0	0.0	3	2.4
None	76	60.8	31	24.8
	125	100%	125	100%

TABLE 10. EDUCATIONAL BACKGROUNDS
OF NEW MEMBERS

	Full Members	Candidate Members
Engineering	10	9 .
Agronomy	. 7	• 4
Science	3	2
Military	2	4
Arts & Letters	2	. 7
Party schools only	3	4
No data	11	21
	 ,	******
	38	51

TABLE 11. OCCUPATIONS OF NEW MEMBERS

•	Full Members		Cand Men	******
, i	Before 1953	After 1953	Before 1953	After 1953
Apparatchiki	17	23	16	27 .
High level bureaucrats	6	8	2	10
Low level bureaucrats	5	0	1	. 1
Military Officers	2	2	3	5
Writer	0	.0	1	1
Journalist	0	0	2	1
Scientists	3	3	2	2
Trade Union Officers	0	0	1	4
Indeterminate	0	1	0	0
No data	4	0	23	0
	37	37	51	51

full-time Party work. Second, the turnover in candidate membership in 1966 suggests that some individuals who had been members primarily as a result of their specialization and who had not become apparatchiki were removed from candidacy in favor of those who had given more regular administrative service to Party organs in the past.

New Members. Examination of the backgrounds of the newly elected members can be expected to shed further light on patterns of continuity or change in the membership of the Central Committee. Consequently, the educaticnal backgrounds and careers of the 38 new full members and the 51 new candidates are highlighted in Tables 10 and 11. Of the 89 new members and candidates considered, 50 (56%) had been regularly associated with the Party apparatus after 1953. All but 18 (20%) had hao at least periodic occupational association with the apparatus. This suggests a possible effort or the part of the ruling coalition of the Party to check the influence of the technocrats and to stabilize, if not accelerate, the influence of the apparatchiki in the heirarchy of the CPSU. Au the same time it should be emphasized that this effort had more effect on the candidate membership than on the full membership.

II. CORRELATIONS

Age. Although there were only about three years separating the average ages of the full and candidate members of the Central Committee. age proved to have statistical importance as a factor influencing other variables and demarking differences between the two classes of membership. Date of birth was related both to the level and to the source of education. Despite the small difference in age, the candidates had

	Level of Education	Source of Degree	Learned Occupation
Age of Full	0.1.10	0004	0000
Members Age of	.3149	.3024	.2932
Candidates	.5279	.4742	.3428

had greater access to higher forms of education. The higher correlations for the candidates lead one to assume that a larger number of themwere co-opted into the Central Committee or the basis of their specialized training than was the case with the full members, who were often selected on the basis of their positions. In related areas, date of birth had an expectedly high correlation with date of admission to the CPSU, .5608 for the full members and .4682 for the candidates. The lower correlation for the candidates indicates a wider distribution of age of admission, thereby reducing, to a modest extent, the importance of age as a significant determinant to admission.

Sex. Sex is an obvious influence on the selection of members when one considers that only five of the 184 full members and five of the 125 candidates for whom information was available were women. Elite status in the CPSU is clearly reserved largely for males. What, then, are the factors that help to create the exceptions? For the full members no definite pattern was observed. However, two factors stood out in regard to the women candidates. All five of the latter had records as active members of the Komsomols, working in the apparatus of that organization, and four of the five had careers as apparatchiki. Two of the full members had the same backgrounds. The single exception among the candidates was the Minister of Social Security, who was associated with the state bureaucracy. Only one of the five was newly elected to the Central Committee. The foregoing factors indicate that those women who were able to overcome the political obstacle created by their sex have done so largely through their records as political activists in youth organizations and their willingness to seek careers in the Party apparatus rather than through specialization in technical areas. Moreover, it should be noted that the women tended to be younger than the male members, for the eldest was 56 and two of the ten were in their thirties.

Education. Level and source of education proved to be of greater significance for candidates than for full members, although it was important for both. Not only did these two fac-

· FU	LL MEMBERS
	Learned Occupation	Practiced Occupation
Level of Education Source of Highest	.3189	.2101
Degree	.3244	.1897
CAND	IDATE MEMBER	s
	Learned Occupation	Practiced Occupation

	Occupation	Occupation
Level of Education Source of Highest	. 6243	.5848
Degree Degree	.5403	.5370
,	-

tors have a greater bearing on the learned and practiced occupations of the candidates than of the full members, but the source of the highest degree earned by the candidates had a significance of .3540 with Party office held before 1953. The correlation of the same variables pertaining to full members was only .2820. In addition, a similar positive correlation (.3896) existed between the Party office held by candidates after 1953 and occupational status after 1953. Those patterns suggest rather strongly that the candidates were co-opted more for their degree of specialization than the full members. If such is the case, it can be hypothesized that candidate members in the Central Committee elected at the 23rd Party Congress were selected because they were thought to provide a communications in-put into the higher decision-making centers of the CPSU. It appears that the full members, as distinct from the candidates, became less directly associated with the occupational specialty for which they were educated as they moved to higher positions in the political structure.

Regional Factors. There was a correlation of .3956 between candidate status in the Central Committee and the region of birth. This indicates that candidacy is used more to give recognition to the geographic divisions and ethnic groups of the USSR than full membership, for which the correlation was only .2053. Related to this is the relationship of experience in a large city Party organization to the levels of the Party apparatus in which members of the CC who had such experience worked. These levels were identified by the Party offices that were held in the central, republic, and regional Party organizations. The correlations suggest that work in a city Party organization was more important for the full members than for the candidates in terms of their movement upward in the Party apparatus. It also suggests that the younger full members and most of the candidates had found other means of attaining upward mobility in the system. The days of intense rivalry between the Moscow and Leningrad Party organizations are probably about over, and the importance of association with one or the other has apparently declined despite the increasing tendency to move to the larger cities. This indicator, especially when

•	PARTY O	PARTY OFFICE HELD
,	Full M	embers	Candidate	Members
	Before 1953	After 1953	Before 1953	After 1953
City Party Work	.4937	. 3548	.3018	.3005

considered in combination with the background of the members in the Party apparatus, bears out the basic contention that factors other than professional association with the apparatus are of considerable significance in determining the co-optation of persons into the Central Committee, even during a period of conservative reaction to the reformism of the Khrushchev years and even though many of them may be assigned positions in the apparatus after becoming CC members or candidates.

Foreign Travel. Among the other relationships examined only two merit attention, and these may be only of passing interest. There was no apparent difference between the number of awards and decorations bestowed upon the two classes of CC members. What difference existed can probably be accounted for by the slight age difference. On the other hand, one curious differential may be construed as indicating the greater status of the full members in comparison with the candidates. This factor is foreign travel. There is a positive correlation of .3544 between full membership and foreign travel and a slight inverse correlation between candidate membership and foreign travel. This may be interpreted as a distinction in status. although it should be pointed out that the number of full members who had had diplomatic experience may have accounted for part of the difference in correlation.

III. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The evidence presented indicates the importance of education to members of the Soviet political elite both in terms of influencing how they launched their careers and of influencing their status in the CPSU. Most of this educational preparation was specialized rather than general, with the four largest categories being engineering, agronomy, Party, and military in that order. Of our sample, 65% (120) of the full members and 51% (64) of the candidates had a technical education (excluding military officers and scientists). The career patterns of the members included 55% (101) of the full members and 50% (63) of the candidates who had primary associations in the Party apparatus after 1953. In addition, 25% (46) of the full members and 26% (32) of the candidates had primary associations with the state bureaucracy (excluding the military). Of those in the bureaucratic category members attached to the heavy industry segment of the state machinery were clearly predominant, with modest representation being given to agricultural administrators and specialists and only token recognition to those associated with light industry.

Despite the fact of considerable experience in the Party apparatus after 1953, a clear majority of both full and candidate members held no Party posts on the central, republic, or regional levels of the apparatus prior to 1953. This was true of 55% (102) of the full members and 60% (64) of the candidates. It was only after 1953—that is, the period during which increasing emphasis was given to co-opting persons into Party leadership positions who had specialized training and experience in some functional service (economics, agronomy, military technology, etc.)—that many of the members were assigned positions, temporarily or otherwise, in various levels of the Party apparatus. During this period all but 30% (56) of the full members and 24% (30) of the candidates held official posts in Party organs.

The correlation study demonstrated a modest though meaningful relationship between degree earned and Party office and between the Party office held by candidates and their occupational status after 1953. These correlations, especially when considered in the light of the data concerning backgrounds in Party posts, and a general survey of the 1956 and 1961 Central Committees, support the contention that co-optation is developing largely into a rational process and not merely into a device with which to play games of musical chairs. In short, at least a large percentage, though undoubtedly not all, are drawn into the Central Committee as a result of their knowledge, demonstrated abilities, and occupational role associations. Their presence helps to assure an inflow of information from others with whom the members have occupational associations. It is in the sense of accessibility that the members of the Central Committee may be considered representatives, though certainly at this stage of development they are not equal voting deputies.

The role functions of the persons in the Central Committee, especially their representative role, are closely associated with who they are and why they were co-opted. The question of who they are is partially answered by the foregoing empirical study. They are persons with key occupational assignments, most of whom had acquired reputations as successes in their respective career specializations. Most are also associated with an important functional group in the Soviet system. To be sure, the evidence presented here does not deal with the difficult and important question of the degree of group solidarity and the extent to which the persons in the same group share or contest particular values. The situation of the apparatchiki, who constitute such a significant percentage of the membership, is a case in point. The very fact that some of them have joined the apparatus rather late in their careers, that some are in Party posts that require technical training and special skills as well as administrative ability, and that still others have spent their adult lives in Party administration or in propaganda and security organs indicates the range of experiences and attitudes that they may carry into the Central Committee. The point here is simply that most have been associated with particular functional groups that have particular interests. From these associations and interests they can be expected to have acquired specialized knowledge and abilities that influence their perceptions of systemic goals as well as of their own roles in the system.

The question of why they were co-opted relates to the practice of co-optation and the kind of representation they are able to perform. Philip Selznick has argued that organizations adopt two principal mechanisms of defense as means of enhancing the security of the organization in its relation to the social forces around it.4 These mechanisms are ideology and cooptation. The use of ideology as a device of political socialization in the Soviet system is widely recognized by Western observers. The rational use of co-optation in the system has been noted but not deeply explored. Selznick suggests that there are two types of co-optation: formal and informal. Informal co-optation involves the actual sharing of power by the old elite with the co-opted persons. While this has occurred in the case of the Central Committee in leadership disputes (e.g., the anti-party crisis of 1957), the actual sharing of power is undoubtedly the exception rather than the rule. On the other hand, the concept of formal cooptation appears to have more meaningful application in analyzing why persons are co-opted into the Central Committee. This mechanism is used to maintain or increase general acceptance of the legitimacy of the Party elite as the highest decision-making authority in the system by establishing definite means of accessibility to key individuals and especially to key groups. This is accomplished by the selection of persons who are part of group elites. Such use of co-optation also consists of selecting persons who are dependable sources of information. The in-flow of knowledge that they bring helps the elite to make more effective operational decisions than they otherwise might make. By coopting persons on the basis of these two factors -accessibility and communications—the ruling elite may have the advantage of increased stability and information without a complementary loss of power.

⁴ See Philip Selznick, TVA and the Grassroots, University of California Publications in Culture ◆and Society, Vol. III, pp. 259-261. For other -works involving either elite or group analysis see: Bernard M. Bass, Leadership, Psychology, and Organizational Behavior (New York: Harper, =1960); Dorwin Cartwright and Alvin Zander, Froup Dynamics, Research and Theory (Evanston, Cllinois: Row, Peterson, 1960); Lewis J. Edinger, Political Leadership of Industrial Societies (New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1967); Thomas Gorion, Group-Centered Leadership (Boston: Houghon-Mifflin, 1955); Morris Janowitz, The Profesional Soldier (New York: The Free Press of Hencoe, 1960; Harold D. Lasswell, Power and Personality (New York: Viking Press, 1948); Dwaine Marvick, Political Decision-Makers (New Cork: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1961); Robert 'annenbaum, Leadership and Organization: a Beavioral Science Approach (New York: McGraw Mill, 1961). For one of the few indepth analyses of n important segment of the Soviet elite, see John .. Armstrong, The Soviet Bureaucratic Elite (New ork: Praeger, 1959).

The sharing of the symbols of authority, however, opens the door to pressure for a transfer of real power to the co-opted parties. The prevention of this development requires some form of control (Selznick contends informal control) over the co-opted elements. These forces—the sharing of symbols of authority and the placement of controls over those with whom authority is seemingly shared—create tension between representation and participation on the one hand and integration and regulation on the other. Such tension is suggested by the addition of apparatus-associated persons to the Central Committee in 1966 (especially among the candidates) and the corresponding decrease in the more diffuse technocratic contingent. The relative stability of the full membership, however, indicates that certain groups and individuals had acquired representation by right and that only a major conflict would overturn the general balance of forces. Candidacy may be a means of giving ostensible authority and recognition to those less firmly entrenched but ambitious to secure recognition to themselves and those with whom they are professionally associated.

These interpretations must, for the present, be tentative, although they are definitely suggested by the history of the Central Committee since 1956 and by the examination of the backgrounds of the members. The paucity of reliable information on informal channels of communications makes the problem of a more comprehensive empirical study virually insurmountable for the time being. However, it is our hope that the methods used and the hypotheses set forth in this study will be suggestive to others of related and more comprehensive projects that might be developed in the future.

THE RECRUITMENT OF CANDIDATES FOR THE CANADIAN HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLAN KORNBERG Duke University AND HAL H. WINSBOROUGH University of Wisconsin

Systematic empirical research into the process of political leadership recruitment has made substantial progress since World War II with emphasis given to those who occupy formal positions of authority within the political system, specifically, legislators and party activists. Generally such studies have been concerned with delineating (a) who the leaders are, 2 (b) how and why they are where they are, 3

¹ See Dwaine Marvick's essay, "Political Decision-Makers in Contrasting Milieus," in Dwaine Marvick (ed.), Political Decision-Makers: Recruitment and Performance (Glencoe: The Free Press, 1961), pp. 13-27.

² See, for example, Donald R. Matthews, U. S. Senators and Their World (New York: Vintage Books, 1960), pp. 11-67; Mattei Dogan, "Political Ascent in a Class Society: French Deputies 1870-1958," in Dwaine Marvick (ed.), op. cit., pp. 57-90; and Peter G. Richards, Honourable Members (London: Faber & Faber, 1959). A recent study of a non-western elite is Frederick Frey's The Turkish Political Elite (Cambridge: M.I.T. Press, 1965). See, also, comparative studies such as Harold D. Lasswell, The Comparative Study of Elites (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1952) and Donald R. Matthews, The Social Background of Political Decision-Makers (Garden City: Doubleday, 1954).

³ See, for example, Heinz Eulau, "The Legislative Career," in John Wahlke, Heinz Eulau, William Buchanan and Leroy Ferguson, The Legislative System (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1962), pp. 69-121; Dwaine Marvick and Charles R. Nixon, "Recruitment Contrasts in Rival Campaign Groups," in Dwaine Marvick (ed.), op. cit., pp. 193-217; James D. Barber, The Lawmakers: Recruitment and Adaptation to Legislative Life (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1965); William E. Wright, "Local Party Leadership in West Berlin: SPD and CDU," (Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Vanderbilt University, 1966); and Lewis Bowman and G. R. Boynton, "Recruitment Patterns Among Local Party Officials: A Model and Some Preliminary Findings in Selected Locales," this REVIEW, 60 (1966), 667-676.

and (c) the variables affecting (a) and (b). The most ambitious recent studies, in the sense that they try to deal systematically with all three aspects of recruitment, are those by Samuel J. Eldersveld, Austin Ranney, and Henry Valen. Their research, and the example cited of other scholarship, have yielded a substantial number of propositions. Three which lend themselves to testing with data we have gathered on the recruitment of candidates for the Canadian House of Commons, 1945–65 are:

- The status of individuals recruited by a party in part is a function of the party's competitive positions. (Key, Snowiss).
- ⁴ See, for example, V. O. Key, Southern Politic in State and Nation (New York: Vintage Book Ed.), pp. 386-442, and American State Politic (New York: Alfred Knopf, 1956), pp. 133-196 Feter H. Rossi and Phillips Cutright, "The Impact of Party Organization in an Industria Setting," in Morris Janowitz (ed.), Communit Political Systems (Glencoe: The Free Press, 1961) pp. 81-116; Lester Seligman, "Political Recruit ment and Party Structure," this Review, 5 (1961), 77-86; Stein Rokkan and Henry Valer "The Mobilization of the Periphery: Data o Turnout, Party Membership and Candidate Re cruitment in Norway," Acta Sociologica, 6 (1962) 115-158; and Leo M. Snowiss, "Congressions Recruitment and Representation," this REVIEW 60 (1966), 627-639,
- ⁵ Samuel J. Eldersveld, Political Parties: Behavioral Analysis (Chicago: Rand McNally 1964).
- ⁶ Austin Ranney, Pathways to Parliamer (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1965
- ⁷ Henry Valen, "The Recruitment of Parlis mentary Nominees in Norway," Scandinavia-Political Studies, 1 (1966), 121-166.
- 8 V.O. Key, for example, in his study of Sout's ern state parties, found that the favored Democratic parties or (in some instances) factions were able to recruit candidates and workers of rel tively high status. The less favored Republican however, had great difficulty recruiting "respec

- The status of individuals recruited by a party varies with the party's position on an ideological continuum⁹ (Eldersveld, Ranney, Marvick and Nixon, Valen).
- 3) Relative urbanism and the degree of industrialization of communities affect recruitment patterns (Rokkan and Valen, Valen, Snowiss). 10 In the present instance there should be a positive relationship between urbanism and the mean status of candidates.

In testing these propositions we will compare, whenever such comparisons appear appropriate, the data for Canadian parliamentary candidates with findings from some of the previously cited studies and also indicate how, in Canada, multi-partyism is related to the status of recruited candidates. Then we will employ a multiple regression analysis to suggest how in ■able" people. Leo M. Snowiss claimed that the ■characteristics of Congressional candidates in the ■Chicago area varied with inter-party competition.

Thus, in non-competitive districts in which they ■were certain to win, the Democrats recruited
"old-pro" types who were longtime activists in the party organization. In non-competitive districts in which the Republicans were certain to win, however, the Democrats tended to recruit ■younger and, presumably, better-educated ment who most often were lawyers. In marginal districts they frequently recruited candidates with only tenuous links to the party organization ather than the old-line politicians sent to Conscress from their inner-city stronghold.

⁹ Eldersveld, and Marvick and Nixon, in their espective studies of party activists in Detroit and los Angeles, found that the Republican subjects njoyed more prestigious occupations than their Democratic counterparts. Both Austin Ranney and Henry Valen found that the socio-economic tatus of candidates for Parliament in Britain and Norway, respectively, varied with the right-left positions of the parties.

10 Stein Rokkan and Henry Valen demontrated that the proportion of Norwegian women ecruited as party workers increased markedly in rban areas. Valen subsequently found that the roportion of women candidates for the Norwegian Parliament in part was a function of the elative urbanism of constituencies. Lee Snowiss laimed that differences in the backgrounds, the kills, and even the political "styles" of Congressional candidates were associated with relative rbanism (i.e., whether they were seeking office in the core city, the outer city, or the suburban bynships of Chicago).

two pairs of elections the socio-economic status of candidates, the number of candidates in an electoral contest, the relative urbanism, and the competitiveness of constituencies, influence the process of candidate recruitment. The right-left positions of party candidates are not used because we feel this variable does not lend itself to regression analysis when the units sampled and measured are constituencies.

I. PROCEDURES AND DATA SOURCES

The chief data sources are the Report of the Chief Electoral Officer 11 for eight Canadian national elections from 1945–1965 and the Population of Electoral Districts 12 for 1951, 1956, and 1961. The former give the occupations at the time of nomination and votes received by the candidates of the four national parties in the elections of 1945, 1949, 1953, 1957, 1958, 1962, 1963, and 1965. The latter provide a list of all enclaves of population of 5000 or more in each federal constituency.

In this analysis we employed a random sample of 165 of Canada's then 263 federal constituencies. The data for the 1945 election should be viewed with caution. This was a wartime election and a considerable number of candidates were still members of Canada's Armed Forces. This occupation receives a low score in the rating system we employed, so that the socio-economic status of 1945 candidates is somewhat artificially depressed. Further, since there were only 242 constituencies at the time, there are no data for 22 of the sample constituencies.

MEASURES

Urbanism. Our measure of urbanism is based upon the definition of urban employed by the Canadian Census Bureau, that of incorporated onvenient and reliable source for the occupations of both incumbent and non-incumbent candidates. The Parliamentary Guide has considerable bibliographic information but only for incumbents. In seven instances, when a Report listed the occupation of a candidate as "gentleman" or "retired" we also used the Parliamentary Guide, Who's Who in Canada, and the National Reference Book to ascertain occupations. Although there were not enough cases to significantly affect the analysis, it is still possible that some of the published and "real" occupations of candidates differed.

¹² (Ottawa: Dominion Bureau of Statistics). The data for 1946 are available only for Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta and hence, have not been employed in the analysis.

	Party 1 (40% of 4 party vote)	Party 2 (30% of 4 party vote)	Party 3 (20% of 4 party vote)	Party 4 (10% of 4 party vote)
Party 1		10	20	30
Party 2	-		10	20
Party 3			_	. 10
Party 4

Fig. 1. An inter-party competition measure.

cities or towns of 5000 or more.¹³ It is a ratio (expressed in per cent) of all such urban units in a constituency over the total population of the constituency. Scores range from 00 (completely rural) to 99 (constituencies falling wholly within a metropolitan region, such as Toronto or Vancouver).

Inter-Party Competition. Although there are numerous measures of political competition, they are difficult to construct and, therefore, do not please all political scientists all of the time.14 Despite the fact that during the period Canada had single-member constituencies15 and plurality voting, an added difficulty in satisfactorily measuring inter-party competition was the presence of four rather than two national parties.16 Further, all parties did not always contest every constituency and the constituencies which they did contest may have varied from election to election. Since, for the multivariate portion of this analysis, we wish to treat interparty competition as a linear and continuous variable, we have computed the proportion of the total vote (in per cent) obtained by the candidates of the Social Credit, Progressive Conservative, Liberal, and New Democratic parties

¹³ Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, Chapter 23 (2:38).

¹⁴ See the discussion in Kenneth Janda, Data Processing (Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1965), pp. 174–183.

¹⁵ Except for a two-member constituency in Halifax, Nova Scotia and Queens, Prince Edward Island. The two-member districts were abolished and the number of constituencies was increased to 264 after the 1966 redistribution of seats.

¹⁶ Mark Kesselman has employed an "index of multipartyism" to measure competition in French national and local elections. According to Kesselman, the index does not measure competition but rather the convergence of votes among competing parties. See his "French Local Politics: A Statistical Examination of Grass Roots Consensus," this Review, 60 (1966), 963–973.

for every election in each of the 165 sample constituencies. Votes obtained by Independents or by candidates of splinter parties such as the Labor Progressive (Communist) have been disregarded. Our measure is based upon differences in the proportions of votes cast for the competing candidates of any of the above four parties and increases in magnitude as competition among the parties decreases.¹⁷

Socio-Economic Status. Political scientists are aware that occupation is a discriminating variable that frequently is correlated with sharp differences in behavior. Although, for analytic purposes, occupations are frequently arranged in an ordinal fashion, such data (since they are not interval or ratio) ordinarily do not lend themselves to use in multivariate statistica) analysis. Happily, Otis D. Duncan has beenable to estimate numerical socio-economic status scores for all detailed occupations in the 1960 U.S. Census of Population. 18 Briefly, his score is a composite of information on levels of educational attainment and income of the labor force engaged in the several occupations (as reported in the 1950 Census of Population). The score is so derived as to have a high correlation 17 We cumulated the absolute value of all possible differences among parties and divided this sum by the total number of differences. Since the resultant measure increases with disparity amon, candidates, we have signed it negatively in orde that a larger number represent greater competition. Figure 1 is a schematic representation of situation in which all four parties contest a constituency. The resultant measure is Gini's meadifference. For bibliography concerning this measure see Gerald J. Glasser, "Variance Formulator the Mean Difference and Coefficient of Corcentration," Journal of the American Statistica Association, 59 (1962), 648-654.

¹⁸ The rationale and method for computir these scores are described in Albert J. Reiss et al. Occupation and Social Change (Glencoe: The Fre Press, 1961).

with the prestige rating of occupations ranked in a 1947 survey conducted by the National Opinion Research Center. The result is an SES score which is a two digit number ranging from 00 to 96. It may be treated as a continuous variable in a statistical analysis in which a single figure representing occupational socio-economic status is desired. The measure is especially appropriate for the present analysis since the assumption underlying much of the literature on "respectable" candidate recruitment is that their desirability is a function of the prestige ascribed to them by the public. Further, Canadian society is sufficiently similar to the American in the education required, the income derived, and the prestige ascribed to the several occupations, that the use of these scores is valid for the study of 4168 Canadian candidates for Parliament.19 We have two measures of status: "mean status" (\overline{X} SES) which is the cumulated mean scores of candidates over their "N", and "status difference" (A SES).20

19 We did not employ the Canadian occupational class scale developed by Bernard Blishen because, in our view, the Duncan scale was more detailed. However, Blishen in describing his scale said that rank correlations were computed between the ratings of occupational prestige in each of several countries previously studied by Alex Inkeles and Peter Rossi (i.e., U.S.A., Great Britain, New Zealand, Japan, the U.S.S.R., and West Germany). According to Blishen, "The highest ranked correlation, .94, was found between Canada and the U.S." See Bernard Blishen. "The Construction and Use of an Occupational Class Scale," Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, 24 (1958), 523. It should be noted that Inkeles and Rossi had found that in any population there was very little variation in the evaluations of occupations by sub-groups. Thus, Inkeles later observed, "Whether a worker or a professor does the rating, both place the doctor, lawyer, and engineer very near the top of the list, the ordinary worker about two-thirds of the way down, the shoe-shine boy or garbage man at the bottom." See Alex Inkeles, "Industrial Man: The Relation of Status to Experience, Perception and Value," American Sociological Review, 66 (1960), 8. The earlier study referred to by Blishen is Alex Inkeles and Peter Rossi, "National Comparisons of Occupational Prestige." American Journal of Sociology, 61 (1956), 329-

²⁰ Like the measure of inter-party competition, status difference is the sum of all absolute value differences in SES scores for the candidates in every constituency over the total number of possible differences. Since we shall call this mea-

	(scores)	A (93)	B (90)	C (64)	D (42)
Α	()		3	29	51
В				26	48
\mathbf{C}					22
D
Sum	of difference	es = 179); Δ SE	S = 179	=29.8
				6	-

Fig. 2. A measure of status difference.

A number of assumptions underlie the analysis. Three deserve particular comment here. First, in the complex process by which individuals come to assume active political roles, it is essentially the local party organizations that initiate action and proselytize recruits. Second, it is assumed the parties generally can recruit candidates from population pools in which the several social classes are present, although, in different proportions, irrespective of whether they avail themselves of these resources. Third, despite the disagreement on the subject. 22 we sure "status difference" it has been signed positively. Figure 2 represents a status difference score for four candidates.

²¹ Samuel J. Eldersveld's finding that a considerable proportion of the party activists he studied claimed they generated their own political careers suggests that the relationship between recruiter and recruitee is not a neat asymmetrical one. See Eldersveld, op. cit., p. 128. However, the assumption that candidate recruitment, even in a parliamentary system with disciplined parties, is left largely to the local party organizations is based upon a study of legislative behavior in a Canadian House of Commons. See Allan Kornberg, Canadian Legislative Behavior; A Study of the 25th Parliament (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1967), pp. 63-66. See, also, R.M. Dawson and Norman Ward, The Government of Canada, 4th ed., (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1963), pp. 480-486. Ranney's investigations in Great Britain and Valen's research in Norway also point to the important role local party organizations play in the process of candidate recruitment.

²² Both our willingness to accept this ideological continuum and the less-than-complete consensus among observers can be understood by considering the observations of various experts. Some of these follow:

Parliamentary scholar R.M. Dawson has written that historically there have always been differences between Conservatives and Liberals (e.g., "The Conservatives have been the party of

are willing to assume the four Canadian parties currently can be arrayed along a right-left ideological continuum ranging from the Social free enterprise while the Liberals have taken the lead in public ownership and social legislation"). See R.M. Dawson, The Government of Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1948), p. 506. Data from an empirical study of the 25th Parliament tend to support this point of view. See Allan Kornberg, "Caucus and Cohesion in Canadian Parliamentary Parties," this Review, 60 (1966), 83-92, Also, Robert Alford has described the New Democratic party as a "Social-Democratic-Left" party; the Liberals as a "Center-Left" party; the Conservatives as a "Conservative-Right" party; and the Social Credit party as a "Reactionary-Right" party. See Robert Alford, Party and Society (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1963), p. 13. Somewhat differently, Gad Horowitz sees the Conservatives as the party of the right, the NDP as the left, and the Liberals as the "classless" center party. Further, the electoral success of the Liberals, their "refusal to appear as a class party forces both right and left to mitigate their class appeals and to become themselves, in a sense, centre parties." See Gad Horowitz, "Conservatism, Liberalism and Socialism in Canada; An Interpretation," in Hugh G. Thorburn (ed.), Party Politics in Canada, 2nd ed., (Scarborough: Prentice-Hall of Canada, 1967), pp. 55-74.

On the other hand (and despite the fact that a series of Liberal Administrations have passed most of the social welfare legislation Canadians enjoy) sociologist John Porter has argued there are few, if any, basic differences between the Liberals and Conservatives: both espouse the same conservative values; both parties are oriented toward business; and both perform essentially brokerage functions. See John Porter, The Vertical Mosaic: An Analysis of Social Class and Power in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1965), pp. 373-379.

As for the two minor parties, the Social Credit and the CCF, both grew out of the short-lived Progressive party. See William L. Morton, The Progressive Party in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1950). The Social Credit party began as a radical, rural, fundamentalist movement that was pledged to implement extremely unorthodox financial policies. See John Irving, The Social Credit Movement in Alberta (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1959). Over time, electoral success at the provincial level and the quest for respectability seemingly have caused the Western wing of the party to abandon the financial panaceas and radical ideology advocated during the 30's. The Alberta and British Columbia contingent appears to have moved from a popuCredit, through the Conservative and Liberal parties, to the NDP (formerly, the CCF).

list almost neo-fascist party, to a solidly conservative one. In fact, both former national leader Robert Thompson and Mr. Ernest Manning, long-time Premier of Alberta, a number of times have called upon Conservative party supporters to join with their party in a truly conservative coalition against socialist (i.e., Liberal and NDP) forces in Canada. See Mr. Manning's recent book Political Realignment: A Challenge to Thoughtful Canadians (Toronto: McClelland and Stewart Limited, 1967). Mr. Thompson, perhaps because few Conservatives were joining him in the Social Credit party, recently left Social Credit, joined the Conservatives, and won the Conservative nomination for Red Deer, Alberta, in the June, 1968, national election. Spectacular defections such as those by Messrs. Thompson and Olson have seriously undermined Social Credit's claim to be a national party. Certainly, the nomination of candidates in less than a hundred constituencies in the 1968 election suggests that such defections have a deletorious effect on candidate recruitment.

The initial intention of the CCF was to eradicate capitalism in Canada and to replace it with a socialist society. In 1961, the party's close ties with organized labor were formalized in a union from which emerged the New Democratic Party. The CCF-NDP also appears to have lost some of its ideological militancy. The desire for electoral success and, relatedly, the necessity of broadening the base of its middle class support, seemingly, have turned the CCF-NDP from a party advocating a full-blown socialist ideology to a leftist party of moderate reform. See Leo Zakuta, A Protest Movement Becalmed: A Study of Change in the CCF (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1964).

A kind of ideolological convergence seemingly has taken place on the Canadian left. The Liberals, supposedly, under pressure from the CCF-NDP, have moved left while the CCF-NDP, in turn, appears to have moved somewhat to the right. That the Liberal party's drift to the left has not been unopposed, however, is suggested by the recent struggle in the Liberal Cabinet and caucus between the supporters of Messrs. Sharp (the right) and Gordon (the left). In our view, however, the NDP still must be regarded as the party of the left, while the Liberals may be best described as a left-center party.

On the other half of the continuum at least the Western wing of Social Credit has moved from a radical conservative to a traditional conservative position. Still, they are certainly to the right of the Conservatives since the latter party moved somewhat to the left (e.g., they passed legislation

TABLE 1. RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN OCCUPATIONAL STATUS^a AND RIGHT-LEFT PARTY AFFILIATION FOR PARTY ACTIVISTS IN LOS ANGELES AND DETROIT AND CANDIDATES FOR THE BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE NORWEGIAN STORTING

For .	Occupational Status X Right-Left Party Affiliation	For	Occupational Status > Right-Left Party Affiliation
L. A. Party Acti-		British Candidates for
vists Detroit Party	$Gamma^b = .47$	Parliament Norwegian Candidates	Gamma = .62
Activists	Gamma = .53	for Storting	Gamma = .64

^a The data are derived from: Marvick and Nixon, op. cit., p. 205, Table 8, "Men Only"; Eldersveld, op. cit., p. 52, Table 3.1; Ranney, op. cit., p. 204, Table 7.7 and Valen, p. 141, Table 9. For the American and British studies, we dichotomized occupations into "high" and "low" status. The former include business proprietors, corporate executives and professionals such as lawyers. All others are classified as low status. The data on Norwegian occupations are trichotomized into "high" (i.e., business proprietors, professionals), "medium," (i.e., salaried employees, public and private, farmers and fishermen) and "low" (i.e., manual workers). The candidates of the Christian and Center parties are not included since, in our view, these appeared to be more pressure groups than parties.

^b This is a non-parametric statistic proposed by Leo A. Goodman and William H. Kruskal, "Measures of Association for Cross-Classification," Journal of the American Statistical Association, 49 (1954), 732-764.

II. FINDINGS

An overview. As has been indicated, a particularly intriguing aspect of the Eldersveld, Marvick and Nixon, Ranney, and Valen studies is that in all four, the average occupational status levels of parties' recruits vary with party position on an ideological continuum. Thus, all four studies show a rather impressive relationship between occupational status and right-left party postion. (See Table 1).

Our data, however, indicate that over a twenty year period, the Liberals, the party of the left-center, have presented the Canadian public with the most prestigious (as measured by their SES scores) candidates for the House of Commons. They also indicate that over time all parties have managed to recruit candidates of increasingly higher status. Interestingly the SES scores of Social Creditors rose fairly sharply in 1958, the election year in which, because of the unprecedented Conservative victory, they failed to elect a single candidate. An even sharper increase in the SES scores of CCF-NDP candidates occured in 1962, the year after the CCF formally joined with organized labor which increased farm subsidies and extended benefits paid to old-age pensioners) during the tenure of their recently deposed leader, Mr. John Diefenbaker. Thus, the Social Credit still can be regarded as the Canadian party of the right while the Conservatives can be best described as a center-right party.

to become the New Democratic Party. (See Table 2).

In order to make a more direct comparison with Ranney's data, which included only non-incumbent candidates from 1951-64, for the two major Canadian parties, we isolated losing from winning candidates for the period 1949-64. The occupations of Ranney's subjects were then scored by using the Duncan system. Analysis indicated that: unsuccessful Canadian Conservative party candidates had higher status scores than Liberal losers;²³ unsuccessful candidates of the two major Canadian parties on the whole, enjoyed more prestigious occupations than their counterparts in Great Britain. (See Table 3).

In part, this difference in the prestige scores of the candidates for the British and Canadian House of Commons can be explained by the larger proportion of lawyer-candidates in Canada²⁴ and the fact that lawyers receive a very

²³ However, the status of Canadian candidates still did not vary with their right-left ideological positions since the losing right-wing Social Creditors had mean status scores which were considerably lower than both the unsuccessful Conservatives and Liberals.

²⁴ For the period 1945-65, 28.5% of the candidates of the two major Canadian parties were lawyers. In comparison, Ranney found that 15% of the candidates of the Labor and Conservative parties were lawyers (i.e., barristers and solici-

TABLE 2. SOCIO-ECONOMIC STATUS OF CANDIDATES FOR THE CANADIAN HOUSE OF COMMONS 1945-65, BY RIGET-LEFT PARTY AFFILIATION

Election Year		Parties
	Social (Credit*	Conservative		Libe	Liberal		CCF-NDP
	X SES	N =	\overline{X} SES	N =	\overline{X} SES	N =	\overline{X} SES	N =
1945	46.0	57	52.2	115	61.5	142	47.1	113
1949	46.1	48	65.6	146	68.4	154	47.1	104
1953	48.5	42	63.9	156	67.0	165	47.1	103
1957	49.4	76	66.3	163	70.1	165	49.8	99
1958	55.4	55	68.5	165	67.7	165	45.0	103
1962	54.3	152	67.4	165	68.0	164	57.5	133
1963	56.2	143	62.8	165	69.4	165	55.9	144
1965	54.0	112	68.6	165	73.8	165	56.9	159
X SES				`
1945-65	52.6	685	64.9	1240	68.3	1285	51.6	958

^{*} Social Credit includes individuals who ran as Ralliement des Creditistes in 1965.

high ranking (93) on the Duncan scale. The high incidence of lawyers in the legislatures of most Western countries usually has been explained in terms of the congruence between politics and law. In Canada, lawyers also would seem to be attractive candidates since the proportion of a party's winners who are lawyers normally exceeds the proportion of its lawyer-candidates. However, one Canadian scholar tors). Ranney's data support the findings of an earlier study of incumbent British MP's by Barrington and Finer. See H.E. Barrington and S. E. Finer, "The British House of Commons," in Jean Meynaud (ed.), "The Parliamentary Profession," International Social Science Journal, 13 (1961), 601-605.

²⁶ See Kornberg, op. cit., p. 44. Dawson and Ward have estimated that approximately a third of the members of the several Canadian Parliaments have been lawyers. See R. M. Dawson and N. Ward, The Government of Canada, 4th ed. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1964), p. 346. Their estimate is supported by data gen-has gone beyond the congruence-attractiveness thesis and claimed that lawyers serve as a kind of Canadian surrogate for a ruling class.²⁶ erated by Roman R. March in his longitudinal study of the characteristics of Canadian Parliamentarians. See Roman R. March, "An Empirical Test of M. Ostrogorski's Theory of Political Evolution in a British Parliamentary System," (Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Indiana University, 1967).

²⁵ Alexander Brady, "Canada and the Model of Westminister," in William B. Hamilton (ed.), The Transfer of Institutions (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1964), pp. 59-80. Brady argues, "In the absence of anything like the modern British governing class, the legal profession in both the French and English sections of the country is a partial substitute. From the birth of the federation the role of lawyers in the national Parliament has been conspicuously more important than at Westminister." (p. 74)

However, in his intensive analysis of the distribution of power in Canadian society, John Porter

TABLE 3. A COMPARISON OF THE SES SCORES OF NON-INCUMBENT BRITISH CANDIDATES, 1951-64, WITH UNSUCCESSFUL CANADIAN CANDIDATES, 1949-64 (MAJOR PARTIES ONLY).

Period	Great B	ritain	Period	Canada
	Conservative \overline{X} SES	Labor X SES		Conservative \overline{X} SES	Liberal \overline{X} SES
1951–64	63.9 (N = 1311)	55.3 (N = 1431)	1949-64	66.6 $(N = 596)$	63.5 $(N = 499)$

TABLE 4. A	COMPARISON	OF THE	SES SCORES	OF FRENCH	AND CANADIAN PARLIAMENT	TARIANS	FOR THE PE	RIOD 1945-	58.

	Fr	ench Deputies, 1945-5	ĭ8ª
Far Right	Right	Left-Center	Left	Far Left
Poujadist Unclassified	Moderate, Independent Gaullist	MRP & Radical	Socialist	Communist
₹ SES	\overline{X} SES	\overline{X} SES	\overline{X} SES	\overline{X} SES
62.8 (N = 85)	61.2 $(N = 243)$	63.0 (N = 340)	62.6 (N = 198)	38.3 ($N = 246$)
	Co	ınadian MP's, 1945-	58
Far Right	Right	Left-Center	Left	Far Left
Social Credit	Conservative	Liberal	NDP
X SES	X SES	\overline{X} SES	\overline{X} SES
46.4 (N = 29)	66.3 (N = 282)	72.1 (N=415)	45.6 (N = 69)

^a Data are derived from Mattei Dogan, "French Deputies 1870-1958," in Dwaine Marvick (ed.), Political Decision-Makers: Recruitment and Performance (Glencoe: The Fress Press, 1961), p. 67, Table 3.

Another interesting comparison we were able to make with the use of the Duncan scores was between members of the French Chamber of Deputies, 1945–58, and Canadian Members of Parliament for the same period. One is struck by the remarkably similar status, except for the Communist Deputies, ²⁷ of all French parliamentarians, regardless of party. A second inter-claims there is an effective Canadian ruling class—the members of the Canadian corporate elite. They have not (generally) bothered to make their way in national politics but have preferred to govern through the political elite. Most frequently the lawyers in the corporate elite have provided the link between the corporate and political worlds. They are the most likely to have overt political affiliations, to hold elected or appointed public office, and to hold top offices in the national and provincial party organizations. See Porter, op. cit., pp. 296–298.

27 Although, as has been indicated, Valen found that the occupational status of candidates for Parliament varied with the right-left positions of Norwegian parties, he also found by far the largest proportion of low status blue collar workers among Communist candidates.

esting finding is the very substantial difference between the status of French Socialist and Canadian New Democratic MP's. At the other end of the political continuum, the "far right" in France apparently has been able to recruit and to elect candidates of a higher occupational status than has the Canadian Social Credit party. 28 On the other hand, the Canadian "center" parties, particularly, the Liberal, compare very favorably with their French counterparts (See Table 4).

It would appear, then, that in a gross sense, the occupational status of Canadian MP's does not vary with the ideological position of their parties but, rather, with how successful the parties have been in national elections. Thus, the Liberal party, which over a twenty-year period has managed to capture 48% of the seats in the House of Commons, also has recruited ²⁸ It could be argued that a comparison between the French "far right" and the Social Credit party is not a particularly appropriate one. It should be noted, however, that the Poujadist element of the French far right and the Quebec Creditistes were both "protest" movements and drew support from relatively similar social groups within their respective electorates.

Table 5. candidates' mean ses scores by order of finish in national elections $1945-65^{\rm a}$

	Position of Candidates in Electoral Contests
Election Years First Place		Second Place	Third Place	Fourth Place
-	\overline{X} SES $N =$	\overline{X} SES $N =$	\overline{X} SES $N =$	\overline{X} SES $N =$
1945-49	65.6 (300)	56.4 (293)	48.3 (241)	47.1 (45)
1953-57-58	67.6 (495)	64.7 (493)	50.9 (329)	50.6 (140)
1962-63-65	66.8 (495)	65.8 (495)	61.1 (486)	54.3 (356)
All, 1945–65	66.8 (1290)	63.2 (1281)	55.0 (1056)	52.8 (541)

In their present form, these data, from which inferences are drawn as to the relationship between party, candidate status, and order of finish are subject, of course, to the now familiar effects generated by "ecological" correlation.

candidates with the highest SES scores. The Conservative candidates have ranked second to the Liberals, both in status and in terms of the proportion of seats (37%) they have won during that time. Finally, the candidates of the two minor parties, who together over the twenty years have been able to capture only 13% of the House seats, also trailed major party candidates in occupational status by approximately 15 SES points. The best way of illustrating the apparent relationship between the status of a party's recruits and its competitive position would be to show the mean status of all its winning, second, third, and fourth place candidates. Unfortunately, we do not have these data and are confined to merely suggesting the relationship through the table below. Over the years, the two minor parties generally have finished in third or fourth place and the data show that mean status scores vary directly with the order of candidate finish. The dramatic increase in the number of third and fourth place candidates also implies that the electoral activity of the minor parties has grown appreciably in the post-war period (See Table 5).

Urbanism, Candidate Numbers and Candidate Status. A cross-tabulation of the relative urbanism of constituencies by the SES of candidates running for office in them indicates that over a twenty-year period the status of candidates has varied directly with the urban nature of the districts they hope to represent (See Table 6).

Table 6 can be interpreted in two ways. First, the data, in part, may reflect the fact that the Canadian population has become more homogeneous over the years. That is, essentially rural areas have become more urban as people leave farming, move into towns and cities, and take up non-farming occupations. Thus, the largest differences in the status of candidates occurred in the 34–66% urban category, wherein we would expect such a transition to have occurred most rapidly. A second and related interpretation of these data is that urbanindustrialized communities are likely to contain larger proportions of individuals with high

TABLE 6. CANDIDATES' SES SCORES BY THE RELATIVE URBANISM OF CONSTITUENCIES

Election Years			Relative Urb	anism (in %)
	0-	33	34-	-66	67–99
	\overline{X} SES	N =	\overline{X} SES	N =	\overline{X} SES	N =
1945•–49	51.1	(405)	53.5	(171)	66.3	(303)
1952-57-58	54.4	(630)	61.1	(285)	67.6	(542)
1962-63-65	55.5	(716)	64.7	(380)	68.4	(736)
1945-65	54.1	(1751)	62.2	(836)	67.7	(1581)

a It should be noted that the urban measure for the 1945 election is based on 1951 census data.

TABLE 7. MEAN SES OF CANDIDATES BY NUMBER OF CANDIDATES IN A CONTEST

Election Years	2 Can	didate	Races	3	3 Candidate Races			4 Candidate Races
	\overline{X} SES 1	\overline{X} SES 2	N =	SES 1	$ar{X}$ SES	\overline{X} SES	N =	\overline{X} SES 1	$rac{\overline{X}}{ ext{SES}}$	\overline{X} _SES 3	\overline{X} SES 4	N =
1945	73.7	45.5	(24)	60.2	52.2	48.1	(85)	56.7	47.4	38.6	51.4	(30)
1949	68.2	56.0	(28)	70.0	63.2	51.6	(111)	54.5	60.7	44.2	38.5	(15)
1953	76.6	63.3	(59)	66.8	61.1	48.5	(73)	56.1	52.6	50.3	50.6	(32)
1957	76.0	.71.5	(55)	65.8	66.4	50.1	(44)	59.4	63.2	55.5	50.0	(65)
1958	71.5	66.2	(50)	66.9	69.5	48.9	(72)	65.0	63.6	52.7	51.6	(43)
1962	(only 9-	2	62.0	67.9	67.3	(40)	65.4	66.0	60.9	52.2	(122)
1963	cand	lidate r	aces	64.7	59.9	56.1	(33)	65.9	64.6	59.6	55.7	(127)
1965	during	g these	years	73.6	68.3	62.5	(57)	67.7	65.9	61.6	55.1	(107)
1945-65	73.9	63.5	(225)	66.6	63.1	52.9	(515)	63.9	63.2	57.1	52.8	(541)

status occupations than are found in rural areas. Since there is a larger pool of high status people from which the parties may draw, we find a positive relationship between relative urbanism and mean candidate status.

Given this relationship, we would expect that candidates for the House of Commons from Ontario constituencies would be a more prestigious group than candidates from other provinces, because Ontario always has been the most urbanized and industrialized province in Canada. This is not the case, however. The data show that Quebec rather than Ontario candidates have the highest average prestige scores. This was true for both winning (75.2 vs. 69.4) and non-winning candidates (63.8 vs. 58.1). We interpret these data as supporting the claim by John Porter regarding the elitist character of Quebec society; a rigid system of social stratification reinforced by an archaic "classical" educational system has had the effect of limiting the political participation of non-elite groups largely to voting. High public and party office positions have been virtually monopolized by a small socio-economic elite who periodically have employed the supposed threat to existing cultural arrangements both to justify and to maintain their dominant position in Quebec society.29

²⁹ See Porter, op. cit., pp. 91-96. See, also, J.A.A. Lovink, "The Politics of Quebec: Provincial Political Parties, 1897-1936," (Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Duke University, 1967). The Creditiste successes in Quebec, particularly in 1962, have been interpreted as a protest against the traditional elite domination of both the Liberal and Conservative parties. See, for example, Hubert Guindon, "Social Unrest,

A more difficult relationship to explain, in the sense that it is not as consistent as that between urbanism and candidate status, is the association between the number of candidates contesting a district and their mean occupational status. Table 7 shows that at certain time periods an increase in the number of candidates contesting a seat was associated with lower SES scores, not only for the third and fourth finishers, but also, for the first and second. An immediate interpretation that is suggested is high status candidates are reluctant to contest districts in which, because there are likely to be more than two candidates in the race, the outcome may be less certain. The problem with such an interpretation is that in the elections of the sixties, the relationship between status and candidate numbers, generally, is attenuated or reversed. We have suggested another interpretation in the multivariate portion of the analy-

To recapitulate, we scored the occupations of over 4000 candidates for the Canadian House of Commons during a twenty year period. The scores take into account the income, education and prestige ascribed to the occupations of individuals and provide a single convenient measure of their occupational socio-economic status. By similarly scoring the occupations of non-incumbent candidates for the British House of Commons, 1951–64, and members of the French Chamber of Deputies, 1945–58, we found that the SES scores of candidates recruited by the two major Canadian parties were even higher than the scores of the candidates of British and French parties with whom they were compared. With respect to the hypotheses we were testing, examination of the relevant data indicated that the mean status of candidates recruited by the four Canadian parties seemingly did not vary with party position on a right-left ideological continuum. One can speculate that this finding simply reflects a lack of class-based politics in Canada. Both Robert Alford and John Porter have noted the ability of Canadian parties to transform economic and class cleavages into ethnic-religious ones. The result, according to Alford, is that there is less class voting in Canada than in Britain, Australia, or even the U.S.³⁰ This situation may be changing, however.³¹

Social Class and Quebec's Bureaucratic Revolution," Queen's Quarterly, 71 (1964), 150-162.

There was a relationship between the status of a party's candidates and its competitive position vis a vis the other parties. In a gross sense this was illustrated by the fact that over the years the most successful Canadian party, the Liberal, has managed to recruit the most prestigious candidates for Parliament. The candidates of the second major party, the Conservative, have ranked somewhat behind the Liberals in terms of status, but still have been drawn from higher strata than have the candidates of the two minor parties, the Social Credit and the New Democratic. Over the years, the latter two parties have enjoyed approximately the same amount of electoral support and have recruited candidates with virtually the same status.

Finally, the data also have shown that the relative urbanism of the several constituencies and, to a lesser extent, the number of candidates in a particular contest, were associated with differences in the mean SES scores of candidates.

III. AN INTER-ELECTION MODEL

Our next task is to suggest how these variables (other than the right-left ideological positions of the parties) are associated in the recruitment process. To accomplish this we focus ³⁰ See Robert R. Alford, op. cit., pp. 250-286.

³¹ A 1965 survey of four metropolitan areas showed that people voting Conservative tend to follow religious lines, whereas NDP voters follow class lines. Liberal voters appear to be crosspressured, with some following class and others religious lines. Further, religious affiliation would seem to be a more important determinant of voting preference among working class than among middle class voters. See Wallace Gagne and Peter Regenstreif, "Some Aspects of New Democratic Party Urban Support in 1965," Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, 23 (1967), 529–550.

on inter-election relationships in a pair of elections in which one election directly follows another. Within the pair of elections we conceive of a rough causal ordering of variables. At the beginning of the recruitment process for the second election, we assume the values of the variables for the first election are known and uninfluenced by subsequent events. Further, we assume the urbanism of a constituency is established by forces outside of or too ponderous to be influenced by the election-to-election recruitment process. We further assume that the outcome of the recruitment process for the second election is represented by three variables: the mean status of candidates in a district; the status difference of candidates in a district; and the number of candidates standing in a district. Because decisions and successes in the recruitment process are thought to be dependent on prior decisions and successes, we assume the value of these outcome variables are, in part, a function of variables pertaining to the prior election. Finally, we assume that the degree of inter-party competition in the second election is that which the recruitment process aims to affect. Consequently, we hold this variable to be subsequent to both the events of the first election and to the recruitment process for the second. Within a pair of elections, then, we assume a causal ordering as in Figure 3.

To begin the construction of such a model, we assume each of the outcome variables may be predicted from a linear function of the initial variable. The parameter of such a linear function may be estimated by the usual least squares technique. We then assume the competitiveness of the outcome of the second election is a linear function of both the initial variables and the outcome variables from the recruitment process.

Although candidate recruitment in each of the several constituencies is intended to influence the outcome of a particular electoral contest, the process also may be affected by the total environment in which the election takesplace; local affairs are rarely insulated fromnational affairs. For example, in an election in which the national outcome is considered certain, candidate recruitment in some constituencies may take on an aspect of experimentation or of providing campaign experience for highly regarded prospects. In such an election the aim of recruitment may be less that of immediate success and more one of long-run party maintenance. Conversely, in a tense election with a doubtful national outcome, the possibility of immediate electoral success may lead the parties to be cautious and conservative in their recruitment practices. Because of the potential sensitiveness of the recruitment process at the local level to the national political milieu, we have chosen to investigate our model in two pairs of elections; one a safe sustaining pair, the other, two see-saw contests.

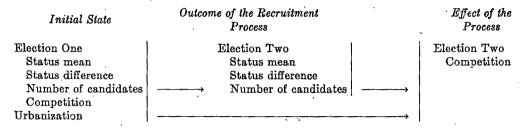

FIG. 3. CAUSAL ORDERING OF VARIABLES IN AN INTER-ELECTION MODEL.

The Elections of 1949-53 and 1962-63. In 1949 the Liberal party won a smashing victory at the polls. Although it captured only 49% of the popular vote, it obtained 74% of the seats in the House of Commons, to maintain what, apparently, was an endless hegemony. In 1953, the distribution of the vote was such that, although the Liberal party again captured 49% of the vote, its proportion of seats declined to 64%. The latter election still may be seen as one which comfortably sustained a dominant party in office.

The environment in which the 1962-63 elections took place was drastically different. The Social Credit party, which had lost every member of its parliamentary group on the Conservative landslide of 1958, won thirty seats in 1962 and promised to do even better in 1963. A resurgent New Democratic Party, which by 1962 had come under the dynamic leadership of Mr. T.C. Douglas, posed a threat not only to the Liberals in the urban areas which had long sustained that party, but also to the Conservatives in the rural constituencies of the West. Although most "responsible" public opinion leaders, including some in his own party, were deeply disturbed by Conservative party leader John Diefenbaker's thinly veiled anti-Americanism, it was apparent from public response to his efforts that he had seized upon an emotional issue which well might return him to office. The Liberals, on the other hand, were hopeful that the continued internecine warfare in the Conservative party and the (supposedly) related loss of public confidence in the Conservative party would be sufficient to bring them back into office after six years in opposition. The 1963 election, then, was a tense contest with a doubtful outcome. The differential impact on candidate recruitment of a safe sustaining pair of elections and two see-saw contests is vividly illustrated in these two pairs of elections.

Let us, then, consider the relationship between outcome variables and initial-state variables. Table 8 presents values of the standardized regression coefficient (B) for each equation in each election. The table also presents standard errors of the coefficients as well as the multiple correlation for the equation. Thus, the first two rows of this table present values for the equations to predict mean status of candi-

TABLE 8. PARAMETERS FOR THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN INITIAL STATE VARIABLES AND VARIABLES WHICH ARE OUTCOMES OF THE RECRUITMENT PROCESS.

Dependent Variable and Elections	Independent Variables
	$ar{X}$ SES 1		Δ SES 1		CAND 1		Comp 1		Urb. 2		Multiple
	В	SE B	В	SE B	В	SE B	В	SÉ B	В	· SE B	R
Ā SES 2										7	· · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·
1949-53	.454	.073	.221	.071	075	.069	120	.071	.058	.075	.598
1962-63	.588	.064	. 185	.059	039	.067	001	.056	.186	.070	.726
SES 2									,
1949-53	.305	.084	.233	.082	.085	.079	033	.082	101	.087	.384
1962-63	.174	.081	.459	.074	173	.084	054	.070	.011	.088	.496
CAND 2
1949-53	263	.074	070	.073	.211	.070	.317	.072	.280	.077	615
1962-63	030	.081	.094	.074	.319	.085	.246	.071	.108	.089	.495

dates in the second of each pair of elections. In both pairs of elections the multiple correlation coefficient is respectably high, with the association being greater for the 1962-63 electionsperhaps because of the shorter interval in that pair of elections. One would expect fewer unmeasured inter-election circumstances to develop that would diminish the association between prior and present variables. Thus, the higher multiple correlation for the 1962-63 pair of elections is as expected. This interpretation is strengthened by noting that the Beta value for mean status in Time one is considerably higher in the 1962-63 pair of elections than in the 1949-53 elections. Thus, the inter-election persistence of the mean status of candidates is higher in 1962-63 than in 1949-53. Although the shorter interim seems the most likely explanation of this greater persistence, it may be that its strength also is enhanced by the uncertain outcome of the 1963 election. A conservative approach to the recruitment process might lead the party organizations to offer as candidates in the second election many of the same individuals as were candidates in the first, on the assumption that their past experience would have made them more visible and "electable." The higher Beta for urbanization in the 1962-63 pair of elections appears to be an election-specific effect. The previously mentioned resurgence of the New Democratic Party in urban areas and their ability, since 1962, to recruit higher status candidates (see Table 2) may have led one or more of the other parties in such areas to try to increase their competitive positions by also recruiting higher status candidates, thus raising the mean in urban constituencies.

A greater opportunity for experimentation in the 1949-53 interval is suggested by the somewhat higher Beta values for Time one competition and status differences among candidates. Thus, in the 1949-53 interval, greater Time one competition tended to diminish Time two mean status while greater status differences among candidates in Time one tended to increase mean status in Time two.

Our interpretation of these data is that in 1953 the minor parties tended to enter candidates in constituencies that were competitive in 1949 and tried to avoid entering candidates in constituencies in which the outcome appeared certain to go against them. Such minor party candidates were likely to be individuals of lower status than the candidates of the major parties. Hence, in such constituencies the average status of candidates would be lower in 1953.

On the other hand, the major parties might be encouraged to enter very high status individuals in 1953 in constituencies where, in the last election, there was an obvious status difference among candidates, so as to take greater advantage of this difference. This also would increase the mean. A second and related interpretation is that in 1949, the minor parties probably were reluctant to contest constituencies in which the major parties' candidates were prestigious people, but, if they did, there was likely to be a "status gap" between their candidates and those of the major parties. If these minor party candidates ran poorly in 1949, they, or their constituency parties, may have been unwilling to try again in 1953, thereby reducing the status gap and raising the average status.

We already have pointed out that the outcome of the 1953 election was never in doubt and that this probably encouraged some experimentation with respect to recruitment. We can speculate that parties that had done poorly in certain constituencies had nothing to lose and considerable to gain by: dropping their chronic losing candidates in favor of new and (hopefully) more successful ones; allocating their resources parsimoniously by not contesting districts that appeared hopeless.³²

A dominant national party such as the Liberals also would be likely to feel fewer constraints in this environment. Since it had done well in the past and promised to do even better nationally in 1953, it may have contested constituencies in which it had not entered candidates previously on the assumption that now it might very well be successful.³³ Alternatively, the Liberals may have wished to test the mettle of new but promising recruits in these constituencies. If they did reasonably well, they would have established their claim to serious consideration as future candidates in more congenial districts (to the party) either at the national or provincial level.³⁴

³² In fact, the CCF-NDP entered one candidate less in 1953 than it had in 1949, while the Social Credit party contested six fewer sample constituencies in 1953.

³³ In 1953, the Liberals increased the number of their 1949 candidates by 11. The Conservatives increased their 1949 total of candidates by 10 in ▶ 1953.

³⁴ That this strategy is likely to be employed by parties is suggested by Ranney's study of the recruitment of British MP's. Ranney arrayed British constituencies along a "Winability" continuum and found that previous electoral experience was significantly related to the desirability of the constituencies in which non-incumbents stood. Austin Ranney, op. cit., p. 94. Further, Lec Snowiss reports that in the suburban townships in

Even if they had no real hope of improving their competitive positions, the Liberals and, particularly, the Conservatives, probably had to try to recruit prestigious individuals to contest non-competitive districts in 1953 simply because they felt their images and competitive positions as national parties would suffer if they did not "show the flag" in most constituencies. Although they may have been disadvantaged in these areas, they probably possessed the resources at other levels of government necessary to induce high status, politically ambitious young men to contest apparently hopeless seats.³⁵

Moving to the second panel of Table 8 we note that status difference is not as well predicted in the 1949-53 elections as it is in the 1962-63 pair. The appreciably higher Beta value for ΔSES₁ in the 1962-63 pair of elections is consonant with our interpretation of greater persistence in a shorter time period while the higher positive Beta for \overline{X} SES₁ and Δ SES₂ in 1949-53 strengthens our belief that the 1953 election afforded the parties an opportunity to experiment in their candidate recruitment. As was suggested above, the major parties (especially the Liberals since they appeared to be certain winners) were able to recruit high status people, even in constituencies in which previously they had not done well. This would have had the effect of increasing status differences in 1953. On the other hand, in 1963 they may have had greater difficulty inducing high status candidates to enter contests since the election outcome was uncertain and status less indicative of an opponent's potential strength. Consequently, the 1962-63 correlation is lower.

An election-specific event, the resurgence of the minor parties in the sixties and their ability to recruit higher status candidates, seemingly which there was no prospect of winning, the Chicago Democratic organization recruited Congressional candidates from among ambitious young lawyers seeking to establish themselves politically and professionally. Here they might be groomed for future more important (i.e., local) public office. See Snowiss, op. cit., pp. 633-635.

as Canadian party organizations have considerable patronage at their disposal if they hold executive office at either the national or provincial mevels. Lawyers, in particular, are likely to benefit by being given substantial legal work by national and/or provincial Administrations. In Chicago, Snowiss reports that the considerable patronage available to the Democratic machine undoubtedly enabled them to recruit candidates and workers in areas in which the party was weak. See Snowiss, bid., pp. 627-639.

is reflected in the fairly high and negative Beta for $CAND_1$ and ΔSES_2 in 1962–63. The negative Beta tells us that increasing the number of candidates in 1962 tended to decrease status differences in 1963. As Table 2 indicates, the Social Credit party ran 97 more candidates and the New Democratic Party 30 more candidates in 1962. These candidates generally were of higher status than these parties heretofore had recruited and, assuming that a substantial number were again candidates in 1963, their addition decreased status differences in 1963.

Moving to the third panel of this table, we find that the number of candidates is better predicted for the 1949-53 elections than for the 1962-63 elections. On the other hand, we find a higher Beta for the number of candidates in Time one in the latter (1962-63) elections, suggesting (as we have argued) that persistence is stronger in a shorter interim. The magnitude of this Beta for 1962-63, however, is somewhat smaller than we would have expected. This fact, plus the lower multiple correlation for these elections again leads us to the interpretation that, in a tight election in which a resurgence of minor party strength is possible, the variables from the immediately past election may be less important in determining the entry of a candidate than are time-sepcific variables unmeasured in our model.

In the 1949–53 elections we find a moderately high Beta for competition in Time one and a somewhat lower but still significant one in 1962-63. Thus, in both 1953 and 1963 there was a greater tendency for parties, particularly the minor ones, to enter candidates in previously competitive districts, although the tendency was less pronounced in 1963. These data also are consistent with out previous finding that increased competition in 1949 depressed average status in 1953 because it encouraged the entry of minor party candidates in certain constituencies. Urbanization is positively related to number of candidates in both elections, with the lower value being in the 1962-63 elections. The latter appears to be yet another electionspecific finding that reflects the increased activity of the Social Credit party in rural areas of Quebec together with the increase in 1963 of opposition to the Conservatives in the rural constituencies of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. Mean status of candidates in Time one is negatively related to the number of candidates in the 1949-53 elections, indicating, as was previously suggested, an unwillingness or inability to recruit new candidates to face competition from high status veteran candidates. That this effect is not apparent in the 1963 election suggests that in such a tense election status may be a less important indicator of a candidate's strength.

Finally, let us turn to the relationship between competition in the second election and the prior variables. Parameters for these relationships are presented in Table 9. For both pairs of elections, the multiple correlation coefficient is fairly high with the value for the 1962-63 elections being somewhat greater. For both pairs of elections, the Beta for competition in Time one is also quite high—again being greater for the 1962-63 pair of elections. Scanning the remaining Beta values for the 1962-63 elections, we find relatively high values for only two independent variables—the number of candidates in Time one and the number in Time two. Candidates in Time one have a positive Beta of .268 and candidates in Time two have a value of -.266. What do these two values, taken together, tell us about the effect of the number of candidates and the change in the number on competition?

TABLE 9. PARAMETERS FOR THE REGRESSION OF COMPETITION IN THE SECOND ELECTION ON PRIOR VARIABLES.

	1949–53		1962-	1962–63
_	В	SE B	В	SE B
Δ SES 1	137	.075	+.084	.071
Δ SES 2	+.055	.072	043	.067
$\bar{\mathbf{X}}$ SES 1	171	.082	+.057	.083
$\bar{\mathbf{X}}$ SES 2	+.098	.086	+.011	.084
Cand 1	+.137	.070	+.268	.063
Cand 2	259	.079	266	.062
Comp 1	+.604	.075	+.739	.057
Multiple R	.609		.744

The positive value in Time one suggests that, given the Time two number of candidates, the Time one number is positively related to competition. The negative value for Time two says that, given the Time one number of candidates, the Time two number is negatively related to competition. Taken together, they say that a change in the number of candidates is negatively related to competition. That is, an increase in candidates tends to decrease competition in Time two over the value expected from the level of Time one competition. Such a finding is, of course, quite reasonable, Added candidates are not likely to do well and, hence, they reduce competition (as we have measured it) in the district.

In the 1949-53 elections the Beta value for Time one candidates is lower while the value for Time two candidates is approximately the same as in 1962-63. However, in both pairs of elections the direction of the relationships is the same, indicating that in both instances added candidates did not fare too well.

Finally, for the 1949-53 elections, the mean status of candidates in Time one has a reasonably high and negative Beta value. The Beta value for mean status in Time two is positive and although it is not statistically significant, both correlations taken together at least suggest that in certain districts an increase in the status of candidates in 1953 over what it was in 1949 also led to increased competition therein. The fact that the equivalent correlations are neither significant nor in the same direction in the 1962-63 elections again strengthens our belief that in a tense election in which the national outcome is doubtful, increasing the status of candidates in a district over what it previously was may not produce the desired effect—an increase in partisan competition.

IV. CONCLUSION

In the construction of our inter-election model we have identified a plausible-seeming causal order among the variables available to us and we have investigated the partial relationships of prior with succeeding variables in the model.

We have conceived of the candidate recruitment process as a "black box." Initial-state variables are the input to this black box and our output variables—the mean status of candidates, the number of candidates, and their status difference—are the result of the process. Underlying the model is the assumption that the aim of the process is to select output variables that maximize Time twocompetition in the several constituencies. Given the format of our data, it has been reasonable to use legislative districts as observational units rather than parties within districts. Thus, the logic of the situation which flowed from the format of our data led us to assume anaggregate variable—that is, one at the district level—was the one to be maximized. Such a point of view is useful because, in fact, we might suppose that one party's choice of a candidate is not independent of another's choice. Thus, we are forced to assume that within our black box, a system is in operation in which there is reciprocal interaction. In a future analysis, this reciprocal interaction maybe better investigated by focusing separately on variables for each party's candidate choice within each district.

In the present paper, we also have asserted that differential deviation from the competition-maximizing function of recruitment within the several constituencies can be attributed in great part to the impact of the total electoral environment on recruitment within districts. Thus, we investigated our model in two pairs of elections; one, a sustaining pair in which the second electoral outcome was considered known; the other, a pair in which the second outcome was very doubtful. We further stated that in the former, the object of candidate recruitment in many instances may well be party-maintenance, while in the latter, the outcome of recruitment is intended to be immediate electoral success. However, a complicating factor was the difference in the interelection time gap for each pair of elections we employed. Thus, future investigations will require more analyses of elections with somewhat similar aim-effects but with different time gaps. Assuming, also, that a critical election-specific aim-effect is party maintenance, then, the analysis of a series of more than two elections could be attempted so that decisions whose aims transcend the immediate election might demonstrate their effect.

Again, further attention to measurement of inter-party competition and status difference appears necessary. In other than a multi-party system, for example, Gini measures may not be particularly appropriate.

Finally, it seems likely that we will have to go beyond multiple regression analysis to satisfactorily decompose the recruitment process. Although it is both valuable and important to delineate "net" associations between variables such as, for example, candidate status and inter-party competition, we have seen that this association obviously is mediated by the number of candidates in a contest. Our decomposition of "intervening" variables in this paper largely has been intuitive. The use of a linear causal model of the Simon-Blalock³⁶ or path analysis37 type would appear to be particularly useful in the decomposition of the variables involved in recruitment. Although the problem involved in designing such a model would certainly be complex, the probability of generating some theoretical notions, if not a theory of recruitment, would make the game well worth the candle.

³⁶ For an explication of their technique see Herbert A. Simon, Models of Man (New York: John Wiley and Sons, Inc., 1957), chapters I-III; and Hubert M. Blalock, Jr., Causal Influences in Non-experimental Research (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1964), chapters I-III.

³⁷ Social scientists were introduced to path analysis by geneticist Sewell Wright in a series of articles dating from the 1920's. See, for example, Sewell Wright, "Correlation and Causation," Journal of Agricultural Research, 20 (1921), 557-585; "The Method of Path Coefficients," Annals of Mathematical Statistics, 5 (1934), 161-215; and "Path Coefficients and Path Regressions: Alternative or Complementary Concepts?" Biometrics, 16 (1960), 189-202.

A NOTE OF CAUTION IN CAUSAL MODELLING

Hugh Donald Forbes
Yale University

AND

EDWARD R. TUFTE Princeton University

Many empirical investigations in the behavioral sciences today aim at tracing the causes of variations in some key dependent variable. The search for satisfying causal explanations is difficult because of the complexity of social phenomena, the crudeness of the measures of many important variables, and the prevalence of simultaneous cause and effect relations among variables. Although these difficulties remain, a number of important methodological contributions have clarified the conditions under which causal inferences can be made from non-experimental data. In particular the Simon-Blalock technique has recently gained considerable attention, and has been profitably used by a number of political scientists in their research.2 Examination of some of these applications does, however, reveal the need for a better understanding of the purposes and limitations of the technique.

¹ See Herbert A. Simon, "Causal Ordering and Identifiability," and "Spurious Correlation: A Causal Interpretation," reprinted in Models of Man (New York: Wiley, 1957), chs. 1–2; and Paul F. Lazarsfeld, "Evidence and Inference in Social Research," Daedalus, 87 (Fall, 1958), 99–130. Blalock's work is reported in Hubert M. Blalock, Jr., Causal Inferences in Nonexperimental Research (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1964).

² Political science applications of causal modelling approaches include Warren E. Miller and Donald E. Stokes, "Constituency Influence in Congress," this Review, 57 (March, 1963), 45-56; Hayward R. Alker, Jr., "Causal Inferences and Political Analysis," in Joseph Bernd (ed.), Mathematical Applications in Political Science (Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1966); and Arthur S. Goldberg, "Discerning a Causal Pattern Among Data on Voting Behavior," this REVIEW, 60 (December, 1966), 913-922. Causal modelling ideas have also been used to clarify the study of power; for example, Herbert A. Simon, "Notes on the Observation and Measurement of Political Power," op. cit., ch. 4; and Robert A. Dahl, "Power," International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences (Macmillan, 1968), vol. 12, pp. 405-415.

This paper reviews two studies: (1) the reanalysis of the Miller-Stokes data by Chudde and McCrone,3 and (2) the analysis of the determinants of Negro political participation in the South by Matthews and Prothro.4 We shall argue that both these applications have two faults: (1) a failure to distinguish conclusions from assumptions, and (2) an inadequate correspondence between the assumptions made in constructing the mathematical models and our prior knowledge about the phenomena being studied. In addition, we shall use the first study to illustrate a principle of general importance in causal analysis: the investigator should check the possibility that different causal mechanisms occur in different subgroups of his data. And we shall use the second study to illustrate the difficulty of separating the effects of two highly correlated independent variables.

The purpose of these criticisms is not to suggest that causal modelling is an inherently misleading technique. On the contrary, this note should be seen as a defense of the technique against some of its proponents. Causal modelling formalizes and extends the common practice of social scientists in much of their work. Potentially, by making the logic of causal inference clearer and by introducing more powerful procedures, causal modelling can lead to great improvements in data analysis. Misguided applications of the technique, however, not only lend a spurious air of ³ Charles F. Cnudde and Donald J. McCrone, "The Linkage Between Constituency Attitudes and Congressional Voting Behavior: A Causal Model," this Review, 60 (March, 1966), 66-72. More recently the same authors have published an analysis of the causes of democratic political development that suffers from the same faults as their earlier paper. See Donald J. McCrone and Charles F. Cnudde, "Toward a Communications Theory of Democratic Political Development: A Causal Model," this Review, 61 (March, 1967), 72-79.

⁴ Donald R. Matthews and James W. Prothro, Negroes and the New Southern Politics (New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1966), ch. 11. certainty to false conclusions; such misapplications can also lead to an unwarranted distrust of the methods which seem to have produced the conclusions.

I. ASSUMPTIONS AND CONCLUSIONS

In any kind of statistical analysis, conclusions about the nature of the world are the result of both the investigator's data and his prior assumptions. A change in assumptions in data analysis may lead to a change in conclusions. For example, a given collection of data may be used to estimate the parameters of many different causal models-models that incorporate different assumptions about the nature of the causal mechanisms that produced the data. The Simon-Blalock technique uses correlation and regression coefficients to test hypotheses about the presence or absence of particular causal links in a given hierarchical model. (Hierarchical models are those in which it is assumed that there is only one-way causation within the whole set of variables being analyzed; simultaneous cause and effect relationships are assumed not to exist, as are feedback loops around several variables.5) The structure of the hierarchical model-including the direction of all possible causal links between variables-must be decided before a test of the existence or nonexistence of any particular link is possible. Given a fair number of variables, a great many different initial assumptions are logically possible, and a large number may often be equally plausible. To choose any one of these possible hierarchical orderings is, in effect, to decide the directions of causal impact among all of the variables. If several initial assumptions about the ordering of the variables are equally plausible, then the Simon-Blalock technique provides no means for deciding between them. Both the applica-

⁵ These models are called "hierarchical" because they assume that all the variables in the analysis can be ordered a priori in a hierarchy of causes and effects. Variables in a model are said to form a causal hierarchy if they can be ranked so that those "higher" in the ranking appear in the equations of the model only as causes, and never as effects, of those variables which are "lower" in the ranking.

6 Moreover it is not true, in general, that we can "infer the most likely [model]" if we "resort to the use of regression coefficients": Cnudde and McCrone, op. cit., p. 68. A given set of data may be used to estimate the parameters of many different models. The basic logic of model building and testing is especially clearly set out in Stefan Valavanis, Econometrics: An Introduction to tions of causal modelling examined in this paper ignore this important fact.

In their reanalysis of the Miller-Stokes data Cnudde and McCrone fit a hierarchical causal model to a pattern of six correlations and then make a number of inferences about the relationship between Congressmen and their constituents. Their most important conclusions. seemingly disconfirming the results of other research on Congressmen, are (for civil rights issues): "1. The lack of a direct link between Congressmen's attitudes and district attitudes indicates that elite recruitment is not the basis for constituency control. 2. Unlike the private citizen, the Congressmen does not distort his perceptions to coincide with his own attitudes. Because the costs of misperceiving are so high for an elected official, his perceptions are likely to cause him to modify his attitudes to fit his reasonably accurate perceptions.7"

Maximum Likelihood Methods (New York: Mc-Graw-Hill, 1959), ch. 1.

7 Ibid., pp. 71-72. Compare the second proposition with Lewis Anthony Dexter's description of the representative: "A congressman's conception of his district confirms itself, to a considerable extent, and may constitute a sort of selffulfilling prophecy.... A congressman hears most often from those who agree with him. . . . Some men automatically interpret what they hear to support their own viewpoints." See "The Representative and His District," in Robert L. Peabody and Nelson W. Polsby (eds.), New Perspectives on the House of Representatives (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1963), pp. 9f. See also Raymond A. Bauer, Ithiel de Sola Pool, and Lewis Anthony Dexter, American Business and Public Policy (New York: Atherton, 1963), part V. Donald R. Matthews makes the same point with reference to Senators: "Without the most stubborn and conscientious efforts, a senator is almost certain to see and talk mostly with friends and supporters on such a trip [to his constituency]. Since both categories are likely to be in general agreement with him, the image of constituency opinion he brings back to Washington is usually distorted in favor of his own views": Donald R. Matthews, U.S. Senators and Their World (New York: Vintage Books, 1960), p. 229.

The first proposition seems inconsistent with the frequent emphasis on the "localism" of Congressmen; see Samuel P. Huntington, "Congressional Responses to the Twentieth Century," in David B. Truman (ed.), The Congress and America's Future (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1965), pp. 5-31, especially Table II, p. 13; also David B. Truman, "Federalism and the Party System," in Arthur W. Macmahon (ed.), a Data are Miller-Stokes correlations reported in Chudde and McCrone, op. cit., p. 67.

Fig. 1. Intercorrelations of variables pertaining to civil rights—whole district.9

Their report suggests that these conclusions are empirical findings in the ordinary sense: the Miller-Stokes data imply these conclusions and no others (they are said to "emerge" from the analysis of the data). Using the Simon-Blalock technique, however, the second conclusion-about the direction of causation between Congressmen's attitudes and their perceptions of district opinion—can never be more than a (perhaps justified) prior assumption. The first conclusion—about the existence of a causal link between constituency attitudes and Congressmen's attitudes—is contingent upon the assumption that they present as their second conclusion; change the assumption and the opposite conclusion results. In neither case do their manipulations of correlation coefficients constitute empirical tests of their conclusions.

To illustrate this argument, we shall examine three causal models connecting district attitudes with Congressmen's roll call votes. All three models fit the pattern of correlations. Moreover all three models satisfy two additional restrictions: they treat district attitudes as purely an independent variable and they do not require any direct link between district attitudes and roll call votes.

Figure 1 shows the basic pattern of correlations used in this analysis.

Figure 2 shows three different causal models linking district opinion and the votes of Congressmen. Cnudde and McCrone have shown that Model 2(a) fits the data. Model 2(b) also fits: the addition of the link between district opinion and Congressmen's attitudes generates no new prediction equations that distinguish model 2(b) from 2(a). And model 2(c) also fits as Table 1 shows.

Federalism: Mature and Emergent (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1955), pp. 115-136. Even though restricted to the civil rights issue area (in 1958), Cnudde and McCrone's findings, if valid, would be of considerable substantive importance in view of the above literature.

How do we choose between these three different models, each of which suggests a different conclusion about the relationship between attitudes and perceptions? It should be apparent that the choice between them must rest (in the absence of additional data) on the investigator's hunch (or assumption) about what causal mechanisms are likely to exist in the real world. The only other imaginable basis for choice is the criterion of parsimony: the fewer the links (or causal paths) in a model, the better. Model 2(a), suggesting that perceptions cause attitudes, might be accepted over 2(b) (which suggests the opposite) since the former contains one less causal link.8 But if we were to take parsimony seriously, then Model 2(c) would seem most acceptable: it has the minimum number of links possible between four variables. Thus this criterion of parsimony leads to the surprising conclusion that there is a correspondence between Congressmen's own attitudes and their perceptions of their district's attitudes only because of their participation in roll call voting. One need not accept this conclusion;

⁸ This seems to be the approach of Cnudde and McCrone; see the reasoning leading to their model III (p. 69) and the comment about parsimony (p. 72).

⁹ Model 2(c) is actually somewhat plausible; it implies that the representative's perceptions of the criterion of parsimony that leads to it is really irrelevant. There is no reason to believe that parsimony in this sense (a relatively small number of unidirectional causal linkages) is a distinguishing characteristic of valid models of social phenomena.

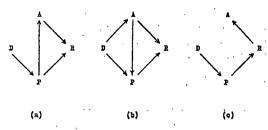

Fig. 2. Three causal models that fit the intercorrelations of variables pertaining to civil rights.

In this case, then, the choice between the three models is, in itself, a decision about the relationship between the attitudes, perceptions, and votes of Congressmen; it is a decision that is logically prior to looking at the data, and one for which the prescription of parsimony provides no guidance. Similarly it is clear that the first proposition (which suggests that elite recruitment is not relevant to district control of Congressmen) rests on the postulated relationship between attitudes and perceptions. Neither of the assertions made by Cnudde and McCrone are "findings." 11 constituent attitudes have an impact only when mediated by voting in accordance with district opinion, that is, playing the role of agent of the constituency.

¹⁰ In addition, the absence of a direct link between district opinion and Congressmen's attitudes in a single issue area would not seem to be an adequate basis for inferences about "elite recruitment."

11 The three models just discussed are hierarchical models; they force the investigator to decide at the outset, for example, whether attitudes cause perceptions or the other way around. Yet both these alternatives seem excessively strong in the light of research revealing the significant interaction between attitudes and perceptions. Miller and Stokes (op. cit., p. 51) observe: "Out of respect for the processes by which the human actor achieves cognitive congruence we have also drawn arrows between the two intervening factors, since the Congressman probably tends to see his district as having the same opinion as his own and also tends, over time, to bring his own opinion into line with the district's." Lacking adequate theory to justify temporal or psychological

TABLE 1. PREDICTION EQUATIONS AND DEGREE OF FIT FOR MODEL 2(C) OF CONSTITUENCY INFLUENCE^a

Prediction Equations	Predicted	Actual	Differ- ence
rdprprtra = tda	(.738) (.823) (.721)	= .438 .498	.060
rdprpr =rdr	(.738)(.823) = .607	649	.042
rprira = ipa	(.823) (.721) = .493	.543	.050

^a Data are Miller-Stokes correlations reported in Cnudde and McCrone, op. cit., p. 67.

. II. INTERACTION EFFECTS

Applying a single causal model to all the data that an investigator has collected is not always the best way of revealing the structure of the data. To fit a single causal model to a collection of data means, in effect, to assume that the data have been generated by an underlying causal mechanism that is roughly the same for all the units being studied. The structure of the mechanism is represented by the mathematical model, and the data are used to estimate its parameters. But different units can have different causal processes. ¹² In any case, the validity of the mechanism hypothesized for all units in the population is not established by using all the data at once priority of one variable over another, one will be unable to select between a number of hierarchical models that fit the data.

The assumptions made in a reciprocal model, in contrast to a hierarchical model, allow some variables to be both the cause and effect of each other. Such a model would, in theory at least, help disentangle attitudes and perceptions. Estimation of links in such models is a difficult empirical matter, however. On the problems and requirements in estimating the parameters of reciprocal models, see Valavanis, op. cit., chs. 4 and 6; and J. Johnston, Econometric Methods (New York: McGraw Hill, 1963), ch. 9.

¹² Alker has drawn attention to the importance of this point in inter-nation comparisons. See Hayward R. Alker, Jr., "Regionalism Versus Universalism in Comparing Nations," in Bruce Russett et al., World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964), pp. 322–340; and also Hubert M. Blalock, Jr., "Theory Building and the Statistical Concept of Interaction," American Sociological Review, 30 (June, 1965), 374–330. In many cases it may be useful to transform the variables to eliminate nonadditive effects. See Joseph B. Kruskal, "Transformations of Data," International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences (Macmillan, 1968), vol. 16, pp. 182–193.

for a single estimation. Rather the general validity of the model is established by showing that the hypothesized set of relationships holds for various relevant subgroups within the population. This is the familiar notion of controlling for a variable applied to causal modelling; a model ought to be tested within different subgroups of the sample. This method may, indeed, yield interesting results even if a single causal model is inappropriate, since it may be possible to show that different causal processes are operating in different parts of the population. The importance of examining subgroups of the data to establish the wider validity of a causal model is not merely a methodologist's maxim; in this section we shall show the consequences of the failure to test a model among relevant subgroups of the study population.

Miller, in a paper using the Miller-Stokes data on Congressmen, shows that the correlation patterns between district opinion and Congressmen's perceptions, attitudes, and votes vary widely across different types of districts (competitive and noncompetitive) and across three issue areas (social welfare. civil rights, and foreign policy).13 There are, in short, many different types of representation. The model proposed by Cnudde and McCrone would have been more plausible if it had been tested among various subgroups of Congressmen, and in different issue areas—if they had, in effect, controlled for some of the prominent variables suggested by other studies of Congress.

Additional analysis of the Miller-Stokes data sharply illustrates the dangers of accepting a causal model tested only by reference to correlations across the entire sample. Using the data in Miller's paper, we tested the two major propositions for Congressmen from competitive and noncompetitive districts in the civil rights issue area. The basic Cnudde-McCrone model under consideration holds that there is no relationship between district opinion and the attitudes of the Congressmen when preceptions of district opinion by the Congressman are held constant: "...perceptions are likely to cause him [the Congressman] to modify his attitudes to fit his reasonably accurate perceptions."14

¹² Warren E. Miller, "Majority Rule and the Representative System of Government," in Erik Allardt and Yrjo Littunen (eds.), Cleavages, Ideologies, and Party Systems: Contributions to Comparative Political Sociology (Helsinki: Proceedings of the Westermarck Society, 1964), pp. 343–376.

Analysis of the data shows that the model fits for one-party districts but does not fit for competitive districts (Table 2). Furthermore, as we saw earlier, there are many other possible models which would fit the data from one-party districts.¹⁵

TABLE 2. TEST OF THE DISTRICT OPINION—PERCEPTIONS—ATTITUDES MODEL FOR COMPETITIVE AND NONCOMPETITIVE DISTRICTS⁴

Civil Rights	Predicted Correlation
One-party districts	$\frac{.54}{.78} = .69$	yes
Competitive districts	$\frac{16}{.23} =70$	no

^a Data are for majority district opinion from Miller, op. cit., pp. 362-363.

^b The Cnudde-McCrone model implies that $r_{DA} = r_{DP}r_{PA}$. This in turn implies that the ratio r_{DA}/r_{DP} is positive.

III. MULTICOLLINEARITY

In Negroes and the New Southern Politics, Matthews and Prothro propose a causal model to account for variations in Negro political participation. Figure 3 shows the model which leads to the conclusion that:

Community structure... is thus seen to have direct effects on social and economic attributes of individual southern Negroes and on the community political system, but not on Negro attitudes and cogitions or on Negro political participation. Individual socio-economic attributes and the political system have direct effects only on attitudes and cognitions. All effects on political participation are interpreted by Negro attitudes and cognitions. 18

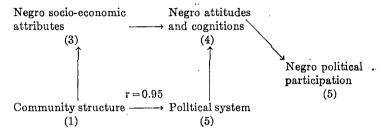

There are two major difficulties in this use of causal modelling that point to more general problems in multivariate analysis. First is a 15 Although Cnudde and McCorne restrict themselves to the civil rights issue area, their hypotheses would, if true, have more general significance. We tested their model for welfare and foreign policy issues in competitive and non-competitive districts (based on the data in Miller, op. cit.). The model failed to fit in all four of these tests.

¹⁶ Matthews and Prothro, op. cit., pp. 323-324, emphasis in the original.

¹⁴ Cnudde and McCrone, op. cit., p. 72.

Fig. 3. Causal model of negro political participation.

Source: Matthews and Prothro, op. cit., pp. 322-323.

difficulty we have already discussed: the reporting of assumptions as conclusions. The causal model of Negro political participation makes dubious assumptions about the relationships between the variables in the model (a good example is the one-way relationship-postulated between characteristics of the political system and political participation by individuals), and, in the end, these assumptions are presented as if they were findings based on the analysis of the data.¹⁷

The second problem, deserving the attention of political scientists using multivariate models, is that of separating out the independent effects of highly correlated independent variables. In the study of Negro political participation, for example, the correlation between the "community structure" variable and the "political system" variable is 0.95. The extremely high correlation immediately raises the question of whether it is possible to disentangle the effects of these two variables, as the model requires, since they are virtually identical. It is, in fact, impossible to assess the independent effects of the "community structure" and the "political system" on Negro political participation in any reliable fashion.18 This is the problem of "multicollinearity": when two or more independent variables are highly correlated, it is difficult to make reliable inferences about their relative contribution to the determination of the dependent variable. As the correlation between two independent variables approaches unity, it becomes literally impossible to tell one variable from the other. As Blalock puts it:

Stated in most simple terms, whenever the correlation between two or more independent variables is high, the sampling error of the partial slopes and partial correlations will be quite large. As a result there will be a number of different combinations of regression coefficients, and hence partial correlations, which give a most equally good fittings to the empirical data. In any given case the method of least squares will usually yield unique solutions, but with slight modifications of the magnitude that could easily be due to sampling or measurement error, one might obtain estimates which differ considerably from the original set.¹⁹

Finally, as a matter of general interest, it should be noted that the difficulties arising from multicollinearity persist regardless of the method of data analysis. In short, multicollinearity not only affects estimates in multiple regression procedures; it also weakens inferences based on cross-tabulations. While occasionally the use of additional information may alleviate the problem, it often happens that when the social scientist must rely on "experiments" performed by nature, he will be unable to obtain the independent variation necessary to assess the independent effects of his explanatory variables.

IV. CONCLUSIONS

This review of two recent applications of causal models to political data suggests the need to stress certain elementary principles of data analysis. As models grow more complex, basic principles may often be lost in the maze of elaborate analyses. We can suggest a number of specific points growing out of the preceding discussion:

- 1. In complicated multivariate models, there are a number of inherent problems of estimation. These often arise in attempts to dis-
- 19 Hubert M. Blalock, Jr., "Correlated Independent Variables: The Problem of Multicollinearity," Social Forces, 62 (December, 1963). p. 233. For more detailed discussions of the problem, see Donald E. Farrar and Robert R. Glauber, "Multicollinearity in Regression Analysis: The Problem Revisited," Review of Economics and Statistics, 49 (February, 1967), 92–107; and Johnston, op. cit., pp. 201–207.

¹⁷ See the reasoning about "direction of causation," ibid., pp. 321-323.

¹⁸ The beta weights included in the analysis (ibid., p. 321) also run contrary to the model.

tinguish the relative impact of different variables that are themselves highly intercorrelated. The accuracy of the estimates degenerates as the intercorrelation between independent variables approaches unity. Indeed, in the case of perfect correlation between two variables, the variance of the estimates of the relative impact is infinite!

- 2. Any investigator, and especially those aiming to give a causal interpretation of their findings, should consider the possibility that different causal processes operate in different subgroups of their data. This may be formally incorporated into the model by using statistical procedures that take interaction effects into account.
 - 3. Complex multivariate models require a good many assumptions in order to estimate the parameters of the model. These assumptions are often not testable and they do not, of course, "emerge" from the analysis of the data, and should not be reported as empirically grounded conclusions.

The Simon-Blalock technique does not eliminate these problems. The investigator, regardless of his particular data analysis strategy, must face them and avoid the unthinking manipulation of correlation coefficients in an attempt to "eliminate" causal links.

(Editor's Note: For further discussion of these questions, see the Communications by Chudde-McCrone and Forbes-Tufte at pp. 1269-1271.)

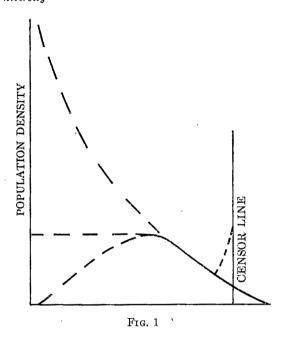

A NOTE ON CENSORSHIP

GORDON TULLOCK
Rice University

In Toward a Mathematics of Politics¹ I presented a model of reciprocal interaction between information media and the opinions held by members of the community. It is the purpose of this note to apply a somewhat simplified version of this model to the specific problem of censorship. Testable hypotheses will be deduced and implications which may be of importance for policy will be suggested.

Suppose the population of the country are arrayed on some issue dimension. It makes little difference for our present purposes what the dimension itself represents. It might, for example, indicate the degree of nudity of pictures of women in men's magazines or the strength with which the views of Castro are supported. Let us suppose that the distribution along this issue dimension declines at one, end, as shown in Figure 1. Note that the remainder of the distribution can be any shape; in fact, I have drawn in three dashed lines for three possible distributions.2 If we assume, not unreasonably, that most people who are in the business of producing public information seek to maximize readership, then we would anticipate that in a competitive market the information media would be spread over the possible positions in this line in much the same pattern as the population.3 Put more bluntly, the

- ¹ Toward a Mathematics of Politics (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1967), pp. 82-99.
- ² Even the requirement that the distribution decline at one end is not necessary. A highly abstract version of the theorems developed below can be presented with any distribution covering a finite interval.
- ³ The relationship between the publication distribution and the distribution of the opinions of the consumers of the publications is complicated by two factors. One is economies of scale, and the second is the poor information held by the operators of the media on public preferences. Working out the implications of these two modifying factors is tedious and difficult. Readers interested in this aspect of the matter should turn to Chapters V and VI (pp. 82-99) of Toward a Mathematics of Politics. For our present purposes, however, an extremely simplified model which ignores these factors is a suitable mapping of the more complex basic model. One aspect of the basic model should be mentioned. Due to the very large economies of scale to be found in the field of media managers of such organizations as Time, Newsweek, and CBS go where the customers are.

This competitive situation in a sense is an equilibrium situation. Individuals' tastes would be influenced by things they read and what they read would be affected by their tastes. For any individual there would be some tendency to move along the line, but there is no obvious reason why the general population should be shifted. An individual would normally be reading or looking at some things that are not perfect expressions of his optimum taste. The man who thinks, for example, that Playboy is ridiculously conservative in its photographic standards might nevertheless occasionally read Reader's Digest. Thus, to some extent, insofar as his opinions are affected by the information which he receives he would be subject to some tendency to move to the left on our diagram if increasing nudity is considered to be on the right.

The point of this article, however, is to discuss the effect of censorship. Let us begin by considering what can be called majority or production, areas where customers are dense are characterized not by many publications, but by a few large, heavily capitalized journals.

conventional censorship. This is the type of censorship we frequently get in democracies. It is an effort by the majority of the population to prevent some minority from obtaining media to its tastes. A classical example, of course, is the law against pornography, but there are other areas in which similar things may be observed. Thus, let us suppose that the government establishes a censorship which, on our issue dimension, simply prohibits publication of anything to the right of what I have labeled the censor line. This immediately means that the media now publishing to the right of that line must cease publication or shift their editorial policy. It also, however, has a sharp effect on the market of those media which are immediately to the left of this line. They are now the closest approximations of the taste of all the people to the right of the line. Thus one could anticipate a rapid expansion of media in this area. Note that this does not necessarily involve an increase in the number of (let us say) magazines published in that area. It could involve, instead, a sharp improvement in circulation and of quality in those magazines. Looked at from the standpoint of the publishers the change in censorship adjusts the tastes of the population insofar as they can be expressed in purchases of journals so that they fit more or less the dotted line in Figure 1.

Here we have a readily testable hypothesis. If the theory is correct, attempts to impose conventional standards on "girlie" magazines would lead to a sharp increase in the number of magazines which just pass the police standards. Given the fact that there is a good deal of variation in the rules imposed by different police forces, a comparative analysis of relative frequencies in different cities should show a high concentration of magazines which just pass the minimum standards in each city.

With this new distribution of publications the individuals in the society will be confronted with somewhat different reading matter than they had before, and this over time should work at least some shift in their tastes or political preferences. For example, the people who previously were reading material to the right of the censorship line are now compelled to read material to the left. It is reasonable to assume that after a while their preferences will shift in that direction. This would, if left entirely to itself, produce a small secondary hump in the normal distribution curve at or near the censor line. This would, I presume, be one of the objectives of people who propose the censorship. There is, however, another objective which is frequently mentioned by people who favor censorship. They very frequently are not interested in the "depraved" people who directly consume whatever it is they object to. They tend to say that they are interested in the entire population, particularly the younger portion of the population, and therefore their objective in eliminating the extreme portion of the spectrum is not to save people whose tastes are already widely deviant from conventional morality, but to prevent a movement in that direction by the whole population.

If this is the objective of the censorship, it is by no means obvious that it can be achieved. The development of a concentration of fairly high quality media just inside the censor line will change the information available to people who have more conventional tastes, too. Thus, someone who is approximately at the middle of the population and who would be unlikely to read anything banned by the censorship anyway, may find he is much more likely to read something which is just acceptable now that the volume and quality of material published at that point has been so sharply increased. It is thus possible, although not certain, that imposition of censorship will have an effect of shifting the general population distribution to the right on our diagram at the same time it eliminates the extreme tail. It is fairly easy to make sets of detailed assumptions under which this will either occur or will not occur, but there seems no point in doing so here. Clearly, we have a subject for empirical investigation, rather than theoretical speculation. It should be noted, however, that it is clear that this type of censorship may have results which are highly perverse, from the standpoint of the people who recommend

So much for censorship by the majority. Let us now consider its totalitarian equivalent. Figure 2 is like Figure 1, but we assume that some party which holds an extreme position has seized political power. The party has the position shown. Under these circumstances it could, of course, simply take over the press and see to it that everything it published was exactly what the party wishes. This is the early Communist and Nazi technique. If this is done, we would have a fairly simple result with the entire volume of publication represented by that particular point on our horizontal line, and presumably some tendency for the population distribution to shift towards that point.

A great many dictatorships, however, have not followed this technique. Instead, they have simply established a censorship which permits some variance in what the news media will publish. I represented this situation by drawing in the censor line a short distance from the party's own position on Figure 2. Here again, the circulation-maximizing manager of some kind of publication media would find that his opportunities were severely restricted, and it would have the effect upon him very similar to that if the population itself had shifted to the form shown by the dotted line. Thus, we would anticipate a very high concentration of publications which were as close as they could get to the censor line. This would not be because they particularly favored freedom of the press, but simply because they were trying to attract readers. Dictatorships normally do not favor objective research into their policies, but it might be possible to test this hypothesis nevertheless. Even the most monolithic government will change its censorship rules from time to time, and a comparison of the distribution of publications under different rules should show the effect. The effect on the general population of such a concentration of news media at or about the censorship line would presumably be to shift its position to some degree. There is, however, another likely outcome of this concentration. The dictatorial clique or party is now confronted with a very large collection of high quality information media which are almost at its position, but slightly closer to majority opinion. Presumably, the members of this dictatorial clique were able to maintain their opinions against the set of publication media distributed much as the population itself because the publication media which were at a considerable distance from their own position exercised little influence on them. They were convinced that these people were basically wrong. Now, however, confronted with an extremely large concentration of media which are just slightly different from their position, it is likely that the party itself will tend to shift.

This shift (to the left on our diagram) is apt to be accompanied by a similar shift or attrition in the censor line, and hence this scheme although it does influence the populace in a way in which the initial founders in the revolutionary regime would approve is apt to influence these founders and their descendants in a way of which they would disapprove. The long gradual attrition of Czarist censorship in the 19th century would appear to be an example of this. It may appear that the conclusions I have drawn from the use of this extremely simple theoretical model are excessive for the reasoning structure which underlines them. In practice, however, it does seem that the assumptions I have made fit the real world, and the conclusions I have drawn also seem to fit. But casual empiricism is only the start of any investigation. Formal tests are clearly called for, and I hope that some of the readers of this note will undertake them.

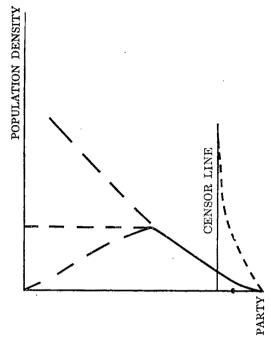

Fig. 2

COMMUNICATIONS

TO THE EDITOR:

Professor Kaplan's amusing conclusion of his review of my World Politics: The Global System (this Review, June, 1968, p. 694) moves me to exonerate the Dorsev Press from his charge "that they could not afford proper critical help to the author . . ." They proferred more critical help-all of it relevant and from highly reputable scholars—than I was willing to accept.

Mr. Kaplan and I could argue about who misunderstands, and how grossly, the literature on strategic doctrine. Some highly placed practicing strategists have assured me that my understanding and interpretation of it in the book are sound. In any case, the absurdum to which some strategists have reduced their doctrines in the device of the doomsday machine was not presented as a preferred strategy in my book. As for Mr. Kaplan's magistral assertion that "it is not true that nuclear weapons cannot be used to acquire some future good," would it not serve the purposes of the REVIEW—which is one of our profession's "present means to obtain some apparent future good"-if he were to elaborate, corroborate, and engage in a little dialectic?

HERBERT J. SPIRO

University of Pennsylvania

(EDITOR'S NOTE: The Managing Editor regrets that inadequate copy-editing and proofreading allowed this unwarranted statement to appear in the Review, and apologizes to Professor Spiro and the Dorsey Press for any embarrassment it may have caused them.)

TO THE EDITOR:

In his article, "On the Neo-Elitist Critique of Community Power," this REVIEW (1968), pp. 451-60, Richard Merelman is severely critical of our analysis of the nature and process of nondecision-making. Within the limited space permitted us here, we can do no more than point out his major errors.

In Merelman's view, we make the following interrelated points: (a) "non-elites are encased in values foisted on them by the elite"; (b) "non-elites are not even conscious of having major differences' with the elite"; therefore (c) conflict in the community is limited to "unimportant matters which do not threaten the elite." (p. 452.) Given this perception of things, savs Merelman, we must be "neo-elitists."

Worse, our formulation is riddled with logical and empirical problems.

The chief objection to his critique is that it is predicated on a careful misreading of our discussion of nondecision-making. As we see it. the process is at work when the mobilization of bias, created or sustained by its beneficiaries (who may be either elites or non-elites), is sufficiently dominant-not necessarily or even usually omnipotent and all-encompassing, as Merelman contends—to prevent a political issue from reaching the decision-making arena. Obviously, if a particular set of political beliefs was universally embraced in a given community, no one could tell whether the consensus was "false" or genuine. Merelman labors this point; but in concentrating on the limiting case, he ignores all those other, more common situations in which consensus on values is lacking, yet persons and groups shaping and supporting currently dominant beliefs are able to utilize these beliefs as a means to silence the opposition or render it ineffectual.

We deny the contention of our pluralist critics that so-called non-events are beyond the reach of empirical investigation. It is possible to determine, on the one hand, the nature and degree of covert support for critics of the dominant set of values and, on the other. the extent to which those who stand to lose from public airing of an issue use power or its correlates to sustain the beliefs that will keep the issue from being seriously considered. It seems well established, for example, that Senator Joe McCarthy and his supporters engaged in nondecision-making in the early 1950's, when their exploitation of anti-communist sentiments effectively blocked access to the decision-making arena of demands for social reform. Even more interesting is the evidence we have found in Baltimore, where the value of equal opportunity for blacks has lately gained wide acceptance—only to be used by prominent whites to deny Negroes a greater share in the actual making of community decisions. It is immaterial for present purposes whether white leaders consciously adopted a pro-civil-rights posture in order to isolate the advocates of "black power." What is significant is that they exercised authority and influence on the nondecision-making level and did so without creating a communitywide consensus. Need we add that had we relied exclusively on analysis of "concrete" decisions, in the fashion of Merelman and his fellow pluralists, we would have missed this critical aspect of contemporary politics in Baltimore?

From what we have said here and elsewhere, it should be clear that we are not "neo-elitists." We neither presuppose that every community is run by an elite nor that an elite consensus must exist in order for nondecision-making to be operative and effective. We simply reiterate that nondecision-making may be and often is a critical element in the political process and, as such, deserves further theoretical analysis and empirical study. We plan shortly to produce another paper along these lines.

PETER BACHRACH

Temple University

MORTON S. BARATZ

Brun Mawr College

TO THE EDITOR:

Mercifully, the Bachrach-Baratz letter permits me brevity:

- 1. Parts III and IV of my article, which deal with cases of nondecision-making involving power and force, are distinguished from Part II by the fact that while the latter presupposes false consensus the former two do not. Therefore, as Bachrach and Baratz can no doubt see, the power and force sections deal with the class of situations they accuse me of ignoring. In fact, I intended Parts III and IV to absolve me of any suspicion that I was only treating a "limiting case."
- 2. Non-events are, by definition, non-empirical. You cannot observe what has not happened. Therefore, interpretations made about nondecisions are subject to the difficult and peculiar problems of inference I discussed in my article. The fact that you can find evidence supporting your version of why something did not happen in Baltimore, say, does not circumvent the inferential problems I discussed. The situation is analogous to a jury forced to convict on circumstantial evidence. It is always nice to have a corpus delicti around. We must, otherwise, make leaps of faith that are usually too great for most political scientists, as scientists and not as citizens, to at-Mtempt.
- 3. Bachrach and Baratz deny that they are neo-elitists, or that they believe that every community is run by an elite, or that elite consensus is necessary for nondecision-making to operate effectively. Of course, only Part II of my article makes the latter two assumptions, which are specifically limited to the alse consensus case therein discussed. Since, as paragraphs 1 and 2 above indicate, the Bachrach-Baratz letter has not raised any new issues which dispute my analysis, I will continue to let the article speak for itself. I'm glad we can at least agree that nondecision-making needs more analysis.

RICHARD M. MERELMAN University of California Los Angeles

TO THE EDITOR:

Forbes and Tufte (this issue of the Review) level three charges against our linkage article. They are: (1) that our model is somehow suspect because underlying the nationwide data are different patterns of linkage for competitive and non-competitive districts; (2) that our assumptions are not reasonable given other literature on representation; and (3) that we state one of our assumptions as a conclusion.

The hypothesis that different models are appropriate for competitive and non-competitive constituencies is an attractive one and worth investigating properly. If the hypothesis were supported by appropriate testing, it would be an important and welcome addition to the literature on representation. Unfortunately, Forbes and Tufte utilize an unsound and misleading methodology in their test.

The magnitude of correlation coefficients depends in part upon the variance which is measured in a variable. When we divide a body of data into subgroups, say into competitive and non-competitive districts, we may differentially affect the variance in variables and, therefore, the correlation coefficients. Since the values of those correlation coefficients depend in part on how we divided the data, they are descriptive of the divided data only and should not be used as comparisons with those from the originally undivided set or from the set divided in other ways. It is not surprising, then, that these writers find a model other than ours in one of their subgroups since their analysis utilized correlation coefficients. (Note that our analysis also uses correlation coefficients and therefore describes our data set only, but we do not attempt comparisons with other sets or subsets.) We suggest that if Forbes and Tufte are serious in the testing of their hypothesis, they should use unstandardized regression coefficients in the future. The procedure they utilize was specifically warned against and reliance on unstandardized coefficits was suggested nearly two years ago in this Review (March, 1967) by Blalock. Ironically, Blalock used the Miller-Stokes data as his case study in warning against reliance on correlation coefficients for this type of model analysis.

We should also note, however, that for Forbes and Tufte to utilize unstandardized regression coefficients for subgroup analysis, they will still have to face the major problem of sampling error in the Miller-Stokes data. To use even regression coefficients for subgroup analysis, we must be able to ignore sampling error. With only 116 districts to be divided into competitive and non-competitive districts and very few (average of 15–20) interviews per district, sampling error might produce disparate results even utilizing regression coefficients.

Finally, we would also like to make clear that even if the model were different for competitive and non-competitive districts, this would constitute a specification of the conditions under which our model was operative or inoperative. It would not constitute grounds for rejecting it.

Their second charge that there is "an inadequate correspondence between the assumptions made in constructing the mathematical models and prior knowledge about the phenomena being studied . . ." is indeed weak. Despite their manipulations of the roll-call behavior in their model 2c, we assume that there is no quarrel over considering district attitudes as independent and roll-call vote as the dependent variable. The objection seems to be that it is unreasonable to think that a congressman's attitudes are affected by his perceptions of district attitudes.

What, then, are their grounds for objection? They cite two studies in which the authors stress misperception as descriptive of congressmen. Dexter, in his article and in American Business and Public Policy, for example, sees misperception on fair trade legislation. But is fair trade legislation civil rights legislation? Miller and Stokes find considerable misperception on foreign policy and social welfare, but on civil rights the correlation between perception and district attitude is .74, which is higher than that between his own attitude and his perception (.46). One would expect that if attitudes were causing perceptual distortions the latter correlation would be higher than that between perception and district attitude.

More importantly, however, they fail to make clear, as we did, that two specifying conditions need to be set for accepting the notion that his attitude can be affected by his perceptions. "Because the costs of misperceiving are so high for an elected official, his perceptions are likely to cause him to modify his attitudes to fit his reasonably accurate perceptions." (Italics added). We feel that .74 correlation is reasonably accurate perception. The Hays-Alford case demonstrates the costs of "error" in civil rights.

As to the third criticism, it has some merit.

A pitfall of causal modeling is the ease with which assumptions become conclusions. Their "note of caution" is in order for us and several other practitioners of the art.

In conclusion, we would like to take this opportunity to clear up several misconceptions about our article which we found in Forbes and Turte and in conversations with colleagues. Our model was solely devised as a model of constituency influence on civil rights. We were quite certain that it was not a general model and at no point did we seek to call it one.

Second, when we stated that we accounted for the 88% of the original relationship between district attitude and roll-call vote, many failed to recognize that this original relationship accounts for only 42% of roll-call behavior. In other words, like Miller and Stokes, we dealt only with constituency influence models.

Third, though we argue that perceptions are influential on congressmen's attitudes, we do not mean that they are the sole, or even primary determinant of his attitudes. The magnitude of the correlations leave considerable room for the operation of other influences on Congressmen's attitudes.

CHARLES F. CNUDDE DONALD J. McCRONE

The University of Wisconsin

TO THE EDITOR:

Near the end of their communication, Cnudde and McCrone agree with our main criticism of their paper, that they reported their assumptions as conclusions. Their other points, however, suggest a few additional cautionary remarks.

First, their discussion of subgroup analysis should not discourage anyone from controlling for key variables and testing explanatory models within regions of the data. Subgroups analysis is an essential tool for discovery in the detective kit of the data analyst. In suchanalysis one will face obvious difficulties when the variability within subgroups is small. These difficulties weaken all inferences, not merelythose based on comparisons of correlations coefficients across subgroups. In the case of the Miller-Stokes data, Cnudde and McCrone provide no evidence that the variability is severely reduced in the comparison between competitive and non-competitive districts Miller, of course, has reported a wide range of results for such subgroups of Congressiona districts.

Second, their comments about unstan dardized regression coefficients are quite missleading. Regression coefficients generally provide a better summary of a linear relationship than a correlation coefficient, although for some data this general rule does not apply. For the Miller-Stokes data, unstandardized regression coefficients are inappropriate because their metrics do not possess the substantive meaning required for the sensible use of such coefficients. Here we would recommend the paper that Blalock somewhat inaccurately cites in his justification of unstandardized coefficients. John Tukey wrote that "correlation coefficients are justified in two and only two circumstances, when they are regression coefficients, or when the measurement of one or both variables on a determinate scale is hopeless. . . . [An] area in which correlation coefficients are prominent includes psychometrics and educational testing in general. This is surely a situation where determinate scales are hopeless." Since this is also the situation for the Miller-Stokes data, the advice of Blalock (seconded by Cnudde and McCrone) is inappropriate.

4.

> HUGH DONALD FORBES EDWARD R. TUFTE

To the Editor:

In an otherwise innocuous review of my book The Politics of the European States (this RE-VIEW, June 1968) Mr. Robert A. Rupen confuses a point of my conclusions. He states that "he (Ionescu) wants to get the superpowers out of Europe, although he clearly recognizes that simple simultaneous withdrawal of the USSR and the U.S. would be unlikely to bring about the democratic pan-Europe he ardently desires." I thought that the real point I was making, although subtler, was clear enough when I wrote (p. 282): "What is suggested here has very little to do with either the theory of the third force, or with that of European neutralism, or with the old fashioned theory of 'disengagement.' The point concerns only the difference in the stimulus of the initiative and the novelty of the results, according to whether they originate from the blocs respectively led by the two superpowers or from the European countries. Whereas, in the former case, the worst coming to the worst, a more correlated, more flexible and yet more lasting status quo could be acceptable, if not recommendable, in the latter it is precisely the status quo of the general relation between Europe and the two superpowers which is questioned." And (p. 283): "What is meant is that it is more probable that, in a situation of double flux, changes recorded in the internal sphere of each country of a 'camp', and of the camp itself, would reverberate more effectively on the process of (European) integration itself."

I believe that the Czechoslovak experience of 1968 confirmed my trend of thinking, if properly understood and fairly presented.

GHITA IONESCU

London School of Economics and Political Science

TO THE EDITOR:

Your recent review of Metropolitan America: Challenge to Federalism (issue of June 1968, pp. 623-4) does little more than register the reviewer's annoyance with this report and with the studies of the Acvisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations on which it is based. The inaccuracies in Thomas J. Anton's review are too numerous to cover in a brief rejoinder, but a few can be cited as illustrations.

Mr. Anton contends that the report criticizes the fragmentation of government in metropolitan areas but fails to state criteria for determining that problems result from this fragmentation; that the report finds conflicts of interest among governments blocking effective action to deal with metropolitan problems, but fails to state what action should be taken on specific issues. Criteria are, however, presented on pp. 30-32 and in case studies of two areas of governmental responsibility: water supply and sewage disposal, and the relocation of people and businesses displaced by public land-takings. More effective action in these two areas is proposed in considerable detail on pp. 141-154. Mr. Anton may well disagree with the criteria and the proposals, but to claim that no standards are presented and no action indicated is a strange way of registering disagreement.

Mr. Anton's critique of Commission findings as confused and inconsistent derives largely from his own faulty summary Thus he attributes to the Commission the view that "the federal government should retain an essentially advisory role," and then finds contradictory recommendations for federal planning standards as a condition of local grants-in-aid. Far from contending that the federal role should be primarily advisory, Metropolitan America discusses reasons warranting federal action in metropolitan affairs (pp. 119-123), proposes many positive federal measures, and focuses particularly on ways of improving the grantin-aid system. The Commission's recommendations for federal action are certainly fair game for criticism, but dismissing them by manufacturing internal contradictions is not a very high level of criticism.

Finally, Mr. Anton rejects the work of the Commission as "organizational tinkering" inappropriate for the solution of serious urban "Organizational tinkering" preproblems. sumably refers to proposals for change in the governmental system. But present governmental arrangements have much to do with such problems as poverty and inequality of opportunity. The governmental strategies that the Advisory Commission recommends involve redressing fiscal disparities among local governments, enabling communities where the poor are concentrated to support higher levels of public service, expanding the supply of lowincome housing, enforcing laws against discrimination, increasing state contributions to local welfare assistance, and providing certain educational and employment programs on a metropolitan basis.

These are not the only possible strategies, and continuing analysis and debate may well suggest others. Effective solutions, however, are not likely to have the tightly organized, consistent quality that Mr. Anton wants. Given the complexity of our urban problems as well as of our governmental system, a simplified and therefore highly consistent solution may make for happier speed-reading, but it will not contribute much to public policy.

BERNARD J. FRIEDEN

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

To THE EDITOR:

Presumably, Mr. Frieden would have us frame recommendations that are (1) loosely organized, (2) inconsistent, and (3) complex. Such recommendations, he thinks, would "contribute" to public policy more effectively than tightly organized, consistent and simplified solutions. Maybe so, but as a slow reader, I have my doubts.

Perhaps it is his quest for complexity that leads Mr. Frieden to misstate part of what I wrote: I did not say that criteria for determining the existence of a problem were lacking in his report, but that the expressed criteria were little more than slogans, with neither clarity of meaning nor specificity of application to recommend them. Statements that governments should be large enough to permit economies of scale, should have an area adequate for effective performance, should have the legal and administrative ability to perform assigned services, and the like (pp. 30-32), are quite meaningless unless and until the key terms are given specific content. What defines "adequate" or "effective" performance? What defines legal and administrative "ability"? How large is "large enough" for economies of scale? Stating principles without defining them is rather like proposing marriage without setting a date. In both cases there is reason to suspect the integrity of the proposal.

For the rest, Mr. Frieden seems to me to be playing a semantic game on the issue of what constitutes an "advisory" role for the federal government. He does not, after all, propose that the federal government take over local governments and his report specifically advocates leaving "major reponsibility" for metropolitan problems with State and local governments. (p. 119) And, if Mr. Frieden now thinks that re-structuring urban government will have much impact on poverty or inequality of opportunity, then he is in disagreement not only with me, but with himself, for he expressed the opposite view on pp. 126-127 of Metropolitan America. But let us not play silly academic games. Poverty, prejudice, education, housing, environmental quality, money, violence and just plain decency are some of the most pressing problems we face in our urban areas. Surely, it is these problems we must deal with and solve. If our solutions require changed governmental forms, then let us change those forms. We are not likely to have a good idea of what governmental changes to make, however, unless we know what we want to do in our cities. And knowing what to do, in specific as well as general terms, requires work of a different order than that so far produced by the Commission.

THOMAS J. ANTON

The University of Michigan

TO THE EDITOR:

I am perennially annoyed that a fallacious political myth keeps popping up in introductory government texts from which I have taught, and apparently is in no danger of refutation by the hard-minded empiricists among us.

This myth is that a communist government has never been voted into power in a free election. Although this may not be an earthshaking issue, it is doubly disturbing to me that this bit of folklore is perpetuated by some scholars who are extremely prominent and highly respected in our field.

¹ Marian D. Irish and James W. Prothro, The Politics of American Democracy (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1965), p. 74; Lee S. Greene and George S. Parthemos, American Government: Polizies and Functions (New York: Charles Scripner's Sons, 1967), p. 358; Austin Ranney, The Governing of Men, rev. ed. (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1966), pp. 178-179; William Ebenstein, C. Herman Pritchett, Henry A. Turner, Dean Mann, American Democracy in World Perspective (New York: Harper and Row, 1967), p. 664.

In texts where this myth is not blatantly stated, it nevertheless is strongly implied, which probably serves to leave the reader with the same belief as if the myth had been stated baldly, such as in the following case:

Indeed, whenever the communists have captured power from within (as contrasted with cases where they imposed a puppet regime through the power of the Red Army), they were successful as conspirators or as guerrillas because they recognized the primacy of politics and turned prevailing discontent to their own advantage.²

This sort of phraseology is common to several other introductory texts, and while I am just as leery of communism as the next person, I believe that we are intellectually committed to give the devil his due. Certainly we are obliged to delete such unnecessary lapses in research as this one:

So far, no communist regime has ever been set up after a free election, and thus President Kennedy's commitment to accept such an election result has never been tested in practice.³

This kind of statement is to be expected from the oddballs on the radical right whose jingoistic patriotism is overshadowed only by their immense lack of gray matter, but not from authors with doctorates in political science who are writing for college students.

In 1945, San Marino became the first country to elect a communist government in free elections. This government continued in power until 1957, when the voters (again, in free elections) turned them out.⁴

In the year that the communist government

- ² Leslie Lipson, The Democratic Civilization (New York: Oxford University Press, 1964,) p. 193. I am surprised to read in a government text-book that there is apparently something unethical about a political party's turning prevailing discontent to its own advantage. Is there a better way to get elected?
- ³ Ebenstein, Pritchett, Turner, and Mann, p.
- ⁴ The story of the communist rule of San Marino is told entertainingly by Donna Shor in "San Marino: Little Land of Liberty," National Geographic, 132 (August, 1967), 233-251.

of San Marino was voted out, Kerala, India, became the first state to put a communist government in office in free elections. In 1958, numerous mass demonstrations and strikes occurred in Kerala in opposition to an education bill promoted by the communists which would provide state control of the many church- and caste-run private schools. President Prasad of India declared a state of emergency, new elections were held, and the communists were voted out of office, to be replaced by a coalition of opposing parties.

As a result of the general election in February, 1967, Kerala and West Bengal formed United Front ministries in which the Communist Party was the largest single party. The central government of India ousted the West Bengal United Front in November, 1967, and placed West Bengal under President's rule in February, 1968, but the leader of the communists in Kerala, E.M.S. Namboodiripad, was sworn in as chief minister in 1967 and (so far) is still in office.

The preceding examples are in addition to a number of small towns in Italy where the town's elected Council is composed of communists alone, or in which the communists have an absolute majority or are in a controlling position.

I have found no evidence that the communist governments cited above were a product of communists "seizing control," "overrunning" the government, or "capturing" the government. Granted, these instances are largely inconsequential political units. But that is beside the point. The issue is whether communist governments have been freely voted into power.

I offer a suggestion. From now on, why not phrase the myth more accurately, such as the following: communists have never been freely elected to control an important national government. This should satisfy those whose scholarly objectivity is subject to momentary frenzies of patriotism or fear, like a recurring attack of malaria. But I would much rather we simply admit that, on occasion, communists do win elections honestly. This admission is not only straightforward and honest, but it would also enable us, in my opinion, to argue more effectively the case against revolutionary communism.

DAVID LINDSAY

Central Missouri State College

BOOK REVIEWS AND NOTES

3	OOK REVIEWS
	Chambers and Burnham, editors, The American Party Systems. A. E. Keir Nash	1275
	Seton-Watson, The Russian Empire 1801-1917. Frederick C. Barghoorn	1276
	Myrdal, Asian Drama: An Inquiry into the Poverty of Nations. Jean Grossholtz	1278
	Rudolph and Rudolph, The Modernity of Tradition: Political Development in India. Robert L. Hardgrave, Jr.	1280
	Tarrow, Peasant Communism in Southern Italy. NORMAN KOGAN	1282
	Hyneman (with Gilbert), Popular Government in America: Foundations and Principles. Neal Riemer.	1284
	Muir, Prayer in the Public Schools: Law and Attitude Change: Johnson, The Dynamics of Compliance: Supreme Court Decision-Making from a New Perspective. Sheldon Goldman	1285
	Lefever, Uncertain Mandate: Weiss, Political Protest in the Congo. Crawford Young	1287
	$Pennock\ and\ Chapman,\ editors,\ Nomos\ X$: Representation. James A. Steintrager	1289
	Plank, editor, Cuba and the United States: Long-Range Perspectives: Zeitlin, Revolutionary Politics and the Cuban Working Class. Richard R. Fagen	1291
	Erdman, The Swatantra Party and Indian Conservatism. Susanne Hoeber Rudolph	1293
	Bernd, editor, Mathematical Applications in Folitical Science III. Herbert F. Weisberg	1294
	Fox and Fox, NATO and the Range of American Choice: Beaufre, NATO and Europe: Cleveland, The Atlantic Idea and Its European Rivals. STUART A. SCHEINGOLD	1296
	Patterson, Congressional Conservatism and the New Deal: The Growth of the Conservative Coalition in Congress, 1933–1939. David R. Mayhew
	Scalapino, The Japanese Communist Movement, 1920–1966. Solomon B. Levine
В	OOK NOTES
	Political Theory, History of Political Thought, and Methodology	1301
	American Government and Politics
	Foreign Governments and Comparative Politics
	INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW AND ORGANIZATION	1391

BOOK REVIEWS

The American Party Systems. Ed. BY. WILLIAM NISBET CHAMBERS & WALTER DEAN BURN-HAM. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967. Pp. 321. $6.75.)

These ten essays—five by historians and five by political scientists-comprise an unusual symposium: without exception they merit publication. Too often unhappy combinations of publishing profligacy and foundation munificence conspire to produce edited proceedings on American politics whose redundant, optimistic vacuity tempts summary by updating Yeats' The Scholars:

Roll-call minds oblivious of their wives, Pluralist, tenured heads of felt, Edit politics of ghetto knives That young blacks girding garrison belts Wield like urban swords of brute despair To batter Congress' ignorant ear.

All cough consensus into civic ink; All strut convention floors in rational vests; All think the moderate thoughts each other thinks:

All test the happy truths their colleague tests. Lord, what would they say

Had their Kennedys walked that way?

Not so The American Party Systems, which is so much better than the average product of group cogitation that we should direct our attention as much to the source as to the nature of its strength. At least five procedural aspects must have formed the base of its substantive distinction. First, the contributors gathered for four days to discuss early versions of their manuscripts. Second, at those gatherings were seventeen other scholars who came as critics unburdened by impulses to be supportive of fellow-authors in hopes of reciprocation. Third, well before penning final versions the authors not just the editors—were cognizant of the contents of each other's manuscripts. Fourth, by that stage they had evolved sufficient similarity of approach such that the conceptual framework is not relegated to the silly limbo of editorial preludes and post-ludes but rather permeates the fabric throughout. Fifth, the combination of participants seems to have worked a beneficial confrontation of disciplines: the results are essays by historians who venture beyond chronological explanation and essays by political scientists who-though knowing their behavioral tools-do not treat history with the disdain of Henry Ford.

This intimates the book's chief substantive strength: its coherent and full-bodied exploration of a central theme—that "examination of American party politics over time reveals the existence of not less than five national party systems" (p. 289). In lieu of describing the characteristics which the authors argue informed and distinguished these systems-for only the essays constitute adequate briefs-let me urge some major grounds for taking the argument seriously.

The authors are not only willing to question "accepted wisdom" about the functioning of American parties but also able to offer sophisticated integrations of general explanatory models and historical particulars. In so doing, they build upon each other even as they question their own earlier work. To give two instances: Chambers, McCormick, and Burnham use Hartzian insights to clarify their subjects, while Sorauf and Dawson expand upon an issue first mentioned by Chambers—the question whether party-analysts have tended to exaggerate the independence of American parties from controlling socio-economic conditions. When not being wholly original, they are willing to borrow explanations grand and small in order to analyze historical data. One such instance is Eric McKitrick's amplification of an idea of David Potter's, which McKitrick calls "the most original single idea to emerge from the mass of writings . . . on the Civil War in . . . years" (p. 120). From this nub, Mc-Kitrick develops a compelling argument that the absence of a well-defined party-system in the Confederacy barred from Jefferson Davis —even as its presence in the Union permitted to Abraham Lincoln-a crucial means of channelling and controlling dissent. McKitrick's article is so rewarding an essay in comparative history that I cannot forbear "drawing the moral" that American historians would do we'll to spend more time in this type of enterprise. Just so, I might add, those in political science who are prone to conjure into articles highlevel theories about the political system and leave them vaporizing in the empirical virginity of the "suggestive-model" stratostage, might do well to heed Hays' integration of Toennies' community-society model with the pesky quotidian nitty-gritty of American history from 1865 to 1929. Similarly, both behavioralists contemptuous of yesteryear and normatists prone to rely on Plato for tools with which to pound American politics might profitably examine Stokes' and Lowi's uses of 19th and 20th century voting data—the first to analyze temporal shifts in the relative imports of local, state, and national electoral forces, and the second to argue in statistical terms a substantive view of American party politics greatly fortified by thus arguing.

We could go on at length limning The American Party Systems' merits, had we but space enough and time. Those lacking, let me rest by pointing to as notable a merit as any otherits fertility in leading to—despite not explicitly tackling-further questions for examination. Given their abundance. I shall have to restrict myself to noting some which are sufficiently stimulating to spur future detailed analysis (see Nash, Party Systems, Ideology, and Development, Holt, Rinehart, & Winston, 1969). Has, possibly, the book's prevalent assumption of a "pragmatic-versus-ideological" conceptual dichotomy in contrasting American and Continental party systems hindered adequate reckoning with conflictual faults in the American system whose dangers events have rendered more clear and more present since the writing of these essays in 1966? (However, note at least partially contra, Hays at 162 and Burnham at 304-07.) Similarly, while "importation" of the concept of political development into the American analysis is here fruitful if only for its consequence that the United States is not seen as wholly unproblematic of development, might not an examination of that concept's evolutionary presuppositions have been wise? (But, for a judicious minority customs-examination of this aboriginal package, see Sorauf at 34 ff.) Is not, indeed, such suspicion warranted by the very similarity between Goodman's characterizations here of certain post-revolutionary State parties and sundry analyses elsewhere of party-functioning a century and a half later? Both systems seem "factional"—in fact, sufficiently so to tempt the historical sociologist to rekindle with American fuel the fire of the Butterfield-Namier-Duverger "faction-versus-party" dispute. And, both systems seem at once so restricted in their problem-solving capacities and so terribly "pragmatic" as to lead to a final range of questions. To what extent has an unconscious ideology of pragmatism produced the very loss of control over the direction of American society and politics which, as Sorauf observes, has befallen "party-bosses" concomitant with the decline of old-style residential and social patterns? Might, in short, a "less American," "more Continental" style of party politics have better retained that control by undertaking not merely—as Dawson argues -to react as a dependent variable to socioeconomic changes, but to act as an independent variable channelling and managing the very rural-urban-suburban flow which has dated that power? Might not, in sum, the pragmatism of American party decision-makers have turned most unpragmatic?

These are but a few of the many speculative hooks which this book lets neatly dangle. It is a collection distinguished as much for what it does not, as for what it does, explore—a collection frequently original and fruitfully synthetic, and when not that, almost always lucid and graceful of expression.

A. E. Keir Nash University of California, Santa Barbara

The Russian Empire 1801-1917. By Hugh Seton-Watson. (London: Oxford University Press, 1967. Pp. 813. $10.00.)

Professor Seton-Watson's Russian Empire is a superb historical study, which says much of value for political scientists. Seton-Watson does not permit the concerns of the present to color his analysis of the past. However, in this study, the values and preferences of a sophisticated believer in cultural freedom, civil liberties and parliamentary government have exerted a salutary influence on the selection and interpretation of issues and evidence. The study focuses on certain dominant themes, and especially on the role of the tsardom. Seton-Watson states (p. 10) that "if there is one single factor which dominates the course of Russian history, at any rate since the Tatar conquest, it is the principle of autocracy."

Seton-Watson regards the history of the Russian people and the other peoples, such as the Poles, who were conquered and subjugated by the tsars as an unusually tragic one. It would, however, be unfair to a very objective scholar to suggest that he regards autocracy and other negative patterns of Russian history as permanent attributes of Russian national character or cultural tradition. While he clearly identifies with the West European political tradition, in which "nations were formed in a long struggle between the monarchical power and the social elite," and finds much to deplore in Russian autocracy, he understands that such factors as Russia's lack of defensible frontiers and its relative economic backwardness help to explain, if not to render appealing, the oppressiveness of Russian political life.

Before turning to some observations about the interplay between political absolutism, on the one hand, and the challenges to the stability of this pattern springing from the internal and external environments, on the other, which for this reviewer constitute the most interesting features of this work, it should be noted that The Russian Empire is a general history, in which foreign policy, military history, and social, ideological and cultural development. are treated in detail. This reviewer regrets that Seton-Watson did not treat diplomatic and military events very briefly; if he had, he could have dealt more fully with domestic political dynamics, on which he is insightful and innovative. In Part One, the first of six sections, each of about one hundred twenty pages in length, Seton-Watson sketches the geographic, cultural and religious contexts of Russian development. From the outset, with a grasp that is firmly maintained throughout this. enormous eight hundred-page volume, there are delineated the essential structures and the modes of operation of the centralized, militarybureaucratic, inefficient but not ineffective, multi-national empire, the development of which Seton-Watson regards as the prototype of the process of "deliberate modernization" of most countries of the world, a pattern that he contrasts to the more gradual, less coercive modernization of Western Europe and the United States. The excellent organization of the volume makes it easy to follow, from period to period, any particular problem or trend. Although connections are made between external and internal factors, foreign policy is perhaps too often treated as if it were a separate and independent realm. To be sure. Seton-Watson often stresses the baneful effects on internal political stability of unsuccessful or only partly successful foreign wars, such as the Crimean conflict and the Russo-Japanese war. As for World War I, Seton-Watson indicates clearly his belief that the Russian decision to participate in that conflict led to the destruction of the monarchy although he states that in terms of the "conventional wisdom of international diplomacy in 1914, her decision to go to war was fully justified."

One of the outstanding achievements of this book is its presentation of relationships between the dominant Russian nation and the non-Russian peoples, ruled by Russian, or Russianized, civilian, military and police bureaucracies. Of absorbing interest are the descriptions of the aspirations and way of life of various peoples of the Western borderlands, the Caucasus, Central Asia, Siberia and East Asia who were brought under the sway of St. Petersburg as the empire's territories expanded. His honest admissions that with respect to some issues disputed by partisans of various national points of view the outside observer can do little more than to summarize conflicting positions will not be pleasing to extremists. It will, however, furnish reliable guidance to all who seek understanding of one of the most difficult and abiding aspects of Russian history and politics. Seton-Watson is acutely conscious of the significant interconnections between the external and internal dimensions of Russian nationality problems and policies. He understands the reasons for but demonstrates effectively the dysfunctionality for the multi-national Russian empire of the development of an intelerant Great Russian nationalism. He traces the frustrations, humiliations and deprivations inflicted by Russian chauvinism on Finns, Poles and Ukrainians, and of anti-semitism, the "socialism of the imbecile," on Jews.

The main focus of The Russian Empire is on the ultimately unsuccessful efforts of the autocratic institution to cope with disequilibrating forces. Although Seton-Watson does not present a theory of autocracy, and perhaps could have done more to explore its "psycho-cultural" aspects, he does furnish valuable insights and extraordinarily interesting data regarding a pattern of leadership and decisionmaking which in modern parlance might be categorized as "bureaucratic politics." Within this pattern, in which the emperors themselves were the chief initiators and coordinators of policy, there was much petty intrigue, caprice and self-serving struggle for power. However, policies were often inspired by motives higher and perspectives broader than those dictated merely by concern for preservation of personal or group power and privilege. Talented statesmen such as Speranski, during the early years of the reign of Alexander I, Loris-Melikov, who proposed measures designed to bridge the gap between state and society after the assassination of Alexander II, or Witte and Stolypin, assassinated in 1911, by a killer who was at the same time a police agent and a member of the revolutionary SR party, advocated or instituted policies that might, if they had been wholeheartedly and energetically supported by the monarch, have led to the transformation of autocracy into constitutional monarchy. As Seton-Watson perceives the Russian political dilemma, cultural lag at the highest levels of decision-making made it difficult, and perhaps impossible, for the autocracy to adapt adequately for its survival and that of the political and social strata the destiny of which were linked with that of the tsardom. Seton-Watson emphasizes the deep historical roots of the Russian preference for autocracy to oligarchy. He demonstrates that the upbringing of heirs to the throne reinforced their sensitivity to real or fancied threats to the principle of absolute, individual dictatorial authority.

It is not clear whether Seton-Watson believes that the collapse of the Russian old regime was inevitable. He refuses to commit himself to either a rigidly deterministic or a looser, more probabilistic interpretation, although he inclines to the latter. Perhaps his illuminating analysis would have been even more successful if he had utilized, in addition to the concept of modernization, the categories for the analysis of political development and revolutionary change employed by some contemporary social scientists. He often seems to say that bolder, more enlightened and rational policies on the part of the tsars and their chief ministers might have "saved" Russia. However, he also presents impressive evidence indicating that these products of an essentially unscientific, authoritarian socialization process, working under conditions of great stress, generated by foreign and domestic resource allocation problems, lack of adequate internal political support, and widespread disaffection, could scarcely have been expected to possess either the inclinations or the capabilities to cope with the challenges by which they were beset, which to a surprising degree resembled those which have been dealt with more successfully, and far more ruthlessly, by the bolshevik successors to a less efficient centralized structure. The two regimes are very different in Weltanschauung, but similar in their "siege-mindedness," exemplified in a propensity to identify dissent with treason.

Seton-Watson's views regarding the social structure of imperial Russia perhaps represent a more original, if more controversial, contribution even than his valuable analysis of the operations of the decision-making agencies of government. Put briefly, he says that there was no genuine bourgeoisie in old Russia; a Western-style bourgeoisie was only beginning to develop in the last thirty-odd years of imperial rule. There were, he believes, three "middle classes," namely, the bureaucrats, intelligentsia and businessmen. They did not share a common ethos and were not committed to such typically bourgeois values and goals as rule of law, private property or parliamentary government. Because of the weakness in Russia of bourgeois values, political liberalism was weak. Liberals, whether in the civil service or in the professions and, in the early twentieth century, in nascent political parties, tended to be ground between the upper and nether millstones of intolerant conservatism or even more intolerant radicalism.

Seton-Watson sees the revolutionary enemies of Russian autocracy as themselves products of the authoritarian milieu. In his view, revolutionaries such as Pestel, Tkachev, and Lenin, were aware that "in matters of dictatorship, the provisional has a way of lasting." Their declared intentions to impose only a temporary dictatorship cannot be taken literally. On recruitment of revolutionaries, such as the high proportion in their ranks of the children of orthodox priests, he makes insightful observations.

It is difficult, even in a fairly long review. to suggest the richness of this magisterial work. For example, although he does not use the terminology of input-output or structuralfunctional analysis, he is clearly aware of the decisive role of education. One of his major criticisms of the tsarist regime and its ministers of education, is that, by depriving the mass of the population of even elementary education, they fostered a cultural gap between elite and masses which generated frustration and destructive impulses in the ranks of the intelligentsia. In his strictures on imperial Russian educational policy, Seton-Watson contrasts the Russian record unfavorably to that of Japan following 1868. This comparison is one of many relevant and illuminating ones with which the study is interspersed.

As this reviewer hopes he has made clear, Professor Seton-Watson has produced a very important book, full of thoughtful reflection and wisdom, comparative and objective in approach. It is perhaps not "scientific" in a model-building or hypothesis-testing sense. However, especially in the portions concerned with the roles, outlooks and personalities of individual decision-makers and with the political and administrative structures, the book provides stimulating partial theories and comparisons which should be very useful to students of political and administrative structures and processes. However, its greatest value consists in its power to deepen and enrich our understanding of the similarities, and differences, between the political experience of Russia and that of other nations.

FREDERICK C. BARGHOORN Yale University

Asian Drama: An Inquiry into the Poverty of Nations. 3 volumes. By Gunnar Myrdal. (New York: Pantheon Books, Twentieth Century Fund, 1968, Pp. 2,284. $8.50. paper bound.)

Reading these volumes is like jogging around the baseball field. The scenery is familiar, the perseverence required is enormous, and one is easily led to savor the nobility of the effort more than the purpose. But there is more here than a test of endurance for the reader. Professor Myrdal and his colleagues have constructed a "grand theory" of development defining the relationship between all the relevant and significant political, economic and social factors involved. The theory encompasses a set of explicit propositions about the nature of economic growth in the Asian context and a set of supporting propositions defining the political and social relationships that underlie and react to those economic conditions.

The authors argue that the key to economic growth in the Asian environment lies in the agricultural sector and the central factor in the development of agriculture is the utilization of labor. Myrdal is extremely critical of the application of the "capital/output ratio" to development planning and builds a strong case that it is misleading in the Asian context. Instead he would concentrate on labor and devotes the largest part of the manuscript to defining the economic, political and social forces which impede the effective utilization of labor.

Myrdal argues that work practices in agriculture in Asia are labor intensive and low yields per acre are mainly a consequence of underutilization of the labor force. "Without any innovations and even without any investment other than longer and more efficient work, agricultural yields could be raised very substantially." (1253). Existing work practices are a product not only of economic forces, but of population pressure, health conditions, education, traditional values and status commitments, and even climate. In part, the impediments to effective use of labor are a product of social changes triggered by colonial policies. For example, in response to lowered mortality rates and subsequent population increases, the whole social situation was subtly arranged to "absorb the continual increase in the agricultural labor force." (436). In the same way, colonial education policies strengthened the traditional notion that high status was allocated to those who did not work.

Throughout the book, Myrdal emphasizes that the fundamental problem is a lack of social discipline on the part of the elites and populations of South Asia. The discussions of the use of controls and the weakness of the political systems are likely to be the most interesting to political scientists and they are, unfortunately, the least persuasive.

Professor Myrdal's analysis of the political environment concentrates exclusively on something he labels the elite. The elites of South Asia have adopted the "modernizing ideal" and, partly because of this ideal, are unwilling to use compulsion to force their people to modernize. The modernizing ideal comprises a series of value premises that Myrdal himself holds, and which he says constitute the goals of the elites. The list includes rationality, development and planning, a rise in productivity, rising levels of living, improved institutions and attitudes, national consolidation, national independence, political democracy, democracy at the grass roots and social discipline. Myrdal recognizes that these are overlapping and poorly defined but he maintains that, taken together, they represent the goals of the elites. Although alien to Asia, these goals "have come to be indigenous in the sense that they have been adopted and shaped by the intellectual elite, who in turn, have endeavored to diffuse them throughout the population." (73). The dilemma arises, both for the reader and the elites, in that a commitment to these goals is a commitment to change and to intervention in the lives of the population and such intervention conflicts with the elite's notion of democracy. Myrdal calls them "soft states" and argues that: "All these countries, whether or not they have a democratic system of government, have generally placed fewer obligations on their citizens and have enforced these obligations much less effectively, than have the Western democracies." (894).

At some points Myrdal seems to be saying the elites are unwilling to do what is required and at others, that if they simply adopted the right policies, the compulsion would follow. At no time, however, does he attempt to sort out the political environment of the countries concerned and the forces and pressures operating on the political leadership. He does not differentiate between party politicians, administrators, planners or opposition groups, but lumps them all together as the elite. He seems to have a view of a well defined group of people with common goals permanently in office or at least in charge. Perhaps the easiest way to illustrate the difficulties of this analysis is to raise three questions.

First, what does it mean to say the elite is committed to the modernizing ideal? Are there not mutually contradictory and often obscure goals imbedded in the list of values? In Malaysia, for example, the problem of national consolidation often conflicts with the goal of an overall rise in productivity and the Malaysian elite has, to some extent, opted for consolidation at the expense of productivity. In Sukarno's Indonesia, national independence took first place to rationality and rising levels of living.

Professor Myrdal himself appears to have trouble with these conflicts, putting emphasis on rationality to the exclusion of other goals. For example, in his discussion of confrontation (218-19) he assumes no reason or logic to Sukarno's position and ignores the whole question of the value choices made by the political leadership. Again, with respect to the existence of bicameral legislatures in Indian states, Mr. Myrdal calls them a "luxury" without any investigation of what role they might possibly play in integration or unity. His views on these matters are made clear in his discussion of Myron Weiner's analysis of Indian politics. (291-293). Professor Myrdal asserts that political pragmatism is not compatible with economic growth and the broadening of active political participation but he gives no argument that relates such behavior to his value assertions and goals. Politicians in his view seem to appear in office without any strings, or any need to do anything to remain in power.

Second, why are these states unwilling to use compulsion for output goals when many of them seem quite willing to use compulsion, censorship and, in many cases, extra-legal means to restrict opposition elites? With the exception of the Philippines and India, all the states involved have used implicit or explicit restrictions on the press and on the development of political organizations independent of the ruling group. And certainly the President's rule provision of the Indian Constitution indicates a recognition of the need for compulsion.

If the reason for not using compulsion is a commitment to the democratic ideal, then how is this possible? In addition, Myrdal never investigates the costs and risks of compulsion. Would not the requirements for police or administrative controls be rather heavy expenditures in these fields?

Third, and most important, how can political leadership create social discipline? To what extent does the leadership itself reflect a form of social discipline? In his discussion of controls for example, Myrdal seems to assume the governments will use non-discriminatory controls even though he makes clear such controls can play little role given the social structure and status requirements. The states do not use nondiscriminatory controls because "in the absense of anything like perfect markets, many transactions are not of the market type" and "price incentives are weak." Few people calculate in terms of cost and returns and if they do, their economic behavior is not primarily determined by these calculations. In a footnote, Myrdal cites an Indian scholar's statement that "self interest in the shape of desire of wealth is not absent, but it is not the only, nor principle, motor." (912).

What should people be "compelled" to do to change this attitude? One would assume that the same kind of detailed investigations of the assumptions of Western economists that Myrdal has provided, are required in the arena of value considerations and the response of the population. But what is lacking here is a systematic explanation of who is making the decisions, why they make the ones they do, and what forces influence their decisions.

Although the scope of the study extends from the South Asian states of India, Pakistan and Ceylon to Burma, Thailand, Malaysia and the Philippines, in fact most of the empirical data used to support the theoretical propositions is from the Indian case. This is particularly true of the political sections. When Myrdal refers to the elites of Asia, it appears he has in mind Indian intellectuals and, in fact, at one point he cites Nehru as the "ideal type Asian leader who articulated the position of other leaders. This reviewer would question the validity of the comparison, particularly with such diverse types as Sukarno, Magsaysay, Tunku Abdul Rahman, and Sarit Thanarat.

The depressing and frightening result of reading these volumes is to leave the reader with the knowledge that even with perfect information as to the levels of investment of labor and capital required and the interrelatedness of these with environment and resources, nothing will be accomplished without the active commitment and will of the political leadership, and their ability to understand and mobilize their populations. The failings in this regard are major and we know little of their causes.

JEAN GROSSHOLTZ

Mount Holyoke College

The Modernity of Tradition: Political Development in India. By Lloyd I. Rudolph and Susanne H. Rudolph. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967. Pp. 306. $8.95.)

In the typologies of comparative politics, polar models have served to distinguish and heuristically analyze non-western and western systems, agraria and industria, tradition and modernity. Lloyd and Susanne Rudolph argue, however, that such ideal types, which assume that the components of one must necessarily be absent in the other, may be "serious obstacles to understanding social change and modernization." Modernity and tradition, in a dialectical rather than dichotomous relationship, infiltrate and transform each other; "The assumption that modernity and tradition are radically contradictary rests on a misdiagnosis of tradition as it is found in traditional societies, and a misapprehension of the relationship between them." The Rudolphs seek to accord tradition higher priority in the study of modernization, and, in the analytical gap between tradition and modernity, to explore those sectors of traditional Indian society that contain or express potentialities for change.

The Modernity of Tradition draws together and develops various themes explored by Lloyd and Susanne Rudolph over the past few years. The book contains three parts, each examining an aspect of political development in India and unified by a concern for the dialectical relationship of modernity and tradition.

Part One, "Traditional Structures and Modern Politics: Caste," examines the changing structure and function of caste, contending that, as a vehicle for an expanding identity horizon, caste provides a link between tradition and modernity. The development of modern communications, the spread of literacy, and rising prosperity has contributed to the horizontal consolidation of caste communities in India and, as soliderity has increased, caste has been politicized and drawn into the political system as a major actor. The role of caste in modern Indian politics has been decried, by scholar and politician alike, as a vestige of "tribalism" and a fissiparous threat to national unity. Against this view, in a highly influential article in 1960, "The Political Role of India's Caste Associations," Lloyd and Susanne Rudolph argued that as a channel of communication, representation, and leadership, caste provides a potential link between the mass electorate and the modern democratic process by making it comprehensible in traditional terms to a population still largely politically illiterate. The argument was developed, and in some ways modified, in the pages of this journal (LIX, December, 1965), in analyzing "the democratic incarnation of caste."

The modernity of Tradition, in an expanded treatment of these earlier themes, analyzes the relationship of caste and politics in terms of three types of political mobilization: vertical, horizontal, and differential. "Vertical mobilization is the marshalling of political support by traditional notables in local societies that are organized and integrated by rank, mutual dependence, and the legitimacy of traditional authority." These vertical relations of authority and cleavage characterized the traditional caste system of the Indian village.

"Horizontal mobilization involves the marshalling of popular political support by class or community leaders and their specialized organizations, · · · introducing a new pattern of cleavage by challenging the vertical solidarities and structures of traditional societies." Horizontal mobilization of caste is reflected in the "paracommunities," formation associations, voluntary associations drawn from the ascriptive reservoir of traditional caste. At this level, the Randolphs argue, tradition and modernity meet and fuse. The caste association becomes the mechanism of equality. "By initiating, managing, and encouraging the efforts of lower castes to become twice-born, to don the sacred thread symbolizing high ritual rank and culture, it in effect if not in intention drains the caste hierarchy of meaning by homogenizing and democratizing it."

"Differential mobilization involves the marshalling of direct and indirect support by political parties and other integrative structures) from viable, but internally differentiated, communities through parallel appeals to ideology, sentiment, and interest." Competitive politics stimulates the formation of the caste association, the democratic incarnation of caste, but at the same time, as the caste differentiates internally, political parties weaken caste organization by articulating and mobilizing the divisions within them. Modern politics paradoxically "appears to be an instrument for both the revival and the supersession of traditional society."

The transformation of caste must also involve "a profound change in the nature of human sensibility." Here the Rudolphs are concerned with the spread of fellow feeling, with the future of equality. The examine the mechanisms of caste mobility and change and conclude that the diffusion of political power, democratization of twice-born culture and status, expansion of ascriptive boundaries, westernization, and secularization have brought Indians "closer to political equality, cultural homogeneity, and structural unity." The test of fellow feeling is untouchability. In the struggle for equality, protective discrimination, as in special benefits and in the reservation of seats for untouchables, has to a degree yielded access to economic opportunity and political power, but, as the Rudolphs admit, most village untouchables remain subject to the traditional forms of domination by the upper castes upon whom they are economically dependent. They argue, however, that continued private commitment to tradition is not incompatible with modernization, but, in fact, may facilitate it, as long as it remains private, by providing adaptive insti-

Part Two, "The Traditional Roots of Charisma: Gandhi," explores, in the life and personality of the nationalist leader, the transformation of traditional ideals for modern political purposes. As in his life, so in his memory, Gandhi most normally evokes extreme reactions-either one of fawning adoration of of jaundiced skepticism. The Rudolphs, with sensitivity and balance, avoid either extreme. He is at once saintly, yet profoundly, foibly human; ethereally idealistic, yet organizationally astute. The Rudolph's deal little with Gandhi's role in the struggle for independence. His most important contribution, they contend, is what he did for Indian character. "Gandhi's leadership, regardless of its objective success or failure, had important subjective consequences, repairing wounds in self-esteem inflicted by generations of imperial subjection, restoring courage and potency, recruiting and mobilizing new constituencies and leaders, helping India acquire national coherence."

Part Three, "Legal Cultures and Social Change: Panchayats, Pandits, and Professionals," analyzes the relationship between the parochial system of customary law, and the national, Anglo-Indian legal system, combining norms of Brahmanical law with the procedure and values of British law.

At a time when India's future seems so unsertain and its problems so overpowering, many scholars may find it difficult to share the basic optimism of the Rudolphs. India has entered "the dangerous decades," but the predictions of national disintegration and the collapse of democracy have not been fulfilled. With all of its difficulties, India continues to manifest remarkable stability. The Rudolph argument suggests that this stability may be due to the relationship between tradition and modernity, to the modernity of tradition, its resiliance and capacity to transform itself. It may be, however, that a perhaps temporary stability has been purchased at the price of failure to achieve the fundamental transformation necessary to sustain a viable and developing nation.

The Rudolphs avoid the dangers of the mutually exclusive bi-polar model of tradition and modernity. Although they never fully conceptualize the two elements of the dialectical process they examine, the book, calls for serious re-examination of the established notions of modernity and provides an incisive and refreshing analysis of the area to which our theoretical lens must move. The Modernity of Tradition, written with sensitivity to that which is unique in India, is guided by a fundamental concern for the process of change and is an important contribution to our understanding of modernization.

Peasant Communism in Southern Italy. By SIDNEY G. TARROW. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1967. Pp. 389. $8.75.)

Relating socio-economic patterns to political processes is one of the major problems facing the students of government, especially comparative government. The changes that take place in political parties as they operate in different milieus, particularly parties that have linkages to international movements, create other fascinating issues. This has been especially true of the international communist movement. In this regard close attention has been paid to the national variations among communist parties, variations often attributed to different national political cultures. But there is no reason to suppose that the same kinds of variations would not be present within a nation if substantially different regional cultures were present. It would be necessary to demonstrate, however, that the political cultures of the regions did indeed differ substantially and that these differences were the product of underlying contrasts in the socio-economic-cultural milieus.

This is precisely what Sidney Tarrow in his extremely interesting, and in some respects fascinating, book on southern Italian communism has tried to do. In addition, he has tried to show that a national strategy developed by the Italian Communist Party at the end of World War II. called the "Italian Way to Socialism," was elaborated and implemented for northern Italy, where it perhaps could be justified, and then imposed by the Party on southern Italy, where substantially different milieu doomed it to failure. At the same time this imposition prevented the southern Party from elaborating a strategy which might have been appropriate to southern conditions.

I remain basically unconvinced of Tarrow's theses. I do not believe the political culture of Italy is so dualistic. Where Tarrow sees a fundamental difference of kind, I see only a difference of degree. Where he sees sharp discontinuities, I see gradations. I agree with the Sicilian writer Sebastiano Aglianò, who points out that the social characteristics of his native island are the characteristics of Italian society in general, but merely more extreme. The statistical data collected by Almond and Verba for The Civic Culture buttress this viewpoint. In many significant categories, political cognition, political efficacy, and administrative efficacy, the differences between north and south are not very wide. Nor are they significant when it comes to measuring the qualities of Italians as political participants or political subjects. In the north and the south the Italians are poor participants and poor subjects. In both parts of the country they are politically alienated.

In making his case Tarrow exaggerates the modernity and rationality of the north and to some extent the extreme backwardness of the south, based on a traditional-ascriptive social order. To do this he overrates the importance of some statistical differences. For example, when discussing the career patterns of national Communist leaders he writes "While an average of 24.8 percent of the [Communist] national leaders from the Center-North had held local CGIL posts in 1964, 31.6 percent had been CGIL leaders in the South." To me the important information is that in all of Italy over two-thirds of these national leaders had not held local CGIL posts.

The characteristic of cynicism is not peculiar to the South. The Florentines are its historic and present masters. Neither is the furbo-fesso syndrome (the high value placed on being sly and the shame borne by a sucker). The padronedipendente (master domination of dependents) pattern is present in the most advanced parts of the north. Enrico Mattei ran the huge ENI public holding corporation in a personal and autocratic manner; Vittorio Valletta ran Fiat, the largest private Italian firm in the same fashion. The partisan intervention by prefects in the politics and elections in communes and provinces is well known. But it is not confined to the South. It dates back to the days of Cayour in Piedmont after 1848. Tarrow writes that in the North the prefect "is a humble functionary whose duties are performed quietly and apolitically." I doubt that there is a single mayor in northern Italy who would subscribe to that statement, especially the Communist mayors of the red belt.

What I have written is not to reduce the worth of Tarrow's work. On the contrary, I consider it all the more valuable, for many of his acute and penetrating insights have an even wider application than he is willing to grant them. His discussion of "clientelism" in southern politics, a crucial aspect of the political culture, is relevant here. In my opinion the relationship of the Communist leaders of the cooperatives in Emilia-Romagna and Tuscany to their members and employees is essentially clientelistic. Tarrow emphasizes the distinction between the old-style clientelism of the southern notables and the new clientelism of the party bureaucrats. The new style is "Patronage channeled through an organization rather than through a chain of individuals." But to me an organization is a chain of individuals (more tightly or more loosely structured) and the party bureaucrat is a new notable added to the others, whose manipulation of clienteles and patronage is important in all of Italy.

Tarrow tends to waver in his definition of the North. Sometimes he means all of Italy above the regions of Lazio and Abruzzi; on other occasions he is really describing the northwest industrialized triangle of Liguria, Piedmont and western Lombardy. At times he makes the distinctions between northwest, northeast, and center-north clear; at other times he does not. There are political differences between western and eastern Lombardy, and between Emilia-

Romagna and the Veneto. There are also many Souths, and sometimes he is clear about this while othertimes not. Western Sicily is different from eastern Sicily because, if for no other reason, the Mafia is present in the west while it is absent in the east.

I am bothered by two of his positions on the causes and consequences of political modernization. He believes modernization of the South can only come from substantial industrialization. I feel that modernization does not necessarily require this: Denmark is an example of an advanced country based on modern agriculture and commerce, but little industrialization. This is an important issue because the feasibility of the major industrialization of southern Italy is currently being debated by Italian economists and industrialists. Tarrow believes that modernization creates coherent class and group distinctions, simplifying conflicts and providing natural economic and political alignments. I feel the opposite is true; the more modern the society the less clear the social and class identifications. At the theoretical extreme of advancement everybody is middle class.

Tarrow gives us a first-rate analysis of the thought of Antonio Gramsci, the patron saint of Italian communism. He makes a major contribution in showing us how Palmiro Togliatti and his followers departed from Gramsci while claiming to follow in his footsteps. Togliatti's populistic alliance of all social groups and elements, excluding only the large monopolists, is far different from Gramsci's revolutionary alliance between northern workers and southern peasants. Tarrow believes that Togliatti's strategy, imposed from the north onto the south, threw away the revolutionary potential of landless farm laborers and desperately poor share tenants in the south. Instead, it achieved at best, through its emphasis on land reform and the breaking up of the great estates, an increase in Communist votes but also an enlarged class of basically conservative peasant proprietors, many of whom would be added to the clienteles of Christian Democracy. Although the question is academic since the alternative was not attempted, I doubt that a strategy of revolutionary alliance could have worked in the south. National and international forces would have blocked it. It also, would have required a revolutionary working class. But, as the Communist leader Giorgio Amendola has complained, the Italian workers, even those in the Communist-controlled unions, have neither a revolutionary consciousness nor a general political consciousness.

Norman Kogan

The University of Connecticut

Popular Government in America: Foundations and Principles. By Charles S. Hyneman with the collaboration of Charles E. Gilbert. (New York: Atherton Press, 1968. Pp. 320. $8.50.)

In this thoughtful and stimulating book a mature political scientist reexamines some of the basic problems of democratic government. His task is guided by a conscious theoretical commitment: "to prepare the ground for theory making, and perhaps to take a first few steps in proposing theory about democratic government." Hyneman's "concern" is with "a political system in which the people have effective means for expressing expectations and preferences and for inducing compliance with their demands." He seeks to provide an "analysis," and to offer some "perspectives," to help stu-dent and scholar alike clarify "the basic rationale of popular government in the United States " He is particularly concerned with the basic proposition "that the democratic character of a political system is determined by finding answers to a three-part question: How much of the population shares, in how much of the critical decision-making, with how much impact or influence."

The essays in the book—which were pieced together, revised, and supplemented with the help of Charles Gilbert—cover five main topics: I. Democratic Ideals; II. Popular Government; III. The Structure of Authority; IV. Limited Government; and V. Democracy on Trial. Under these headings Hyneman clarifies the social requisites of democratic government in terms of three key concepts: individual and group autonomy, the commitment to equality, and commonality. Autonomy involves free choice for the individual and a pluralist social structure. Equality involves the concept of equity, of fairness, of the opportunity which permits free men to realize their potential and contribute to the common good. Commonality is a term Hyneman employs to emphasize common beliefs, purposes, and methods, and includes the mutual acceptance of the rules of the democratic game. Professor Hyneman also identifies two systems of demand and response which figure importantly in determining how much of the population shares in how much of the critical decisionmaking with how much influence. One of these he calls the group competition thesis or the pluralist demand-response system. The other he calls the equalization of influence thesis or the populist demand-response system. These two theses are used to illuminate varying aspects of popular government throughout the book. Hyneman also stresses the crucial role of the "critical electorate" and the ways in which various types of voters (e.g., issue oriented, candidate oriented, and party oriented voters) exercise control of government. He is vitally interested in "distributed self-government," his term for the division of power among national, state, and local political communities. He explores key questions concerning the authority, fitness, and answerability of legislative representatives; repeats his earlier professional concern about (indeed, his fear of) Presidential power and an inadequately controlled Administration; probes the ways by which limited government can be made more secure; raises serious questions about the price of free speech and the problems of democratic self-protection; and concludes with an analysis of the Negroes' challenge, the contemporary movement of protest and resistance, and the continuing task of preserving democracy's foundations.

Hyneman argues that the treatment of black men in America constitutes a serious challenge to personal and group autonomy, to equality, and to commonality. Yet although he recognizes the legitimacy of the black man's effort to secure first-class citizenship, his focus is less on the effort required to bring American practice intc accord with American ideals and democratic requisites than it is on the need to probe the bounds of permissible protest and resistance. His operational presumptions are in favor of verbal protest and against refusal to comply with the law. He is very much concerned with identifying the protesters, their objectives, strategies and tactics, and the consequences of their actions. He endorses protest and resistance which will gain for black men and women not only the right to vote but a better life in all aspects; but, although he is willing to accept the sting and inconvenience involved in this protest, he opposes violation of the law or even non-violent action that provokes violence.

In Hyneman's judgment, commonality is in greater jeopardy today than autonomy or equality. As he is more sympathetic to antisubversive legislation to preserve democratic government, so he is less sympathetic to the "communicating elite" whose bias, distortion, and partisanship—he holds—corrode that moderate leadership and that spirit of toleration essential to commonality.

This somewhat selective summary of his thesis and argument does not, alas, do justice to his consistent concern for theory. Throughout the book he employs thoughtful questions, simple models, and reasoned argument to explore how theory may be employed in illuminating democratic government. Throughout Hyneman emphasizes the need to develop and employ theory to clarify and appraise competing values, to guide empirical research, and to facilitate sound political judgment on troublesome questions of public policy.

Hyneman, himself, is clearly partial to a politics of compromise and toleration, to the equalization of influence thesis (the populist demand-response system), to Congressional (rather than to Presidential) power, to "distributed self-government" (rather than to the concentration of power in Washington), to the legitimacy of careful anti-subversive legislation designed to protect popular government itself, to a more conservative interpretation of the bounds to free speech, and Negro protest and resistance. Yet his more conservative liberalism should not obscure the value of his analysis at key points, his efforts to advance the cause of democratic theory, and his seasoned judgments on many of the controversial problems of popular government. Those to his left politically may challenge his views on free speech and subversion, or on the Negro Revolt, or on current movements of protest and resistance, but-perhaps ironically—they may (in the light of the war in Vietnam and other exercises of power under President Johnson) share his misgivings over the dangers of inadequately controlled Presidential power. In fairness to Professor Hyneman's detached, calm, and non-partisan analysis, I hasten to add, he does not illustrate his fears of Presidential power by reference to Vietnam or President Johnson.

However, whether we agree or disagree with his critique, we can profitably probe democratic theory and practice in many of the ways he suggests. His book constitutes a healthy antidote for much of the uncritical, unhistorical, unphilosophical, and self-righteous propaganda of partisans of the New Left. Their very sound commitment to authentic human beings, to civil rights, to the Negro, to the poor, to enhanced democratic participation in political and social life, to honest institutions, and to a speedy end to the terrible and tragic war in Vietnam, may be served by their greater willingness to explore democratic theory by engaging in a more genuine dialogue nourished by many of the normative, empirical, and prudential considerations that Professor Hyneman raises. Such a dialogue, moreover, would be mutually beneficial.

In such a debate, those on the Left might cogently urge Professor Hyneman to adopt a broader view of the citizen's role in the polity, and not to focus so sharply on voting and other aspects of the formally legal government. They might suggest that his own logic in favor of "participative democracy" should move him toward a more radical diagnosis of racism in America and ways to overcome it. They might point out that his commitment to the equalization of influence thesis most definitely requires him to ask how the influence of the poor can be enhanced? And can it be enhanced without increased power for the President and the national government? They might also raise the question, "What price commonality?" as Professor Hyneman has raised the questions "What price free speech" and "What price protest and resistance?" They might defend many of the "communicating elite" for challenging unhealthy aspects of the status quo even if this elite's exaggerated rhetoric sometimes violates a gentlemanly ethos.

Hyneman, on the other hand, might underscore the need in a democratic society to balance the preferred and the feasible. He might emphasize the dangers of intolerance. He might note that the unrighteous as well as the righteous may violate the law and resort to violence. He might challenge the power of even the righteous minority. He might emphasize (to their delight) that fundamental policy (e.g., the undeclared war in Vietnam) must be made and changed only with the concurrence of the representative assembly. He might question efforts of some on the "righteous Left" to silence those with whom they passionately disagree or to subvert a lawful institution (e.g., a University) because some of its practices are objectionable to them.

The ensuing debate, if carried on in accord with Hyneman's guide lines (e.g., who protests? what are their objectives? strategy and tactics? what are the consequences of their actions?), might be very productive. It would certainly emphasize dramatically the several tasks that Professor Hyneman sees as cardinal tasks for the political theorist in a democratic society: the clarification of democratic values, meaningful understanding of significant empirical political patterns, and the sharpening of prudential judgment on key issues of public policy.

NEAL RIEMER University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee

Prayer in the Public Schools: Law and Attitude Change. By WILLIAM K. Muir, Jr. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967. Pp. 170. $5.95.)

The Dynamics of Compliance: Supreme Court Decision-Making from a New Perspective. By RICHARD M. JOHNSON. (Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1967. Pp. 176. $5.95.)

It is of course a truism for students of public law that Supreme Court policies are generally not self-executing. But only within the last decade has there been much effort to study systematically the impact of Court decisions and the nature of compliance to Court policies. Increasingly such studies have been theoretically oriented and concerned with developing rigorous methodology. This has involved, in part, a concern with attitudes and public opinion and the use of survey techniques. Prayer in the Public Schools by William Muir and The Dynamics of Compliance by Richard Johnson are recent studies of this genre.

Both books are impact/compliance studies of the Supreme Court's 1963 prayer decision (Abington School District v. Schempp) on a local public school system. Both are theoretically oriented and employ survey techniques. And both are welcome additions to the developing literature.

William Muir's principal interest was with certain attitudes of the public educational elite of a medium-size city he calls "Midland" as those attitudes were affected by the policy pronouncement in Schempp and the subsequent voluntary decision of the Midland school board to comply. Muir interviewed his sample of 28 school officials both six months before and about eight months after Schempp. The reinterviews gave Muir the opportunity to compare pre-Schempp attitudes to post-Schempp attitudes and thus to attempt to answer the broad questions "Can law change deep-rooted attitudes?" (p. 1) and "under what circumstances [does] law change them positively?" (p. 3).

In answering these questions Muir heavily relied upon cognitive dissonance theory. For others than those who were "vindicated," Muir hypothesized and then found his respondents' patterns of public and private (attitudinal) response to "the law" as having been one of four types. Muir assumes that the immediate motive for the varying patterns of perceptual and attitudinal response is the reduction of cognitive dissonance which itself is assumed to occur after the individual commits himself to compliance or non-compliance. Muir's task was to explain why his respondents demonstrated one response pattern rather than another. To get at this he examined and classified his respondents pre and post Schempp responses to questions concerning their role perceptions or "self-images" (Muir's term) concerning schoolhouse religion, their specific policy preferences concerning religious practices in the public schools, and their attitudes toward law and the Supreme Court. Muir further relied on "armchair" psychological analyses of his respondents. The findings are many and should be of interest to scholars in this field.

Some mention should be made of Muir's "armchair" analyses. (Muir himself, in a different context, provides a convenient definition of this term: "my intuition about the respondents, an intuition which was tutored equally by their words and by their gestures, facial expressions, and hesitancies, by nonverbal cues that become invisible on the typewritten record" p. 62). Muir goes about this with a novelist's eye and neo-Freudian's gleam. Although these analyses are imaginative and occasionally persuasive, one can perhaps be skeptical of their veracity. Muir purports to have discerned "the mental frames" (p. 35) and "perceptual habits" (p. 31) of his respondents on the basis of two interviews. Of one principal, for example, we are told that the Church "provided her a picture of reality which gave a context to some of her perceptions" (p. 34). Of a Jewish principal who Muir claims (although on what basis it is unclear) "had lost the respect of Jews" (p. 35), we are told "he committed himself to an almost paranoic view of the world in which he was the victim" (p. 35). Lest the reader conclude that the city school system was bursting with neurotics. Muir notes

The majority had its "door open," its "ear to the ground." Its perceptual habits were healthy, not morbid. (p. 35)

At another point we are told that "The Midland staff became angry at the prayer ban" and "took its agression out on the Supreme Court" (p. 118). In short, armchair psychology is one "methodology" which must be cautiously used if it is to be taken seriously. In a few instances (e.g. those cited above) such caution is lacking. Yet it should also be noted that Muir skillfully interweaves the armchair psychology with his more empirically based analyses to provide plausible (if not altogether convincing) answers to his research questions.

Muir, with commendable candor, recognizes methodological limitations of his study. He does this in several places in the text (pp. 47, 62, 73 n. 1) and in a methodological postscript in which he notes his study's "methodological looseness which should challenge the reader to question both the findings and the generalizations" (p. 139). He also frankly reveals "I frequently created and employed a method because its results corroborated conclusions I had previously intuited" (p. 140). Yet he also argues that "methodological makeshift... is justifiable and appropriate in venturing into a field not previously studied" (p. 140) and it is difficult to disagree especially when the "makeshift" is as imaginative as that constructed by Muir.

Muir's emphasis is on the psychology of compliance. Richard Johnson's book although concerned with this is also concerned with the politics of compliance. Indeed, Johnson's purpose is to provide a general framework in which to study compliance and to present a test case of that framework with the issue of schoolhouse religion in a rural Illinois school district comprising the towns he calls "Eastville-Westville."

Utilizing communications theory, Johnson analyzes the Supreme Court as a "message source," the substance of the schoolhouse religion "messages" in terms of the incentives to induce compliance contained within them, and both the formal and extralegal transmission of the "messages." Johnson examines the extralegal transmission to "Eastville-Westville" by way of a content analysis of the area newspapers and other media.

Cognitive balance theory is used to explain individual reactions to the transmitted messages both before ("cognitive imbalance") and after ("cognitive dissonance") the individual selects a course of action. Johnson's research design, unlike Muir's, was not attuned to investigate attitude change but rather the attitudes held by 176 respondents to a mail questionnaire almost a year after Schempp was decided and months after the school superintendent had achieved compliance within the school district. Johnson classified the respondents as to their modes of response and found seven types. Using a factor analysis of questionnaire responses and a scoring method built on it, Johnson further explored the bases of acceptance or rejection of the Court's policy associated with each response type.

One of Johnson's major conclusions is that the legitimacy and expertise bases of Supreme Court power are sufficient to induce compliance by those who acknowledge these bases despite their private disagreement with Court policy. This leads Johnson to advocate the furtherance of The Judicial Myth lest "important bases of Supreme Court power...be seriously undermined" (p. 150). This conclusion, however, may be premature. First it is questionable whether a disbelief in the myth is necessarily incompatible with a belief in the Court's legitimacy and expertise. More refined questions aimed at differentiating attitudes towards and the nature of the Court's systemic role from the myth per se would be desirable. Secondly, Muir's study suggests that those who privately disagreed with the Court's ruling but nevertheless complied with it did so not because of a belief in the myth but because of other reasons e.g. exaggeration of the Court's power and the perception of compulsion, social pressures, a desire to minimize community conflict. Third, one can conclude from both the Johnson and Muir studies that crucial to compliance was a key individual in the school system (the school superintendent in one, a lawyer on the school board in the other) willing to take the initiative in securing compliance because he strongly agreed with the Court's ruling but not necessarily the myth. In brief, the necessity for belief in the myth for compliance has yet to be demonstrated.

Both Muir and Johnson do not question the validity of the theory they utilize. Muir states in his preface "Creation and proof of dissonance theory are the psychologist's job, not the political scientist's" (p. viii). But this begs the question. Whether and to what extent cognitive imbalance existed when the prayer ruling was announced, and whether and to what degree cognitive dissonance existed subsequent to the individual decision to comply or not comply are empirical questions which should be recognized as such. Muir's findings (but not Johnson's) lend some support to cognitive dissonance theory but further research must be done by political scientists if such theory is to be accepted as a component of a compliance model.

It should be understood, however, that both Muir and Johnson through their imaginative research designs and creative use of theory have pushed the study of impact/compliance an important step forward. They have produced major studies which can be expected to have an impact on the field.

Seeldon Goldman University of Massachusetts

Uncertain Mandate. By Ernest W. Lefever. (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1967. Pp. 254. $7.50.)

Political Protest in the Congo. By HERBERT Weiss. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1965. Pp. 326. $8.50.)

Locked in uncomfortable embrace in this review are two quite disparate studies. They share the Congo (Kinshasa) as subject matter, but the similarity ends there. Herbert Weiss places one of the most important of the 1960 generation of Congolese political parties under minute scrutiny, while Ernest Lefever is primarily concerned with the functioning of the United Nations peace-keeping machinery in the Congo from 1960 to 1964.

The Weiss study is by far the more valuable of the two. Between its covers are the results of more than half a decade of painstaking research, begun in 1959 when the author was associated with the M.I.T. Center for International Studies. The major part of his field investigation took place in 1959-1960; he arrived at a particularly strategic moment, and enjoyed an intimacy of access into several of the most important Congolese political movements which is most unlikely to be available again to an overseas scholar. The present study focuses upon the Parti Solidaire Africain (PSA), a militant movement which at its height in late 1959 and the first part of 1960 was beyond doubt a mass single party within the geographical confines of Kwilu District, in southwestern Congo. The Weiss kit of photocopying equipment rarely ceased operation during his Kwilu work and an implausible wealth of party documents were amassed for the study; indeed, as he confesses in the introduction, his collection was in the end better than that of the party itself in many respects.

The central theme which Weiss distills from his vast stores of data is rural radicalism. In the interesting autobiography of the book which is offered by way of introduction, he retraces the evolution of his thinking in this regard. Initially, he shared the then orthodox view that radical nationalism was the artifact of a new, urban-oriented, Western-educated elite group, which drew in its train a reluctant, apathetic rural mass by charisma and cajolery. But his observation of rural organization by the PSA, and other militant parties such as the ABAKO, and Mouvement National Congolais/ Lumumba (MNC/L) suggested that this model needed to be stood upon its head. In Kwilu, in Lower Congo, in Orientale province party organizers were all but submerged by the radical pressures from their rural constituents.

There can be no doubt as to the accuracy of the author's perceptions in the regions where his data was gathered. Further research into the origins of modern nationalism elsewhere in Africa also lend some support to the Weiss arguments, in particular work of a group of historians at Dar es Salaam. Yet nagging doubts remain about the rural radicalism hypothesis. The highly centralized colonial system fashioned by Belgium assured a relative uniformity of experience in different areas of the Congo, yet the Kwilu pattern of response was by no means uniform for the whole country, although it might eventually have become so. There are enormous temporal fluctuations to explain as well; retracing Weiss's footsteps two years later, the reviewer found apathy, disillusion and social demobilization where Weiss had seen effervescent ebullience. The pendulum took another violent swing 18 months later, when the Mulele rebellion swept a portion of the area, and this in turn has been succeeded by renewed quiescent despair. That the tensions of enforced change and oppression have secreted a volatile protest potential is clear. But far more needs to be ascertained about the conditions in which it becomes activated into overt group behavior, the organizational form in which it becomes manifest, and the determinants of the system of values through which frustration is expressed.

But the contribution of the Weiss study goes far beyond the issue of rural radicalism. As a detailed exploration of the birth and growth of a major political party, it is an invaluable case study, made particularly important by the fact that the PSA was not a capital-centered movement. The process of giving organizational form, however shortlived, to the volatile sentiments of the countryside is illuminating. During its brief life as an effective party, the PSA had two election campaigns to confront; in the first, it organized and enforced a boycott, and in the second it had the difficult task of establishing lists for a complex proportional representation system, with both national and provincial seats at stake. The study stops at indepencence; one might have hoped for some account of the phase of disintegration of the PSA rural organization in the months following, or its life as a parliamentary clique in Kinshasa.

Weiss proposes a typology of the major Congolese parties which is of considerable interest and comparative value in its own right. He goes far beyond the mass v. patron dichotomy which dominated early literature on African parties, and suggests ten attributes which may be used to establish a party profile, including style, duration, orbit, sociological base, and nature of leadership.

A companion study on the development of the MNC/Lumumba is promised for the near future. There seems every reason to assume that it will be of the same high quality as the PSA study, and to wish it an accelerated gestation.

The Lefever volume is not in the same class. The author, now a staff member of the Brookings Institution, began his study while in the employ of the Institute for Defense Analyses. There is a substantial overlap between the present work, and an earlier Lefever study, Crisis in the Congo: A U.N. Force in Action (Washington: Brookings Institution, 1965), although Uncertain Mandate does focus more explicitly on the roles of the various national actors. The author has circled the globe in search of material, pursuing prominent participants to the ends of the earth; respondents were bagged from Rome to New Delhi, from Ottawa to Addis Ababa. Curiously, field work in the Congo itself appears to have been very cursory, and Lefever seems to have interrogated very few Congolese, which perhaps explains the inadequacy of the treatment of Congolese internal politics.

The primary purpose of the study is to investigate the practicality of multi-national peace-keeping forces through the U.N. mechanism. He explores in turn the rule of the General Secretary, the host country, the United States, the Soviet Union, Britain, France, Belgium, and the smaller states in the U.N. operation in the Congo from 1960 to 1964. He has been thorough in his coverage of U.N. official documents, and has interviewed a large percentage of the international personnel associated with ONUC. The official sponsorship of the initial phase of the investigation presumably assured him access to an array of classified American materials. All of these resources ensure the basis for a useful summary of the U.N. operation. Lefever concludes, plausibly, that the Congo experiment clearly demonstrated the limitations of the U.N. mechanism in this type of crisis. The U.N. could and did restrict the capacity of local power contenders, with their international allies, to impose their will by force. Physical force remained a key determinant of outcomes, but its operation was much more subtle than, say, in Nigeria today. But the breathless expectations of 1960 on the East River—that the U.N. could serve a helpless new state as a benevolent colonial surrogate without colonial authority—were utterly disappointed. As Lefever suggests, the U.N. achievement was by no means negligible; for an investment of $411 million in cash, and the human resources of a large number of highly competent international civil servants, the Congo gained four years of breathing space. While the Congo situation by 1964 may not have been very good, the grisly slaughter in Nigeria suggests how much worse it might have been.

The book would have benefited from a more detached perspective from the author. Lefever seems to have little doubt that United States interests have a special sanctity, and that the best evaluative standard for a multi-national operation is the "goodness of fit" between its performance and U.S. policy. On this score card, the U.N. in the Congo receives high ratings. Lefever confirms the observations of Soviet and radical Afro-Asian commentators that ONUC was dominated by an Americanled coalition. Through this looking-glass, the support for Lumumba by radical African states was "simplistic" (p. 169); African states in using the U.N. to achieve their national objectives are guilty of hypocrisy and a double standard (p. 218), while the U.S. apparently obeys the dictates of a higher law in doing the same thing; U.N. officials were exhorted to display the "courage to withstand Communist and neutralist pressures" (p. 147), presumably saesoned by the good sense to truckle immediately to Western pressures. A modicum of empathy would have softened many of the harsher judgements, and produced conclusions more persuasive to those outside of the official policy-making community.

CRAWFORD YOUNG

University of Wisconsin

Nomos X: Representation. Edited By J. Ro-LAND PENNOCK AND JOHN W. CHAPMAN. (New York: Atherton Fress, 1968. Pp. 317. $6.95.)

What happens when 19 diverse intellectuals, representing political science (including two Polish Marxists), law, philosophy and mathematics, write on the concept of representation? Perhaps surprisingly, a rather high degree of consensus emerges. The mandate-independence controversies of the past are rejected, both empirically and normatively. Complex and diverse issues both compel and make it desirable that the representative act with independence. As Marek Sobolewski argues, the Marxist concept of the mandate is inadequate for present political realities. But the representative is not only increasingly independent vis-a-vis his constituency. There has been a decline in party discipline as well. The range of issues makes it difficult for a party to present an integrated program which will hold all of its members on every or almost every issue. Consequently control over the representative is not to be found in specific acts of party discipline or in votes by the electorate, although these continue to have some influence. The representative is both informed of popular desires and controlled in more general ways. A variety of pressure groups and channels of communication exist to transmit the desires of the people to the representative. But he is not strictly determined. He knows what his constituents want, and undoubtedly he will be affected. But he also knows that the interests of that larger constituency, the nation, must be considered and that the prevailing issue-ignorance of the public free him to consider what, in fact, would be good for the country. This responsible responsiveness is reinforced or hindered by the concept of representation held by the representative and by the public. At least to some degree, he is independent if he considers that his role demands independence and responsible if he feels he ought to be responsible. Conversely, he may fail to consider wider interests if, as David Apter suggests, either he or his constituents have an inadequate notion of his role. Roles formed in an industrial setting but transferred to a nonindustrial one may unduly tax the political system. A plunder psychology may develop which demands immediate need-satisfaction where what is required is long-range planning. Or, as Eric Nordlinger argues, the constituents may have a mandate concept of the representative's role and, accordingly, be deeply suspicious of his attempts to act outside his mandate. This suspicion may endanger the legitimacy of his actions and, therewith, the very principle of representation itself.

What emerges, then, from the Tenth Yearbook of the American Society for Legal and Political Philosophy is a pluralistic concept of representation which is admirably summarized in "Political Representation: An Overview" by J. Roland Pennock. It also shows up in the rather startling frequency with which the Supreme Court's reapportionment decisions are criticized. Charles Black, Stuart Brown, Lewis Dexter and Robert Dixon follow diverse approaches and arguments in arriving at the same general conclusion: Reapportionment was necessary but the Court's opinions were careless, thoughtless, and simplistic. As Brown argues, the Court opted for one theory of representation without any sufficient reason and that theory, a radical egalitarianism linked to the concept of a mandate, is precisely the theory rejected throughout the volume. Dixon points out, morevoer, that the Court tried to correct substantive evils with a formalistic egalitarianism. In doing so, the Court embraced an unrestricted majoritarianism which may well endanger minority rights. Only Donald Stokes defends the Court. As he sees it the Court's decision to make one man, one vote the criteria for each house in the states will strengthen party control which is necessary for efficient government which, in turn, is necessary to insure governmental legitimacy. Unfortunately Stokes' arguments sound tired and, in general, do not meet the objections raised by the Court's critics. (The mathematical implications of weighted voting and one man, one vote are also considered in papers by William Riker, Lloyd Shaplev and Robert Nozick, which in general continue the criticisms of the Court.)

It is necessary to express some reservations about this heady consensus over the virtues of pluralism. One finds it disturbing that so much of the discussion should have centered on the Court's reapportionment decisions when so little is said about the more interesting challenges raised by Negro disaffection and alienation from pluralistic democracy. What of the tendency toward withdrawal into homogeneous communities? More generally, what about the problems implicit in voter ignorance, apathy. and indifference? The issues raised by Black nationalists, by the radical left as well as some on the right, ought really to have received more serious consideration (even granting that the papers are the outgrowth of the Association's 1965 meeting). Very little attention is paid to what ought the represented to want and expect from government. What ought to be the ends pursued by government? One suspects that many of the writers would agree with Sobolewski that class interests, i.e., economic considerations, are the main determinants of voting behavior and the reflection of popular desires. But such crass materialism is not even compatible with Marx's fuller notion of alienation. The problem of what the individual does and ought to want hinges on what one thinks man ought to be. Is politics intended to contribute to the growth of the individual, to the fulfillment of his identity—an identity which includes but transcends merely economic needs? How much of a person's identity ought to be or can be represented? Julius Cohen does touch on these problems and suggests their complexity when he remarks that "there is somehow a social dimension to the identity of the principal ... his identity is not exhausted merely by treating him as Mill once did, as an isolated independent entity." (p. 47) It may be, when all is said and done, that the issues raised by the new left and the Black radicals are only bread and butter economic issues—though one suspects, or hopes, that there is something more to it than that.

One must be fair. Some attention is given to the procedural problems of representation which have been raised by the dissidents. Joseph Witherspoon considers methods of increasing popular participation in the bureaucratic process since the legislative process, in fact, so often begins in the bureaucracy where problems are defined and programs formulated. As he points out, citizen involvement improves the flow of information not only to but from the government, hopefully improving the programs and gaining more acceptance for them. Both the Poles, but especially Witold Zakrzewski, grapple with the manner of increasing citizen involvement through a variety of local governments (though given recent developments in Poland there is a hollow ring to their remarks). The importance of involvement is suggested by Apter's argument that a hierarchy with insufficient participation and a low flow of information increases the likelihood of coercive governmental action since coercion is often a response to uncertainty. But throughout the emphasis tends to be on questions of govermental stability rather than on what the goals of governments and men ought to be. Perhaps only Harvey Mansfield, Jr. fully raises the more general questions. Mansfield argues, contrary to current scholarly opinion, that representative government is a modern innovation, decisively different from premodern government. All premodern government, regardless of the form, was government by divine right. In rejecting divine right, in the name of freedom and toleration, modern political philosophy rejected the political relevance of man's noblest aspirations. "Modern representation requires a representable society consecrated by an undemanding god, a society without aspirations." (p. 73) Unfortunately, the general failure of the other essays to discuss modern representative government in terms of man's nobler aspirations may give support to Mansfield's arguments. There are some, however, who hope that it is not impossible to combine the nobility and the virtues of classical and medieval life and thought with the freedom and diversity of modern representative government.

JAMES A. STEINTRAGER

University of Texas at Austin

Cuba and the United States: Long-Range Perspectives. Edited by John Plank. (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1967. Pp. 248. $6.75.)

Revolutionary Politics and the Cuban Working Class. By MAURICE ZEITLIN. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1967. Pp. 295. $8.50.)

The literature on the Cuban Revolution, although voluminous, is very thin when viewed from scholarly perspectives. Being generous, no more than a dozen books in Spanish, English, and French combined would go on the "must" reading list. Here are two more candidates for honors; of the two, Zeitlin makes it, Plank does not.

The book edited by Plank is an anthology of ten essays commissioned by the Brookings Institution, submitted to the editor in 1963, 1964, and 1965, and finally published in 1967. The essays are aimed at "the concerned citizen" and in one way or another all of them (with the exception of Robert Smith's contribution on domestic politics) attempt to locate the Revolution in its international settings. Thus there is "A Hemispheric Perspective" by Kalman Silvert, "A European Perspective" by Raymond Aron and Alfred Grosser, "Castro on the Chessboard of the Cold War" by Leon Lipson, and essays of much the same tone and style by Henry Wriston, Tad Szulc, Raymond Carr, Hanson Baldwin, and others.

A book of this sort about the Cuban Revolution must inevitably miss the mark for two very obvious reasons. First, by the time it reaches the public, it is frightfully out of date. For instance, the imprint of the missile crisis of October, 1962, is still heavy on many of the essays, for this was the most recent major international event involving Cuba at the time that many of the papers were written. Needless to say, much of relevance has happened for and to Cuba since then. Secondly, the audience of "concerned citizens" for whom the volume is intended probably does not exist as an audience that can be "written for." It is composed of harried bureaucrats, educated housewives, preoccupied businessmen, professors and students among others. If this clientele is ever going to learn anything about Cuba, it needs more diverse fare. As it stands, the book is composed of essays that are neither fish nor fowl. They lack the bite, topicality and vividness of first-rate reporting, and none has the data base nor achieves the objectivity, insight and analytical sophistication that we expect of first class scholarship. This is not to say that some are not interesting and intelligent; they are. Aron's essay in particular captures and communicates well the bewilderment of a European intellectual confronted by the tangled history and mad logic of United States policy toward Cuba. But even though a few of the articles rise to this level of insight and sophistication, the bulk of the book is pretty standard stuff, admixed at times with not a little scare-talk, jingoism, and self-congratulation, a style that is most manifest in Bayless Manning's colsing essay, "An Overall Perspective."

Zeitlin's book is of quite another type. It has the distinction of being the only book-length study on the Cuban Revolution in any language that is based on field research on the island. (The Cubans have done some studies of this sort, but they have never been released for publication). This alone elevates Zeitlin's work to the "must" list. There are other books based on a trip or two to the island, documentary sources, and chats with officials, but Zeitlin actually conducted formal interviews during the summer of 1962 with a sample of 202 randomly selected Cuban workers from 21 industrial plants. The study was carried out with the support and approval of the then Cuban Minister of Industries, Ernesto "Che" Guevara. Zeitlin deserves great credit for designing and executing such a study after the break in diplomatic relations between Cuba and the United States. It was no mean feat, and there is little evidence that he compromised his design or scholarly purposes in order to gain access.

With the exception of Chapter Ten in which the author dichotomizes his sample into those who support free speech for opponents of the revolution and those who would suppress it, the main dependent variable of the study is the worker's attitude toward the revolution. This was measured by a well-constructed six point Guttman scale which Zeitlin collapsed into the trichotomy "favorable," "indecisive," and "hostile" for purposes of analysis. He also makes considerable use of the variable 'attitude toward the Communists before the revolution," measured in a much less satisfactory manner by a single retrospective question. In Chapters Two through Nine he analyzes variations in these two attitudinal dimensions (toward the revolution and toward the Communists) in the light of workers' economic insecurities, race, level of skill, sex and marital status (in a chapter delightfully mistitled "Sex and the Single Worker"), social mobility, plant relations, alienation from their work, and the political generations to which they belong. Chapter Ten, as suggested above, analyzes the determinants or at least the concomitants of more as opposed to less liberal attitudes of workers toward those who would criticize the revolution. The eleventh and final chapter is an overview of the "meanings" for members of the working class of the recent history of Cuba and workers' perceptions of their role and place in the revolutionary process.

In a short review, it is not possible even to suggest much less to discuss the bulk of Zeitlin's findings, but his work on political generations does deserve special mention. Whereas the other analyses in the book depend on fairly standard sociological variables combed out of the questionnaire materials, the chapter on political generations is more imaginative. Zeitlin divides his sample into five generations, taking as his chronological cutting points historical events deemed relevant to the working class. He then predicts a rank-ordering by generation of support for the Communists and another of support for the revolution. Particularly in the case of support for the revolution, his predictions are not at all "obvious," deriving as they do from expectations about the consequences of national events for individual political socialization. His predictions are almost completely borne out by the data, including his expectation that the youngest generation (those from 21 to 27 years old at the time of the study) would be one of the two groups least favorable to the revolution (actually they were the least favorable). This chapter stands as an impressive demonstration of the manner in which data on individuals can be made much more meaningful through being embedded in the context of national events. More importantly, it is also a powerful argument in favor of viewing relevant political attitudes and postures—at least when studying developing countries—as deeply affected by adult socialization experiences rather than as predominantly determined in family or school settings.

Just as Revolutionary Politics and the Cuban Working Class is a book worth reading, it is also a book worth criticising. Zeitlin created for himself a magnificent opportunity to write a classic about the Cuban Revolution. His book falls significantly short of this potential achievement for a number of reasons—two of which will be mentioned here: First, many of the questions which he set out to answer derive from, are shaped by, and are cast in a vocabulary taken from 19th and early 20th Century Marxism and anarchosyndicalism. If we grant that as philosophical and organizational traditions these had some importance in the evolution of the Cuban labor movement. this does not justify dragging them in to shape the sociological analysis of revolutionary Cuba. The smoke of old battles drifts across the pages and footnotes of this book, and the ghosts of old European warriors come to haunt and confuse our understanding of Castro's Cuba. There is even a more modern aspect of all this extraneous and sometimes antiquated theorizing. Working with data on the political beliefs and "tolerance" of Cuban workers. Zeitlin attacks Lipset's thesis on working-class authoritarianism. Lipset probably deserves all the knocks that Zeitlin gives him, but if so, it is a case of the right battle fought at the wrong time, in the wrong book, and with the wrong data. Let me make perfectly clear that I do not object to either the undertones or overtones of political radicalism and sociological revisionism that run through the book. I would simply argue that there are more modern weapons than anarchosyndicalist thought and more powerful intellectual allies than Friedrich Engels for one who wishes to do battle against midcle-class Yankee sociology while at the same time analyzing the Cuban Revolution. In Zeitlin's case, both his politics and his sociology are weakened by his allegiance to these particular reference groups.

In the second place, the data generated by Zeitlin's field work are unevenly and incompletely analyzed. Such is almost always the case with survey research, but in this instance the shortcomings are acute and the consequences perhaps more unfortunate than usual. His field questionnaire contained 92 items: perhaps less than half of the data generated by these questions found their way into the analyses presented in the book. One suspects that the author himself was embarrassed by the amount of data that did not get analyzed and reported, for Revolutionary Politics and the Cuban Working Class does not contain either the original Spanish of the English version of the austionnaire. To read Zeitlin's questionnaire one must go to his Ph.D. dissertation, which is, to say the least, an inconvenience. Especially after reading the full interview schedule, one comes away from the book with a sense of opportunities missed. But even confining the critique to the data actually used, there is a certain heaviness about the manner in which the author keeps returning to attitude toward the revolution and attitude toward Communism as the two dependent variables. Given the importance of the topic, the uniqueness of the field opportunity, the author's tenacity and resourcefulness in gathering the data, and the five years which then passed before the book was issued. one might hope for a more complete and multifaceted analysis. Essential reading on the Cuban Revolution it is; a classic it is not.

RICHARD R. FAGEN

Stanford University

The Swatantra Party and Indian Conservatism.

By Howard L. Erdman. (New York;
Cambridge University Press, 1967. Pp. 356.

$9.50.)

Mr. Erdman's lucidly written, well-organized and thoroughly researched book offers a comprehensive view of the Swatantra Party's origins, structure, leadership, ideology and decision making processes through India's fourth general election held in early 1967. By relating his analysis to conservatism in Indian thought and society and to the economic and social forces that constitute the party's environmental challenge; he provides perspectives and insights hitherto unavailable in studies of Indian politics. Conservatism, both manifest and latent, has been obscured by the shadow of Nehru and neglected by scholars concerned with economic and political development. By calling our attention to latent conservatism, he makes clear that the Swatantra Party has mobilized only a fraction of the conservative forces in the country. The analvsis is based on national party files and records, published commentary and statements by the party organizations and its notables, and extensive and detailed interviews conducted throughout India in 1962/63 and again in 1966/67 with elected and party officials and party supporters. Mr. Erdman was remarkably successful in winning and holding the confidence of those whom he interviewed and in writing an account that keeps faith both with them and with scholarship, no mean accomplishment in these days when American scholars abroad are everywhere suspect. Although it does not attend to the doctrines of representation that introduce Samuel H. Beer's superb study of Britain's Labour and Tory parties. Mr. Erdman's book provides a comparable understanding of one of India's major parties.

The Swatantra Party's outlook ranges from the modified Gandhianism of its aged and nationally respected leader, C. Rajagopalachari, through the "feudal" landed conservatism of princes and nobles, to the modern liberalism of urban professionals and Bombay industrialists. Heterogeneity of outlook is matched by heterogeneity of support. While Minoo Masani was general secretary, he pressed for more rationalized professional and centralized party organization, emphasized in the party program and image its liberal qualities and gave strategic priority in the allocation of finance and official support to national parliamentary as against state legislative candidates. The party's state and local elites, made up primarily of rural based "feudalists," the former rulers and noblemen of princely India, command most of the party's electoral support in the states where it is strong, Rajasthan, Orissa, Gujarat and, for a time, Bihar. They have resisted the attempts of the party's national elite, made up primarliy of ex-civil servants and modern businessmen, to use the party's central organs to achieve the goals pursued by Masani when he was general secretary. They are self-financing, and able to rely upon what in eighteenth century Britain were called interests and connections, that is, command of the political resources provided by organic and hierarchical territorial communities and the aggregation of these and other kinds of political resources through channels of kinship, dependence, patronage, friendship and personality. More concerned than the national elite to capture state power. they have also been more sympathetic to doctrines and programs that speak to rural electorates in terms of religious fundamentalism and local pride.

Mr. Erdman makes clear that the Swatantra national office has not had the resources to make good its preferences. It is ironic that the leading laissez-faire party in India has found that the commercial and industrial leaders from whom funds for the national office might be raised were, in the words of C. Rajagoplachari, "in the grip of the ruling [Congress] party." (p. 172) Through the 1967 general elections most businessmen felt they could protect themselves better from Congress socialism by giving more to the Congress than to Swatantra. (Now that Congress dominance has been shattered, it has brought in legislation barring corporate giving to political parties.) Given these constraints and limitation, Mr. Erdman remains cautious in his prognostications concerning the party's future.

Mr. Erdman's book invites comparison with other entries in the literature on Indian parties. Like several of them—Myron Weiner's 1957 account of the non-communist parties in opposition to Congress; Marshall Windmiller and the late Eugene Overstreet's 1959 study of the then Communist Party of India-it focusses on the national level of party structure, leadership, ideology and behavior. Unlike them it pays much more attention to the state level and to patterns of interaction between national and state parties. It does not concern itself explicitly and systematically with the relationship between district and state politics as does Paul Brass' 1965 study of Congress factionalism in Uttar Pradesh nor with the interaction and mutual penetration at the district level between modern political structures represented by the Congress and the various organized economic and social forces found in the environment, as does Weiner's most recent study. These contrasting research strategies vield somewhat different kinds of knowledge about Indian parties. Erdman's study and the other national studies tell us more about ideology, program and party organization while Brass and the second Weiner study tell us more, for example, about paracommunities and personal followings. Such differences are not only the result of varying research strategies employed in the study of Indian parties; they are also artifacts of system level differences and of the parties themselves. It is not until one reaches the national level, for example, that ideological differences within and among parties become a meaningful independent variable. By focussing as much as he does on the state level system, Erdman manages to maximize the range of his observations and findings. And there is much less point in attending to districts in a study of the Swatantra Party for the simple reason that it, unlike Congress, lacks viable district organizations.

It is difficult to cavil at Mr. Erdman's decision to set his analysis of the Swatantra Party in the context of conservatism generally and Indian conservatism in particular. This was the book that he intended to write. Yet in doing so he dealt with some questions only by implication; the evidence is there but the questions and concepts necessary to provide answers are missing. For example, how are Swatantra's strategy and structure shaped by its place in the party system, by the electoral system and by larger political environment? To what extent does the party shape social forces and cleavages and to what extent is it shaped by them? To what extent is its organizational looseness a consequence of the Indian political system, particularly its federal dimension? Finally (and here the evidence is not provided), how does the Swatantra Party compare to conservative parties in other countries, including European countries, not only today but as they took shape and entered earlier political arenas?

The Swatantra Party and Indian Conservatism is work of enduring value. By directing our attention to the India of businessmen, princes and peasants it provides a much needed corrective to the India of modern nationalists and urban radicals of the left or the right so often featured in Indian political studies.

SUSANNE HOEBER RUDOLPH
University of Chicago

Mathematical Applications in Political Science, III. Edited By Joseph L. Bernd. (Charlottesville, Virginia: The University press of Virginia, 1967. Pp. 119. $5.00.)

This volume is a collection of papers from the third National Science Foundation sponsored conference on Mathematical Applications in Political Science. The essays involve mathematical applications in five different areas. Otto A. Davis and Melvin Hinich extend the mathematical model of the electoral process which they developed in the second volume of this series. Gerald H. Kramer uses the theory of finite automata to obtain a result concerning the impossibility of a form of rational decision-making. William H. Riker uses experimental games to verify two theories from game theory. S. Sidney Ulmer proposes a discriminant function model as a means of predicting judicial decisions. Richard L. Merritt describes procedures for graphic display of time-series data on the attitudes of countries toward one another.

Merritt's chapter is the most elementary mathematically. He analyzes 1954–1964 European survey data concerning attitudes toward other countries. Basic trends are obtained through regressing friendliness and salience scores for a pair of countries on time. Merritt then shows which pairs of countries became more and less friendly over time, utilizing several suggestive means of graphic representation. The result is an interesting data analysis which regrettably lacks theoretic focus.

Ulmer's essay is another in the series of articles dealing with the problem of prediction of judicial decisions from "the facts of the case." Ulmer factor analyzes the facts of several cases in order to reduce the number of predictor variables sufficiently for his model. The factor scores of the cases are then used as the independent variables and the court's decisions on the cases as dichotomous dependent variables in a discriminant function model. Finally Ulmer selects the prediction equation which yields the highest proportion of correctly predicted cases from the smallest number of factors. The maximization of the proportion of correct predictions is a reasonable criterion. though the discussion remains insensitive to the interpretability of the resulting equation. The successful prediction of an additional one to five per cent of the cases is of little importance if the final predictors lack theoretic meaning. There is insufficient emphasis in this article on the role of subtsantive theory in the search for the best statistical model.

Riker examines coalition formation in threeperson bargaining experiments in order to test two results from game theory. There were proposals and counter-proposals of coalitions in the experiments until a pair of players agreed on how they would divide the money they would be given if they formed a two-person coalition. The average payoffs within possible coalitions fit very closely with the values predicted mathematically. This fit of the model is explained in terms of the concept of trustproposals of coalitions giving a player more than his quota were not trusted. Thus there is political relevance in Riker's discussion of the mechanisms of the bargaining situation, though the games themselves are apolitical in face content. Yet the basic use of game theory as a theory giving predictions which require empirical verification remains questionable. The utility of a mathematical theory does not rest on its descriptive validity.

Kramer is concerned with the feasibility of rational behavior given the limited computational capacities of real decision-makers. He constructs an analogy between a decisionmaker and an information-processing device, an automaton. The question becomes whether any conceivable program can be devised for such an automaton which leads to decisionmaking behavior which is consistent with rationality. Rationality is here defined as acting in accordance with a set of consistent preferences. The theory of automata is then employed to establish that rationality with respect to an infinite number of alternatives is incompatible with a computing device which is finite. It would seem doubtful whether an infinite number of alternatives either could be represented by the input language for the device or could be processed by a finite device in a finite period of time. Kramer's terse prose style leaves the reader uncertain as to whether these conditions are required by his proof, so the significance of his result is not clear.

The Davis and Hinich essay continues their work on a multidimensional model of party competition. In their earlier article, Davis and Hinich assumed that on a given issue each voter has the same level of concern. They now relax this assumption, instead assuming that the level of concern on a given issue is variable but is independent of the position of the voter on that issue. With this new assumption, the dominant strategy for a candidate still is to take the mean position on each of the issues, if the distribution of voters in the space is multivariate normal. The candidate whose platform is closest to that mean will win the election. The Davis and Hinich model is extremely elegant, though their basic result would seem to require much less elaborate machinery. Given a symmetric and unimodal density of voters in the space, such as the multivariate normal distribution, with either equal or symmetric levels of concern on issues, the mean is the dominant strategy for the candidates. If this assertion is not intuitively obvious, a simple geometric proof would seem possible. Also it is not entirely clear whether they have significantly relaxed the assumption of an equal level of concern for all voters in this article. They restrict the standard deviation of the concern of voters to be much less than the smallest eigenvalue of the matrix of average concern. Notwithstanding their assertion to the contrary, this condition would seem to make the variation permitted nearly trivial relative to the average size of the level of concern. At a minimum, a more complete discussion of both this restriction and the meaning of the general model would have been appreciated.

"Mathematical applications in political science" must be judged simultaneously on the basis of their relevance to political science and their usage of mathematics. "Mathematical applications" involve sophisticated use of mathematics, though the mathematics used need not be sophisticated. Experimentation with novel forms of mathematics is to be encouraged, if their application is truly appropriate. Mathematics more powerful than is required to solve the problem at hand should not be employed unless the formalization in terms of high-power mathematics is likely to lead to insights in the solution of a more general problem. Mathematical modelling should involve more than statistical modelling and routine data analysis. Still a confrontation with empirical materials need not be avoided. The use of mathematics heightens the responsibility of an author to communicate to his audience in a readable manner. Finally the emphasis on mathematical sophistication does not alter the conventional standards of judgment of a work: substantive merit and theoretic importance are of greater significance than technical considerations of method.

There is a definite and growing need for the publication of volumes of essays on "mathematical applications in political science." Articles dealing with substantively important questions in a mathematically technical form can rarely be printed in the major political science journals which must balance the importance of the article against the reaction of their readers. Yet it is hoped that the articles in future volumes of this series will contain a more skillful blending of the technical and the substantive, mathematical sophistication with theoretic significance.

HERBERT F. WEISBERG The University of Michigan

NATO and the Range of American Choice. By WILLIAM T. R. FOX AND ANNETTE BAKER FOX. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1967. Pp. 352. $7.95.)

NATO and Europe. By André Beaufre. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., 1966. Pp. 170. $3.95.)

The Atlantic Idea and Its European Rivals. By Harold Van B. Cleveland. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1966. Pp. 186. $5.95.)

It is part of the conventional wisdom that NATO is something special as peace-time alliances go. It maintains an infrastructure of communications, airfields, etc.; it functions under a partially integrated command structure; and it has troops and airplanes at its disposal. These and other novel features smacking of supranationalism are taken as evidence that NATO is significantly more than the usual contingency pact—just how much more and why has been a matter of conjecture among students of alliances, in general, and the North Atlantic Area, in particular. But for all its successes. NATO has had notable failures and periods of general malaise. Most significantly, troop commitments have seldom been met and the dominant role of the United States has led to periodic-perhaps continual-resentment among the other members of the system. Within the last five to ten years centrifugal forces have been particularly strong. Gaullist prodding has succeeded in raising basic questions about the future of the Alliance. Indeed, there is reason to wonder whether NATO has a future-except perhaps as a traditional contingency pact.

All three of the books covered in this review devote considerable attention to diagnosing NATO's current ills. Two of them, Beaufre and Cleveland, offer prescriptions for the future. Fox and Fox, on the other hand, give the reader a sense of the practicability of these prescriptions by focusing in some detail on a variety of constraints and choices impinging on U.S. policy makers. It is interesting that with respect to diagnosis, all three, the French general, the convinced Atlanticist, and the academic analysts, are in fundamental agreement. In addition, all three books share a common perspective; they are concerned first and foremost with American behavior. They all, in other words, accept at least implicitly American leadership.

NATO's ills are, first of all, traced to the stabilization of the strategic balance and the emergence of a Soviet-American detente. Since the basic premise of all the authors is that NATO is primarily a military alliance, they agree that as the Soviet threat has receded, the willingness to participate fully in the alliance has declined. Secondly, there seems to be general agreement that the strategic balance has reduced the credibility of the American nuclear guarantee. Finally, given reduced threat and reduced credibility, the allies have become increasingly unwilling to accept the dominant role which the United States has played in NATO policy making in general, and in control of the nuclear deterrent in particular. NATO conflicts turn out to be partially over policy and partially over structure.

With respect to structure, all the authors agree that control of the nuclear deterrent is indivisible. Beaufre, thus, writes off the MLF as impracticable. If Cleveland is more positive, it is simply because he saw the MLF as a device which might have locked Germany more securely into the NATO system and reduced the likelihood that the Germans would seek their own deterrent. In any case, Beaufre sees the MLF as just another instance of the U.S. failing to coordinate and consult with its allies before policy decisions are made and announced. Beaufre's major concern is with the establishment of simple but effective procedures assure real consultation. Cleveland strongly argues that relationships within the alliance are based on power realities; accordingly, he claims that while the U.S. should strive for consensus, it should be willing to settle for something less. He feels, for example, that the U.S. should have pushed ahead with the MLF using whatever leverage was at its disposal, so long as the MLF was deemed useful. Real-politik within a framework of reciprocal interests is Mr. Cleveland's vision.

These perceived reciprocal interests serve as the foundation for the substantive policy prescriptions espoused by Beaufre and Cleveland. For both men the Soviet-American détente depends for the foreseeable future on the continuation of a stable strategic balance. Accordingly, they agree that the Alliance is necessary, although neither makes it clear just exactly why the strategic balance is dependent on the alliance rather than simply on U.S. and Soviet nuclear capacities. Presumably the link is that within this balance, the USSR must not be tempted to nibble at the periphery of Western Europe. It is assumed by Cleveland that U. S. interests in a non-Communist Europe would necessitate an American response to such nibbling. Beaufre also believes that the U.S. has a stake in preventing conventional military action in Europe, because such a war could not possibly be contained—presumably the force de frappe would trigger the escalation.

What then should the United States do to maintain the alliance? The European allies are, on the one hand, restive under American control. On the other hand, the Europeans are not inclined to take on the costly responsibilities for their own defense. Beaufre and Cleveland offer prescriptions which in the medium term are not significantly different, since they both suggest that the U. S. accept and recognize the growing strength and cohesion of Europe. But because their long term visions of Europe differ markedly, there is disagreement as to whether European autonomy should be encouraged or simply tolerated.

Cleveland casts his vote for toleration and so his policy recommendation amounts to temporizing with the current situation. The U. S. should not work against European unity, but should cease to promote it. In any case, the Furopean idea has lost its vitality; it is stalled and will continue to be stalled somewhere between a collection of discrete nation states and a federal union. Accordingly, the United States must work to drive home to the Europeans the importance of the reciprocal interests-military, financial, and commercial-which bind the Atlantic Area into what Stanley Hoffmann has called a "partial international system." According to Cleveland, the keys to successful policy are: (1) to promote the cause of the British who will serve as the linking force between the U.S. and Europe, and (2) to make certain that the Germans are kept reasonably satisfied, since Cleveland sees a revisionist Germany as far and away the biggest threat to a generally acceptable status quo. Thus, Cleveland suggests that the U.S. not oppose a European nuclear force if it is the price de Gaulle demands for British entry into Europe and if providing for German participation binds Germany more firmly into the Atlantic system.

Beaufre's prescription is more radical, for he wants the U.S. to encourage European autonomy by promoting the staged development of an independent European military force. The medium-term goal is total European takeover of responsibility for ground defense of Europe. Eventually, this European military establishment should include a nuclear force as well. For Beaufre, military integration and defense responsibilities are the key to real union. Beaufre agrees with Cleveland that the drive towards European union has been stalled, but unlike Cleveland, Beaufre believes that it can be revived. Again, in sharp contrast to Cleveland, "Europe" for Beaufre must in the final analysis stretch from the Atlantic to the Soviet border. If in the short run Beaufre's scheme assumes limited European autonomy combined with more intensive NATO consultation and enhanced joint planning, in the long run it adds up to an orthodox Gaullist third force strategy.

Beaufre and Cleveland, thus, present different prescriptions for reviving the alliance. Fox and Fox offer the reader a decision-making perspective on the feasibility of these alternatives. The reader can, for example, infer from Fox and Fox just what kinds of obstacles are likely to be raised within the American system to establishing more intensive consultative machinery. Similarly, it is possible to assess the effectiveness of such machinery should it be accepted.

In order to indicate the general lines of their analyses I will discuss the feasibility of the two prescriptions from the Fox and Fox perspective. But first let me emphasize that this exercise is only illustrative. The book is, first of all, inordinately rich in detail and balanced in judgment. Accordingly, the data are surely open to other inferences. Moreover, I am considering the problem only in terms of internal U. S. decision-making processes while their analysis extends to NATO processes, to alternative claims on American policy makers, and to the variety of purposes that NATO is perceived to serve. With these caveats in mind, let us consider the two prescriptions.

First, it seems reasonably clear that the Cleveland policy would be more acceptable simply because it calls for the most limited departure from current stands. NATO policy making in the U.S. Government is a very cumbersome process. If it is difficult to achieve consensus with our allies, this task is almost as difficult within the government. Coordination within the executive branch involves intradepartmental struggles as well as coordination between Defense and State. In addition, any policies requiring substantial expenditures or having to do with atomic energy must be driven through a polycentric Congress and therefore made acceptable to Congressmen who are not very often responsive to the policy as such, but simply to whether or not it threatens to accelerate government expenditures or aggravate the balance of payments.

While all government policies must run this political gauntlet, Fox and Fox point out some of the special handicaps under which NATO policy labors. Virtually any NATO issue will stir up interservice rivalries. Moreover, NATO has not been a high priority problem area even at times of crisis and so the President has not been inclined to devote his scarce attention resources and limited political capital to such issues. Still another difficulty is that many of the policy makers charged with responsibility for NATO are not really attuned to NATO problems. The military seems to have done a better job than the diplomats in building a concern for and understanding of NATO into its bureaucracy, but in neither department are NATO duties perceived as strong pegs upon which to hang a career. Finally, the history of NATO has given rise to expectations by American decision-makers that our leads will be followed. This is not simply an expectation based on what have been the power realities of the alliance. NATO is perceived to be anchored in a strong mutuality of interests and empathies. Accordingly, we seem to expect our partners to accept our offers in a spirit of friendly cooperation.

What all this adds up to is, on the one hand, a general policy inertia and, on the other, the likelihood that reforms aimed at bringing our allies into the policy making process may be more trouble than they are worth. Such reforms will probably be resisted in Congress and in the executive branch—given the rather restricted NATO constituency and the burden of adding more 'decision makers to the already cumbersome process. Even if accepted, a device like Mr. McNamara's "select nuclear committee" may not make the system more responsive. Indeed, it may increase frustrations by further complicating matters.

As I indicated, it is not really possible to do justice to Fox and Fox within the compass of this kind of joint review. The book manages to bring together, synthesize, and evaluate within a useful process framework vast amounts of information. As such, it is a real contribution to a literature cluttered by policy studies and abstract theorizing. It lays a foundation for some of the middle range theory that scholars in the international relations field have been calling for for so long, and may well catalyze important new research projects.

STUART A. SCHEINGOLD University of Wisconsin

Congressional Conservatism and the New Deal: The Growth of the Conservative Coalition in Congress, 1933-1939. By James T. Patterson. (Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1967. Pp. 356. $8.50.)

The writers connected with the Survey Research Center must often wish that someone had started gathering their data in the 1930's rather than later. It would be fascinating to be able to gauge party identification in a period of change rather than in one of electoral stability. For like reasons the 1930's ought to be attractive to Congressional roll-call analysts, and it is a little surprising—even given the lack of ordered data—that the Congressional voting of the New Deal decade has been given so little attention. Changes in electoral patterns in the 1930's surely provoked changes in Congressional alignments, and the latter are no less subject to statistical analysis than the former.

James T. Patterson, an Indiana University historian, has not written a "roll-call study," but he has made good use of roll-calls in providing a blow-by-blow account of Congressional politics in the 1930's. His subject is the rise of the "conservative coalition" between 1933 and 1939. The emphasis is on heretical Democrats, and especially heretical Democrats in the Senate. Patterson wastes no time worrying over a definition of "conservatism"; he uses the term conventionally but, in the context, sensibly, to denote opposition to Rooseveltian domestic reforms.

It goes without saving that Republicans alone could not sustain an effective opposition, conservative or otherwise, in the 1930's. At their lowest point, just after the 1936 election, they numbered only 16 in the Senate and 89 in the House. Their strategy by 1937 was to keep silent and supply back-bench votes for the causes of vocal anti-Roosevelt Democrats. Patterson's study of the disaffected Democrats is a study in gradual alienation. In the Congress on 1933-1934, there were only 5 Democratic Senators who were consistently opposed to major New Deal measures: Byrd and Glass of Virginia, Bailey of North Carolina, Tydings of Maryland, and Gore of Oklahoma. By the end of the 1935 session, after the intense struggles over the utilities holdingcompany bill and the "wealth tax," some 19 Senate Democrats had broken with the President on two or more major issues. The bitter Court controversy of 1937 drove many more into opposition and cemented an alliance of Republicans and conservative Democrats. After the 1938 election this cross-party coalition was in a position to take over the Senate. Over in the House the trend from 1933 through 1939 was more or less the same. One difference in the larger body was that the opposition made more use of formal machinery; soon after the 1936 election the Rules Committee moved into its familiar blocking role and Martin Dies surfaced with his passion for investigations.

Who were the renegade Democrats? To put it another way, how were they different from Democrats who remained loval New Dealers? Patterson finds no significant difference between the two groups either in age or in seniority. Nor was region as critical a variable as one might retrospectively assume. Before 1936 it was not even true that the opposition was disproportionately Southern. Senators like Byrnes of South Carolina and Harrison of Mississippi remained loyal to the President long after colleagues like Gerry of Rhode Island, Copeland of New York and Burke of Nebraska had vociferously declared their independence. In Patterson's list of the 35 "most conservative" Democratic Senators of the 1933-1939 period, only 10 were Southerners and only 5 more were from the Border states. It is true that by 1939 the opposition had a Southern cast to it, but even then Southern Senators were not as cohesively conservative as they later became in the 1950's and 1960's. Senator Bilbo, among others, was still waving a New Deal flag.

A merit of Patterson's study is that it provides suggestive evidence for the kinds of inductive generalization and theoretical speculation political scientists like to engage in. What, for example, has been the relation between electoral realignments and Congressional rollcall behavior? It seems clear that "dimensions of voting" in Congress, rather stable since World War II, were thoroughly reshuffled in the 1930's. An extended longitudinal study of roll-call voting might turn up the same pattern of normal stability broken by occasional realignment that V. O. Key, Jr., Walter D. Burnham and others have found in the partisan behavior of the electorate. The Democrats, both at the grass roots and in Congress, shifted their center gravity north and east during the New Deal decade. One consequence of the Democratic shift was a rearrangement of forces within the Congressional Republican Party. The New Deal dealt a death blow to Midwestern and Western Republican Progressivism, but at the same time gave birth to a new Republican heresy in the formerly orthodox Northeast. The new sectional leanings became apparent in 1937 when the only Senate Republicans to support Roosevelt's minimum wage bill were Lodge of Massachusetts and Davis of Pennsylvania. Ten years later the old and proud Republican Progressive tradition survived only in the erratic career of Senator Langer of North Dakota.

Patterson's account of the confrontations between New Dealers and anti-New Dealers is also of relevance to coalition theorists. What was the logic of the opposing strategists? The propositions of William H. Riker's Theory of Political Coalitions seem to fit the facts surprisingly well. After 1934 the Roosevelt Administration followed Riker's principle that it makes no sense to maintain an excessively large crowd on a winning bandwagon; that is, Roosevelt, instead of trying to keep his party united, served his liberal adherents by submitting legislative proposals sweeping enough to command the support only of narrow majorities in House and Senate. The utilities holding-company bill, for example, survived a key vote in the Senate by only 45-44. Not long after the 1936 election it became possible and expedient to throw off the bandwagor the leaders of the Senate Democratic establishment-Byrnes, Harrison, and also Vice President Garner—and thrown off they were. How did the conservative opposition react to Roosevelt's strategy? In general, by seeking support wherever they could find it. There were times in 1937 and 1938 when the conservatives could hope to win Senate majorities only by making Burton Wheeler their informal leader; they quickly suppressed the animosities of two decades and rallied behind Wheeler. Roosevelt's strategy of maximal immediate accomplishment doubtless served the interests of his New Deal following, but there was a price to be paid for it later. When Democratic Congressional majorities fell to a "normal" level after 1938, the President had to work with Congressmen and Senators who displayed toward him the sullen hostility described by Allen Drury in his Senate Journal, 1943–1945.

Besides being thought-provoking, Patterson's study is well-written, well-documented, and consistently analytic rather than discursive.

DAVID R. MAYHEW

Yale University

The Japanese Communist Movement, 1920–1966. By Robert A. Scalapino. (Berkeley: The University of California Press, 1967. Pp. 412. $6.75.)

We have come to expect of Professor Scalapino exhaustive and insightful analyses of Japan's experience in political party development. This well-organized and brilliantly written study is no exception—a product of a decade or more of research in depth into a wide range of Japanese and non-Japanese documentary sources and a limited series of interviews with key figures active in or close to the JCP. Ample footnotes and an excellent bibliography are also included.

The author concludes that communism in Japan is an isolated, minority movement. "Barring external interference," it shows little promise of success in a society which "having attained modernity, can afford freedom." (p. 354). Few, except Marxist-Leninists, would take issue with this conclusion. On the basis of the detailed chronology Professor Scalapino presents, communism in Japan has missed whatever opportunities it might have had as a revolutionary force. However, a more penetrating analysis of economic and social factors might make the hypothesis fully convincing, especially in an era when "revisionism" appears to be becoming orthodox throughout the communist world.

The study, jointly sponsored by the RAND Corporation and Berkeley's Center for Japanese and Korean Studies, traces communism in Japan from its earliest origins in 1898 and follows the gyrations of the movement through the pre- and post-World War II eras, continually couched within the context of communist policy developments in the U.S.S.R. and, after 1949, in Red China. The major portion of the book deals with the events since Japan's surrender to the Allies.

The first six chapters provide a highly detailed chronology of the JCP. The last two are given over to an assessment of the party's current status and its future prospects. Communism's prewar legacy (Chapter I), developed when the party for the most part was illegal and suppressed and had fewer than 1,000 members, was "an unending series of frustrations and defeats," unable to compete with Japanese nationalism (and eventually ultranationalism), led by increasingly extremist intellectuals, lacking a working class base, and after 1924 controlled by the Soviets. Heaped upon these was a constant plague of internal factionalism, fed by characteristic Japanese organizational cliques. The major bid of the communists to gain ascendency came with the Allied Occupation's call for drastic political, economic, and social reforms, release of communist leaders from jail, and strong encouragement of "progressive" groups. "Making communism loveable" (Chapter II) failed when SCAP reversed its policy after 1947, the united front of leftists crumbled, and the Russians attacked the JCP leadership for its "Japanization" of Marxism-Leninism. Yet, this precursor of today's nationalist communism did vault the JCP to its greatest proportionate strength, capturing almost 10 percent of the popular vote in the 1949 general election and 35 seats in the Diet's lower house. Since then, the party's fortunes ebbed, barely registering more than five percent of the votes, as the socialists and other minority groups (such as the Clean Government Party) retained the great bulk of the populace opposed to the conservative party in power.

As Japan's economy recovered and entered its period of "miraculous" growth, the JCP has been unable to achieve widespread popular identification and has suffered from the stigma of foreign control. At best, it has been a catchbasin for protest against imbalances, inequities, and grievances felt by scattered groups in the burst of Japan's recent dynamic changes.

Shifting to the left after 1950 (Chapter III), the party's bitter factionalism reemerged as the communists' success in mainland China spurred on dreams of Maoist guerilla warfare from mountain hideouts. By 1955 Peking dominance was clear, and with de-Stalinization, the stage was set for the JCP to become caught in the rise of the Sino-Soviet dispute. Despite a return to legalism after 1955 (Chapter IV), the JCP, attempting to find an impossible solution between the Russian and Chinese positions, lost out again in an effort to form a united front and capitalize upon deep sentiments among the Japanese for preserving the peace, banning the bomb, assuring Japan's independence, and advancing democracy. In the early 1960's, the communists were more isolated than ever and, swinging to Peking in 1963 (Chapter V), lost dissidents who favored either "internationalism" or "structural reform." A "struggle on two fronts" (Chapter VI) then ensued, continuing to the present as the mainstream struggled over "how to use and abuse the social democrats at the same time" and how to achieve internal party unity. As "modern revisionism" gripped the communist world, by 1966 "never in its history had the Japanese Communist Party attempted so ardently to place itself in the mainstream of Japanese evolution, to fit itself into the pendulum-like swing toward and away from external influences that had characterized the most basic political forces operative in Japan." (p. 276). While as elsewhere Japanese communism is increasingly autonomous, it remains nonetheless isolated both domestically and internationally.

How "isolated" is a problem difficult to gauge from the study. The author finds (Chapter VII) the party's membership of 270,000 predominantly urban, young, more "bourgeois" than "proletariat" (and little "peasantry"), relatively well-educated, intellectual, and gradually gaining voting strength. The JCP also appears well-financed (probably from foreign sources) and tightly organized. Yet its chances for achieving a united front, the main hope of the JCP, remain slim, as the socialists, labor unions, student movement, and other left groups themselves continue to hew orthodox Marxism without embracing the communist formula because they continue to capitalize upon the alliance with the U. S., uneven economic development, the lack of Japanese "individualism," and, the impact of the Chinese communist victory (Chapter VIII).

This study should be of immense value to any student of communism or of Japanese politics, although it is possible to raise doubts about the selection of materials used and the emphases given to them, as the author himself acknowledges. It evokes a number of questions for further penetration into the basic premises that the process of Japanese government is comparatively well-established, that Japanese generally are highly socialized to accept its legitimacy, and that the changes now occurring so rapidly in Japan can be readily accommodated in an "advanced" society. The answers to questions such as these may hold the key to the future of the whole Japanese Left (and perhaps extreme Right) and the role of communism within it.

Solomon B. Levine University of Illinois

NOTES

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

The Power Structure: Political Process in American Society. By Arnold M. Rose. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967. Pp. 506. $8.50.)

Who Rules America? By G. William Domhoff. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1967. Pp. 184. $4.95.)

The Emergent American Society. By LLOYD WARNER, ET AL. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1967. Pp. 667 $15.00.)

All three of these books are best read and regarded not as the efforts in social science they purport to be but rather as expressions of political ideology. To be sure, each bears respectable methodological hallmarks and all present the fruits of impressive empirical homework. Still and all, it is abundantly clear that in each case the authors had their conclusions well in mind before they began to search for materials that would support their points of view.

All writing on a subject such as power is bound to be ideological in that an author's selectionand omission—of illustrations and emphases will inevitably reflect his personal judgments about the quality of the society he is purporting to depict. To be sure, it usually remains for the reader to locate these moral premises: part of the fun of the game stems from the fact that certain cards are always kept face down.

Arnold Rose, who died shortly after completing his book, sets out to rebut and refute C. Wright Mills and Floyd Hunter. This is not really very difficult once you decide to depict the Mills-Hunter position as a simple-minded monolithism. It is ironic how much academic energy has been expended attempting to lay to rest these two stimulating but hardly research-worthy tracts. Nevertheless, to coin a paraphrase, it takes an ideologue to catch an ideologue. Rese's unstated opinion is that the United States is a pretty good place by any objective or comparative standard: the society is pluralistic, power is dispersed, and political influence is diffused throughout a vigorous population. In short, not much is wrong with the way things are. This position-not at all uncommon among political scientists-combines elements of liberalism and conservatism. That is to say, it supports a New Deal conception of the good society-more or less, a Hubert Humphrey view-with a liberal government in an essentially capitalist culture. However such an outlook is necessarily conservative if only because it has so much to defend. New Dealers are compelled to justify the existing contours of American politics and society, for that structure is in large measure a product of the policies to which they have long been committed. To suggest that almost three decades of this kind of government has still left the nation in a seriously unsatisfactory state would be to condemn one's own handiwork. Thus The Power Structure is, in these terms, an apologia for the America in which we now live. The status-quo is defined as democracy; and democracy is seen as suffusing the status-quo. It is instructive that an author of Rose's disposition saw fit to invest so much time and effort in attacking critics on his ideological left; yet it is understandable that he do so, as they are claiming that all his successes were in fact failures.

Professor Domhoff, in contrast, is a young man with no commitments to the policies or programs of the past. His mercifully slender volume purports to show than an intertwined circle—he prefers to call it a "class"-presides over the major instruments of power in American life. The book names names, draws lines of relationships, and concludes that a small and concerted group in fact rules America. Quite plainly, Domhoff considers that United States to be a most undemocratic and inequalitarian society; by his moral measure it is a hypocritical and decadent culture direly in need of thoroughgoing reform. However while he draws on and has much sympathy with the thinking of C. Wright Mills, Domhoff wears at least one of Rose's ideological blinders. For all his radicalism, he is temperamentally too much in the American grain to acknowledge that the power structure he is examining remains essentially capitalist in character. Hence his elaborate preoccupation with the people in high places, but hardly any attention to the institutional complexes which provide the chairs in which they sit.

My own judgment is that Rose's description of power in our national life is a very partial picture, having selected for empirical analysis only those areas where in fact a relatively broad and diversified series of publics participates in the making of policy. (No one, not even Paul Sweezy, has ever suggested that PTA's are puppets of a ruling class.) But Domhoff's assiduous mining of the Social Registers never comes to grips with the fact that the United States is a system built on private ownership, advanced technology, and a government which must necessarily expend most of its efforts reacting to conditions not of its own making. His problem is that he has no coherent conception of the macro-structure which elevates al the board-room types he enumerates. I am no suggesting that the answer is somewhere in Volume IV of Capital; however I would assert that until Domhoff and others like him begin to look at American power in its capitalist context, they will only be charting effects rather than causes (Let me add that those of Rose's persuasion are convinced that capitalism disappeared between the break-up of the old Standard Oil Company in 1912 and the inauguration of Social Security in 1935. They have such an intellectual vested interest in the assumed irrelevance of Marx that it is too much to ask them to rethink their conclusions about that mode of perception.)

Finally, Warner's non-book—and a $15,00 nonbook at that. The formula is of course familiar First persuade yourself that you are qualified to delve into a very significant subject; next convince a foundation that you are the man to preside over a research project that will produce the definitive statement for our generation; and then proceed to spend lots and lots of money gathering lots and lots of facts. Here we are presented with fifteen chapters, by different authors, on churchesand corporations, unions and universities, trade associations and government agencies. Literally thousands of questionnaires were sent out and their replies sedulously recorded. Some of the facts are quite intriguing. (For example, most religious associations have governing bodies with 50 or more members whereas most groups devoted tothe advancement of education are presided over by boards having less than 20 members.) But the general conclusion is a non-conclusion: large and complex organizations in contemporary American society are large and complex. On first glance, it would seem that Warner and his colleagues are not infected with an ideological glaze. After all, no conclusion should be a sign of no ideology. But further scrutiny reveals that what we have here is not simply knowledge that has been produced by mechanical means; more important, the very substance of that knowledge has been shaped by the machines it has employed. Ideology is basically a manner of perceiving reality, and here the distorting lens is inherent in the method: for the Warner volume assumes that only information which car be secured by certain mechanical means is entitled to be regarded as reportable knowledge, Needless to say, this limits one's purview.

With all deference to Karl Mannheim, I do not believe that scholars can somehow raise themselves above the ideological smog which infects the senses of lesser men. But I do believe that we can do a lot more to understand the scope of our preconceptions and the limits they impose on our perceptions. I also have a hunch that if we were not so cautious about soiling our career credentials we might even preface our books by acknowledging our biases about the good, the true, and the beautiful. Certainly to continue to claim that we can immunize our writing from ideology is pretentious nonsense.—Andrew Hacker, Cornell University.

Political Philosophy and Time, By John G. Gun-NELL. (Middletown: Wesleyan University Press, 1968. Pp. 314. $10.00.)

Plato's capacity to elicit writing of the highest quality from his commentators is instanced once more by Prof. Gunnell's Political Philosophy and Time. It is one of the wonders of intellectual history that given talent and sympathy, a scholar can be raised almost above himself by the force and beauty of Plato's dialogues. They infect the studious admirer with some measure of their own excellence: they insist that a man be at his absolute best when he responds to them, and they insensibly, mimetically, impart inspiration to him. Aside from Rousseau and Burke, it would be hard to think of any other political theorist who possesses this power of enchantment to nearly the same degree. Naturally, agreement or disagreement with Plato (or Rousseau or Burke) is not in question. Rather, it is a matter of honoring with attention imaginative genius wherever it appears. Gunnell's book is the fruit of such devotion.

His thesis is that "... political philosophy was at its inception, that is, with Plato, a reconstruction, on the level of conscious thought, of the vision of political order as a mediating space, a mesocosm, which would assimilate man to or integrate him with that which is most eternal and overcome historical existence, which in terms of the Greek experience meant essentially the fall from order." Long before the time of Plato, several ancient societies had achieved that "integration" by means of myth. Gunnell gives a chapter to Egypt and Mesopotamia. In each society, "... life is lived essentially in the 'present' . . . the 'future' exists only as a repetition of the 'past'; the uniqueness of events is not perceived, and temporal distance contracts into the present. . . . In mythic thought, change in the sense of becoming or the experience of unique events is sublimated in the concrete, recurrent, and spatially grounded rhythms of nature. . . . Primordial time is the time of cosmic creation, and the events narrated in the myth are continually made present and serve as archetypes which give meaning to experience. The unique event or act is meaningful only to the extent that it can be joined to an archetype. Here life moves not historically, but ritualistically between significant points in the cycle of nature and society. . . ." There is no sense of history as a continuous flow full of the possibility of novelty, either for good or bad; there is consequently no sense of individuality, no idea of the self, which is dependent on the sense of history.

Gunnell does not say why he assumes societies built on such myths survive unaltered for long periods of time. Were the myths sufficiently close to the needs of human nature, sufficiently "true?" Or, would any mythic orientation which enclosed the individual in a social system purporting to be regulated in accordance with the perceived order of nature have been adequate? Or, was it the cunning of social devices, made even more cunning by having the sanction of myth thrown over them, which accounted for the longevity of certain ancient societies? In any case, there the examples of Egypt and Mesopotamia were: they served as precursors, and perhaps as direct influences, on the later Platonic, non-mythic effort to abolish time. and with it, change, disorder, and decay. After examining the reluctance of the Hebrews to associate the rescue from time with a coherently articulated political society, and their consequent trust in God's ability to redeem them through the very workings of time. Gunnell reaches the heart of his book, three long and brilliant chapters on the Greeks.

First, Gunnell traces the attenuation of "the integral myth" in Greece. He takes up Homer, Hesiod, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and a few other poets, and shows through them the steady growth in complexity of the Greek idea of time: a combination of historical and intellectual developments led to a common awareness of the inexhaustible potency which life has for ruining the social structures men laboriously build. The inherited integral myth proved powerless when faced with the ravages of time. Though the Greeks' idea of cosmic time was cyclical, their understanding of human time had a different pattern, the pattern of tragedy. Awe before the eternal yielded to the passion to perform those individual deeds of political and military greatness which earned immortality. The self became the world, though, to be sure, not the modern romantic self in all its depth and cultivated idiosyncrasy. But just as the self contained passional elements which drove men to aspire and hence to suffer, so it contained the divine element, an element of reason, at last fully recognized, which could serve as the basis for a new vision of order.

It fell to Plato, in Gunnell's account, to make a system out of Greek impulses to save men from "the futility of action" and constant political upheaval. Through reason, the philosopher could detect the underlying reason of nature and use it as the paradigm for social order. Reason would thus restore the unity of self, society and nature of the earlier mythic orientation, but now a unity founded on genuine knowledge, not merely dim intimations. Gunnell presents an extremely skillful and creative reading of the Republic, and then of the Laws, in the light of his general thesis. Of special interest is his sustained comparison of the Republic with the Laws: the latter book emerges as the culmination of Plato's obsession with the problem of order. A far less beautiful book than the Republic, it nevertheless is marked by an utterly serious practicality of purpose lacking in the Republic. Several themes stand out in Gunnell's book: the way in which the Philebus and the Timaeus provide the bridge between the cosmologies of the Republic and the Laws; the nature of the philosophical understanding which the higher office-holders in the Laws must have, as distinguished from that of the rulers in the Republic; the meaning of Plato's assertion that the polity of the Laws was "second best" in comparison to the ideal polity of the Republic; the change in Plato's use of the word, "law"; the meaning of Plato's concept of life as "serious play" in the polity of the Laws.

One's only complaint is that Gunnell does not deal with the major contention of Glenn R. Morrow's great book, Plato's Cretan City (1960), that the practices advocated in the Laws were heavily dependent on both contemporary Athenian practices, and the practices of the "ancestral" Athenian constitution. But that is only a small complaint. Gunnell has made a substantial contribution to the history of political ideas. In addition to that—I do not mean to say "more important than that"—he has shown that a reading of some of the major texts in political theory can be, without artifice or strain, perhaps even unintentionally, a substantial contribution to political science.—George Kateb, Amherst College.

Aus Nächster Nähe: Lebenserinnerugen. Vol. I. 1884-1927. Mit der Kraft des Geistes. Vol. II. 1927-1967. By Arnold Brecht (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1967. Pp. 526, 496. DM 38 each.)

During the German war of liberation against Napoleon, Goethe, in the opening poem in his cycle Der West-östliche Divan, viewed the turmoil in western Europe with a total lack of engagement and urged his readers to flee these unpleasant realities "and in the purer east enjoy the air of sages." To many respectable Germans in the nineteenth century, this seemed sound advice, and they were encouraged by it to abstain from political activity—indeed, to regard politics as a distasteful and demeaning business with which a cultivated man would have nothing to do. "Politics," according to the popular saying, "destroys character." Essentially, of course, this was an irresponsible attitude; it left all effective power in Germany in the hands of people who could not be held accountable for the way in which they exercised it; and in the long run it had catastrophic results. It would be wholly appropriate, Arnold Brecht writes with an allusion to the lines quoted above, to compose an essay entitled "Goethe's Co-Responsibility for the World War."

For the first thirty years of his life, Brecht was himself-as he admits ruefully but with a certain nostalgia for lost pleasures and quieter times-a "Goethe-German." Thereafter, however, as if he meant to atone for his long abstention from it, politics became his life. From the birth until the death of the Weimar Republic, he was never far from the center of events; and when Hitler's takeover forced him to leave Germany, it was to the study of the political process that he devoted himself during his years at the New School for Social Research in New York, where, among other things, he wrote his brief memoir of the last days of the German republic-Prelude to Silence (1944) -and his magisterial study Political Theory: The Twentieth-Century Political Foundationsof Thought (1959).

Now, in these two big volumes of reminiscence, Brecht tells the story of his years of active service in the Weimar Republic, and it is difficult to comment on his achievement without breaking out in a rash of superlatives. Written with a remarkable objectivity and a freedom from rancor that is rare in books by men who have been forced to leave their country, rich in reflection upon the structural defects of the democratic constitution and the personalities and policies of the men who tried to make it work or, alternatively, to destroy it, and presenting a not inconsiderable amount of new data on the political struggles of the 1920's and the permanent crisis of the years 1930-1933, this book will become required reading for all serious students of the period, and will doubtless, because of its wealth of anecdote, be mined assiduously by college lecturers.

The uniqueness of these recollections is to be explained in part by the position from which Brecht was able to view the early history of the republic. After completing his legal training and serving for brief periods as counsel in the Reichsjustizamt and the Office of Economics, his investigation of the war aims of the allied powers and his attempts to improve German propaganda with respect to claims in general brought his name to the attention of the last imperial chancellor, Prince Max von Baden, who, in October 1918, offered him a post in the Reichskanzlei. Here Brecht remained for the next three years, working under seven chancellors (Prince Max, Ebert, Scheidemann, Bauer, Hermann Müller, Fehrenbach and Wirth) and experiencing, and playing a role in, the abdication of the Kaiser, the revolutionary disorders of 1918 and 1919, the drafting of the constitution, the crisis caused by the Versailles peace terms, the Kapp Putsch, the loss of the democratic majority in the elections of June 1920 (which he calls the germ of death for the democratic system), the reparations debate, the murder of Matthias Erzberger, and the beginning of the policy of fulfillment.

His account of these events, and of the general history of these years, is that of an insider at the elbow of those making the decisions, and, even when the story he tells is well known, the vantage point throws new light upon it. From his notes of cabinet meetings in November 1918, for instance, we learn what the ministers of state were worrying about on the eve of the revolution that was to make most of their concerns irrelevant. We learn, from one who observed it himself, of the fearful impression that the murder of Rosa Luxemburg made upon Ebert, and of the frustration felt by the much-maligned Gustav Noske when he was compelled to rehabilitate the old military system because the working class refused to provide the volunteers who would have made possible the establishment of a new one. And we learn (with a surprised shock of recognition) of the cabinet's attempts to buttress federal authority, end the excesses of private justice, and strengthen the rule of law in the country by working for gun-control laws and the surrender of weapons. One of Brecht's special missions was to go to Munich in 1921 to urge the Bavarian police chief Pöhner to cooperate with the federal government in this policy; and it was in Pöhner that he encountered for the first time the political mentality that was to dominate Germany in 1933. "If any commie dog tries to take my gun away from me," Pöhner told him, "I'll put a bullet through his head."

Brecht left the Reichskanzlei in 1921 to become head of the division of political and constitutional matters in the Federal Ministry of the Interior. During his term there, Rathenau was assassinated, the French occupied the Ruhr, Hitler made his first attempt to seize power, and the country moved, by way of the Dawes Plan and the Locarno Treaties, into the period of stabilization. Brecht has comments on all of these matters, although his role in most of them was minor. (He is one of the few survivors of that period, he says, who does not claim to have a hand in the stabilization of the currency in 1924.) His real interest by this time was in the question of the relations between the federal government and the states. Because of ill-defined separation of powers, this had, on numerous occasions and particularly in 1923, caused major crises; and it was Brecht's belief that a basic reform was needed that would clarify the question of competence and at the same time rectify the gross discrepancy in the relative size of the various states. This question, which in his mind was one of life or death for the republic, continued to hold his passionate interest after he was dismissed from the Ministry of the Interior by a conservative government in 1927, because his views were too democratic, and had entered the Prussian service to become that state's representative on the Federal Council. Like many other proposals that might have strengthened the republic, Reichsreform was lost in the rush of events that overcame German politicians after 1930; but Brecht's analysis of the problem and the proposed solutions is highly instructive.

The most dramatic aspect of Brecht's official life came in 1932 when, after Papen's dissolution of the Prussian government on 20 July, he appealed to the highest court of the land for a ruling on the constitutionality of the action. Dismissed by Papen but reinstated by the court, he carried on the fight during the short period of Schleicher's chancellorship, only to have his hopes defeated, and to be deprived once more of his seat in the Reichsrat, after Hitler's accession to power. In his lively account of these events, he shows little respect for Papen, recalling Briand's comment on the gentleman jockey, that the longer he knew him the more he admired his horse; but he is clear in his own mind that it was this dilettante who made the first serious breach in the Weimar constitution (a view, incidentally, which he shared with Hitler who, in a war-time conversation, ironically thanked Papen for smoothing his path to Brecht's portraits of the leading personalities of the period are almost invariably striking and always fair. The best, perhaps, are those of Erzberger, Rathenau, Wirth, Bruening, and particularly Otto Braun, the long-term prime minister of Prussia. Toward Hindenburg he is more charitable than most writers, feeling that he loyally defended the constitution as long as he recognized the issues at stake; but he feels that the Field Marshal's reelection in 1932 was a tragedy for the country and wishes that his own candidate, Dr. Hugo Eckener, had run in his place. With Stresemann, Brecht seems to have had no intimate contact, and the Foreign Minister remains an almost shadowy figure in these pages.

Brecht is not, however, a believer in the great man theory of history. In an interesting passage in his first volume, he talks of his friendship with Kurt Hahn, an assistant of Prince Max von Baden and later the founder of the Salem School in Baden and Gordonstoun School in Scotland. Hahn was always talking about the necessity of educating boys to be leaders, but his constant iteration of the word Führer worried Brecht. It was, after all, leaders that the "Goethe-Germans" wanted, to relieve them of political responsibility. Brecht himself wanted more engagement by more people on every level of politics in the interests of a healthy democracy.—Gordon A. Craig, Stanford University.

The Social Psychology of Organizations. By Dan-IEL KATZ AND ROBERT L. KAHN. (New York: John Wiley, 1966. Pp. 498. $8.50.)

This book might well have been subtitled "A General Basis for the Study of Behavior in Political Systems." As far as I can judge and know the field, it comes closer than any other work to putting into one frame of reference an interrelated body of significant and powerful propositions about the central focus of (much) political study—how people behave in organizations.

The treatment is in terms of an open systems meta-theory; organizations are viewed-so far as I can see, almost always successfully and systematically-as in constant transactions with their environments, receiving inputs, transforming them, and transmitting outputs. "An open system is defined by its boundaries for the selective reception of inputs (a coding process) and for its typical transmission of outputs. It is further characterized by such properties as negentropy . . . feedback . . . homeostasis . . . equifinality . . . and differentiation." As Bennis says in reviewing the book in the American Sociological Review, "no other writers have used (open systems theory) in so systematic and radical a way . . . (In so doing), they have succeeded in removing some substantial roadblocks to further development (of organizational theory)."

For purposes of optimum use by political scientists, the book would have to be radically reorganized and revised; it is, after all, not addressed to our particular traditions; the writers are social psychologists, whose major focus is on industrial management. So far as I can guess, most political science adaptations would best start off with the seventh chapter on "the taking of organizational roles." Human organizations are defined as contrived entities, the structure of which consists of acts or events (rather than of physical properties; I found my own long standing concern about the effect of political "structures" upon outcomes greatly clarified by this open-system approach to organizations). Organizations, therefore, attain constancy and stability in terms of relationships between units, rather than in terms of units themselves. This constancy is provided by role expectations, the prescriptions and proscriptions held by members of a role set (the occupants of offices adjacent to a member within organizational space). Obviously, many role expectations are irrelevant to or run athwart the formal job descriptions. "The crucial point is that the activities which define a role are maintained through expectations of members of the role set and that these expectations are communicated or sent to the focal persons . . . Acts of role sending can be characterized in terms of such dimensions as magnitude, specificity; intensity, etc." They then proceed to show how the fit or lack of fit between the sent role and the received role may be due to such factors as differential relationships to the productive process, differential reward receipts, noise in the communications channels, etc.

Any review or summary of a book of this character is likely to be unjust or demeaning. This is so because a successful synthesis is, taken as a whole, substantially greater than any of its parts; and so whatever the reviewer selects for praise is, taken out of context, less impressive than within it. It happens that Katz and Kahn follow up the discussion of organizational role taking with what I regard as a very useful treatment of power and authority; summarized by itself, I do not know that it would immediately strike the reader as a great advance over everything in, say, March's Handbook of Organizations (Rand, McNally, 1966). But the precise point is that their treatment of power and authority is presented in general and carefully thought-out relationship to role episodes and to open systems analysis in general.

This is, of course, only a portion of what they offer; they provide, for instance, the clearest description and definition of policy decisions which I have seen. As the co-author of a book on Americar Business and Public Policy, (Atherton, 1963) I am glad finally to get some clarification on that very popular notion, "policy." Similarly, their treatment of communications in organizations seems to me to permit interpreting and generalizing a good many studies of political communications (including incidentally American Business, etc.).

I myself have used the book with satisfaction in a graduate seminar (at Berkeley) on interest groups; it helped make sense out of the loose notions of influence and pressure which help to confuse that topic. I also found the Katz and Kahn approach helped to clarify my own forthcoming discussion of The Job of Government Relations; Washington Representation (Bobbs Merrill, 1969). I expect to use the book in future seminars in Military Policy and in Problems of Undergraduate Social Science Teaching (in the latter case to help illuminate the organizational issues which teachers need to take account of in curriculum construction and course planning). Finally, I followed the ideas of Katz and Kahn (though I did not use the book itself) in a junior level second course on Administration (Michigan State U.) in order to relate the Case Studies in Public Administration to each other.

One of the reasons I did not use it as a text in this undergraduate course was its very wealth of ideas. On the fifth reading, I still find myself seeing new implications. Beyond that, non-psychologists will generally be discouraged by its vocabulary. And many readers will be thrown off by the fact that the carefully worked out, convincing examples are largely from the field of industrial management (plus, to be sure, some from university life and a few from hospitals, etc). The authors certainly are not as familiar on a day-to-day basis with state government, political campaigning, etc: and, unfortunately, many of the political examples they choose are (as compared with those from business) rather superficial. However, despite a somewhat negative first reaction to this latter circumstance, I have been able to see how examples from state and national government, comparable to those they cite from business, can be used to show the illuminating character of their theory, meta-theory, conceptions, and generalizations.

More objectionable is a kind of compulsive optimism, which at points Sinclair Lewis would have satirized. "Conflict" they tell us "clarifies." In Biafra? In La Violencia in Colombia? In border warfare in Scotland in 1400? In big city slum gang fights? A wider historical and anthropological perspective would have aided; most of the examples from outside the United States are from Western Europe, especially from Norway. Or, such theorists of tragedy as Thomas Hobbes and Niebuhr would have helped the writers to handle the fundamental problems of conflict and change; it is not surprising that in this otherwise extraordinary book, their attempt to tackle organizational change fails entirely to handle revolutionary or catastrophic situations. As with many other works -as with any textbook I can think of on American government-students need to be warned against the professional, middle-class, Western European-North American focus of the value assumptions and interpretations. But, unlike most American government texts, these writers supply a theory and meta-theory which permits correction in the light of incongruous data.

These reservations are important and should, since the volume ought to be recognized as classic, in any case be mentioned. But I am emphasizing them here, not in order to criticize the book negatively, but merely in order to point out some of the reasons the contribution Katz and Kahn have made has not been recognized in our field (and may not be so recognized) as quickly as it ought to be.—Lewis Anthony Dexter, Belmont, Mass.

Contemporary Radical Ideologies. Totalitarian Thought in the Twentieth Century. By A. James Gregor. (New York: Random House, 1968. Pp. 370. $5.95.)

It takes courage to devote another volume to the theoretical explication of totalitarian systems of government. Professor Gregor, whose Survey of Marxism (1965) was greeted with critical acclaim, has that courage. He is also a professional philosopher, and the lucidity and severity one expects from men of his discipline stands him in good stead as he takes us over the well-trodden ground, beginning with the founding father, Hegel, on to Marx. Lenin. and the Leninists on the one hand, and to Croce, Gentile, and the fascist spokesmen on the other. Some readers might consider the treatment of the classical elitists (Mosca and Pareto) as "protofascists" too conventional: others will find the space allotted to Apartheid and to native African socialism (more than one fourth of the book) excessive. But the students of national socialism will welcome the addition of the little known figure of Ludwig Woltmann to the gallery of thinkers who informed and misinformed the mind of Adolf Hitler.

As a professional philosopher, the author chooses to remain "indifferent to the efforts made to explain empirically the advent and prevalence of any specific ideology and ideologies in general." (4) He is emphatic on this point: "Assessment of the validity of the various theories advanced to account for ideologies is not one of the obligations of critical social and political philosophy." (5) Only at the very end of his trail does Professor Gregor sufficiently relent to admit that "all radical collectivist movements represent a manifest radicalization of trends . . . increasingly apparent even in nontotalitarian states." He dutifully lists the well-known empirical facts: economic and political centralization and bureaucratization, the development of mass communications. Indeed, "some of the principal species traits of totalitarianism are already common to all industrially advanced countries . . . Without the rapid technological advance . . . totalitarianism would be impossible." (339)

But Professor Gregor does not rely on the usual distinction between terroristic and non-terroristic regimes. Instead, he prefers to contrast Western political pluralism and the one-party state which "fixes upon a unique community as the ultimate and fundamental source of values . . ." (327) That legitimation will be either class origin, or race, or the concept of the nation, and of these three "the nation has become the focal community of contemporary movements of solidarity . . ." (336). Not class: "the fundamental issue of our century is not the ownership of property but its management" (340), and we are told that "Leninist parties . . . have never succeeded in winning the allegiance of the proletarian class wherever there was a proletarian class to be won" (338),—a statement which students of French and Italian politics will find more difficult to accept than the observation that even in the Soviet fatherland of scientific socialism "the critical search for truth is the privilege of the elite." (332)

Hitlerism, based on the ideas of the racial folk and its leader, appears to be "unique insofar as it was apparently seriously committed to an intuitionist and mystical epistomology." (Ibid.) But only apparently so, for "one of the principal theses of this work will be that even radical social and political ideologies are in significant measure the products of reason, experience, and observation, and are, consequently, to some degree corrigible . . ." (vii-viii). Even national socialism comes under these headings. The conventional distinction between the pseudo-rational marxist and the intuitionist fascist versions of totalitarianism is boldly discarded and inverted. "The employment of myths or political formulas calculated to engender . . . the acquiescence to rule, is not irrational or transrational in itself." The fact that "the anomic masses . . . can be, and perhaps must be, lead through the manipulation of sentiment does not characterize a political strategy or the movement that employs it as irrational." (329) It is in this sense, then, that "all totalitarian or protototalitarian collectivisms share a constellation of diagnostic traits that makes them more nearly like each other than like any other system of government ..." (337). They also share in over-all anticapitalistic tendency: "There is scant data . . . to support the thesis that the totalitarianism of the right, Italian Fascism or German National Socialism, is the 'creation' of large-scale capitalist interests." (341)

All this is presented as an "attempt to provide the exposition of radical ideologies without polemics . . . The essential function of this volume is the rational reconstruction of the justificatory arguments advanced to support radical ideologies." (ix) But something more than that emerges. something like a very personal conclusion: "In our own time it has become increasingly evident that fascism typifies the form that totalitarianism has taken and in all probability will continue to take during the twentieth century" (334), and since nationalism has proved, at least to the author, its superiority over the competing ideologies of class and race, it is Italian fascism that emerges as "paradigmatic of twentieth century totalitarianism ... (336). Almost thirty years ago, Professor G. A. Borgese, then a refugee from Italy, proclaimed the same view in Thomas Mann's Princeton home. He asserted heatedly that Mussolini, not Hitler, was the more important, and more dangerous of the two dictators. When Mrs. Mann commented: Borgese, your Italian nationalism is showing!" the distinguished antifascist author was not amused. -James H. Meisel, The University of Michigan. The Logic of Choice: An Investigation of the Concepts of Rule and Rationality. By Gidon Gottleb. (New York: Macmillan Company, 1968. Pp. 188. $5.95.)

This is a book on what judicial decision-making is and, to a lesser extent, what it ought to be. It is written from an analytic jurisprudence point of view by a professor of legal philosophy at the New York University Law School. The book is related to the writings of Llewellyn, Cardozo, and Frank but is more closely related to Hart, Austin, and Wittgenstein. It clearly illustrates the great concern shown for detailed definitions, conceptual schemes, and the use of words by analytic legal philosophers as contrasted to generalizing about judicial behavior from numerous specific instances.

According to Gottlieb, the essence of judicial decision-making, at least at the appellate level, is reasoning with rules. Such reasoning consists of a process of deliberation arising out of a set of relevant facts designed to arrive at a decision governed by procedural and substantive rules which are based on certain purposes (ch. 3). Subsequent chapters are devoted to defining each of these basic elements ending with a discussion of rationality or good reasoning. Once the facts and rules are given, the process of deciding is essentially deductive (ch. 5). Determining what facts are relevant depends on the substantive and procedural rules and purposes (ch. 4). Likewise determining the rules or precedents depends on the facts in the precedent cases, the rules pre-existing the precedent cases, and the purposes upheld by the courts (ch. 6). To interpret an ambiguous rule involves looking at its language, intent, anticipated appellate decisions, the reasonable man's common sense, and free discretion (ch. 7). To decide between conflicting rules requires looking to the purposes behind the rules (ch. 8).

Where purposes conflict, Gottlieb takes a position between Black and Frankfurter (ch. 10). He (like Black) advocates making an absolutist interpretation of the Constitution or other relevant fundamental document rather than weighing or balancing the values involved. If, however, there is no fundamental document relevant to the dispute, he (like Frankfurter) advocates strict judicial restraint relative to the legislative. Gottlieb also seeks to escape down the middle of the law and morality conflict by emphasizing how reasoning from rules applies equally to legal rules and moral rules and by emphasizing how moral rules tend to be part of the purposes behind legal rules (ch. 9).

In deciding between conflicting facts, rules, or purposes, Gottlieb recognizes the importance of attempting to predict the impact of the alternatives on the parties, society, and future cases (ch. 5 and 11). He does not, however, recognize the role that social science can play in testing generalizations about the impact of alternative behaviors on subsequent attitudes and behaviors. He goes so far as to say (p. 22): "It is clear that reasoning with rules is manifestly non-scientific. There is nothing testable about a decision, for the consequences which it may occasion can themselves be evaluated only in non-empirical terms." In reality most consequences are really means and can thus be evaluated in terms of their observable ability to achieve other consequences. Intuitive acceptance is only necessary in the rare situations where ultimate consequences or purposes are involved.

Likewise Gottlieb impliedly recognizes subjectivity in proving facts, but he fails to recognize the subjectivity of choosing among conflicting facts, rules, or purposes when he dismisses Jerome Frank by saying (p. 53): "A defective mode of proof does not impair the rationality of the process of reasoning on the basis of the facts proved and believed." One does not have to be a Marxist to recognize the importance of class identification and orientation in shaping the legal reasoning process among different judges in many situations where there are conflicting facts, rules, or purposes.

In his initial and concluding chapters, Gottlieb defines rationality or good reasoning in terms of reasoning procedure rather than in terms of the relation between consequences and purposes. Thus a judge is deciding rationally if his reasoning is governed by the relevant facts, rules, and purposes as determined by the above-described procedures. The alternative would be to say a judge is deciding rationally if the consequences of his decision are in conformity with his purposes. Social scientists including political scientists can thus contribute to making judicial decision making more rational by testing generalizations as to the nature of the purposes of judges and the public and the nature of the social consequences of alternative decisions.—Stuart S. Nagel, University of Illinois.

The Social and Political Thought of Karl Marx, By Shlomo Avineri. (London: Cambridge University Press, 1968. Pp. 269. $8.50.)

As the author himself remarks, yet another book on Marx may be difficult to justify. Not so, however, with this one. In addition to its substantive contributions, of which more below, Avineri's concise and thoughtful explications of Marx's basic ideas will serve general readers and beginning students alike as one of the more lucid available interpretations of a complex subject. Professional scholars are no doubt perfectly competent to deal with Marx's specialized and archaic philosophical vocabulary, but many novices will surely be thankful for Avineri's clear explanations of seemingly arcane passages, like the following from the early writings: "Subject and predicate [in Hegel's philosophy] have, therefore, an inverted relation to each other; a mystical subject-object, or a Subjectivity reaching beyond the object, the absolute subject as a process of self-alienation and of return from alienation into itself, and at the same time of reabsorption of this alienation, the subject of this process; pure, unceasing revolving within itself."

The author's primary aim, of course, is to provide more than a clear rendering of the complexities of Marx's thought. He has designed this book as a contribution to the historic and continuing debate over what in that thought is vital-humanism, determinism, liberalism, authoritarianism, neurosis, prophecy, social myopia, or whatever. He believes, and many scholars will concur, that the debate has been slanted by distortions flowing from diverse political objectives and academic vogues. Thus we now have Marx à la Engels, Lenin, Lukacs, Hook, Sartre, Calvez, Cornu, Fromm, Tucker, and others. Europeans quote Marx to criticize the Soviet Union, Americans reconstruct Marx to condemn Communism, and the New Left revives Marx to berate the Establishment. The result, according to Avineri, is that partisan exegetes have upset the inner balance of Marx's thought, especially by distinguishing sharply the young from the elder man, and we have thereby lost sight of much of the unity and fundamental harmony of the principles he espoused. The Social and Political Thought of Karl Marx seeks simply to restore the balance, to rescue Marx from both his friends and enemies.

Avineri's substantive and polemical accomplishment, then, is his closely reasoned and carefully documented argument that the bulk of what Marx said and wrote remains consistent throughout. His rationale is intricate, covers two hundred and fifty pages, and cannot be summarized with justice here. But two major points of emphasis do deserve mention. The first is the transformative method, which Marx borrowed from Feuerbach and used to upend Hegel. Avineri shows how this philosophical device is first expounded in the early writings and then woven into later works. Employed as a critical tool, it provides the constant framework of inquiry which generates Marx's early interest in alienation and later concern with economics. Secondly, Avineri devotes several chapters to Marx's views on praxis and revolution, tracing them through a variety of sources including the early writings, the Manifesto, Book III of Capital, letters, speeches, and works on the midcentury revolutions and the Paris Commune. In these sources, according to the author, the founder of Marxism-Leninism maintained that the historical consciousness of the proletariat, and an increasing degree of managerial control of industry, will develop dialectically. Where the two trends merge, capitalism will gradually transform itself into socialism without the midwifery of either a conspiratorial Communist Party or a Jacobin-style paroxysm of violence. That is to say, Marx never really abandoned his early humanism to a harsh materialistic determinism.

This reviewer thinks Avineri's interpretation of Marx a good one, cogently and persuasively argued, never unreasonable or dogmatic. If it stimulates a re-evaluation of Marx, as the author hopes, so much the better. Others no doubt will research the enormous bibliography of writings by Marx, his disciples and students, and deploy a different combination of key quotations in order to contradict Avineri's findings. Their conclusions will not decisively refute his, however, for it is in the nature of such inquiry that while facts are readily procured, their meaning in totality cannot be definitely ascertained. Meanwhile, even scholars who question the book's broad theme of consistency will profit from scores of well-informed and perceptive comments on important extant interpretations ranging from Kautsky, Weber and Lenin to Calvez, Cornu, Meyer, Tucker, and Lichtheim.—David M. Ricci, Pennsylvania State University.

America's Political Dilemma: From Limited to Unlimited Democracy. By Gottfried Dietze. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1968. Pp. 298. $7.95.)

From the preface to the last chapter of his book, Gottfried Dietze asserts and reasserts the argument that the expansion of American democracy in the twentieth century has resulted in the undermining of constitutionalism, free government and individual liberties. Embracing the values of the Federalists, he is at a loss to understand how any departure from their political philosophy could rationally be construed as anything less than tragic. The wisdom and insight of Madison, Hamilton and Marshall are contrasted to the naive and foolish views and actions of men such as Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt and John Kennedy. One cannot but admire the author's boldness and directness in presenting a position that will find few adherents. Unfortunately, his argument is supported neither by reason nor fact.

On the topic of economic rights, he states: "When American popular government, traditionally favoring the individual, became one favoring the masses, when the United States came to be considered a democracy rather than a republic, the ethnical melting pot was complemented by a federal one in which the protection of economic rights melted away." (Pp. 73-4). In a typically Federalist manner, Dietze assumes that a government that expands the economic rights of "the masses" also undermines the rights of "the individual" (presumably the natural aristocracy) and thus departs from the Constitution and "free government."

It is no surprise that he believes also that the recently passed civil rights statutes are basic deprivations of individual freedoms and contrary to the Constitution. Overlooking the fact that there is no freedom of contract clause in the Constitution, he asserts, "Freedom of contract is one of the foremost American liberties." (p. 132). In erroneously thinking that civil rights statutes prohibit prejudice (they prohibit discrimination) he declares that, "Although prejudice should not be promoted, it should be permitted out of respect for the dignity of man." (p. 136).

In Professor Dietze's view, the Supreme Court has abdicated its role as guardian of the Constitution since, during the past thirty years, it has not had "the courage to seriously challenge [the] majority" by invalidating laws which regulate economic activities. The fact that during the same period the Court held eighteen Congressional statutes, or parts thereof, unconstitutional on the grounds that they infringed personal liberties safeguarded by the Constitution does not impress Dietze. Clearly, he and the Court fundamentally disagree on the relative importance of economic and human rights. An equally clear difference between Dietze and the Court is that the latter makes a reasoned argument for holding to a double standard while Professor Dietze makes none.

Because strong presidents are inclined to favor regulation of property, Dietze advocates an amendment that would restrict presidential tenure to one term of office. He believes that if Hamilton lived today, he too would favor a weak presidency. He concludes his indictment of what he considers to be the excesses of democracy with a discussion on foreign policy. If postwar presidents had not been under pressure from public opinion, the United States, he argues, would have rightly gone well beyond a policy of containment of the Soviet Union. In his view a showdown with the Soviet Union would have cleared the air.—Peter Bachrach, Temple University.

The Function of "China" in Marx, Lenin, and Mao. By Donald M. Lowe. (Berkeley University of California Press, 1966, pp. 200, $5.00.)

Li Ta-chao and the Origins of Chinese Marxism. By Maurice Meisner. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967. Pp. 326. $4.95.)

The two books under review have much in common. Both were written by intellectual historians who exhibit a firm grasp of Marxist-Leninist theory in general. Both are well-written and thoroughly documented. Both have a theoretical orientation representing a promising direction in China scholarship.

The two books neatly complement one another in illuminating the "function of 'China'" in Marx, Lenin, Le Ta-chao, and Mao Tse-tung. They document, at the same time, a shift of focus from Eurocentric to Asiatic (Chinese, to the exact) Marxism. Professor Meisner's sweep is necessarily narrower than Professor Lowe's, but the former painstakingly draws a consistently informative picture of a major figure in Chinese Communist history and of the Chinese intellectual situation at the turn of the century.

Towe's central concern is "the correlation of the changing ideas of China with the changing Marxist unity of theory and practice in different, changing situations" (pp. xiii-xiv). Successively and systematically, he gives an exposition of the intellectual situation in Western Europe, Russia, and China and relates each to emerging theory in Marx, Lenin, and Mao, respectively.

Marx inherited from his intellectual predecessors an image of China as a despotic, reactionary, and static society. The image was gradually transformed into a view of China as caught up in the vast process of universal history. This change was due to Marx's interpretation of the opium war as having introduced capitalism into China, having ended China's isolation, and having made her a part of the international capitalist market. This argument, as Lowe points out, contradicted the materialist interpretation of history and the view of change as instigated by internal forces. rather than being externally induced. Marx further anticipated that the Taiping rebellion in China would lead to an economic crisis in England, since the rebellion would inevitably bring about a disruption of the Chinese economy on which the British economy in part rested. Indeed, Marx predicted that China would precipitate a general European crisis, a series of revolutions on the continent. In his Eurocentrism, in short, Marx was concerned with China not in its own right but in its relation to Europe.

Lenin's conception of China was ancillary to his constant endeavor "to correlate Western-oriented theory and Russian-preoccupied practice," to identify "Russia's equivalence to the West" (passim). Before the abortive Russian revolution of 1905, Lenin subscribed to the prevalent image of China (and "the East" generally) as stagnant, reactionary, and despotic. After the 1905 revolution, and particularly after the October Revolution, Lenin began to see the East as changing, moving, revolutionary. In his quest for a revised model of the Marxian revolution, the East suddenly became "politically alive" (p. 67). World War I, Lenin believed, had dragged the East and all colonial and semicolonial countries into the world revolutionary process. He developed his well-known strategy of the dual revolution in colonial and semicolonial countries, a strategy that permeated the revolutionary movement in China.

The first major step toward the Sinification of Marxism was taken by Li Ta-chao, who was an ardent nationalist, the first important Chinese intellectual to declare his support for the Russian October Revolution, and the foremost interpreter of Marxism before Mao. Li's intellectual development-from preoccupation with the Chinese classics, to exposure to Western philosophies (particularly Bergson's voluntarism and Emerson's transcendentalism), to conversion to Marxism, to the advocacy of a peasant revolution in China-is carefully detailed by Meisner. Born in 1888 and secretly executed in 1927, Li is now honored by the CCP as its true founder and greatest martyr. Li became chief librarian at Peking University in 1918, in which capacity he influenced his young assistant, Mao Tse-tung.

Throughout his intellectual development, Li subscribed to a mystical vision of an imminent global regeneration in which China played a central role, a vision that was reinforced by the October Revolution. China was a "proletarian nation," which although lacking the economic base for socialism, was ready for a Marxist revolutionary movement; she would join the forces of world proletariat because China as a nation had suffered under international capitalism. Li's populism made it easy for him to support the Communist alliance with the KMT in 1923; in fact, he became the only Communist member of the KMT presidium.

Though strong, Li's populism showed reservations toward the urban proletariat. Thus, after the failure of the CCP-KMT alliance, Li was among the first to turn his attention to the peasantry and the countryside. As early as 1919 he had called upon the Chinese youth to go to the villages in order to liberate the peasants as a revolutionary force. In a 1925 article on "Land and the Peasants" (highly suggestive of Mao's "Hunan Report") Li assigned the peasantry the central role in a communist revolution in China.

This strategic modification of doctrine became a key factor in Mao-Tse-tung's thoroughgoing Sinification of Marxism. Mao became progressively disillusioned with the efficacy of the Soviet model for China and he increasingly stressed the unique features of the Chinese situation. Mao retained the nationalist and populist ideas of Li but he was a far more astute student of Lenin than his mentor. Li did not appreciate the pivotal role of the Communist party in organizing and leading the peasants. He did not fully perceive the importance of military organization and military activity. And he did not see the unity of peasant revolutionary activity in the countryside and proletarian revolutionary activity in the urban centers.

These two books represent a step in the right direction in China scholarship-a move toward a theoretical approach to an understanding of communism in China. The studies of China-as the early studies of the Soviet Union-have been overburdened with descriptive and historical detail. Franz Schurmann's brilliant Ideology and Organization in Communist China (1966) being a major exception. What is needed is a more conceptual treatment of China as a type of communist regime-the kind of treatment now well under way in Soviet studies and best exemplified in the work of Alfred G. Meyer and Robert C. Tucker, among others. It is time, in short, to begin the crucial task of incorporating the mass of available data into a theoretical structure for the study of Communist China in the context of the comparative study of communist political systems.—Mostafa REJAI, Miami University.

Bolingbroke and His Circle: the Politics of Nostalgia in the Age of Walpole. By Isaac Kram-Nick. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968. Pp. 321. $6.95.)

This book should do much to disabuse students of political thought of the notion that Augustan England was, as dismissed in Sabine's classic guide, "a period of quiescence or even of stagnation." For, in seeking to determine reasons for the Bolingbroke-Walpole feud-and the appeal of the former, reputedly a philosophe, to later Tories, Professor Kramnick bares an ideological division in English political life in the years from Locke to Hume. The struggle betwen Walpole's government and Bolingbroke's opposition did not, he finds, turn mainly upon a concern with the dignity and emolument of public office; more importantly, it involved a clash of different sets of ideas about society and politics. Thus the central figure of this study emerges, not as a mere opportunist inventing principles to suit the exigencies of the moment, but as the "full-blown spokesman" of gentry discontent with basic social assumptions "from which he never wavered" (p. 37).

The author interprets Bolingbroke's political attitudes, and those of his coadjutors—principally Swift, Pope, Gay, and Lyttleton, as, in a negative way, "inextricably bound" to the financial revolution of 1690-1740. The Viscount assailed the new world of liberal capitalism—endorsed and, in part, sponsored by Walpole's regime—because, in corrupting political life and undermining a traditional society, it was threatening the fundamental constitutional balance. Here, Bolingbroke is seen as a "frightened Harringtonian" who knew that, with the rise of moneyed and decline of landed property, the law of the balance, which had elevated the gentry-led Commons and perfected the Tudor constitution, now militated against nobility, gentry, and family. Yet he abandoned Harrington for Machiavelli in "the summation of his political writings and career" (p. 163), and looked to a great man, above politics, to again restore the constitution and reform a corrupt society. "The Patriot King, the great testament of Bolingbroke's Opposition," Kramnick concludes, "explains . . . the movement's failure . . . Bolingbroke, because of his . . . obsession with morality, example, and the just ruler, befuddled his institutional insights" (p. 168).

To support his claim of an Augustan ideological conflict, the author compares positions in the Bolingbroke-Walpole confrontation. In almost all areas, they are seen as opposed. Bolingbroke, e.g., used traditional Whig conceptions of the past to argue, against-paradoxically-Tory interpretations in the Walpole press, that 1688 had but restored and renewed the liberties of an immemorial constitution; he challenged Locke because the latter, "given the official stamp of the government and the Whig Establishment" (p. 117), was being used to negate the institutions and values of a 'genuine' polity; he rejected Walpole's two-partystruggle view of politics and distinguished between a faction (the 'anti-constitutional' Whig regime) and a national 'party' (his 'constitutional' opposition); and he espoused the right of constituents (reflecting the national consensus) to instruct their delegates (being corrupted by the ministry and moneyed interest) while Walpole's apologists denounced the radical theory of representation. Thus is explained Bolingbroke's role as both conservative and 'populist' spokesman for the declining gentry, and his appeal to later Tories-and radicals.

Professor Kramnick's is, on the whole, an excellens book-erudite, penetrating, and extremely well-written. But, while his knowledge of Bolingbroke is most impressive, when he moves away from the fulcrum of his inquiry, he is, in places, on somewhat less sure ground. Defoe is a case in point. To credit his "huge literary output" with consistently liberal views and then assert that all that he wrote "paid tribute to the ideas, institutions, and society . . . over which Walpole presided" (pp. 188-189) needs explaining. On one side, Defoe clearly "embodied the projecting spirit" (p. 193). Yet his was a bifocal mental outlook; he, too, could, on occasion, condemn the 'villainy' of projecting and stockjobbing, attack the big companies for various forms of 'knavery' including 'parliament-jobbing,' and demand corrupt-practices legislation. And, rather than being mere popularizations of Locke (p. 189), his serious views on the origins of government are closer to Bolingbroke's. Both, e.g., saw family groups as the fundamental units in a pre-political condition, landed property as the basis of legitimate power, the state as formed by an association of families. and the contract as between people (family heads) and prince. Furthermore, both scored party government. Finally, the author's ignoring of Defoe as a link in the revival of the radical theory of representation (pp. 169-174, 243-250) is perplexing; for, in his prime, he was the foremost exponent of the theory-and of the doctrine of the 'original power' of the people (both flatly rejected by Walpole). All of this, Defoe's and Swift's simultaneous counseling of the same minister (Harley), and Defoe's service, in 1713-1714, to Bolingbroke himself (on the Mercator) suggest that the total Augustan ideological situation was even more badly tangled than is conceded in the last chapter ("The Ambivalence of the Augustan Commonwealthman") of this valuable study.—JAMES V. ELLIOTT, Tufts University.

The Origins of Modern African Thought: Its Development in West Africa During the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. By Robert W. July. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. 480. $10.00.)

It is with a great deal of interest that one picks up a book which sets out to examine the origins of modern African thought—a subject of consider--able relevance and interest at the present time. Professor July suggests that modern Africa has been shaped largely by "two of her most recent minvasions," Islam in the mid-seventh century and ■the "scientific-technological revolution introduced From Europe at the beginning of the nineteenth sentury." (p. 15) Of these two major influences the author chooses to examine the latter in detail since "the more recent arrival of western scientifc-technological thought seems more completely to have influenced the institutions and ideas of the nodern states of mid-twentieth-century Africa." p. 15) The geographic emphasis of the study is the West Coast of Africa, in particular the areas of what are now Senegal, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Rhana, and Nigeria.

The focus on origins of modern African thought coses serious problems for Professor July. He does ot tell us how he wishes to use the term. On the casis of the author's Preface (and especially the cook jacket) we are led to assume that he means origin" in the sense of the source or determinants f modern African thought. We expect that the uthor will set out these themes and show us the nks between nineteenth and early twentieth centry thought and modern African thought. Except for a brief effort in the Epilogue, we are destined to disappointment. By "origin" it appears that the author means that which came before the modern period. If he means more than this, it is not evident in his presentation or analysis.

Professor July devotes the major part of his effort to an examination of the thought and writing of important West African thinkers and activists. All of these men had at least a limited "western" education and had accepted the legitimacy and to some extent the necessity of British and French influence in Africa. Some, such as Paul Holle and Blaise Diagne, regarded the contact with Europe as providing the means for the betterment of Africa. Indeed we see the paradox of Africans like Holle and Abbé Boilat viewing with discain the efforts of Frenchmen like Governor Faidherbe to study and guard local customs. In sharp contrast, other Africans like Edward Blyden were concerned about the maintenance of African values and the debilitating influences of much of what came with the benefits of external contacts.

Some of the studies of these early thinkers and writers are very well done, showing great sensitivity and understanding. It is here that The Origins of Modern African Thought makes a significant contribution. A number of important conflicts become clearer-that created by the contact between relatively highly modernized societies and nonmodernized societies; the disruptive influences as well as the contributions of western education and religion; the identity crises of those torn between traditional ties and a strong attraction to foreign ideas and religions, and their often torturous efforts to justify and come to grips with their new roles. Men like Bishop Crowther tried to resolve some of these conflicts in arguing (in his early writings) for a synthesis of European ideas, Christian teaching, and indigenous African customs (p.

These studies of West African thinkers also contribute to an understanding of the diffusion of ideas along the coast of Africa, especially the major influence of the slaves returned to Sierra Leone who later moved up and down the coast, and the strong assimilationist influences of both the French and English.

Unfortunately the studies of individual thinkers are of a varying quality. All too often we are at a loss to know what the author thinks and why he deems a particular writer worth quoting or sees his work as significant. Can we accept what "X" says as valid? We are seldom told. What was his contribution to modern African thought? Often one must guess. Only two paragraphs, for example, are devoted to "the significance of Africanus Horton" at the end of a chapter on his work. In addition, the way in which secondary sources are used is often confusing. We find statements like this:

"Everywhere Christian worship became standard, and European schooling was much sought after..." (p. 131). While I do not think that Professor July believes this as a general statement in the light of what he says elsewhere, comments such as this one are confusing at best. Again and again we are confronted with the problem of lack of definitions. The author talks about "the modern African mind" (p. 22), the "unusual turn of the Gallic mind" (p. 28), or English and French "national character" (p. 30), without ever specifying what it is that differentiates them from each other. To understand their influences we must first know what they are.

The importance of the individual thinkers studied in this book is not questioned here. What is generally lacking, however, is a systematic effort to relate their activity to modern African thought and to set out general themes which ought to emerge from this study. As it is, we can only infer many of the author's conclusions. We must ourselves draw most of our conclusions from the material-sadly, without the benefit of the extensive and impressive work that went into the preparation of this study. Perhaps as political scientists we are asking too much of Professor July who is an historian speaking no doubt to an audience consisting largely of historians. Yet in this instance, I think we are not. The author sets out to examine origins, the relationship of the contact between individuals in societies with fundamentally different ideas and traditions, and the influence of western ideas on modern thought in Africa. It is in the analysis of these questions that the work is most deficient.

In short, this study is of uneven quality. At times the author shows considerable sensitivity and insight, at other times he is oblique and lacking in clear analysis. Despite its shortcomings, The Origins of Modern African Thought will be useful as a reference work for those interested in the political thought and influence of nineteenth and early twentieth century West African thinkers who had extensive contact with the West.—Fred M. Hayward, University of Wisconsin.

Freud: Political and Social Thought. By PAUL ROAZEN. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968, Pp. 322. $6.95.)

The author notes at the outset that a theory of human nature has been an integral part of political philosophy throughout its entire history. In the Republic, for example, Plato offers not only a theory concerning the nature of the human psyche but also (books VIII and IX) the first social psychology in Western thought. Very little of subsequent political philosophy is as explicit as Plato is on this point, but the theme is never entirely absent and is always of fundamental importance.

Although the significance of the theory of human nature is quite obvious, it is often overlooked or not fully appreciated in writings on political philosophy. Periodic reminders are thus not inappropriate, and Professor Roazen's book ought to be welcomed on this account. Nothing in twentieth-century Western thought can rival Freudian theory as an original contribution to the historical concern with the problem of human nature; it follows that no serious work in political philosophy can fail to come to terms with Freud's thought. Professor Roazen has attempted to remind us of this fact and to show in systematic fashion the relevance of Freudian theory for present-day work in the social sciences.

The author's main contention in this book is that Freud's work has been divided into two distinct strains: the clinical tradition on the one hand, which concentrates on a narrow therapeutic approach, and social theory on the other, which puts exclusive emphasis on Freud's metapsychological writings and neglects his clinical contributions. Prof. Roazen argues that this situation is detrimental to both psychoanalysis and social theory, and especially to the latter; he writes (p. 19) that it is "impossible to understand these late social and political speculations of Freud's without fitting them into the context of his theories of clinical psychoanalysis." By examining Freud's clinical writings Prof. Roazen tries to demonstrate that Freudian theory can supply a vital ingredient for social science: a "systematic notion of human motivation" and a theory of the human personal-

By far the most valuable part of this book for political scientists is the section (pp. 59 ff.) dealing with an application of the insights afforded by psychoanalysis to the research techniques widely used at present in political science. Prof. Roazer shows that, if the data gathered in questionnaires and surveys and in the analysis of political behavior (e.g. voting) is evaluated without the sophisti cation in the understanding of human motivation made possible by psychoanalysis, such empirica studies are likely to be of little value. Since much effort is currently invested in these studies, hi challenge is quite important. Unfortunately hi discussion of this point is too brief, and one woulhope that the author would publish a more exten sive account of this topic in the future.

Certainly further pursuit of this aspect of Proparation Roazen's analysis is necessary for political science. But the main contention of this book is mor problematical. He wants to rescue Freud from mistreatment by philosophers and metaphysician who, he claims, have distorted Freud's work by emphasizing his metapsychological theories and ignoring his clinical writings. He does not only want to restore the balance, but to reverse the priorit of attention; and he argues that "clinical psychoanalysis has a logical independence from Freud's own social theories" (p. 112).

It is hard to know just which philosophers and metaphysicians the author has in mind in making this indictment, for he does not mention any names. In fact much creative work has been done in applying psychoanalytic conceptions to social theory, even by philosophers. Outstanding examples are: some of Wilhelm Reich's writings, studies by individuals associated with the Frankfurt Institute for Social Research, Herbert Marcuse's Eros and Civilization and his essays in the volume Freud und der Gegenwart, and Norman O. Brown's Life Against Death. The interpretations of Freud by Brown and Marcuse are just the opposite of Prof. Roazen's. They maintain that Freud's metapsychological inquiries cannot be separated from his earlier clinical work: "the psychoanalytic theory of therapy has to be a theory of culture" (Brown); "Freud's theory of civilization grows cut of his psychological theory" (Marcuse). As a result Brown and Marcuse have been able to indicate quite clearly the interconnections between Freudian theory and the traditional concerns of social theory. If Prof. Roazen thinks that they have done Freud a disservice, he ought to show us where they have gone wrong.

One cannot establish the "logical independence" of Freud's earlier and later work by quoting his private comments expressing dissatisfaction with his metapsychological efforts or by suggesting (p. 102) that Freud's later writings represent his attempt to "stave off his own personal disintegration" by "appealing to society through social theory." What is required is a much closer examination of the texts. Such an examination reveals a great many complexities and indeed difficulties—for example, in the problem of the relationship between the individual and society; but that is what makes the study of Freud so valuable for the political theorist.—William Leiss, University of Saskatchewan, Regina.

Democracy's Dilemma: The Totalitarian Party in a Free Society. By BENJAMIN E. LIPPINCOTT. (New York: The Ronald Press Company, 1965. Pp. 293.)

Professor Lippincott's main thesis is that the presence of a "totalitarian" party in a "free" society poses no genuine dilemma for democratic poitical theory. The Communist Party in western countries is not a bona fide party according to the author, but a revolutionary conspiracy masquerading as a party. As such it stands outside the pale of liberal politics, especially as it would abrogate political pluralism and tolerance if it ever capured state power. Thus the problem of the CP in liberal democracy is never one of freedom of speech of individuals, but rather a problem of illegal action by a conspiratorial association. As a consequence, the Communist Party has no moral right to exist and can be outlawed or otherwise controlled without involving democratic theory in self-contradiction. What specific measures are taken against the Party is a matter of mere expediency, having no implications for the civil liberties of genuine democrats.

A subsidiary argument of Lippincott's seeks to demonstrate that the failure of democratic theory to recognize the "true" nature of the Communist Party and the liberals' preoccupation with rights and disregard of duties have impaired the ability of democracies to withstand the internal and external onslaught of Communism. The third purpose of Democracy's Dilemma is to provide evidence of the democratic theoretical shortcomings by a survey of the writings of American and British socialist, liberal, conservative, and Catholic intellectuals and political leaders between 1917 and 1952.

The structure of the book reflects these three concerns. Lippincott opens with a short historical chapter purporting to demonstrate the awesome and evil power of Communism in America and to link it to the inappropriate scruples of liberal democrats whose paralyzing sense of an insoluble dilemma has prevented them from dealing with the situation self-confidently and with a good conscience. The following three chapters are devoted to a report on the results of an examination of 6,000 books and articles that deal (or at least might have dealt) with democracy's dilemma, and to an account of the position of traditional ("orthodox") liberals and so-called "realistic" authors. (The "realists," unlike the "traditionalists," recognize in the "totalitarian" party an agency for revolution which-given a chance-would deny the very freedoms on which it relies to promote its subversive aims.) Lippincott finds that only few writers dealt fundamentally with what he thinks is "the most crucial internal dilemma confronting democracy in the twentieth century." Forty-four American and British authors who did confront that "dilemma," however, receive more extensive treatment. The account of their arguments is reliable, fair, and unpolemical. These chapters—the distillate of a prodigious amount of reading-constitute a handy summary on an important subject and are the most valuable part of the book. The central core of Professor Lippincott's concern, however, is reached only in the following three chapters in which the traditionalist liberal view of the dilemma is severely criticized and the author's own thesis is presented according to which the suppression of "totalitarian" parties in democratic states does not involve democratic theory in selfcontradiction. The work concludes with recommendations for meeting the danger of internal subversion by, and external threat from, the supposedly world-wide Communist conspiracy.

We can do here no more than merely suggest briefly some of the major difficulties that vitiate Lippincott's book. Underlying them all is the ideologically distorted view of the world as a battlefield on which the forces of Good (the "free" world) are locked in mortal combat with the forces of Evil (the centrally directed Communists, bent on enslaving mankind). Constrained by this mythology, Lippincott remains unaware of the ideological content and the role of the concept "totalitarianism" whose use blinds him to the differences between Fascism and Communism, and to the analytical distinctions between revolution and counter-revolution. Indeed, except for two peripheral comments (pp. 38 and 221f), there is no indication that Lippincott is aware of the dynamics of social revolution. On the contrary, much of his argument depends on the implicit judgment that the maintenance of the status quo, tempered by incremental reformism, is a good in itself which the United States has a moral commitment to uphold all around the globe, and that the world-wide forces of radical social change can be understood only as the agents and dupes of the Kremlin.

The reader will search in vain in Lippincott's book for a realistic analysis of the post-industrial state, or for an inkling of the pervasive crisis of confidence in liberal pluralism, in its compatibility with democracy, and in its capacity to organize a just and authentically free society. Rather, when Professor Lippincott speaks of "democracy," "free society," or "equality," these terms remain purely formal, devoid of any realistic content. He never defines freedom at all and confuses the notion of the correlative nature of rights and duties (which holds that the rights of one person create necessarily obligations in another person, and not, as Lippincott would have it, in the person claiming the rights) with a theory of contingent rights (which insists that the valid claim to a right depends on the fulfillment of certain conditions).

A more exhaustive review would have to question Lippincott's almost total disregard of the relevant Supreme Court decisions (Yates, Lightfoot, and Albertson are not even mentioned; Scales and Noto receive one footnote each); his dubious interpretation of the Dennis case (Lippincott sees no difference between the "clear and present danger" and the "grave and probable danger" doctrines); his failure to use the many recent studies on the politics of integration and the dynamics of economic development (indeed, of all the books cited, only twenty three were published after 1956, only twelve of them in the 1960's, and the most recent systematic political science source used is Duverger's Political Parties of 19591); and Lippincott's parochial analysis of political parties. A more extended criticism would, finally, have to take issue with Lippinuott's unbalanced version of the history of the Cold War and with the numerous misjudgments concerning European, especially German and Austrian, political events of the interwar years; his disregard of important changes in, and profound divergencies among, Communist states; his very incomplete account of the role of revolution and violence in Marxist and Leninist theories; and his championing not only of the data developed by the House Un-American Activities Committee, but also of its record of "expos[ing] for the sake of exposure," without even mentioning the Watkins decision.-Kurt P. Tau-BEL. Williams College.

The Revival of Democratic Theory. By Neal Ris-Mer. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1962. Pp. 190. $2.25.)

The Democratic Experiment: American Political Theory. By Neal Riemer. Vol. I. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc., 1967. Pp. 245. S2.85.)

Riemer's main purpose in The Revival of Democratic Theory is "to analyze the decline and to suggest a case for the revival of democratic theory." Drawing principally from the writings of Strauss, Easton, Brecht, Cobban, and Morgenthau, he adduces five reasons for the failure of political theory "to unify and undergird political science." All of this consumes some 17 pages. Next, he explores "democratic theory in particular" in light of the more general malaise that has overtaken political theory. He writes: "Democratic theory lacks a conceptual scheme which unites the values, facts, and policies of a democratic society. Consequently, a major task of the democratic theorist is to relate harmoniously the normative, empirical, and prudential components of democratic political life." This is a recurrent theme of the book and the very task to which Riemer devotes himself in the remaining chapters (3-7).

What is the function of the "prudential" component of political theory? In the main it serves "to harmonize the values relevant to the good political life and the empirical realities which inevitably affect our strivings to fulfill these values.' What is the good life? It comes down to a "commitment to individual realization within the framework of the common good." There is some discussion and analysis of the perplexing questions that enough to guide an individual intent upon following Riemer's prescriptions. What is more significant at this juncture, however, is Riemer's evident concern to avoid being labelled an "absolutist' or one possessed of "THE TRUTH." On the other hand, he evidences a queasiness towards moral "relativism" (as perforce he must unless he wants to pull the cornerstone out of his entire enterprise). Whether he really negotiates this channel or not (we need not ask here the broader and more interesting question of whether any such "channel" exists) is certainly open to debate. Ultimately his commitment to his formulation of the good life is a matter of "reasoned faith."

In a chapter entitled "Umpiring the Struggle for Power," Riemer stresses the need for "democratic and constitutional accommodation" for the resolution of conflicts that inevitably arise in the body politic. Here we find a defense of majority rule in conjunction with a textbookish examination of the role and functions of American institutions-parties, the Presidency, the Supreme Court, and the Congress. The last of the substantive chapters deals with what Riemer perceives to be two of the major challenges confronting a modern democratic theory: "the lonely crowd and world disorder." There is a plea for a "theory of transition" which will guide underdeveloped countries, if they so desire, to move in the direction of becoming mature and stable democracies. We are informed that accommodation between the Soviet Union and United States is quite likely because the two powers "will in actuality move closer to the meeting ground of democratic socialism." The final and very short chapter repeats and expands upon the theme that "the seeming decline and apparent ineffectiveness of democratic political theory may be attributable fundamentally to the failure of political theorists to view theory as the harmonious relationship of its normative, empirical, and prudential components."

The Democratic Experiment represents the first of a projected "three volume study of the political theory of American Democracy." The "theme" of this volume "is the creative Democratic experiment in reconciling Liberty and Authority in a large state." Riemer sets out to deal with a number of recurrent problems in the "American political community." "What is the nature, and what are the uses, of political theory?" (We already know the answer to that question.) "To what extent are we captives of, or emancipated from, our inheritance?" "Does Puritanism produce the good political life?" "What has been, is, and should be the theory of revolution in democratic America?" "Is just republican government possible in a large state?" "Upon what principles can we build a strong and prosperous nation?" "How do we perceive the American vision?" To answer these and related questions Riemer examines-in seven chapters, a "Prologue," and an "Epilogue"-the writings of Roger Williams, Edmund Burke, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, John Adams, John Marshall, John Quincy Adams, and, among others, Andrew Jackson. Chapter 2, "America's Inheritance: Two Ithe Judaic-Christian and British Constitutionall Traditions," is designed to give us some historical and theoretical background for a better understanding of the American tradition. The very scope of the book precludes detailed analysis here.

What can be said of these two works? If they were intended, and we cannot be at all sure of this given the claims made for them by the author, to be simply texts designed to introduce the undergraduate to some of the enduring problems associated with democratic and American political thought, then something positive can be said about them. The Democratic Experiment is comparable in scope and depth to the major texts in the American theory field, and the Revival volume does raise a number of salient questions and issues, so that it, too, is suitable for assignment in undergraduate courses that center on democratic theory and practices. Beyond this we cannot go. Neither volume advances the existing frontiers of thought in the realm of democratic or American theory. Surely one who can see fit to write 'Locke, with superb common sense, sams up the best in Coke, the Levellers, and Harrington, He reaches back to Hooker, Aquinas, Cicero, and the best in the medieval and classical traditions. . . ," is totally unaffected by a vast corpus of scholarly literature that interprets Locke in a totally different way. And this is no small point, for a reassessment of Locke might well have served to change the thrust of Riemer's arguments, particularly those in The Democratic Experiment. Or one who views Jefferson's stance toward the Alien and Sedition Acts as libertarian (a) is probably wrong, but more importantly (b) glosses over a complex of issues that would lead us to a better understanding of the American tradition. Or, again, for one who claims that Madison ranks among the very best of our "modern political philosophers" but cannot conjure up intelligible reasons why Madison believed "rightful [rather than factional or "bad"] majorities . . . will normally have their way" in our extended republic (a crucial point in Madison's theory), certainly cannot be awarded any merit badges for either imagination or intensive theoretical analysis. And, finally, the presumed "revival" of democratic theory which was promised never materializes. The problems treated, as Riemer's footnotes and bibliography will amply attest, are not original or novel. All of them have been explored with greater sophistication and depth than we find in this particular volume. In fact, off of Riemer's own showing, we can only conclude that democratic theory was never-not until now, anyway-in a somnambulant state.-GEORGE W. CAREY, Georgetown University.

The Political Creature. By Peter Zollinger. (New York: George Braziller, Inc., 1967. Pp. 303, $7.50.)

Like some of the classics of political philosophy, Peter Zollinger's tract in political theory begins with the state of nature. This time, however, we start not from a jungle, whether nasty or idyllic, but from a negatively charged, dynamic, miniscule electron orbiting around a relatively huge, immobile proton. What is important about this primal state, if you will, is that in 1927 it was discovered by Heisenberg that it is impossible to isolate p (position) and q (momentum) of subatomic particles. The two are aspects of a single event, related in such a manner that the more precisely p can be obtained, the vaguer becomes q and vice versa.

According to Dr. Zollinger it is not merely the fact that the physical base of the universe is indeterminate that is critical to our fate as social and political man. Even more important is the principle derived by Niels Bohr in analyzing Heisenberg's findings, namely the principle of "complementarity," the fact that position and momentum were complementary aspects of a single unitary event, not separate realities. It is the universality of complementarity, the fundamental interdependence of everything with everything within any system from the microphysical to the macroscopic, which is the law that is the basis of all matter, both living and non-living, and is the force that has pushed the evolution of things from the hydrogen atom to our own civilization.

The author takes us on a journey, one almost wants to say a Space-Time Odyssey, through the negatively and positively electrically charged microphysical particles to the negative dynamic spermatozoon and positive, static ovum to static, immobile, protonic plants and dynamic, electronic animals. The journey, and I am paraphrasing the author in following it continues into the social sphere with its conventions and domesticity, dominated by the vegetative-protonic sex, the women, and the dynamic-electronic sex with its trade, science, technology, the life military and political, the animalic male sex. Thus, the author tries to show the repetitiousness in evolution with the principle of complementarity the basis of all stages.

In this way Dr. Zollinger traces evolution as it is driven onward by the principle of complementarity. He discusses the emergence of organic and biological life in its most primitive forms and shows the development into more advanced forms, conscious life. He suggests that one must understand social and political life by the same principle and shows, for example, that social life must be understood in terms of the need for both self-preservation and species preservation. From an evolutionary point of view species preservation is of supreme import with functional diversity and integration, the bases of complementarity, allowing for more and more advanced stages of civilization. Dr. Zollinger tells us that it is only when men understand and act according to the principle of complementarity that they can utilize this principle to preserve civilization and species development.

There are a variety of questions that must be asked in evaluating a book of this kind. The first has to do with what new insights or understanding this effort at political theory attains. Dr. Zollinger himself, one expects, would suggest that the most important achievement of the book is the connection he has tried to establish between a social and political ethics and the fundamental principles of the universe. One wonders, however, how the complementarity of proton and electron bears on the nature of an ethics that we search for. The nature of diversity, functional integration, and complementarity at the subatomic level has a formal similarity to the diversity and integration that one finds and tries to encourage among men, but one learns little about how men ought to act in merely saying complementarity is important, even essential. Dr. Zollinger places great importance on Heisenberg's not being able to isolate different aspects of the same microphysical phenomena. For some mysterious reason he concludes from this indeterminacy that somehow there is "freedom" at this level. The physicist should and usually does realize that to speak of the "freedom" of the atom because of its indeterminacy is to say very little about ethics or will. Surely the political theorist or that matter, any man, does not depend on the findings of men like Bohr and Heisenberg to discover his freedom and the freedom of his species. It is this fear of the loss of freedom (or, for that matter, the hope of finding freedom) in scientific work that limits people's understanding of science, particularly in the academic community. Thus, the complementarity and freedom that Zollinger discovers in the physical world seems to be of marginal worth in the problem of social and political ethics.

One might also ask of this book what contribution it makes to political philosophy. Using his "new understanding," Dr. Zollinger concludes that a tension between self-preservation and species preservation is desirable, that a tension between the individual and the state is desirable, that a tension between law and ethics is desirable, etc. The discussion of the nature of these tensions which must be resolved through complementarity adds little to what has already been written by the great political philosophers. The contributions to political and social theory found in this book add little to what we understand. Nevertheless, this effort is a Space-time fantasy and those readers who are wary of the fantasies of Hollywood producers like Stanley Kubrick might find the voyage in this book a diversion that complements their more "electronic" activities.—SIDNEY WALD-MAN, Haverford College.

The Notion of the State: An Introduction to Political Theory. By Alexander Passerin d'Entrèves. (London: Oxford University Press, 1967. Pp. 233. $2.95.)

D'Entrèves implies that it is the shortcomings of "certain modern theorists," indeed, of "contemporary political science" (p. 9), which motivates him to defend a more inclusive theory of the State. The new political science "bears a striking resemblance to certain old notions of the State as merely a relation of force" (p. 9), whereas in truth this force must be regularized through legal rules and these rules themselves stand in need of legitimation, i.e., a feeling on the part of the people that they 'ought' to be obeyed. His book is intended to redress the modern imbalance by reasserting the need for political philosophy as the guide to legitimacy.

Since no work more recent than David Easton's Political System (1953) is cited, one can hardly say the "contemporary" literature has been exhausted. One would think, e.g., that some of the recent studies precisely on legitimacy would have attracted d'Entrèves' attention. But if he does less than justice to modern political analysis, this does nothing to detract from his generally incisive assessment of the contributions of the major political philosophers to one or more of his three categories of the State. He devotes a chapter each to Force ('Might'), Legality ('Power'), and Legitimacy ('Authority').

It is not surprising that Thrasymachus becomes the first spokesman for the State as Force. D'Entrèves' analysis is good. He does not mistake Thrasymachus' embarrassed withdrawal from his Socratic confrontation for a withdrawal of force from the ruler. On the contrary, "Strength must be joined to wisdom" (p. 16). Socrates and Thrasymachus are both essential to the State.

The treatment of St. Augustine is less clear. According to d'Entrèves' earlier definition, legitimation involves "a sense of obligation," "'agreement' on the ends to be pursued," "a civic sense, love of country, complete dedication to the common cause" (pp. 5-6). Nothing is said of the quality of the ends. But later, Augustine's state is denied legitimacy. It is "'ethically neutral," "strictly factual," one in which "all consideration of values is left out," as is "any reference to its ends." While for Augustine it is a state even though unjust, for d'Entrèves, without justice it is "a simple organization of force" (pp. 23-24). From legitimacy consisting in what people do in fact accept as obligatory, d'Entrèves moves to what they ought to accept. Legitimacy is impossible without knowledge of this 'ought.' This is a hard, perhaps impossible, demand, though a noble one. It would seem to call not only for political philosophy but for empirical studies of possible factual 'oughts.'

The State thought of as Legality, the limitation and direction of Force by law, takes d'Entrèves through Aristotle, Cicero, the Romans, the Middle Ages, Bodin, and Hobbes, Space does not permit detailed coverage. One should say, however, that in building his case in this part, the author has done a masterful job of mustering the evidence with no distortion of the sources. Thus, for example, he covers accurately and to the point the differing stages of law as "declaratory" or as "creative": Bodin's origination of the word "sovereignty" to express supreme legal power in an independent national territory; and the legal criteria for Hobbes' force, in contradistinction from Machiavelli's. Also good is his timely reminder that the divided exercise of power does not challenge the principle of unified sovereignty.

As for Legitimacy, we have learned that the State depends not only on its acceptance by the people but on its pursuit of 'right,' of 'just,' ends (pp. 24, 159). What happens if people do not accept this pursuit of justice, d'Entreves does not discuss, any more than does Locke in posing as the criteria for legitimacy the twin concepts of consent, on the one hand, and action in accordance with the law of nature, i.e., reason, on the other. But with the consequences before us of the German Nazi plurality vote in 1932, can any theorist any longer ignore this question?

In terms of 'just' and 'right' ends, Aristotle's conception of the polis as natural, with its own ends but also instrumental to human virtue, was a normative concept. When this natural standard for the State was no longer accepted, the normative need was attached to the state of nature and the social contract (p. 166). D'Entrèves is correct in this attribution, but it would have added to his book had he evaluated the seeming paradox involved in considering as normative a state of nature which men found it necessary to leave, or, alternatively, which was only a construct to begin with

Contrary to inegalitarian elitists, d'Entrèves argues that the origin of legitimacy is in the fundamental equality of rights of all men. As with Madison, presumably this would not preclude inequality of political function as long as based upon consent. Indeed, seemingly only this kind of democratic elitism could actualize the justice essential to his legitimacy.

The book ends with a discussion of the ambiguity of individual rights and interests, on the one hand, and the common good, on the other, as legitimations of power. He rightly cites Locke in this respect, but surprisingly considers it worth noting how strongly rooted was the idea of the common good "still in Locke's day" (p. 224). Since he had already shown familiarity with Madison, he might have lengthened his "still" by one hundred years and noted some of Madison's references to the public interest. Madison boldly joined in the same sentence the "permanent and aggregate interests of the community" and the "rights of other citizens" (Federalist No. 10), and believed that because of social pluralism and the separation of powers the two could be mutually reinforcing. D'Entreves might have explored this possibility, especially since we live in an age stressing individual rights and he is heavily committed to the common good.

Though subtitled 'An Introduction to Political Theory,' this revised English version of the original 1962 Italian edition would be hard going for a beginner. It would be most rewarding at the end of a course using original sources. Both its insights and its omissions could then be appreciated. It is one of those rare books which, good as it stands, would be better were it longer.—Maynard Smith, Hobart and William Smith Colleges.

Organizational Effectiveness: An Inventory of Propositions. By James L. Price. (Homewood, Illinois: Richard D. Irwin, Inc., 1968. Pp. 212. $3.75.)

The relevance of organizational theory for political theory has not escaped recent notice. Wolin in Politics and Vision complained about the assumption of identity between elments in contemporary organizational and political theories. Kaufman in a piece in this Review several years ago was intrigued by the "parallels between organization theory and political theory." And recently, Denhardt in the Public Administration Review has reminded us that "citizenship" and "membership" may refer to the same phenomena. It thus should not surprise the reader that Price has utilized a conception of the organization's "political system" to order a major part of his inventory. The propositions there justify political scientists giving it a try. Those who study bureaucracies or political organizations should find the book even more worth the effort. My choice of words is deliberate for Price's purpose and style (which is in part a consequence of his purpose) make this book difficult no matter the interest of the reader. Those who prefer a more systematic and cumulative social science ought not complain about the purpose; for those same reasons they may rightfully complain about the results.

The author's purpose (with acknowledgement to Berelson and Steiner) "... is to present the core of what the behavioral sciences now know about the effectiveness of organizations: what we really know, what we nearly know, what we think we know, and what we claim to know." (p. 1). Fifty studies of "administrative organization" ("... an organization composed primarily of full-time members" p. 8.) were inventoried for "information pertinent to effectiveness." Productivity, morale. conformity, adaptiveness, and institutionalization were presumed to be more positively than negatively related to "effectiveness" and hence "functional" with respect to it. (In the final model these are listed as "intervening variables.") The format of the propositions is designed to alert the reader to the level of measurement presumably attained on each variable as well as to inform him of conditions imposed on the relationship. Accepting the conceptualizations and findings of his sources as given, Price casts those materials relevant to his interests into a series of primarily bivariate relationships with "effectiveness" the dependent variable. (Effectiveness is defined as the degree of achievement of "operative" as opposed to "official" goals.) Five sets of "determinants" are discussed: the economic system, the internal poltical system, the external political system, the control system, population and ecology. The resulting schemata also delineate potential relationships for future inquiry and are called "models" of effectiveness in organizations. The propositions are subsequently summarized and ordered in terms of the variables most likely to be related to "high effectiveness."

Crdinarily it is not fair to fault an author for more rather than less rigor. In this work, however, the author's attempted precision complicates explication and comprehension. Some examples should illustrate the unfortunate results.

Proposition 3.3 reads: "Except where there is a high degree of complexity, organizations which have a low degree of centralization with respect to tactical decisions are more likely to have a high degree of effectiveness than organizations which have a low degree of centralization and respect to tactical decisions." (p. 60). Later, on page 90, we read: "Therefore, when Katz, Maccoby, and Mcrse note that close supervision is inversely related to productivity, this inventory interprets this to mean that a very high degree of centralization is negatively associated with productivity. Proposition 3.3 refers, not to very high, but merely to a high degree of centralization. Data which suggest that a very high degree of centralization is dysfunctional or effectiveness thus do not necessarily contradict the proposed relation. . . " To be sure, the relationship may be curvilinear. But then again it may not be. Comparable feats of extrication by degrees appear elsewhere and highlight the fact that the concept "degree" and the differences between a low degree, a "mere" high degree, and a very high degree are cause for more concern than the author has shown them.

The use of "positive" and "negative" illustrations must be carefully followed for "positive" means high x, high y, while "negative" means low x, low y. The concept of organizational "size" is defined as "volume of output" and is also measured in "degrees." At another point, the inventory's propositions refer to "degrees" of sanctions while the discussion refers variously to numbers and supplies.

The costs of concision are no better illustrated than on page 132 where we find: "The type of external political system most likely to result in a high degree of effectiveness will have a high degree of autonomy; an ideology which has high degrees of congruence, priority, and conformity; cooptation; major elite co-optation; a high degree of representation; major elite representation and a major elite constituency." The author must mean to say something like "Organizations are more likely to be more effective when their external political systems foster. . . ." Indeed he ultimately says as much on page 204.

Several minor notes as well. Surely there is a typo in Proposition 3.1 (page 49) which now reads: "Organizations which have a high degree of legitimacy are more likely to have a degree of fectiveness than organizations which have a low degree of legitimacy." And we need not be reminded to the point of irritation that illustration is not proof.

Synthesis and systematization of a literature as voluminous as that surveyed by Price is no mean chore. And while I have quarreled over several features of the final product I would also take issue with any who would disparage this or any other equally comprehensive review of a literature. We truly need to know what we know about a lot of things. Price had contributed to our knowledge of organizational effectiveness through his efforts.—Dale A. Neuman, University of Missouri at Kansas City.

The Industrial Society: Three Essays on Ideology and Development. By RAYMOND ARON. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. 183. $4.95.)

The three essays comprising this volume are inked more by M. Aron's remarkable person than by any systematic presentation of ideas. Thus, nowever one may wish to resist the temptation to ndulge in the sociology of political knowledge, to examine such a volume otherwise is simply not to ake seriously perhaps the most important singular actor in the book as such: Aron's aesthetic vision. The three papers are also connected by a systemtic attack on the Left. The first paper is a cririque of the thesis which unites the underdevelopient phenomenon with the fully developed naions. The second paper is a stong assault on evoitionary theory, or at least those forms of evoluonary theory which feed the flames of histori-Ksm. The third paper is an assault on the convergence hypothesis, which maintains that capitalism and socialism are beginning to approximate one another.

However limited much of the writing is, and although Aron remains a prisoner of the ideological parameters he so detests, important coordinates are raised. While Aron's book is not the first effort to attack the idea that socialism is necessary to initiate the developmental process in the Third World, it is one of the few attempting to relate problems of development to those of international peace and order.

In his first paper Aron shows how developmental theory raises a series of causal issues that continue to plague the field. He centers on what is perhaps the major problem, whether underdevelopment is caused by or necessarily responsive to the fully developed and advanced nations. While he takes issue with those who would deny that every nation, like every man, is responsible for the consequences of his own behavior, he does not really show how national behavior is autonomous. For example, he fails to explain why nations which were not impoverished in previous epochs, nonetheless remain backward. Nor does he explain how the widespread monopoly of research and development gives advanced nations leverage over the underdeveloped nations despite intensive efforts on their part. And while Aron realizes that the single crop economy is a weak point in underdeveloped economies, he does not indicate why, these single crop economies seem to persist-although all reasonable evidence indicates the wisdom of diversification. As in so many of his works there is emphasis on ideology at the expense of economics rather than as a consequence of economics. Too often Aron tends to see the problem of underdeveloped areas in terms of administrative strategy rather than as a matter of social structure.

The second study in the volume, ostensibly a response to the tenets set forth by Morris Ginsberg, that the evolutionary or rationalistic interpretation of development has lost ground, permits Aron a statement of his cwn faith and reason. He makes some shrewd observations about what he terms the "schedule of development." He notes that whether one starts from a Marxian or Rostovian premise, development seems to imply a range of choices and decisions. The volitional character of development thus means that the quality of existence will be differential no less than the goals sought.

Aron's position is that rational choice should not be equated with a plan for social life to proceed through inexorable stages of history or development, but rather as a chance to live in the modern world without having to confront "development" and force it upon the political processes. Unfortunately, Aron, while describing the schedule of development, does not take note of when and how this developmental process is to be realized. Since developmental theory no longer accepts any historical explanation, it remains more rooted than ever in teleology. In hunting for the future by arguing with the past, Aron's volume must be seen as a justification for the continuation of a middle class growth pattern. While the basis of a reliable schedule of growth remains the touchstone of developmental strategy, Aron would prefer to think that it is the cultural artifacts produced in the West that remain the essential model to be employed by the underdeveloped world. However, Aron does draw our attention to the problem of determining just what can be measured in the developmental process. As an extreme rationalist he is unwilling to accept that forces outside human volition determine the outcomes of the developmental process. Too often he allows his own detestation of determinism to drift off into dramaturgy. Just as God seems to lurk behind the rationalist philosophes of the eighteenth century, so too Culture seems to lurk behind the idealist social thought of Aron.

As readers of Aron well appreciate, if his critical acumen can at times rise to oracular brilliance, his constructive skills remain pedestrian and at times even absurd. In his criticism of Anglo-American theorists such as Aiken, Lichtheim, and Rostow, Aron exhibits both of these elements. When he criticizes these men, we have some sterling writing, but when constructive alternatives should be posited, he gives us nothing. The conclusion to the book is a series of dreary banalities, such as the following: "The breakdown of ideological syntheses does not lead to insipid pragmatism or lessen the value of intellectual controversy. On the contrary, it encourages a recurrence of rational discussion of problems which, in any case, must be solved pragmatically." Then, in complete denial of the premises upon which his book is built, he notes that: "We are more fortunate than previous generations in that we are not forced to make a choice between conservatism and fanaticism." Presumably what will save us is that, "We know that modern methods, scientific and technological progress, and the rational organization of labor enable us to achieve the objectives to which liberals and socialists of previous centuries aspired." And finally, as if his palliatives were insufficient, we are given a set of prognostications which have the predictive force of Chinese fortune cookies. "History from now to the end of the century will be ings get wrapped up into a gnarled bundle of twine that he seems too impatient to bother unraveling.

The book is more a study of developmentalists or at least some developmentalists than it is of development. This would not be so bad had Aron acknowledged this to begin with: however his failure to appreciate the limits of the text inclines one to ponder the depth of analysis. To appreciate how thoroughly out of tune Aron is with recent developmental literature, one has to keep in mind that his notion of Western developmentalists does not extend beyond Walt Rostow and James Burnham, neither of whom can be considered as recent; and Henry Aiken and Herbert Marcuse, neither of whom can be considered developmentalists. The work of modern developmentalists, the bocks by people such as Adelman, Apter, Pye, Moore, Verba, et al., and on the Soviet side, Liberman and Kurakov, simply don't exist for Aron. The tragedy is that so many conflicts which are real for him no longer exist in the political world. Although Aron's book can be read either for fun or for profit, it is not likely that contemporary American social scientists will turn to it as an example of how to deal with the relationship between modern industrial processes and developmental orientations. Perhaps M. Aron will yet favor us with the big book on this subject.—IR-VING LOUIS HOROWITZ, Washington University at St. Louis.

Systems of Political Science. By Oran R. Young. Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1968. Pp. 113. $4.50.)

Young's book is so very badly done that I would not, ordinarily, agree to review it. Yet it illustrates a trend in contemporary publishing in political science whose implications for the discipline are worth careful examination. Since Young is not responsible for that trend, it is perhaps unfair to use him as a whipping boy, but the point I am trying to make is, I believe, sufficiently important to justify what has been done.

First, the book. Young sets out to expound critically a variety of "approaches" to the study of politics-general systems theory, structural-functional analysis, communications theory, etc. He fails, for reasons that are both procedural and substantive. First, the writing is atrocious. Cliches abound, often in most unusual form: "... pin down the level of interdependence which forms the breaking point..." [p. 25] Clauses dangle; punccal assumptions implicit in the treatment of inquiry are hopelessly naive. The descriptive accounts offered for the various "approaches" are grossly inadecuate if not positively misleading. The criticisms offered for these "approaches" are trivial or merely confusing. Space does not permit more than a hare enumeration of the worst faults and a few illustrations.

The methodological confusion is so severe that it is hard to illustrate. The treatment of "theory," for example, makes use of a concept identified as "inductive testing" without in any way spelling out what is meant by the term. The distinction between logical and empirical limitations on inquiry is simply ignored. The general conception of the goals of inquiry is idiosyncratic to the point of being bizarre. A single illustration—the treatment of "description"—will illustrate the difficulties:

Probably the most basic set of variables and organizing concepts in any discipline can be labeled descriptive. The subject matter of much work in political science falls into this category of description, whose effort is more to delineate relevant phenomena, to generate useful classifications and breakdowns, and to pinpoint the important characteristics of political activities than to explain complex patterns of events, to extrapolate and evaluate trends, or to make predictiors. [p. 5]

The confusion of meanings here is quite hopeless. Some of the more substantive inadequacies of the book can be illustrated from the treatment of "general systems theory"—a topic on which Young has written earlier. The content, if any, of general systems theory is left unstated; we are told something of the kind of propositions included in the theory, but not given the propositions themselves. We are warned [pp. 20, 25] on three occasions that "the propositions" of the theory are badly scattered through the literature, but provided with no examples. In one place [p. 19] we learn that

. . . above all, the communication and transfer of insights along the channels of isomorphisms (sic) and interlocking systems provided a real impetus for empirical work.

A few pages later [p. 26] it appears that Young has changed his mind, for he asserts that:

. . . general systems theory proper has been utilized very little in the social sciences and (that) it is very difficult to judge its utility at this time.

The manner in which the book's poor organization and conceptual inadequacy is reinforced by extremely poor writing is well demonstrated by the treatment of the very important notions of "isomorphism" and "homology."

The concept of icomorphism has been defined as "A one-to-one correspondence between objects in different systems which preserves the relationship between the objects." An isomorphism is therefore more than an analogy since it refers to relationships that are closer than simple likenesses or partial similarities. In this sense, the notion of homology corresponds more nearly with the meaning of isomorphism in general systems theory. Both concepts can refer to important structural correspondences across systems. But the notion of isomorphism has a broader reference than that of homology. In fact, from the standpoint of general systems theory, the most important isomorphisms are functional (rather than structural) correspondences across systems or fundamental similarities in the governing principles or processes of systems, and not homologies at all. [pp. 16-17]

That paragraph contains all of the information supplied on the subject of homology!

Young has written a very bad book. But what is striking about the whole affair is not the quality of the book but the fact that it appears on the open market, is expected to be successful, and has been chosen for review by at least one of the prime journals in the field. How can this be? The answer, apparently, is that books are judged by sponsorship rather than content. Young's volume appears in a series marketed by a major publisher and edited by one of the more prestigious bellwethers in the political science flock: that alone is enough to sell the book to a great many political scientists. But if academic sponsorship is so important for sales, then academic sponsors have some responsibility for the quality of the product they endorse, for the books they include in "their" series, unless caveat emptor in the name of monetary gain is to be the rule. Those who offer us books dealing with the "foundations" of our discipline should not package an edifice of sand and market it as an item of steel and concrete. In the case of Young's book, that responsibility has been shirked by all concerned.—EUGENE J. MEEHAN. University of Illinois (Urbana).

The Political Philosophy of Spinoza. By ROBERT J. McShea. (N.Y.: Columbia University Press, 1968, Pp. 214. $7.50.)

The dust-jacket announces this book as "the first systematic treatment of Spinoza's political thought to appear in over half a century." The author more modestly disavows novelty or the explication of "knotty problems," but claims to provide clarification of some central political ideas and an explication of Spinoza's "system" (vi, vii).

Unfortunately he begins from an ambiguous distinction between Spinoza's "metaphysics" and his "ethic of personal salvation" (30-31). McShea claims that Spinoza is not primarily interested in politics or metaphysics, "but in an ethical program for the achievement of personal autonomy" (30: cf. 204). This distinction assumes the independence of ethics from metaphysics, or at least the subordination of the latter to the former. It seems to reduce political philosophy to a means toward the end of individual perfection. What then are we to understand by Spinoza's "system?" What of the claim in the Improvement of the Understanding that all sciences are directed toward one goal? If the goal is personal autonomy or salvation, how is this deducible from the "philosophy of science" which McShea sees in Spinoza's metaphysics? (42: cf. 33-34). McShea himself says that Spinoza's political philosophy is derived from his metaphysics by way of his ethics (32). This would seem to imply that ethics is subordinate to metaphysics, and to confirm the cognitively low status of politics.

McShea quotes as the central statement of Spinoza's political thought: "I start from the natural rights of the individual, which are co-extensive with his desires and powers." To this, he adds: "if there is any point at which one could separate [Spinoza's political] thought from his metaphysics, it would be here, although only in the light of the metaphysics can the full force of the point be seen. Spinoza knew how critical was his natural right theory to his system; he spoke of it as being the principal distinction between his own political theory and that of Thomas Hobbes" (58). Because McShea underestimates the importance of Stoicism on Spinoza's own teaching, he does not realize that the natural distribution of power is Spinoza's version of the classical doctrine of a hierarchy of natural kinds. The equation of right and power is precisely the point of connection between Spinoza's metaphysics and his politics. One cannot distinguish between his ethics and his metaphysics because salvation or freedom is identical with knowledge of the natural order. This is the key to the metaphysical difference between Spinoza and Hobbes, For Spinoza, man is one natural being among others; the study of man proceeds precisely as does the study of non-human nature. For Hobbes, natural right is essentially and peculiarly human, a result of the specific patterns of human motion. Hence man cannot be explained exclusively in terms of non-human motion: the "natural order" is a political or anthropomorphic interpretation. The philosopher therefore has no special political status for Hobbes, whereas for Spinoza, freedom is identical with philosophy. For this reason, it is false to say that "Spinoza was a more consistent Hobbist than Hobbes" (138, 142). McShea means by this that, whereas Hobbes illegitimately restricts men's right in the state of nature by some form of political obligation, Spinoza does not (138-39, 172). But he also observes that Spinoza is not a narrow utilitarian egocentric (167), and that he is "more than a Hobbist" in preserving the right of the individual to rebel against the government (193), although he furnishes "no rule . . . for determining when and how much to resist government" (194).

McShea cannot unify these assertions because his conception of Spinoza as a systematic philosopher of science leaves no room for the ethical partisan of personal salvation. Even when he equates freedom with "power to know," he obscures the absolute dependence of self-preservation (=freedom) upon philosophy as the highest (=most powerful) human activity. Thus he says that our ability to grasp the truth of Spinoza's teaching "is a matter of 'chance' or 'grace'," whereas it is obviously a function of our power to know, or natural intelligence (62-65). So far as the political teaching is concerned, McShea cannot explain the basis for the differences between Spinoza and Hobbes, nor can he account for the link between personal salvation and political obligation in Spinoza. His analysis of this link seems almost to rest upon a quotation from Locke (194, fn. 67); the ambiguity as he presents it is exactly as it is criticized in Hobbes.

To summarize: this book has some helpful passages (e.g. 168, 173, 185ff., 201), but too many defects. Almost all the remarks on "metaphysics," natural law and pre-Machiavellian philosophy are intolerably vulgar. (Slightly better are the comments on Machiavelli, Hobbes, and Locke; but Rousseau is taken exclusively as the author of the Social Contract.) The summary of Spinoza's political teaching is incomplete, and while pleasantly written, superficial. McShea radically overestimates the ease with which Spinoza may be understood at first reading (7, 180); that is, he fails to appreciate the complexity of Spinoza's rhetoric. And this in turn is because he does not grasp the complexity of traditional philosophy and religion, which he seems to regard as beneath rational consideration (13, 17-18, 42, 53-54, 132, 137, 179ff.). He shares some of Spinoza's conclusions without possessing Spinoza's reasons. His treatment of Spinoza's attituce toward religion, although not altogether wrong, is altogether inadequate. He never clearly explains why it is permissible for a contemporary student to disregard the long polemic with Judaism generally and with Maimonides in particular. He naively accepts Spinoza's assurance that political control over religion would be public or external rather than private or internal (182); that is, he has failed to ponder over Spinoza's statement that "men are to be so led that they think themselves not to be led but to live by their own mind and their own free opinion" (TP, X, 7). and that, by the equation of right and power, freedom of thought is necessarily restricted to the philosopher or free man. He therefore cannot understand why Spinoza is relatively silent about "the civil rights or liberties of citizens," and is forced to disregard Spinoza's ipsissima verba in order to retain the notion of democratic individualism so appealing to contemporary readers (188-89). Finally, McShea's misunderstanding of Spinoza's metaphysics leads him to underestimate the degree to which Spinoza was a political revolutionary (cf. 196, fn. 73). He is therefore unable to speak with force or certitude on the contemporary relevance of Spinoza's naturalistic ethics (176. 202).—STANLEY ROSEN, Pennsylvania State Universitu.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Party Leaders in the House of Representatives. By Randall B. Ripley. (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1967. Pp. 221. $6.75.)

With the publication of Party Leaders in the House of Representatives, Randall B. Ripley and the Brookings Institution have given the legislative literature its most thorough analysis of House leadership and its role in the functioning of the lower Chamber, As it happens, the literature in the legislative field is particularly well developed, but Ripley has made several important contributions with this study. First, he provides a longitudinal analysis of the changing function of party leadership; second, he gives us some suggestion about the direction of future development of party leadership; and third, there is occasional insight into the relationship between the structure and process of party leadership and the larger functioning of the legislative process.

Ripley traces the growth and changing function of party leadership in the House starting in the Nineteenth Century with highly centralized power in the hands of the Speaker and a "few close lieutenants"; moving to more regularized patterns of power distribution through the use of seniority and career service patterns; and leading, after the second Roosevelt, to the clear bureaucratization of the party structures in the House. In short, the party and their leadership structures have evolved in a pattern closely similar to the development of government and American society generally.

The complexities of Twentiety Century American life appear to have their parallel in the structures and pattern of leadership in Congress. More formal lines of authority and communication; the proliferation and formalization of staffing; and the development of intra-House and party cliques, associations, and voting blocs have all in their way been a reflection of the changing shape of American society generally. It should be no surprise that the function and structure of party leadership in the House have responded to these forces. What is significant is that a scholar of Ripley's ability has taken a close look at these developments and has typed them and offered us a systematic analysis of their meaning to the functioning of party leadership in the House of Representatives.

Ripley is at his best in describing the ways in which the leadership patterns relate to the techniques of leadership. In a series of vignettes from recent legislative issues he illustrates that legislative party leaders, like other leaders, have to rely on techniques of persuasion, control of information and the development of mutual trust with their colleagues as they work to forge the majorities that enact legislation. Ripley effectively relates the abstractions of leadership resources (tangible preferment, psychological preferment, and control over communication) to the structural and partisan realities of the House. The role of the White House and agency congressional liaison personnel, as well as internal House practices, is tied into the leadership function.

Inter and intra-party relationships, leadershipcommittee interaction, and the majority-minority status of the parties are all shown to have relevance for the functioning of the leadership and therefore to the decisions of the House.

For this reviewer, one of the most intriguing parts of the book is a short section on the party leader's dominance of the internal communication process. As rich as the legislative literature is, there is very little empirical analysis of the patterns of information flow in Congress. Sources of information, the initiation of information distribution, and the route such distribution follows are just some of the more obvious questions to which our literature has not yet addressed itself. In part, this lack of systematic attention to the communication system in Congress derives from its sub rosa character. Where the formal lines of communication are visible in large complex organizations. the Congress for all its bureaucratization still remains non-hierarchical and decentralized. One of the significant consequences of this pattern is to decentralize the sources of important information, making it difficult to uncover and analyze.

Ripley offers us a start with some interview data reflecting the various sources of information for the membership of the two parties. For example, committee chairmen and senior members of committees were less important to Democrats as major sources of information on party positions than to Republicans who have not had the White House and majority party leadership to look to. There is much that is suggestive in this discussion of the communication process which needs to be developed. It is one of the important next subjects deserving concerted attention by our discipline, for as Ripley puts it, "The leaders are at the center of the communications network in the House and can use this position to influence legislative results."

A few words are in order about Ripley's methodology. He has nicely balanced a variety of data from several sources: roll call data; personal observations of the House over a four-year period; formal and informal interviews with House members and staff personnel; and a rich use of historical materials. The balance of these data gives the book a perspective so often absent from many recent studies of our political institutions, Ripley in his introduction sums up the principal strength of his method and as a result of the book itself: "... some of the specific historical judgments ... may be found in error by subsequent research. But the disadvantages of using historical material that is uneven in quality and quantity are outweighed by the advantages of viewing the House in broad historical perspective and of developing categories for understanding changes that have occurred in it."

In a style that is occasionally flat, Randall B. Ripley has given the discipline an important addition to the legislative literature. He has added to our understanding of changes that have occurred and are occurring within the House of Representatives.—Eugene Eidenberg, University of Minnesota.

Ideology and Electoral Action: A Comparative Case Study of the National Committee for an Effective Congress. By Harry M. Scoble. (San Francisco: Chandler Publishing Company, 1967. Pp. 298. $5.75.)

This book is by an engaged man; Harry Scoble has strong views about American politics and how it ought to be studied. Scoble points to an important problem in current American politics by asking: "When the career of the educated American orients him to accept continent-wide moves as normal aspects of occupational success, when the media he uses increasingly insist upon the relevance of positive neutralism by Kenya, of agitation by tin miners in Bolivia, of princely feudalism in Laos-how will the individual relate himself and this external world to such issues as the factional condition of the parties in Virginia, the significance of a House by-election in Texas, or the contest being waged to represent a few thousand Alaskans in the Senate?" The author sees the National Committee for an Effective Congress as a new organizational pattern that makes it possible for such a concerned individual to participate in a meaningful way. Professor Scoble regards himself as "a hard-data, empirical, positivistic political scientist" who believes the "central focus of political scientists should be the distribution, bases, techniques and effects of political powerthat is, the ability to control the behavior of others through public policies sustained by sanctioned force." Consequently he devotes much of his book to the development of measures for comparing the power of the NCEC with that exerted by other interest groups.

The analysis of power in this context suggests attention to five related questions: the amount of political resource potential, the degree of potential resource commitment to politics, the efficiency of the exploitation of those committed resources, the translation of efficiency into electoral power, and the translation of electoral power into legislative power. Since the principal technique of the NCEC is raising money and disbursing it to favored candidates. Scoble's indicators of efficiency necessarily deal with campaign finance. On the amount of political resource potential, he points to the amount of money raised, the number of contributors, and the willingness of many to give money more than once. The degree of resource commitment of politics is measured by disbursements to candidates, and the ratio of NCEC disbursement to those of other groups is suggested as an index figure of relative commitment. Efficiency is gauged by the concentration of expenditures in close races (between 46% and 54%) where money presumably will have more effect. Electroal power is seen as a function of the number of victories, and an ordinal scale with eight magnitudes is developed on the basis of distinctions between whether the NCECbacked candidate won or lost, whether he was an incumbent or not, and whether his party won or lost the seat involved. The last consideration becomes the basis for a summary measure of net partisan change:

I = no. seats gained—no. seats lost total contests

This index number, which will fall into the range of -1.0 to +1.0, represents the net impact of each group on the electoral process. The translation of electoral power into legislative power is measured by the proportion of leadership positions and seats on relevant committees held by NCEC-backed legislators. An index of committee power is:

$$I_{cs} = \frac{\text{members supported--members opposed unsuccessfully}}{\text{total membership}}$$

Illustrations of these measures are given using data on the NCEC and, where additional data are available, the NCEC is compared with other relevant groups: the A.D.A., organized labor, and the Democratic and Republican Senate Campaign Committees.

Ideology and Electoral Action also has intrinsic interest because of the nature of the group it describes. There are three organizational elements: the staff, the members (a few liberal co-founders plus coopted others of whom about ten could be regarded as active), and the contributors who now number over 35,000. Power within the organization is concentrated; almost all major decisions have been made by the principal founder, Maurice Rosenblatt, and the long-time staff director, George Agree. Their ability to retain effective control and see their organization prosper has been due to two things: their discovery of an appropriate role in American politics and a coincidence between their policy views and those of their contributors. Professor Scoble describes a variety of activities in which the NCEC has engaged since it was founded in 1948 essentially as a successor group (with somewhat broader foreign policy interests) to the American League for a Free Palestine, Over the years, the NCEC has experimented with an information clearing house for those opposing Senator Joseph McCarthy, fund-raising for primary elections, special funds such as a Clean Politics Appeal, and "Citizens for Jones" Committees for candidates who required special backing. Their efforts can be viewed as a trial-and-error learning experience. When a technique did not work, it was dropped; when support was forthcoming from the American political environment, the use of the technique was expanded. Their basic strategem has been fund-raising largely in urban areas and transmitting these monies to general election candidates, most frequently from mid-west or plains states, who have internationalist-civil libertarian views. Until 1960 their efforts were concentrated on the Senate. Since that time, they have been increasingly active in House races. The contributors have tended to be politically active. Stevensonian Democrats, issue oriented, concerned with domestic and international politics, and satisfied with the NCEC serves these interests in a way the major political parties do not. Scoble presents considerable survey data on the contributors, but because "the purpose of this book is to focus on the NCEC as an organization," they are scattered in footnotes throughout the book. I do not follow this reasoning, but references to a "larger study" suggest the author may be saving the data for a more intensive analysis at a later date.

I think the book is less valuable as a contribution to group theory. Professor Scoble argues that earlier group theory has neglected ideology. However, the essential stuff of ideology can be viewed easily as David Truman's "shared attitudes." Likewise the author argues that the NCEC cannot be analyzed as a primary group. True, but if group theory is the appropriate frame of reference for an organization with 35,000 contributors, then Cooley's "secondary groups," or Hyman's "reference groups" could have been pressed into service. In fact, this book strikes me as a fine example of what Thomas Kuhn calls normal science, "empirical work undertaken to articulate the paradigm theory, resolving some of its residual ambiguities and permitting the solution of problems to which it had previously only drawn attention." The major parameters of the relevant paradigm come from the work of David Truman, Robert Dahl, and V. O. Kev. This being the case, it was disconcerting to find in the last chapter an undeveloped attack on what Scoble takes to be the values of his mentors. An incorrectly cited chapter in a V. O. Key text is dismissed as "myopic . . . a valueladen response of a middle-class Harvard professor." It has become fashionable for those with romantic notions of confrontation to spice their writings with barbed comments about "the WASP mind," "the establishment," and "middle class values." But Professor Scoble cught to realize that practice is just as mindless and just as irrelevant to political science as the worship of institutional reform which he deplores in an earlier generation of political scientists.—John H. Kessel, Allegheny College.

Politics and Television. By Kurt and Gladys Engel Lang. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1968. Pp. 315. $6.95.)

Political Television. By Bernard Rubin. (Belmont, California: Wadsworth Publishing Co., 1967. Pp. 200.)

As another Presidential year unfolds before our eyes, professional and lay interest in the way a lot of it unfolds—as 525 lines per second, 430 dots per line—experiences its periodic upsurge. Plans are already laid, I suppose (and will have been executed by the time this is read) for measuring the impact of television debates. There is again concern about the costs of campaigning and television's substantial contribution to those costs. Once more questions of equity, bias, and completeness come to the fore.

What don't seem to get raised are the broader trends and implications of this medium. One of the trends with negative attributes is the apparent shortening of the half-lives of programming innovations. This is most evident in the entertainment segment of the medium, because that is the predominant use. Trial periods are shorter; "seasons" last five months; theme fads disappear unlamented. All in all the networks spend more time, and develop more frustration, trying to divine when and what the next crest will be—when in fact they may be witnessing a qualitative shift in public interest and consumption of television programming that transcends particular decisions about westerns, blue comedy, and old movies.

On the margins, political programming may also be undergoing the same sort of revised public appraisal. The past five years have witnessed an increasing tempo of format tinkering with regular news programs—the move to a half-hour, computer election forecasting, assorted personnel ploys (mostly to counter Huntley-Brinkley), extemporaneous chit-chat, and so forth. Much of this is designed, of course, to affect the division of viewers among the networks; but one can also envisage it as an attempt to hold back the ebbing of addiction to indiscriminate viewing.

Similarly we must entertain the possibility that certain kinds of special programming no longer have the impact they did. A great deal was made at the time of the Kennedy-Nixon television debates of 1960. Can we assume safely that such effects will flow from comparable encounters now? Or is the literature on the 1960 debates as irrelevant, if fascinating, for contemporary understandings as the literature on Orson Wells' "invasion from Mars?"

These questions of secular transformation are not terribly profound, yet they lie beyond the commentary and analysis of too many observers in and out of our professions. Both of the books considered here fail in most respects to move beyond rudimentary levels of analysis, and both fall victim to the pace of television change, dwelling almost nostalgically in the glorious and traumatic days of early television: MacArthur's return in 1950, the 1952 conventions, Murrow's devastating program on Joseph McCarthy, the Kefauver crime hearings, the Army-McCarthy hearings, and so forth.

All this makes enjoyable reading for the general market (for which these books were designed) but for the most part not professionally useful. The Langs offer their own original research, some of it now fifteen years old. Parts of it may be important, but suffer methodologically. Their somewhat informal study of television versus in-person perceptions of the MacArthur parade in Chicago demonstrated the ability to exaggerate crowd size and enthusiasm through selective camera work and narration-clever then, perhaps, but a technique millions of viewers of such January extravaganzas as the Liberty Bowl know how to discount these days. Other aspects of their work is of marginal importance. I find it questionable, for instance, to label as either significant or as biased the kinds of variation in coverage and comprehension exhibited by the three networks television political conventions.

There are some important policy questions raised by these books: does, for instance, the presence of television cameras tend to generate "artificial news?" In certain senses the answer is obviously, yes. We are all aware of the proclivities of rioters to create a little extra action for the camera, and of the self-conscious piety that masks a public figure's face when a zoom lens focuses on him at a King or Kennedy funeral. Of the two books, Politics and Television deals more effectively with this and related problems of the indeterminacy effect. Yet one longs for a recognition that television is hardly an artificial intruder these days, but is decidedly part of the scene, as much as an audience for a speech is. The pervasiveness of news coverage is such that the absence of televised coverage must be considered the abnormality. Again, data or speculation about secular trends might have been helpful; is it not probable that increasing expectation and familiarity with the presence of television, coupled with technological innovation (expecially miniaturization, longer-range lenses and microphones), will diminish this problem decisively?

Political Television has greater trouble than the Lang book keeping its eye on the screen. Substantial portions of the book provide general background, in the Theodore White vein, background to the events which among other things involved television. These portions may be helpful and interesting to younger readers whose political awareness was not too acute in the 1950s and early 60s; this presumably does not include many readers of the Review. The Rubin and Lang books both tend to be careless from time to time about the distinctiveness of television as against other media. All of the advantages of television are found to one degree or another in the other media: visuality in the press and movies, immediacy and voice in radio, confluence of sight and sound in movies, ease of consumer access particularly in radio (much more than television), personalization in radio (Lowell Thomas used to seem as real as Brinkley) and in opinion newspaper columns, and so forth. So too are some of the neutral, controversial, or negative characteristics: candidates and rioters also respond to the presence to radio microphones and newspaper reporters. I don't mean to underestimate the significance of television, but to €mphasize that its contributions to our culture. political or otherwise, are incremental and in certain respects interactional (in the statistical sense). Our investigative talents for isolating and measuring the increments and the interactional effects have not really been imaginatively mobilized.

Troubles with delineation of variables extend to the political behaviors television affects. These authors properly allude to the barrenness of studies identifying viewers' perceptions of "who won" television debates. But their own dependent variables suffer, variously, from imprecise definition, insufficient measurement, and demonstrated or even conjectural relationship to the electoral process or more broadly to the political system. For example, at some level deviations from cognitive accuracy flowing from network bias, naiveté, or incompetence may significantly affect the political process—but not the kind of infinitesimal variations of coverage of the 1952 Democratic Convention studied in depth by the Langs. Rubin discusses in some detail the 70 hours of coverage following the John Kennedy assassination. The impact of that length and intensity of viewing may have been significant, perhaps in the long- as well as the short-run. But Rubin offers no systematic analysis of even the theoretical possibilities, nor of the specific contribution of television.

Reference to that assassination underscores an omission that is sorely missed by this reviewer: an exploration of the role of television in the political socialization of children. The socialization effects of Kennedy's death are known to some extent, thanks to the burst of studies that followed it; and those effects are primarily traceable to televiewing. More broadly, television has to be assessed as an agent of socialization noticeably stronger vis-à-vis family and school than other media have been in the past. This is particularly the case cognitively and in certain segments of politics (e.g., international relations) in which the family effect has usually been weaker.

The most perplexing question about television is its subtle contribution, along with other media and other acculturizing agents, to the setting of cognitive and affective boundaries in the minds of members of a political society. In their concluding chapter the Langs express some of the frustration in trying to track this contribution:

"No one has yet been able to 'demonstrate' through a convincing experiment what the long-range effects of television have been. Nor are they likely to. To trace a change in a political climate or a realignment within the electorate straight to the door of television is a task foredoomed to failure."

Perhaps so; certainly so if attempted at the level of these two books.—Bradeury Seasholes, Tufts University.

The Warren Court: Constitutional Decision as an Instrument of Reform. By Archibald Cox. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968. Pp. 144. $4.95.)

These brief lectures, which former Solicitor Genral Cox delivered at the University of Hawaii in 1967, have two main objects: (1) to survey and evaluate recent constitutional developments, and (2) to explore the implications of the Warren Court's egalitarian activism for the judiciary's role in the political system. Since the nucleus of Cox's argument was published in the November, 1966 issue of the Harvard Law Review, prospective purchasers may fairly ask, what new material justifies the extra expense? The answer does not lie in the subtitle; the theme there announced is not completely realized. Nor does Cox emphasize his personal experiences in shaping the litigation discussed—an omission one hopes he will someday correct. Rather, the lectures enable him to enlarge his focus, elaborate his argument, and get some criticisms off his chest regarding the Court's current course. Though his incisive earlier discussion of state action forms the key chapters of the book, he also covers judicial reform of criminal procedure, displacement of state libel laws, and supervision of reapportionment and voting rights. Specific litigation is then anchored in introductory and closing sections which amplify his variations on the "role of the Court" theme.

The result is a tight little volume of considerable appeal. Cox has exceptional ability to discern emerging trends and to express them with economy of language. He is persuasive, for example; in ranking the Civil Rights Act decisions of 1966 with those upholding the Wagner Act for the potential power of Congress to combat private discrimination. His nimble trip through the wiretapping bog is a model of concision. Since his viewpoint reflects the varying perspectives of advocate, scholar, and critic, there is throughout a healthy appreciation of political realities and tolerance for the rationality, if not wisdom, of contrary views. Consequently, the lectures can be recommended to teachers as concise, fresh interpretations of recent litigation, to scholars as food for thought with a minimum of waste, and to analysts of decision-making as neat illustrations of how a skillful constitutional lawyer goes about his business as midwife of incremental change.

The most arguable theme is Cox's criticism of the Warren Court for excessive innovation. Here the forward-looking frontiersman of the Kennedy-Johnson administrations, who warmly supports the institution and its egalitarian goals, grapples with a lawyer's doubts about the Court's methods and constitutional reform as a staple diet. Refreshingly, Cox wastes no words wondering whether the high tribunal is a political or legal body. He assumes that it is both and that role conflict is inevitable. He also concedes that judicial pioneering has been invited by politicians' default, that Justices have latent functions of moral leadership and can generate support as they proceed. But in the end the lawyer triumphs. Cox advances most of the stock criticisms of the Court for unprofessional methods, too much politics and too little law, endangering the popular consent on which judicial power ultimately rests, etc. He concludes that legislative rather than judicial action is the preferable way to create sustained constitutional obligations in defense of human rights.

It is not always clear whether Cox's main objection to judicial crusading is functional, democratic, or simply prudential—i.e., entails excessive political risks. Implicit also are several debatable assumptions about the objectivity of the judicial process and the popular basis of judicial power. Whatever may be said for "neutral" principles and all that, political scientists are likely to find fault with his political analysis. Cox offers no balance-sheet of the Court's political gains and losses among client groups, no suggestion why it is so damaging for the Justices to lose a battle with Congress. Basically, his argument rests on rather uncritical acceptance of the maxim, first advanced by de Tocqueville, that judicial power is ultimately public opinion. The trouble with this maxim is that it says nothing distinctive about judges and fails to differentiate their publics. Cox's notion that courts derive no authority from popular participation underestimates representation via the adversary system and overestimates popular control elsewhere. The notion that Supreme Court power depends on "ability to command a national consensus" underestimates the leverage of the Court's allies and overestimates its saliency in mass opinion. Disarmingly, Cox admits he cannot prove the connection between craftsmanship and legitimacy. Neither can we disprove it-vet. My quarrel is that Cox, like most writers who wrestle with "role of the Court" justification, made little effort to check his political maxims against empirical studies of popular attitudes about the judiciary. Lawyers often ask what social science can do for law. Bathing normative assumptions in the acid of fact is surely one way empiricism might contribute to a perennial normative concern-if only lawyers would look!-J. Wood-FORD HOWARD, JR., Johns Hopkins University.

The Second American Party System: Party Formation in the Jacksonian Era. By RICHARD P. McCormick. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1966. Pp. 389. $7.50.)

Basic patterns of American party politics were set for generations to come by the party system the Jacksonian era produced. For anyone who wants to understand this formative stage of political development and party action, this volume is essential reading. It is meticulously researched and carefully stated throughout, and brings more discrimination to the subject than any previous study.

At the outset Professor McCormick provides a useful summation of the first party system of Jeffersonian Republicans and Federalists, and its collapse in the years of James Monroe's presidency. By comparison the second party system, he argues, was more popular, more competitive from state to state, high organized, firmly geared to the contest for the presidency, less issue-oriented, and far more given to mass appeals, drama, and "hurrah"-in short, more "modern," as the United States has known parties. Yet it also lived by muting sectional tensions; as a result, it fell sudden victim to intense conflict over the slavery issue in the 1850's, and was soon replaced by a third party system. In its heyday, however, it was more evenly balanced in every section and state than earlier or later party systems were.

Some four-fifths of the book is given to political patterns in the twenty-three states that were relevant in party formation. These chapters, arranged broadly by geographical section, are virtually encyclopedic and never limited to mere narrative; Professor McCormick promises us an analytical-historical study, and keeps his promise. The state chapters vary in length and detail, but in every case they provide data concerning constitutional and governmental structure and the state's heritage of political practices and styles. We are informed about suffrage and voter turnout, relevant experience in the Jeffersonian-Republican era, leadership patterns, and the state's progress—or lack of it—in the years from 1824 to 1840 that brought Democrats and Whigs into being.

Party formation was halting and erratic. To proclaim a national Democratic party with Andrew Jackson's election in 1828, a National Republican phalenx in 1832, and a national Whig party in 1834, as much conventional historiography does, not only races the clock unconscionably, as Professor McCormick shows. It also ignores a whole array of conditions which he argues were crucial in explaining why at least proto-party structures emerged in some states as early as 1828, and in others not until the 1830's or 1840. It also passes over such important matters as the differential rate with which state political management through legislative caucuses gave way to delegate conventions and party committees, matters Professor McCormick treats carefully as an aspect of the creation of modern party structures.

Throughout, the book's major thesis is that the second party system arose as a response to the revival of contests for the presidency. Thus Jackson's challenges to John Quincy Adams in 1824 and 1828 began the process in several states; the fact that Henry Clay as Jackson's rival in 1832 could not command Adams' sectional support in New England brought the growth of party competition there; the process was advanced when the Whigs made the most of Martin Van Buren's unpopularity in the South and elsewhere as the Democratic candidate in 1836; and party structure and competition was brought to apogee by the innovative, bandwagon campaign for William Henry Harrison against Van Buren in 1840. Keen party competition in elections was highly correlated with voting turnout in state and nation, despite some local variations. National turnout in presidential elections, which rose from about 26 per cent of adult white males in 1824 to about 55 per cent in 1828 and 1832, reached a peak of nearly 80 per cent in 1840 and remained at high levels.

The stress Professor McCormick places on presidential contests and other institutional factors as an explanation for party formation is debatable. His emphasis on such features leads him to give short shrift to other probably relevant conditions of social structure, political culture, and political development in general. He also reiterates and recapitulates relatively narrow hypotheses in space that might better have been used for synthesis and for broader, summary analysis; indeed, many analytical historians as well as political scientists will not find themselves wholly satisfied with his conceptual framework and ultimate explanation. Finally, his useful concern with inquiry into state and local roots comes at the expense of similar attention to the articulation of national, if always federal, party structures.

Taken over all, nonetheless, The Second American Party System is not only a gold mine for scholars and students. It is also the most significant assay so far of a crucial, innovative stage in American party development.—WILLIAM NISBET CHAMBERS, Washington University (St. Louis).

The Upper House in Revolutionary America, 1763-1788. By Jackson Turner Main. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1967. Pp. 311. $7.50.)

In this work the author, a professor of American history at Stony Brook, attempts to trace the evolution of the upper house in the quarter century preceding the adoption of the Constitution. The main outlines of his argument are as follows. The upper houses or councils in Colonial America functioned in practice as legislative bodies, though their theoretical status as such was cloudy and their members were chosen by and served at the pleasure of the governors. Despite the fact that a number of ccuncils were dominated by "placemen," recent immigrants or native colonials who held lucrative offices in addition to their positions on the councils, in most colonies their membership was drawn primarily from the established, stable upper class. The most important function these bodies assumed was defense of royal authority. Nonetheless, they were far from a wholly negative force. Though they were unrepresentative of the colonial upper class which was broader than the old, wealthy elite, they defended the economic and social interests of this class and also performed important legislative functions as reviewers and perfectors of bills.

With the coming of the Revolution the upper houses were not abolished, but rather modified and retained. The framers of the state constitutions recognized that the councils, due to the greater wisdom and ability of their members, had performed valuable legislative functions and thus wished not to destroy them but only to make them truly independent legislative bodies. In addition, the desire of the upper class to protect property interests as well as the general attachment of the articulate portion of the population to Whig notions of a balanced constitution containing monarchic, aristocratic, and democratic elements figured in their retention. The new upper houses or senates, however, proved a disappointment to aristocratic hopes. They were or became by 1788 radically different bodies than the councils of the pre-Revolutionary period. Despite the efforts of the upper class or elite elements, the property restrictions on membership that were imposed barred few men who wanted to serve and the great majority of senators were elected for short terms by small property holders. Thus, the composition of the senates was broader than that of the councils. They were no longer composed mainly of established, upper class elements, but rather of a far more diversive group of men of moderate property. As a result, they no longer served as instruments of the upper class, but rather became indistinguishable from the lower houses. In short. both houses became arenas of factional conflict, arenas in which various interests competed for advantage. All in all, however, the most important function the senates performed was legislative, i.e., the initiation and revision of bills. Though this role was old, its extent and importance in the senates was new.

Finally, experience both before and after 1776 with upper houses had an important impact on the Federal Constitution. Though the debates in the Convention were curiously anachronistic in that they failed to recognize the new character of the upper houses, the senates in the states had proved so valuable that there was no question as to the existence of a federal senate, but only to its form. In addition, adherence to Whig notions of a balanced constitution as well as belief in the necessity of a second house to temper the passions of the lower house and limit its power contributed to the desire for an upper house. The federal senate that emerged was in many respects an entirely new body. Its members needed no property to hold office and it was as responsive to majority will as the lower house. Within a few years it like the state senates became the vehicle of party and when this occurred the transformation of the councils was completed.

To present the argument of the book so briefly and simply, however, is to do it more justice than it deserves. What also must be noted, and to some extent it is obvious even in our summary, is that the book contains much that is contradictory, vague, and/or inadequately supported. On the one hand, the information the author has gathered, though impressive at times in terms of the scholarly labor involved, is nonetheless often contradictory, inconclusive, or incomplete. Moreover, this source of difficulty is compounded by other deficiencies. The author's use of many of his key concepts, such as function, role, class, elite, representative, etc., is vague and varied. In addition, he largely separates and confines his discussion of institutional context and theoretical status to a single, highly general chapter late in the book. As a consequence, he severely impairs his ability either to provide guidelines and perspective in his lengthy treatment of the composition and activities of particular upper houses or to relate his brief treatment of context and theory to the events and trends he identifies. On the other hand, the author is prone to repeated mulling over of his themes. Each chapter and each of the three major subdivisions of the book contain sections of review and conclusion and in these various sections themes are stated and restated with both major and minor changes of tone and meaning. In part, this derives from the author's wish to deduce his conclusions from a colony by colony and state by state review of the evidence. But one suspects that in large part it also derives from defects in his information, analytic framework, and use of concepts.

In any event the result of these defects combined with a continuing process of digesting themes is a melange of statements regarding the nature and causes of the experience under analysis. Thus, in truth, the argument of the book is immersed in a welter of conflicting statements and facts and the summary provided above to a large extent represents a piecing together of what appear to be the main themes without regard for the contradictions. To cite one example the author undercuts perhaps his most crucial point regarding the changed character of the senates by also noting that the senates protected property far better than the lower houses and that most issues did not become the subjects of factional conflict.

Nor, as we have suggested, is contradiction the only problem. As can be gleaned even from the summary we have provided, there is much that is vague in the author's argument. Indeed, such vagueness pertains not only to particular points, e.g., the changed dimensions of the legislative role of the senates, but to the contours of the whole experience. We cannot be sure because the author himself seems not entirely sure whether he is simply dealing with developments between 1763 and 1788 or whether he is postulating the emergence of a new, discrete, and enduring form of upper house in this period. Lastly, the degree to which key points are not supported by the evidence is disturbing. We may note, for example, that though the author in most of the book attributes primary causal significance to the superior ability of members of the councils and senates and the great value of these bodies as legislative mechanisms. there is little or no direct or indirect evidence to substantiate these points. Here as elsewhere, the standing of key points that are not necessarily convincing on their face rest simply on the authority of the author despite the mass of information he has gathered.—Joseph Cooper, Rice University.

Censorship of the Movies: The Social and Political Control of a Mass Medium. By RICHARD S. RANDALL. (Madison: The University of Wisconsin Press, 1968. Pp. 280. $7.95.)

Generally, Americans who write about censorship either assume a libertarian posture that cannot tolerate official restraint on any form of communication, or they argue that the freedom to corrupt public morals is not protected by the Constitution and that society may shield itself against moral debasement. In his book Professor Randall espouses neither position but carefully analyzes the censorial techniques that have been used on one of the most powerful segments of the mass media, the movies. He considers the censorship interest as "political energy, pressure, or force rather than as value" and succeeds reasonably well in remaining neutral on the merits of censorship while describing how it has operated over the years beginning with the protest against a peep-show in Atlantic City called Dolorita in the Passion Dance, in 1894. Mr. Randall maintains that two events, the coming of television and the judicial inclusion of movies under the protection of the First Amendment revolutionized movie making. After many years of providing morally safe but artistically immature family entertainment, movies recently have acquired a new quality and maturity, but at the same time, they have become guilty of excesses in the detailing of erotica, nudity and violence as well as giving rise to the "exploitation film" depicting nudist camps, girls in various states of undress and sado-masochism, the advertising for which can be seen daily in any big-city newspaper. Like television and newspapers movies are aimed at a mass audience, but the movies differ from their sister media, says Randall, in that they are uncontrolled by advertisers and now deal with themes that at one time were limited to the theater and to the hard cover book -both of which aimed essentially at an elite audience. Thus movies raise in "acute form" the question of "how a free speech society can coexist with a mass democratic society." Perhaps the proper question to ask is whether modern, mass, industrial society ought to permit as much freedom as it does since, to paraphrase the late Zechariah Chafee, the degree of unity and harmony required for a decent society is not the inevitable consequence of freedom but is the result of political and moral effort. If freedom is not accompanied by self-control, public control will inevitably fol-

The movies are in a peculiar position since, on the one hand, they claim, and rightly, that they are engaged in the creative arts and in communicating ideas and should be free of official restraint. but on the other, they are manufacturing a commodity for the mass market for profit—tremendous profit. But is not the writer or artist also engaged in work for financial gain? How, then, do the movies differ from the printed page or from the painted canvas? Randall suggests that the key to distinguishing motion pictures from printed media, and this would also hold true for the painting, lies in the amount of "distance" placed between the viewer and the simulated reality. That is, movies in sweeping away the ordinary barriers that stand between the viewer and physical reality -words, lack of motion, diminution-may reasonably be required to substitute new barriers such as indirection, stylization or absence of detail since they are capable of simulating reality to an extent unknown in the past. In this sense a movie that meets the "redeeming social importance" test might nevertheless be declared obscene if it were to show detailed scenes of sexual intercourse. It would then be failing to place enough "distance" between the viewer and simulated reality. All of which indicates that the constitutional standards for obscenity in literature cannot be precisely applied to cinematic productions. Unless a majority of the Supreme Court adopts the Black-Douglas position that all prior restraint on movies is bad, and this seems unlikely, some standard might be devised that takes into account the special characteristics of the medium. Randall's idea that obscenity be viewed as a "variable phenomenon" makes sense. It is flexible enough to embrace not only what is being shown but the way in which it is shown, and it is particularly adaptable to motion pictures. Already the movies are constitutionally distinguishable from the press in that the doctrine of Near v. Minnesota proscribes any censorship of the printed word whereas the cinema, with all its freedom, is constitutionally subject to prior restraint.

The sections of the study that describe the operation of censorship, public and private, are extremely well researched, and, while in part they confirm one's suspicions, they also dispel a good deal of mythology. Of the thirty-eight cities and towns with motion picture censorship laws, only ten actively censor movies. But the fact that only a few municipalities actively engage in restraining the showing of certain themes is somewhat misleading, since censorship has an extraterritorial effect in that suburban authorities may follow the lead of a big-city censorship board. Furthermore, some cities have extra-legal citizens advisory committees which may be just as effective as legal censors when they exact voluntary compliance by local exhibitors. Although most censors admit that they would be more restrictive than recent court decisions permit, they are, nevertheless, attempting to comply with the new legal doctrine. Regardless of what statutes and ordinances allow, the vast majority of censorship orders are confined to erotica and most censors are familiar with the Roth-Alberts test in some degree.

Randall finds that the old stereotype of the censor as one lacking in aesthetic sensibility and morbidly interested in seeking out obscene matter to keep from his fellow citizens does not characterize today's movie censor. Although not generally recruited under methods of high standards censors seem no less well-balanced as personalities than those who exercise much more power over the content of movies, namely producers, distributors, and exhibitors. Sitting on Chicago's Motion Picture Appeal Board, for example, are Dr. Ner Littner, a psychiatrist on the staff of the University of Chicago, and Dr. Henry Rago, editor of the monthly, Poetry, the latter actually being against censorship and a strong advocate of classification. In conclusion Randall declares that prior censorship is more of a disadvantage in form than in substance and that movies have far greater freedom over content than any of the other mass media. Today films displaying nudity, sado-masochistic violence, erotically suggestive dances and dialogue are routinely passed, generally without an audience classification. If anything, informal censorship, completely lacking in standards of due process, is a greater threat to free expression in films than formal boards, and the libertarian view that government is the enemy is just not true in this instance.

Although the book is a careful and balanced account of the nature and development of public control over the content of films, it is presented from a single perspective, that of a problem in politics. But more is at issue than a political struggle between those who make and exhibit movies and the general public. There are questions of standards in the arts which are, as William Ernest Hocking wrote, "man's own religion of self-elevation." Overemphasis on the erotic is a corrosion of good taste and no self-respecting civilized society can permit the individual the liberty to degrade the arts at will. To do so is to insult humanity itself. Randall makes no such judgment, but perhaps he should have.—Robert J. Steamer, Lake Forest College.

Prairie State Politics: Popular Democracy in South Dakota. By Alan L. Clem. (Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press, 1967. Pp. 174. $5.00.)

Over the next decade or more, those who write in the area of comparative state politics will find Alan Clem's book a useful storehouse of data. In Prairie State Politics one can find facts and figures accompanied by analyses and descriptions concerning every conceivable aspect of South Dakota politics, ranging from party loyalty in the legislature (p. 111) to personal characteristics of the governors (p. 93) and members of Congress (pp. 119f). Few people will read Prairie State Politics for pleasure. It is too crowded with data to attract a lay audience. However, serious students of politics will make use of the book to their profit.

The dominant impression of South Dakota politics carried away by the reader is of a politics of frustration. In fact, one gets a distinct feeling that Mr. Clem feels more than a little tired and depressed as he surveys the state's political scene.

He establishes at the outset that South Dakota's political behavior differs from both the national and regional norms. By means of a comparative study of voting results in neighboring midwestern states, he finds that the currents of political change that have affected other midwestern states, as well as the nation, have largely bypassed South Dakota. South Dakota remains very nearly as Republican as ever.

Secondly, he determines by means of a chronological account of the state's political history that the drift of its politics has been toward an ever more conservative and isolated political posture. True, in the latter part of the nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries, South Dakota did have its share of populists and liberal or Bull Moose Republicans, such as Peter Norbeck. However, in the mid-twentieth century, the party is increasingly dominated by men of comparatively limited political horizons, such as Senator Karl Mundt.

If I interpret Mr. Clem aright, the reason for South Dakota's political isolation is that it is literally a "backwater" state—isolated geographically and culturally from the rest of the nation. According to Mr. Clem, its members of Congress are almost uniformly undistinguished souls. It seems that they rarely, if ever, head any committees at all, let alone important committees, and they are even less likely to provide national leadership in Congress on important national issues.

Similarly, according to Mr. Clem, the delegates from South Dakota to the national Republican and Democratic conventions are just as uniformly undistinguished. They always "play it safe" in the convention, are outside the main currents of the party, and rarely, if ever, play a meaningful part in the decision-making process.

All of this leaves Alan Clem feeling a little glum when he writes his conclusions concerning the political party system in South Dakota. He writes that "the party as such in South Dakota contributes little imagination or initiative to the state's political life" (p. 183). One of the factors responsible for South Dakota's rather grim political picture seems to be the physical isolation of Pierre, the state capital, located as it is in the rangeland center of the state and separated by "seas of grass" from the population centers in the western and eastern ends of the state.

Clem concludes, "It is in the midst of this vast sea of grass that the nerves of state government are collected. Those nerves are thickly insulated by the vastness of the prairie from popular pressures, and as a result the response of state government to many needs and wishes has often been relatively slow" (p. 137). However, Mr. Clem is equally unenthusiastic about South Dakota politics and government when the voter does have an impact on policies. He observes with all the dourness one can muster while surveying an endless sea of grass that the state's political problems are also partially attributable to the "comparatively large degree of popular control in South Dakota government. The masses are not known for their ability to perceive present problems touching a small number of institutions, let alone the future problems" (p. 137).

We can forgive the sour turn taken by Alan Clem's prose as he peers outward from Pierre's grass, for the book is well done.—John H. Fenton. University of Massachusetts.

Origins of the Fifth Amendment. By Leonard W. Levy. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1968. Pp. 561. $12.50.)

The decision in Miranda v. Arizona, in which the Supreme Court interpreted the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against compulsory self-incrimination as a limitation on the efforts of police to obtain confessions from suspects through interrogation, has rekindled the public controversy over the wisdom and utility of this guarantee that flourished a decade ago when witnesses before various congressional and state legislative committees investigating Communism frequently found it expedient to rely on the Fifth Amendment as a justification for refusal to answer questions about their past or present politics. Leonard Levy began the research for this book during the earlier phase of this controversy, and has completed it, with perfect appropriateness, in time to make an important and useful contribution to the current phase, as well as a matchless contribution to our understanding of the historical background underlying the adoption of a major provision of the Bill of Rights.

Professor Levy is an historian who believes in calling a historical spade a spade, and who rejects totally the view that research into history is undertaken in order to discover those facts—and only those facts—that tend to support the ideological predispositions of the researcher. In his book, Legacy of Suppression, he effectively demolished, beyond hope of serious redemption, the view put forward by overeager libertarians that the framers of the First Amendment literally meant to forbid all abridgment of speech by the federal government, that toleration of absolute freedom of speech was the practice as well as the intent of the founding fathers in that golden age of American liberty, and that, by interpreting the guarantee of the First Amendment as something less than absolute, we had fallen disastrously from the pinnacle of freedom then attained. He demonstrated, with evidence piled upon evidence, that the practice and intent of even the most revered of the founding fathers was vigorously to suppress speech and publications that they thought dangerous. Consequently, when, in this work, his evidence brings him to the conclusion that the right against compulsory self-incrimination (Levy refers to it always as a "right," rejecting as unnecessarily denigrating the common reference to this guarantee as a "privilege") was looked upon as fundamental in the United States at the time of the adoption of the Bill of Rights, and that the overwhelmingly predominant practice even then was to respect this right during trials, grand jury proceedings, preliminary examinations prior to trial, and legislative or executive inquiries, there is reason for confidence in the reliability of his data.

But there would be grounds for confidence even without knowledge of Professor Levy's earlier works, for this book is manifestly the product of painstaking and exhaustive research into available primary and secondary sources, fully and critically documented. By far the largest portion of the book deals with English history through the seventeenth century, because the origins of the constitutional guarantee are primarily to be found there, and also because the English sources (particularly including reports of trials) appear to be considerably more complete and richer in detail than the relatively sparse material available for colonial America. The English history centers around the High Commission, the ecclesiastical court that was reconstituted by Queen Elizabeth in 1583 at the behest of John Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, for the purpose of exposing and punishing Puritans, and which proceeded inquisitorially by means of the oath ex officio. It culminates with the abolition of the oath by the Long Parliament in 1641 and the establishment of the common-law right against self-incrimination in the trials of the Leveller leader, John Lilburne.

The book ends with the adoption of the Bill of Rights, and, as Professor Levy emphatically states in his Preface, "nothing in this book is intended to prove or disprove any position relating to the contemporary controversy about the right against self-incrimination. I care only for an explanation of its background." (p. viii.) Yet, despite this disclaimer, the book is highly relevant to the contemporary controversy. Critics of the right against self-incrimination, such as Jeremy Bentham in the nineteenth century and Sidney Hook in the twentieth, have stressed its inutility and illogicality. Its end result is severely to limit the capacity of the government to obtain evidence by forbidding both the questioning of those persons in the best position to provide it, and the drawing of presumptions of guilt from refusals to answer. As a matter of logic, this position is difficult to refute, but, as a matter of history, as Professor Levy has shown, it appears to be too easy to move from the simple questioning of suspects to harsher methods of interrogation born out of frustration at the failure to obtain desired answers, or to indiscriminate interrogation of individuals, without reasonable grounds for suspicion, in the hope that something incriminating might turn up. The imposition of constitutional checks on the freedom of both investigating committees and police interrogators to obtain self-incriminating testimony would appear to be historically justified. The accusatorial system is less subject to abuse than the inquisitorial.— DEAN ALFANGE, JR., University of Massachusetts.

On Law and Justice. By PAUL A. FREUND. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968. Pp. 259. $4.95.)

This is a collection of articles and shorter pieces by one of the best known commentators on the work of the Supreme Court. Written over two decades, their diversity of subject matter and variety of mood makes difficult an adequate appraisal of their value in a short review.

Most readers will probably find most interesting the essays of varying length on some of the leading justices, of which those on Brandeis, Frankfurter, Jackson, and Black are more appealing to a general student of the Court. One might have expected a more acerbic analysis of Black's judicial craftsmanship from one whose approach to constitutional exgesis seems poles apart from that of Black, yet, perhaps inhibited by the occasion of publication (the anniversary of Justice Black's appointment to the Court), he touches lightly on Black's flat rejection of natural law thinking and judge-made law to concentrate on the moral force of Black's contribution to our public law.

One senses the author's greater affinity with the judicial philosophies of the late justice, Jackson and Frankfurter. Both jurists were wary of those who saw great social issues in simple terms. Though he challenges Justice Frankfurter's over reliance on history (in favor of greater reliance on philosophy), he admires the craftsmanship evident in the opinions of both justices, their careful delineation of issues, their detailing of the conflicting values. Freund deplores the fact that the Court is so pressed for time that its opinions only rarely reflect the full explorations of issues so characteristic of Justice Frankfurter's opinions, and suggests "a more selective granting of review and more systematic procedures within the Court for consultation, interchange, and collaborative endeavor leading toward persuasive and scholarly exposition," (at 162).

While applauding Justice Jackson's cautions to his activist-minded colleagues, Freund argues that the "nay-saying counsel must yield substantial ground," especially with respect to the constitutional guaranties "not excluding those stated in the open-ended or ambiguous terms of the first, fifth, and fourteenth amendments—" (at 167). He reminds us that "the moral and educational effect of a number of those decisions has been great, indeed comparable to the sobering effect of questions in the House of Commons or even to the English literary classics of the liberal spirit—the essays of the trinity of Johns, Milton, Locke, and Mill." (at 167).

It is perhaps in rationality in Judicial Decisions." reprinted from Rational Decision (Nomos VII) that Freund attempts to deal most thoroughly with the central concern of all of these essays. How can the great conflicts of interests and values in our society be resolved through legal processes? It would be unfair to the author, and futile to try to summarize his perceptive exposition. Nor is it in a carping spirit that one concludes that in using the framework of Cardozo (The Nature of the Judicial Process) to explicate the role of rationality in the judicial process, his analysis does not take us much beyond the boundaries reached by that master of the Common Law. Logic, precedent, history, and social utility all play a part. Reason, tests of consistency, exposure of bias, neutrality, and creativity are concepts with which the enlightened judge must live his daily life, but any prescription of how a judge must balance values and competing considerations, of how he must remain true to the law as received doctrine and yet press imaginatively toward a new accommodation of the law to perceived needs and reasoned demands, defies persuasive and meaningful analysis. Once we depart from general statements and reach concrete questions, reasonable men seem bound to differ on the means to be used and the ends to be achieved by the judicial pro-

To many readers these essays may seem excessively philosophical, somewhat remote from the daily life of men performing a difficult job by command of their fellows, with little of the earthy flavor of politics, and not the slightest gesture indicating that the social sciences can provide significant data or insights to those seeking to understand the role of the Court in our political and social system. Nevertheless, as intelligent commentary by one who has studied the Court and its work with intensity and devotion, there are nu-mercus observations and insights here than can hardly fail to stimulate the imagination of students of the Court and suggest forms of research which may yield substantial documentation to support or modify Professor Freund's philosophically held views.—William M. Beaney, Princeton University.

American Legal Realism: Skepticism, Reform, and the Judicial Process. By WILFRED E. RUMBLE, JR. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1968. Pp. 245. $6.75.)

Aryone who believes that the legal realists were characterized by a disregard for the normative content of law and that they tended to identify law and power should read Wilfrid Rumble's American Legal Realism as a healthy corrective for such oversimplified interpretations. Rumble's carefully documented description and appraisal of the realist movement presents a convincing argument that legal realism shared the moral fervor which marked American pragmatic reform several decades ago. Men like Karl Llewellyn and Jerome Frank were more interested in liberating the judicial process from a rigid and often hypocritical formalism than they were concerned with establishing a scientific sociology of law. Rule-skepticism and attention to the behavior of judges were weapons in a campaign to make American law more comprehensible, honest, adaptable to social change and perhaps authentic in the terms of contemporary existentialism. Certainly the rhetoric of realism does not resemble the language of research reports. We are told that legal jargon "befcozles" the ordinary man; that the classical conception of law obscures the ethical character of every judicial question, and thus "serves to perpetuate class prejudices." Of course, since realism was ε movement rather than a school of jurisprudence with fixed doctrinal principles, the various practitioners struck personal balances between reformist zeal and attention to a science of law. While Felix Cohen attempted to reconcile the theories of G. E. Moore and Bentham, Underhill Moore anticipated current work in judicial behav-

Although Rumble tries to comprehend the entire scope of legal realism in his essay, his most significant analysis appears in the chapter devoted to realist efforts in the area of judicial methodology. Both Frank and Llewellyn addressed themselves to the problem of elaborating norms for reaching judicial decisions. They both attacked the traditional conception that courts should adhere to precedent with the familiar arguments that conflicting rules can be applied to litigated cases and that no two disputes brought to court are the same in all relevant respects. They also agreed that judges should be as conscious as possible of the reasons why they made their particular decisions. Responding to traditionalist criticisms that pragmatism would render the legal process unpredictable, they contended that self-conscious judges would be more consistent than judges hiding behind a facade of precedent. Frank and Llewellyn clashed, however, on the means for attaining judicial self-knowledge. Frank suggested that judges undergo a form of psychoanalysis so that they could recognize their prejudices and decide cases in accordance with a clarified "sense of justice." Judicial opinions would be psychological reports of how the decisions were reached. Llewellyn felt that opinions should be written in the "Grand Style," explaining why certain precedents were chosen rather than others and "why the technically solid argument of the loser had no business to be listened to."

Rumble deals at some length with the objections which have been raised against the realist accounts of preferred judicial methodologies. First, the realists have been accused of offering no prescription of the values which decisions should reflect. Whether or not this criticism is damaging depends on the ethical theory to which a man subscribes. Rumble contends that moral guidance for judges is needed, "if the range of choice which confronts them is as wide as the realists claimed." In this case the realists seem to be more contemporary than their intellectual biographer. Like the realists, recent existentialists and situation ethicists have stressed self-knowledge and free commitment rather than obedience to codes as the appropriate bases for decision. The recognition of choice does not "assert that nothing can be gained from systematic, conscious analysis" of values, as Rumble implies, Acceptance of freedom does imply that after ethical debate has ended the judge must still make a decision in a particular case. He is acting in bad faith if he holds that the compulsion of precedents or external norms are responsible for his decision rather than the commitment he has made after study of the law and moral dialog. This is the primary ethical insight of the legal realists, which they share with many twentieth century philosophers and theologians.

A more interesting line of argument against Frank and Llewellyn is that judicial self-consciousness is undesirable because myths that the law can be found with certainty preserve the power and prestige of courts. Thurman Arnold, a realist in other respects, contended that traditional ideals furthered public acceptance of the judicial system and that "realism, despite its liberating virtues, is not a sustaining force for a stable civilization." Arnold's views are consonant with the positions of the political scientists termed "democratic elitists" by Peter Bachrach. Aside from the familiar moral objections to elite theory, the attack on legal realism is subject to the particular criticism that once old ideals have been discredited, compulsively proclaiming them will not restore their appeal. Rumble, in fact, calls attention to evidence that public acceptance of judicial myth is itself a myth. Whether or not a more appealing restatement of judicial infallibility should be devised to promote deference is a crucial question which has its counterparts in current debates on democratic theory. American political thought is currently undergoing a creative surge and it is to Rumble's credit that he has published a work which brings to light theories which should be useful to those of us wishing to reestablish the tradition of radical democratic theory.

While Rumble has succeeded in refuting the charge that the legal realists were skeptics and no more, his otherwise excellent essay is flawed by its lack of historical perspective and its absence of comment on the current relevance of the movement. Rumble implies that the insights of realism have been incorporated by contemporary jurisprudence and the excesses remedied. This is quite doubtful. However, American Legal Realism is a rich mine of argumentation which appears at just the right time.—MICHAEL A. WEINSTEIN, Purdue University.

The Pendergast Machine. By LYLE W. DORSETT. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1968. Pp. 163. $6.00.)

Historian Lyle Dorsett has posed the following questions in his study of the Pendergast machine: What is a political machine? How does it function? What does it do with its power? How does it meet the challenges that it faces? (p. xi.)

Professor Dorsett has done an impressive job of research in the attempt to answer these questions, and has made an important contribution to the study of American urban political history. Had he employed research procedures in common use among political scientists, however, his book would be even more valuable.

The Dorsett study agrees on most points with previous analyses of machine politics. That is, the machine is seen as a political organization which is based upon "specific material inducements" (Banfield's and Wilson's term), i.e., the provision of favors and patronage jobs to its supporters. The author provides a wealth of examples illustrating this point, which makes his study stand out as a successful attempt to recreate the political environment of Kansas City's past.

At two points, however, Dorsett's study differs from the conventional wisdom on the rise and fall of machine politics. Most writers on the subject have conceived of the machine as a system whose foundation is immigrant ethnic groups of low social and economic rank. Dorsett argues, however, that the Kansas City machine, at least in its later stages, drew just as much support from the nativist middle class as from the immigrant working class. ". . . the majority of Kansas City's population was middle class . . . in the 1920's less than 6 per cent of Kansas City's registered voters were foreign-born. The Negro population was larger than in some major cities, but by 1930 less than 10 per cent of the Kansas City population was colored. Primarily a mercantile and financial center. the metropolis in the heart of America was populated by a large native-American middle class. (p. 82)." For this reason, according to Dorsett, a majority of the electorate backed the 1925 campaign for a charter establishing a nonpartisan form of government. Boss Pendergast, therefore, decided to support the proposal, which was enacted. Kansas City's nonpartisanship, however, was de jure only, and actually strengthened the boss's hand. He was now able to pose as the "spokesman for efficient city government conducted on sound business principles. (p. 81)." Pendergast extended his organization into middle-class areas, where the inducements he offered residents were of a purely social nature. The political clubs in these areas functioned year round, sponsoring teas, parties, dances, picnics, and athletic contests. "In these various ways, then, the Pendergast machine provided a social outlet for many citizens who could not afford to belong to the city's expensive and exclusive country clubs, (p. 83.)"

Second, Dorsett notes that the rise of the welfare state did not hurt the Pendergast machine in the slightest, but rather strengthened it. This point also flies in the face of the conventional wisdom, which credits the welfare state's provision of services formerly available only through the machine with a key role in the demise of the latter institution. Pendergast, however, controlled the distribution of New Deal alphabet agency jobs in Kansas City, and thereby greatly increased his political resources and power. Since the Pendergast machine collapsed in 1940 after the exposure of its enormous corruption and the resultant scandal, one might argue that the machine would have declined at the hands of the welfare state had it somehow managed to survive the crisis in which it was destroyed. As the author points out, however, there is no empirical evidence anywhere in the literature to support this generally held assumption of writers in the field.

As valuable as Dorsett's book is, there are serious problems relating to the sources and methodology upon which the thesis of the middle-class machine is based. Although the author provides us with four handsome charts of the changing ward boundaries of the city, there is not a single table of figures relating to the extensive census and election returns data available. Kansas City did have a notably low per cent of foreign born residents during the Pendergast era, compared to other large American cities. The figures quoted above are misleading, however, for one-third of Kansas City's population was either of foreign stock (as opposed to foreign-born) or Negro in 1930. Second. Dorsett does not define what he means by "middle class," and presents no evidence to document his point that Kansas City's population was predominately middle class in 1930. (And thus, by implication, more middle class in composition than other major American cities.) Third, there is no investigation of voting returns by wards, a prerequisite for any assertions about the strength of the machine in middle class areas. As Arthur Mann's recent study (LaGuardia Comes To Power) shows, there is no reason for an historian to be so disdainful of quantitative empirical evidence.—Douglas Fox, Bowdoin College.

The President as Chief Administrator. By A. J. Wann. (Washington: Public Affairs Press, 1968. Pp. 219. $6.00.)

Frofessor Wann has written an excellent administrative history of the Roosevelt era. Not before nor since those exciting times have such significant developments occurred affecting the bureaucracy. The Roosevelt administration was one of bureaucratic expansion, experimentation, controversy, and on many occasions "muddling through." Professor Wann illustrates all of these occurrences, and undoubtedly his book will cause some nostalgia among those who lived through and participated in the bureaucracy during the Thirties and Forties.

This book pulls together most of the diverse literazure relating to the administrative branch uncer Roosevelt. Certainly the New Deal was one of the most chronicled in our history. Ample use is made of the memoirs of the period, as well as relevant documents, newspaper accounts, and seconcary sources. The synthesis of these materials is well done and valuable. Not only does the book refresh the memories of and provide new insights for scholars of administration, but also it is particularly valuable for students of administration who all too frequently these days have little understanding of the historical roots of the administrative branch. It is somewhat shocking how many contemporary students of political science have never heard of the Bureau of the Budget, the Executive Office of the President, the Reorganization Acts, the independent regulatory commissions, the President's Committee on Administrative Management and even the Hoover Commissions! And this list is only the beginning of what is a long list of important developments shaping the bureaucracy that are often ignored today although they were considered of central importance during the Thirties, Forties, and early Fifties. Should our government begin to focus upon domestic problems once again as during the Thirties, increased attention will be given to problems of administrative planning and management.

Professor Wann uses as his basing point the widely accepted view that the President has a constitutional responsibility to be "Chief Administrator." The author accepts this Hamiltonian concept, although at one point he is careful to point out that Congress has a large measure of authority over the bureaucracy. In judging the successes and failures of Presidents in the performance of the role of "Chief Administrator" it should be emphasized that the thrust of the Constitution was not entirely in this direction. Fragmentation of the governmental process through the separation of powers encouraged the fragmentation of the bureaucracy, and the placement of agencies outside of the control of the President. The President is swimming against the tide whenever he attempts to tighten the reins he holds to the administrative branch. The book vividly illustrates this in connection with F.D.R.'s unsuccessful attempt to get Congress to implement the recommendations of the President's Committee on Administrative Management of 1937. In that instance he came face to face with intrenched bureaucratic interests that did not want to be reorganized, and intense pressure was exerted on Congress, particularly by the clientele groups of the old line agencies which also had a vested interest in the status quo, to defeat the reorganization proposals. Perhaps the pervasiveness of the view that the President is "Chief Administrator" should be modified in light of the constitutional and political facts, so that Presidents confronted with bureaucratic intransigence will not feel that they are failing to perform their constitutional "duty." Such a recognition of reality might also soften the views of those who like to criticize various Presidents for failing as "Chief Administrator."

In light of the foregoing considerations, was F.D.R. a successful "Chief Administrator"? The author makes the statement that "although Roosevelt was always interested throughout his career in questions of administrative organization, it is accurate to say that his interest in administration was subordinate to his interest in politics. Perhaps it is really more accurate to say that Roosevelt as President never actually distinguished politics and administration from each other in any clear-cut way." In my view this is the very reason F.D.R. was successful in many of his dealings with the bureaucracy. Whether or not the author would accept the view that politics and administration are inevitably intertwined is not made completely clear, although the facts of his book support this view. Public administration is politics, and to master the art of public administration it is necessary to ignore many of the "principles" of scientific management and concentrate upon the political management of men. Roosevelt proved this. There was a conflict between what he and many of his contemporaries considered to be the proper principles of management, and his instincts about politics. For example, on the one hand he preached the importance of hierarchical control and elimination of overlapping responsibilities, and on the other purposely pitted men and agencies against each other to receive from the clash of viewpoints the components of a good decision, which in his terms meant a wise political decision. There is no contradiction in this except for those who fail to see the true nature of the politics of administration. Although on occasion this book suggests a separation of politics and public administration, its contents actually vividly illustrate the connection between them.—Peter Woll, Brandeis Uni-

The Political World of the High School Teacher.

By Harmon Zeigler. (Eugene: Center for the Advanced Study of Educational Administration, University of Oregon, 1966. Pp. 160. $2.00.)

The Political Life of American Teachers. By Harmon Zeigler. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1967. Pp. 149. $4.95.)

We live in an era of increasing unrest and militancy of American teachers. Teachers may very soon come to display the kind of vocal protest now characteristic of college students and Negroes. Both high school and college teachers are often faced with low salaries, unpleasant community and school conditions, and little effective voice in the decisions that most affect them. That they should turn to strikes, mass resignations, sanctions and other tactics in making their demands heard should not surprise us. The question for political science is, will we be prepared to offer any illuminating scholarly insight and evidence on these problems, or will we be caught once again in the same ineffective position that we now are in with respect to Negro and student radical activism?

Against this background, one welcomes Harmon Zeigler's work on the occupational and political perceptions of teachers. Using a sample survey of 803 high school teachers in Oregon, Zeigler attempts to provide a basis for understanding several facets of teachers' political roles. He focuses upon their varying perceptions of the teaching experience and job satisfaction, involvement in the teacher's association, expectations about the goals and performance of the teacher organization and its leaders, abstract political and educational values, perceptions of the role of the teacher as an agent of political socialization, and beliefs concerning the sanctions that can be brought to bear by others to constrain the teacher's performance of his or her political and educational roles.

The theme given perhaps most emphasis in both versions of the book is that there are many interesting and important differences in the perceptions of men and women teachers. Men are, for example, less satisfied with their jobs, participate less in the Oregon teacher organization, and are more likely to want the organization to involve itself with wider political matters and less with educational politics per se. Although one might be well-advised to wait for other, replicative evidence before putting as heavy reliance on these sex differences as an explanatory device as does the author, such differences are suggestive of sources of discontent in the teacher ranks. In particular, the less successful male teacher, a fairly misanthropic creature in Zeigler's analysis, might bear closer scrutiny in future work. And, it is striking that in one of the few occupations that has long afforded equal access to the sexes, male high school teachers exhibit a political syndrome of lower efficacy and involvement that is more typical of women in the general population. The possible clash of such professionally-defined roles of men with those they have in the more general culture may thus well provide some motive power to radicalize them in the future. That males are less politically conservative and more apt to be attracted to unionization is also suggestive of greater militancy, especially as the proportion of males in the profession rises.

The differences between the two versions of the book are important, especially for the political science reader. The Political World of the High School Teacher presents the data used to make the generalizations presented in both versions. Only The Political World therefore provides the reader with a basis for assessing the extent and significance of the relationships presented. The Political Life version is evidently aimed at a non-technically oriented audience in that it contains few tables or direct references to the data.

The latter, however, does expand the interpretation somewhat. Given how threadbare were the interpretative aspects of The Political World, even small improvements are welcomed in The Political Life. Nevertheless, the book still lacks theoretical integration. It consists essentially of a collection of fairly isolated hypotheses about teacher perceptions. Even the male-female difference theme is largely unsuccessful as a unifying device. The author had perhaps too many disparate empirical purposes when he set out originally to collect his data. The result is that his attempt to weave his various purposes into whole cloth was doomed to failure from the beginning. Combined with a tendency of his writing style to lapse into "disserta-tionese," such theoretical diffuseness clearly limits the work's utility and readability.

In spite of these flaws, the book may well serve to focus attention upon some important questions for further analysis, especially how the changing composition of the teacher profession together with its changing environment may lead it to greater political action. The work also suggests some interesting questions for future research into the role of the teacher and the school in political socialization. As for many attempts to break new ground, it contributes most in raising new hypotheses and suggesting further lines of inquiry.—

JACX DENNIS, University of Wisconsin.

The Politics of Food for Peace: Executive-Legislative Interaction. By Peter A. Toma, with the assistance of Frederick A. Schoenfeld. (Tucson, The University of Arizona Press, 1967. Pp. 195. $3.95.)

Professor Toma's study is concerned with both the past history and future prospects of food-aid, however it focuses on "executive-legislative interaction" in the 1964 Congressional hearings on the extension of Food for Peace. "Why did the Congressional attitude toward Food for Peace change in 1964, Toma queries, "... an answer to this question becomes fundamental to understanding the future of food-aid in the context of American policy."

To set the stage for a discussion of the 1964 hearings, Toma briefly reviews "Agricultural Politics and Policy in the United States," the history and scope of the Food for Peace Program, beginning with the passage of Public Law 480 in 1954. and the "attitudes" and "images" of Congress in years when food-aid legislation was extended or modified. He emphasizes that, while the primary motives for the initiation of Public Law 480 were domestic concerns (i.e. surplus disposal), by 1964, food-aid had become primarily an "instrument of U.S. Foreign policy." This trend was reinforced by the "Food for Peace" label attached to the program by the Eisenhower Administration and, especially, by the organizational and policy changes which were introduced following the election of President Kennedy.

Euring the period from 1954 through 1961, according to Toma, there was also a trend of growing Congressional support. However future support was endangered by several unresolved issues which had recurred in the successive legislative hearings. The most important of these issues were (a) the intent of the program (i.e. to serve foreign or domestic policy objectives), (b) the appropriate term for legislative extensions, (c) whether or not to assist Communist nations, (d) the degree to which Congress should directly supervise program operations, (e) the accumulation and handling of Title I proceeds (from concessional sales) and (f) "the question of organizational efficiency to implement the program according to Congressional desires." An additional problem which was to lead to future difficulties was the lack of an effective method of evaluating the program.

Up to this point, the analysis is relatively clear and straightforward, although the discussion of "Agricultural politics and policy" in Chapter One is extraneous to subsequent material. However, in the more detailed consideration of the events of January-September 1964, the thread of the argument becomes difficult to follow.

There are three major problems with Toma's analysis of this period and the conclusions and implications which he derives therefrom. First, there is no clear conceptual framework or theoretical focus. There is a fragmentary and somewhat puzzling discussion of Congressional and Executive decision-making as "systems" (using a version of Easton's paradigm) but the model is neither elaborated nor applied.

A second problem derives from the neglect of relevant literature on legislative processes and administrative decision making in government. Much of this literature discusses the kinds of issues with which Toma is concerned (i.e. the budgetary process, legislative strategies of administration officials, the position and power of committee chairmen in their respective houses, House-Senate similarities and differences, etc.). Wildavsky's Politics of the Budgetary Process, for example, would support Tcma's contention that the lack of "evaluative documentation" was a handicap to the administration in its relations with Congress. However Wildavsky's study would raise serious doubts about the conclusion that Congressional "penetration" of the "facade" of executive unity is a very helpful explanation of the defeat of the administration proposals. Virtually every important legislative proposal tends to be the result of discussion and compromise in the Executive branch and in the case of Food for Peace the degree of "unity" seems to have been relatively high. To cite another example, the analysis of Congressional decision-making in Chapter Five is virtually de novo as if (to cite just a few relevant works) Matthews' U.S. Senators and their World (1960), Clapp's, The Congressmen (1963) and Carroll's The House of Representatives and Foreign Affairs (1958) had never been written.

The third problem is Toma's use of the Pearson cht to identify "variables" which had "causal influence" on decision-making patterns of Congressional committee members. Toma has taken ten variables from the Congressional Quarterly Almanac and computed contingency coefficients between these variables (individually) and an incomplete record of committee voting on the 1964 bill derived from a mailed questionnaire. The response to this questionnaire was sixty-five per cent (26 responses out of 40) with a strong possibility of systematic variation in the response-non response patterns. From these data, he draws conclusions about the relationship between the "independent variables" of (a) Party, (b) Party unity, (c) Liberal-conservative, (d) Presidential support, (e) Attendance at hearings, (f) Farm Constituency, (g) PL 480 constituency, (h) Age and (i) Seniority and the "dependent variable of "Executive support," "indifference" or "opposition." Where a "statistically significant relationship" (at the .05 level) exists, Toma concludes that the dependent and independent variables are causally related. He then uses the chi2 significance values to order the independent variables with respect to their "intensity of influence" on the dependent variable. There is general agreement, I think, that significance tests cannot be used in this way. Omitting the problem of meeting the mathematical assumptions of the statistical model (which Toma's "sample" clearly fails to do) a measure of the strength of relationship between variables (for example, the omega coefficient) is what would be needed to draw these types of conclusions. In Toma's presentation, there is no connection established between data and conclusions; only the illusion of such a connection.

Because the topic of investigation is a worthy one, it is too bad that these types of problems arise in Toma's analysis. Public Law 480 represented a rather unique symbiosis of domestic and foreign policy interests. Thus the Food for Peace idea has survived the legislative "minuet" better than most foreign assistance legislation and would be a most interesting focus for detailed study of interrelated foreign and domestic issues in the legislative process. Moreover, there is also a need for a book which would increase public awareness of the War on Hunger and its significance, much as McGovern's War Against Want attempted to do several years ago. The Politics of Food for Peace accomplishes neither objective. The non professional who is concerned with the general background and significance of food-aid will find that the style of presentation is too technical and pedantic to hold his interest. The political scientist who is concerned with the legislative or administrative processes of government will find that the connections established between data and conclusions are far from convincing.—JOHN M. RICHARD-SON, JR., University of Minnesota.

Legislative Representative in the Contemporary South. By Malcolm E. Jewell. (Durham: Duke University Press, 1967. Pp. 141. $5.50.)

One of the by-products of the "Reapportionment Revolution" has been renewed interest by political scientists, and members of other disciplines, in representation theory, practice, and results. The state legislatures have served as laboratories for empirical analyses of various representative systems and their consequences. From them, considerable hard data have emerged to add to our knowledge and understanding of the American political system, and of the implications and effects of diverse representation schemes.

Malcolm E. Jewell has undertaken a comparative analysis of certain aspects of legislative representation in eight states in Legislative Representation in the Contemporary South. He examines legislative politics in Alabama, Florida, Kentucky, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas. He is concerned chiefly with the extent of Democratic primary competition, the existence of factional political systems and the development of two-party competition. But, while there is much valuable material here, the problems of comparative studies among the states and especially among their political sub-systems force the conclusions, where they are even possible, to be very broad.

Jewell concludes that the levels of primary competition "vary substantially from state to state" but the data led him to discount as causal factors the length of terms, the number of incumbents who run, and the proportion of Negro or metropolitan districts. In each of the states, however, it appears that one or more of these factors contribute to the incidence of primary competition. Incumbency seems to be an important variable in determining competition—the lack of an incumbent seems to produce a higher level of competition. Also there is somewhat more competition in metropolitan districts and "occasionally" less in the more rural districts.

In assessing the influence of factionalism, Professor Jewell is compelled to focus only upon Kentucky, Louisiana, and Texas because in the other five states there is little evidence of factionalism in legislative primaries. Even in the three states, only limited conclusions can be drawn since factionalism as evident in slating arrangements occurs in too great a variety of situations to permit broad generalizations to stand.

Firmer trends emerge from the consideration of two-party competition. Professor Jewell finds increasing competition from Republicans in legislative elections. This competition is manifested both in more Republican candidates and more Republican success in winning legislative seats. Further, Republicanism has spread from traditionally Republican areas to metropolitan counties, and particularly those in which Republican presidential and gubernatorial candidates have run well. Jewell notes that these counties too are those in which the Democratic primaries are most competitive and where reapportionment is producing additional legislative seats.

In his final chapter, Professor Jewell speculates on the future of competition in these states. He identifies reapportionment and a growing Negro vote as the two major factors that will affect legislative contests, and lead to increased levels of competition in both primaries and general elections. Reapportionment will allot proportionately more legislative seats to areas already characterized by higher levels of competition and enlarge the size of rural districts where long incumbency seemed most deeply rooted. At the least, reapportionment changes the pattern of election systems by altering historic districting schemes to add more legislators from multi-member districts, increase the number of multi-county districts, and introduce single-member districts into métropolitan areas. The impact of the Negro vote increasingly can be expected to be felt in both metropolitan and rural areas as Negroes become participants in Southern political society. Already evident in metropolitan areas, Negro voting in black-belt areas potentially can affect the entire structure of Southern politics. Together with reapportionment, it can lead to more primary and party competition.

This study is useful to understanding state legislative systems as well as Southern politics. Even though he finds that many of his hypotheses about legislative representation in a one-party environment are not confirmed, Professor Jewell contributes valuable data about legislative politics in the eight states. The analysis of Kentucky, Louisiana, and Texas slating practices has the greatest depth, and the data on party competition is most useful from a comparative standpoint in the Southern region.—RALPH EISENBERG, University of Virginia.

Anti-Politics in America: Reflections on the Anti-Political Temper and its Distortions of the Democratic Process. By John H. Bunzel. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1967. Pp. 291. $6.95.)

A-tti-Politics in America is a book of reflections rather than a research report. Many of the reflections are undoubtedly accurate; at any rate, they are banal and unoriginal. Some of the reflections are fascinating, and testable, propositions about the political attitudes of people outside of the mainstream of American politics. Prof. Bunzel's greatest failing in this book is that he has in no meaningful way attempted to verify these propositions. Reflections on impressions gathered at Bay Area brunches and cocktail parties can no longer be accepted as serious scholarship in political science unless these impressions are supported by some hard data.

The author's failure to gather any meaningful data is particularly unfortunate because he is dealing with a major theoretical problem. Anti-politics, according to Bunzel, is the rejection of politics "in the name of some non-political 'truth.'" (p. 3) He lists among the people rejecting politics those on the radical right, the far left, pacifists, psychological determinists, and utopians. Their common characteristic, he asserts (but does not test) is unwillingness to compromise major goals; such people are anti-political because politics necessarily involves compromise following conflict.

Before discussing the book's technical shortcomings in detail, it is necessary to consider some theoretical issues. The first is that there may be some issues on which a reasonable man will not compromise. Bunzel's commitment to democratic procedures seems to be of this nature. The second is that Bunzel seems to claim that there cannot be politics outside of democratic systems, "There is no politics in a totalitarian society because conflict is looked upon as a form of illness." (p. 7) Are we to take this to mean that the process of making binding decisions in totalitarian societies is something other than a political process? And what are we to think of Chairman Mao and his theory of contradictions? Finally, Bunzel writes that politics "leads not to order and stability but to instability and change." (p. 10) Perhaps the author is working in terms of a highly individual conception of stability and instability, but one of the main currents in social thought today seems to be the quest for change with stability. At any rate, it seems more reasonable to argue that politics can lead to any combination of those four terms.

Bunzel's critiques of the manifestations of the anti-political sentiment are generally summaries of the writings of other social theorists, most of whom are at Berkeley, and the reader should be advised that the original works are better. At times, the effusive citations approach sycophancy: the radical right is subjected to the critiques of Franz Neumann, Daniel Bell, and Richard Hofstadter; C. Wright Mills runs Nelson Polsby's formidable gauntlet; the most telling points on psychological determinism are made by Norman Jacobson and Gabriel Almond. But it is not until the last two chapters that this technique reaches its full strength. In the chapter on the utopians and the elimination of politics, we read. "As Bendix and Fisher have observed. . . " (p. 247), "As Bendix and Fisher have pointed out. . . ." (p. 248), "As Wolin says . . ." (p. 249), and "As Wolin points out ..." (p. 250). In the final chapter, "The Commitment to Democratic Politics," there is a quotation running from page 280 to page 282 from Charles Lindblom's "A New Look at Latin America." which is footnoted in the following way: "I thought so highly of his approach and analysis that I had the same piece reprinted in a book of readings I edited for college undergraduates..." (p. 282) and then plugs the book. Perhaps these are only matters of style, but a book devoid of data should not also commit the sin of being aesthetically offensive.

Let us continue to examine the book's methodological problems. Bunzel's basic technique is to infer from the writings of a movement's leaders to the attitudes and probable behavior of the movement's followers. These inferences are generally supported by referring to anecdotes and to the author's conversations with students and other acquaintances who are engaged in such movements. Even Bunzel must realize that this is a risky sort of verification, for at one point he writes that H. Stuart "Hughes, like many followers of the peace movement, reveals subtly that his ringing statements are actually more extreme than would be his own personal actions were he in a position of political responsibility, but that the voicing of such positions is necessary." (p. 169) If this is the case, why does Bunzel assume that all Birchites agree with The Blue Book, that all members of the radical left share the thoughts of C. Wright Mills and the Lynds, that a large proportion of Quakers prefer absolute truth and peace to the give and take of politics (Bunzel claims, by the way, that community action programs are nonpolitical, p. 153), and so on for each of the groups he reflects upon.

Bunzel would have made a significant contribution to our understanding of extremest politics had he gone out and measured the degree of ideological thinking among followers of such movements, and had he correlated the beliefs of leaders with the beliefs of followers. Let me list a few of his conjectures that merit rigorous testing:

- Thinking only in terms of moral cutrage, she ["a friend of mine"] believed an issue to be more important than an institution or a procedure. (p. 28)
- The hostility to democratic politics on the part of the right wing is in large measure a result of its fundamentalist roots. (p. 65)
- 3) The extremists of the far right . . . are a religious people who are separated from the rest of mankind for the great purpose of preserving and propagating the true religion. . . . Worship of the past is coupled with a mistrust of modernity. (pp. 86-87)
- 4) Their deepseated suspicion of everyone but themselves merely underscores their belief in the betrayal of the American Dream by hidden conspiracies and reaffirms their fervor for immediate and total solutions. (p. 87)
- 5) Yet anyone who understands or is sympathetic to the ways of politics in this country knows that many businessmen, bankers, and other "clite" members of the community are very often too indifferent to public affairs for the simple reason that they are too busy making money. (p. 108)
- The religiously dedicated members of the peace movement see a definite dichotomy between politics and their own action. (p. 166)
- There is a real tendency [for pacifists] to apply a double standard to the United States and the Soviet Union. (p. 180)

It is a shame that Prof. Bunzel has not tried to gather the kinds of data which might have verified some of these propositions. I would guess that some of them are correct; others seem to be patently false. Serious testing of these propositions and analysis of their implications for the maintenance of the democratic process would be a significant contribution to the discipline. As it is, we are left with a disappointing and frustrating book, which, in the words of one of my colleagues, "ranges from banality to bêtise to bunkum."—Kenneth S. Sherrill, Hunter College, City University of New York.

The Admirals' Lobby. By VINCENT DAVIS. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1967. Pp. 329. $7.50.)

"In the councils of Government we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist. We must never let the weight of this combination endanger our liberties or democratic processes." Thus cautioned General Dwight D. Eisenhower. Professor Davis' study of the U.S. Navy's officer corps reads as a well argued brief for the defense -at least in defense of the U.S. Navy. He finds that naval officers do not like to engage in activities that clearly have political purposes (p. 302). And in a "propositional" summary at the end of the book he concludes they engage in such activity only when the following two conditions are met: (1) ". . . a dire and immediate sense of threat to the continued existence of the Navy...." and (2) "... leadership, or at least tacit support, from one or more ranking civilian officials, usually the Secretary. . . ." (p. 319). While these findings may not entirely console those who share the fears of the former Commander-in-Chief, the evidence offered in support of them is even less assuring. Especially distressing is the Navy's tendency to interpret everything from Army Air Corps' doctrine in the 1920's, the National Security Act of 1947, to Secretary McNamara's management practices as threats to survival. The author attributes most such reactions to "The Navy's traditional sense of being misunderstood and unappreciated by the American public" (p. 270).

Beyond providing evidence of paranoic tendencies, the bulk of the study presents the reader with a wealth of material which suggests there is nothing particularly sinister or overbearing about the political activities of the Navy. That naval officers and, less frequently, offices engage in lobbying, propaganda, and information manipulation is incontrovertible and the author provides many examples of each. The relevant questions are, how endemic is such activity, to what purposes has it been put, what restraints and checks operate? The answers, considered at length, are for the most part reassuring.

More than anything else, the book is a recounting of the perceptions and attitudes of naval officers themselves. The author has gone to great effort to uncover and set forth a "frame of reference" or "cognitive map" characterizing the officer corps. Drawing from published and some unpublished sources, extensive personal interviews, and very probably his own insights as a former naval aviator and Annapolis graduate, the author attributes to the Navy a vision of strategy, technology, and politics not inconsistent with the colorful statement attributed to Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson: "The Navy is a religion, Neptune is god, Alfred T. Mahan his prophet, and the U.S. Navy the one true church." Officers have a healthy distrust of the virtues of centralized defense organization (Place the Navy at the mercy of a Secretary of Defense who might not appreciate the nature of sea power? Never!). There is a lack of vision in assessing the impact of new technolcgy (We are told for example, "As for the control of nuclear energy, its military significance is dramatized at least as much by its application to propulsion systems for submarines as by its more spectacular uses in ordnance devices" (p. 58). By the way, it is not clear whether this represents the author's or the Navy's belief.). Finally, there is dogged belief in "command of the seas" as a vital element of national security, achievable only through a "balanced Navy." Most interestingly, politics is viewed as a somewhat tainted activity, beneath the dignity of a professional and certainly not the domain of a military professional committed to the norm of civilian supremacy in matters of higher national policy.

The study devotes about equal attention to the development of attitudes and positions prior to World War II and to their evolution during the post-war period. What emerges is a picture of the military as just another bureaucracy devoted to its own particular subgoals and survival interests. Norms which inhibit political activity serve to reduce the Navy's effectiveness in the rough and tumble of the national policy process—but not too much. Despite promises of a conceptual analysis of the subject made in the Preface and notwithstanding the "propositional" summary at the end, the book is primarily a chronology of views and events—closer to military of institutional history than to interest group or organizational analysis. The book's virtues are also its vices. Often drawing on unpublished and frequently anonymous sources, the author creates an interesting and plausible sketch of perceptions among naval officers-accounting for their origins and tracing out some of their implications. However, these merits are achieved at the cost of treating the subject in virtual isolation from the domestic and international events which give the perceptions meaning (for example, little treatment of changing national views about opponents and the threats they might constitute). Foregone are countless opportunities for applying or testing relevant hypotheses from the literature of contemporary studics in politics and organizational behavior. Perhaps most disappointing is the failure to shed much light on what is billed as ". . . really a hypothesis intended to be tested in the research," namely, "... that the nature and employment of armed forces within and by any given nation-state would be to a large degree determined by the nature and culture of that nation" (vii). Perhaps the best judgment of this book is the one the author makes in the Preface, ". . . regard the work in hand as only an early report on an ongoing research project that will require far more work to complete with any substantial degree of thoroughness" (xi).-J. C. Ries, University of California, Los Angeles.

The Political Beliefs of Americans: A Study of Public Opinion. By Lloyd A. Free and Hadley Cantril. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1967. Pp. 239. $10.00.)

The contents of this book are more accurately represented by adding onto the present title, The Political Beliefs of Americans: A Study of Public Opinion, the term, Pre-election, 1964. For this is a study basec on 3215 national cross-section interviews conducted in September and October of 1964 by the Gallup Poll.

The bill-of-fare will be familiar to the student of public opinion accustomed to perusing bivariate cross-tabulations among issue positions, party and class identifications, socio-economic and demographic characteristics, and psychological attributes. However, the reader with an interest in voting behavior is served notice that his appetite will only be whetted by a rare entry or two concerning the relationship between political beliefs and opinions and voting intentions. It is true that the usefulness of working with voting intentions, as opposed to the vote report available from a postelection study, may be questioned due to the discrepancy between intention and behavior. However, given the author's concern with liberal-conservative ideology, the unusually sharp distinction between the Presidential candidates in this respect, the rate of defection from partisan affiliations in candidates choices, and the professed interest in providing an analysis for the use of politicians and the student of practical politics, more attention to voting intentions would seem to have been justified.

The audience to which the book is directed, and the type of analysis employed, is quite accurately stated by Free in the Acknowledgments. "The level of analysis . . . has necessarily been determined by the fact that I am a pollster and political analyst, not a psychologist or a sociologist. . . . In selecting the information to be gathered and in analyzing and presenting it, I have had primarily in mind the politician and the student of practical politics. Accordingly, I have not attempted to trace causation in depth." And that's the way it is.

Apparently the contribution by Cantril is very much restricted to the last chapter. Once again, according to the Acknowledgments by Free, "... my associate, Hadley Cantril, insists that I confess to being primarily guilty for most of it. On the other hand, I insist on making it clear that his is the responsibility especially for the last chapter, the most important and difficult to formulate."

In the last chapter, Cantril observes the need to develop an American ideology which is consistent with the way we behave. The observed inconsistency is between the support for a conservative ideology of private initiative and a limited federal government on the one hand, and support for the welfare programs of the federal government on the other. The empirical base of the observation is provided by the distribution of the population on two scales: an "ideological spectrum" and an "operational spectrum." On the operational spectrum, consisting of five items on federal aid to education, medicare, federal housing, urban renewal, and the eradication of poverty, 65 percent of the population is classified as predominantly or completely liberal. On the ideological spectrum, based on attitudes towards federal intervention in private enterprise, state, and local affairs, and individual initiative, the conservative pole is favored with 50 percent predominantly or completely conservative and only 16 percent in the two most liberal categories.

The apparent inconsistency may be discounted partially on two points of methodology and on one point of interpretation. The first methodological point is that, because of the item content and format, individuals disposed to acquiesce to plausible statements and to accept the status quo are well on the way to becoming ideological conservatives and operational liberals—in the absence of any informed or firmly held opinions to the contrary.

A second methodological issue is raised by the failure to state the basis for selecting the items to be included in the two scales. Why, for example, is an item concerning the amount of power exercised by the Federal Government excluded from the ideological spectrum scale? Its inclusion in the ideological scale, with two-thirds of the population supporting the present, or an increased, exercise of federal power, would help to shift the distribution on the ideological spectrum towards the thinly populated liberal end. Indeed, the strong Guttman scalar relationship between the orderings on the ideological and operational spectrum suggests that a common dimension underlies both measures, with the difference in the distributions on the two spectra a function of item bias.

The observation of a strong Guttman scalar relationship between the ideological and operational spectrum scales is relevant to the point of interpretation that is being questioned here; that the electorate is characterized by a sharp inconsistency of ideology and behavior. No more than a fourth of the population is conservative on the ideological spectrum and liberal on the operational spectrum. Nearly all of the remaining respondents are either liberal to middle-of-the-road on both scales or conservative to middle-of-the-road on both.

Certainly the American political system faces graver challenges than that posed by a quarter of the population, at the very most, subscribing to a conservative ideology while supporting specific programs somewhat at variance with that ideology. It is more likely that the promulgation of this more or less unsubstantiated view of the American electorate serves primarily as a source of frustration for the Republicans who, as the authors put it, "have a philosophy but no program," while "the Democrats have a program but no philosophy."

By implication, this review has suggested that the contradiction between conservative ideals and liberal practice is the only concern of this work. Although the data analysis repeatedly involves the ideological and operational spectra, the interests of the author(s) are much more diffusive. I leave the reader to select among the varied data presentations according to his special interests and needs.

In conclusion, this book may be useful as an "outside reading" for an undergraduate course and it may serve specific purposes at the graduate level without making the prelim reading list. The professional-academic analyst of American public opinion may find it stimulating at points to the extent that he is energized by particular pieces of data.—Aage Clausen, University of Wisconsin.

Claus Spreckels: The Sugar King of Hawaii, By JACOB ADLER. (Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1966. Pp. 339. $8.50.)

Interviewed by a San Francisco Bulletin reporter during his campaign against annexation of the Hawaiian Islands by the United States, Claus Spreckels, The Sugar King, proclaimed that the Islands may be annexed "by and by, some time ... but not now. I'll guarantee to deliver them at any time" (p. 248). This claim of political omnipotence by "His Royal Saccharinity," as his enemies called him, was promptly challenged. Nevertheless, it caused such concern that one of the supporters of Hawaii's revolutionary, Provisional Government warned that Spreckels can largely control Maui, and can have great influence in other parts of the Islands. . . . He is a strong factor . . . and it is important to use him and not quarrel with him (p. 251).

This political jousting occurred at a significant time in Hawaii's political history and in the course of Spreckels' Hawaiian adventure. Both strands of these intertwined narratives are skillfully traced by Adler, who concentrates on the decisive part played by Spreckels in Hawaii's political history during the final quarter of the 19th century. Adler thereby helps us better to understand the decline of the Hawaiian monarchy and the revolutionary outbursts by which it was finally destroyed.

As Adler makes clear, a grasp of these developments is indispensable to those seeking to understand a broad aspect of The Islands' political development: the transition from the monarchic-oligarchic regime of the late 19th century to Hawaii's increasingly egalitarian, democratic regime of today. The importance of Adler's work transcends its analysis of Hawaii's political history by providing political scientists with an opportunity to reflect on a question of fundamental importance: What is the nature of oligarchic rule, the character of the oligarchic regime?

As recounted and interpreted by Adler, Spreckels' career provides an arresting model of the oligarchic man. A remarkably short time after his arrival in the U.S.—in steerage, and with but a single taler in his pocket—Spreckels advanced to a position of enormous financial and political power in California, where he became the acknowledged Sugar King of the West Coast during the 1870s. Not surprisingly, Spreckels turned to Hawaii to supply his California refineries with the enormous, unending flow of raw sugar they required. Thus, it was in Hawaii that he created the world's largest and most efficient sugar plantations.

Adler is at his best as he reveals the scope of Spreckels' genius in matters of finance and production. Guided by an almost uncanny grasp of the possibilities for creating an all-inclusive, vertically integrated, near monopolistic control of the Hawaiian-West Coast sugar industry, Spreckels simultaneously developed plantations, railroads, utilities, shipping lines, banks, and refineries. His oligopolistic, centralized, "factory-in-the-field" pattern of agricultural production was the work of a brilliant and far-sighted man, and was to serve as the model for commercial agriculture, in Hawaii and—many decades later—on the American mainland. Indeed, contemporary students of economic development in the emerging nations would do well to consider Adler's analysis of how Spreckels constructed his empire.

Spreckels faced seemingly insuperable obstacles to his goals. But, as Adler makes clear, he was armed with the maxim, "Every man has his price," and he alternately bribed, then intimidated, Hawaii's royalty in his successful efforts to secure land, water rights, and special privileges of all sorts. At the peak of his power, he controlled over half of the enormous sugar industry in the Hawaiian Islands, and he boasted, "When Kalakaua was King, I practically ran the country" (p. 231).

Nevertheless, Spreckels' methods of achieving his ends in the sphere of production emphasized the defects of his character and perspective. These proved to be his undoing. Unable to comprehend the outlook and motives of non-oligarchic men. Spreckels never believed that King Kalakaua could dare to bite the hand that bribed him. Yet so it happened. Kalakaua, made furious by Spreckels' boasts and bullying, turned to others for assistance. At the same time, the democratic leaders of Hawaii, men such as George Washington Pilipo, a courageous and intelligent native Hawaiian, and Sanford Dole, continued to battle unceasingly against Spreckels in the legislature. These men believed that their political community should be more than an enormous sugar plantation or joint stock company and the goal of human life more than mere production. They were intent on developing Hawaii's agriculture in the traditional pattern of American family farming in order to insure the development of a sturdy, selfsufficient, and free citizenry.

With the overthrow of Hawaii's monarchy in 1893, Spreckels' political defeat was completed. He was unable to restore Queen Liliuokalani to her throne or, subsequently, to prevent the annexation of Hawaii by the United States. His political power crushed, the great oligarch was unable to maintain his economic position, and he lived to see the ownership of his stupendous enterprises fall into the hands of Hawaii-born descendants of the missionaries.

Even though Spreckels' political and economic power had been broken, a powerful oligarchic element remained in Hawaii. It is to a much needed and comprehensive consideration of this aspect of Hawaii's political-economic history that Adler's study of Spreckels points us. As Adler notes, the definitive study of Hawaii's "Big Five" corporate structure remains to be written, as does an adequate account of the persistently monopolistic patterns of land ownership and utilization in Hawaii. Adler's efforts will undoubtedly guide and stimulate this further work. We are thus all the more indebted to him for an extraordinarily useful, important, and fascinating study.—ROBERT HORWITZ, Kenuon College.

North Carolina Politics: An Introduction. By Jack D. Fleer. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina, 1968. Pp. 185.)

This book is an introduction to electoral politics in North Carolina since 1940. Professor Fleer of Wake Forest University has utilized aggregate data, historical documentation, and statutory regulations to produce a clear though simple picture of the state's electoral politics. It is a very useful book for high school and introductory college courses. The author has used scholarly accounts, plus the data he collected and analyzed, to go beyond the extremely simplistic introductions to the politics of individual states which one often finds in books of this nature.

The work includes a brief introductory section on the political environment which describes the elective offices, statutory regulations relating to them, and the effects of reapportionment and redistricting. This is followed by a chapter on the electorate in which the author describes the qualifications for voting, the registration system, and rates of participation. Next comes a chapter on party organization-emphasizing party regulation and activities at various levels. Then a chapter on the electoral process with sections on nominations, campaigning, financing, and elections follows. Analyses of party competition cover the two final substantive chapters—one of these being about intraparty competition, the other about interparty competition.

As with most books, this book could have been made stronger. Data about political opinion, interest aggregations, and other aspects of the informal political structure are missing. (Which might cause some persons to suggest that "The North Carolina Electoral System" rather than "North Carolina Politics" would have been a more accurate title.)

A section on Negro and white political attitudes and involvement in North Carolina politics would have been particularly relevant and helpful. Even though data of this nature for generalizing to the entire state does not exist currently, several studies in recent years have provided valuable individual data about important segments of the North Carolina electorate. Incorporation of these data in the section on the political environment and the section about elections would have added considerable depth to the book.

The book obviously is based on adequate data. However, the documentation often does not show this. The decision to omit all but a few references undoubtedly was a publisher's decision. And, for the beginning student of state party politics, this lack of documentation throughout will be no problem. However, this is a problem for the serious scholar, who would like to pursue the many leads Professor Fleer has provided.

For the political scientist, the value of this book is in the many interesting implicit and explicit hypotheses which the author has raised about North Carolina politics. Currently, survey data are being collected which may provide support or refutation for many of these hypotheses. Both the continuing Southeastern survey and the survey for the Comparative State Elections Study in 1968 include North Carolina as a survey universe. Both will provide data for some of Professor Fleer's hypotheses.—Lewis Bowman, Emory University.

Social Welfare and Urban Problems. Edited by Thomas D. Sherrard. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1968. Pp. 210. $6.00.)

This volume presents some of the papers prepared for the 94th Annual Forum of the National Conference on Social Welfare, held in the spring of 1967. It is a mixed bag, without any very coherent theme or focus. There is one report of field research, presenting evidence that not all black ghettos are alike. There are two essays concerned with the barriers to and the possibilities of social mobility for poor slum-dwellers. Two papers are concerned with significant trends in the practice of social welfare—the use of neighborhood organizations for the delivery of services and the growth of quasi-legal and legal representation in public assistance administration. Another is concerned with the need for comprehensive social and physical urban planning, rather than a varied collection of particular program plans, as a requisite for iniproving slum conditions. The final paper argues the case for a federal guarantee of minimum income. The introduction, by the editor, is the most general and wide-ranging of the papers, with a good many trenchant opinions about current social welfare problems.

Although there are interesting insights and ideas in many of the papers, a reader led by the title to expect something resembling a comprehensive presentation of a "social welfare" approach or viewpoint toward urban problems will probably be disappointed. The primary concern is with poverty and deprivation; only one of the papers (that by Meltzer and Whitley on social and physical planning) devotes much attention to relating these problems directly to any general urban context or system.

Even in the absence of a central theme or organization, several ideas implicit in all, or at least several, of the papers may be singled out. First, of course, is the general sense of crisis, of current failure, of need for important changes in policy and practice. Another is the clear feeling on the part of at least several of the authors that the provision of financial support for the poor should be separated from "social work" proper. Third is the apparent acceptance of the likelihood of positive effort on the part of the underprivileged themselves to change the existing situation, often through methods which will contravene or disrupt the efforts of those who think they are trying to help. Not only are such efforts—labeled variously "indigenous organization," "self-help," or "black power"—expected; encouragement and help for them, even with public funds, is suggested.

Every occupation develops special uses of words that are presumably meaningful among the initiates, though not so clear to "laymen." These papers include some examples. When an author talks of the need to remedy "cognitive deficiency in adults," I am not sure whether he means ignorance or stupidity; if the latter, it may not be easy to remedy. When another writes of the need to enlist large numbers of the poor in "people-helping" occupations, he is probably not thinking of jobs as garage mechanics or typists, though some people might well feel that such efforts belong within the category.

The varying approaches and arguments of these papers themselves constitute excellent evidence supporting the statement of the editor: "No major field of human activity in this country operates with less theoretical and scientific guidance than the field of social welfare" (p. 30). It is a professional field even more heavily laden than political science with sweeping value judgments and unproved assumptions about human behavior. One of the most encouraging things about this volume is the fact, clear in many of the papers, that the leaders of the profession recognize clearly that the profession itself, and the crucially important functions which it performs, are deeply troubled, and that major changes are in the cards.-YORK WILLBERN, Indiana University.

The Development of Political Attitudes in Children. By Robert D. Hess and Judith V. Torney. (Chicago: Aldine Publishing Co., 1967. Pp. 288. $9.75.)

Interested scholars have long awaited book length publication of findings from the large study of political socialization undertaken by Hess and Easton in the early 1960's. Apparently another book by Easton and Dennis will follow this one and will be written more to the concerns of political scientists. Meanwhile, the Hess and Torney book provides a good deal of useful information for scholars in the field as well as students and laymen.

The study is based on questionnaire evidence from 12,000 students drawn from eight cities in four regions of the United States and covers grades two through eight. The sample is biased in that it covers no rural schools, no parochial schools, and contains a disporportionate number of higher status children. The authors are frank about these shortcomings. On the other hand, a large sample of 12,000 enables one to have reasonable confidence in the results once one is aware of the biases. The study was competently executed methodologically and some clever ideas were employed in data gathering and analysis that students in the field should review for possible use before launching their own studies. Measurement of variables was not particularly elegant and the authors, appropriately, have not tried to push the data in statistical analysis. As a matter of fact, the analysis is rather simple and straightforward so that readers not sophisticated in statistical evaluation can readily grasp it.

Fundamentally the book is a developmental analysis; the title is closely accurate as to its contents and flavor. The authors posit four models for developmental processes (the accumulation model, interpersonal transfer model, identification model, and cognitive-developmental model) and suggest at various points in the book which model best fits their interpretation of the findings. Most of the book is devoted to presentation of findings and relatively little space is given to discussion of their implications. Political scientists will not be impressed with the quality of their analysis of politics; the book should be seen, rather, as a contribution to theories of child development. It seems to this writer that the book is inadequately organized; there is a good deal of redundancy from chapter to chapter. On the other hand, summaries appear at frequent intervals and are an aid to review and skimming. Another nice feature is the inclusion of quotations from interviews with children which provide the reader with the flavor of the way kids think about politics.

The reader who is familiar with the literature on political participation, voting behavior, and political socialization will find the great proportion of findings from this study confirming what he already knows from previous studies. For example, political participation and social participation are significantly correlated. More interesting are the findings unique to this study. For example, most adult studies have not been able to use IQ as a variable but it is available here. They find that children with high IQ are much more likely to feel efficacious politically; they become politicized much more thoroughly and speedily; and they have more reservations about government thus developing a need to try and influence it.

Some of the more global generalizations about development are of special interest as well. Political socialization is already well advanced by grade eight: party identification is established in many children and their knowledge of how government works and how they can relate to it is reasonably adequate. As grade level rises the following things happen: Their definition of "good citizen" increasingly emphasizes voting and keeping informed while helpfulness to others and obedience to laws declines. The tendency to see the President as personally responsive and benevolent declines. The tendency to equate parties with candidates declines and they more adequately distinguish the stands of the parties. The tendency of young children to prefer a political image of unity and lack of conflict declines in favor of more acceptance of party disagreement and political contention in general.

The authors conclude that the schools are the central socializing agent, their predominance over the family in teaching about politics is especially marked in low status homes. The family seems predominant only in socializing political party identification, probably because the schools shy away from partisanship. The authors are critical of the schools for emphasizing a norm of citizen duty to vote but not for citizens to be active in a partisan way or to join with others in group activity designed to influence government. The norm to support candidates rather than parties rises with grade level and is most marked among high IQ students. Children, even at grade eight, have difficulty grasping the meaning and role of pressure groups and seem unable to assess their influence. The schools are propagating a belief in individual access to power via the vote which the authors feel is unrealistic and will later be seen as false and disillusioning. They call for a thorough reassessment of the role and curriculum of the schools in political socialization.—LESTER W. MILBRATH, SUNY at Buffalo.

FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS AND COMPARATIVE POLITICS

The Politics of Accommodation: Pluralism and Democracy in the Netherlands. By Arend Lijphart. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968. Pp. 222. $5.75.)

This book will be welcomed as an important contribution to the scarce literature on the political system of the Netherlands as well as an interesting attempt to formulate amendments to pluralist theory. The way in which it integrates modern theory, survey data and historical data in a mosaic is in many respects admirable. It is based on a thorough knowledge of Dutch and other literature. It adds some new empirical data; and above all it gives evidence of an original and stimulating vision.

The author's starting-point is what he calls a paradox: on the one hand, the political system of the Netherlands is characterized by an extraordinary degree of social cleavage (deep religious and class divisions). On the other hand Holland is also one of the most notable examples of a successful democracy (pp. 1, 2). Lijphart tries to explain this paradox in terms of pluralist theory.

After an interesting analysis of several versions of the so-called crosscutting cleavage proposition, Lijphart starts from the conviction: "The Dutch case is prima facie contrary to the crosscutting cleavages proposition. Expressed in the jargon of the cited writers, Dutch politics is characterized by 'mutually reinforcing,' 'superimposed,' 'congruent' and 'parallel' rather than 'crosscutting' affiliations and organizational patterns: class and religious cleavages separate self-contained 'inclusive' groups with sharply defined 'political subcultures.' . . . But Dutch democracy is eminently stable and effective!" (p. 15).

I must confess that I do not fully agree with this starting-point. In the first place, the question arises as to the criteria by which a political system can be classified as one of "crosscutting" rather than "mutually reinforcing" cleavages. The answer on this question will, among other things, have to do with perceptions of the political relevance of the several cleavages. These perceptions in their turn will depend on perceptions of public policy, issues and objectives. Lijphart pays relatively little attention to the latter perceptions and I think this is one reason for a fundamental ambiguity in the book: on most pages the Dutch political system is seen as a system characterized by mutually reinforcing cleavages, but on other pages one can read for instance "that the basic cleavages in Dutch society-religion and class-do cut across each other at an almost perfectly straight angle" (p. 205, see also page 90 and 15, footnote 41).

Personally I think that the cleavages in the Netherlands are, generally speaking, more crosscutting than mutually reinforcing. What characterizes Dutch politics in this respect is that, on the one hand, there are Catholic and Protestant parties, each of which resembles the class composition of the population as a whole very closely, and on the other hand there are liberal and socialist parties, each of which is more homogeneous as far as class is concerned, but more heterogeneous as far as religion is concerned. The fact that not only several parties, but also labor unions, employers' associations, farmers' organizations, newspapers, radio and television organizations and schools are partly based on religious cleavages, does not take away the fundamental crosscutting of the two basic cleavages: religion and class.

This crosscutting is camouflaged in part by the way in which Lijphart repeatedly divides the Dutch population into a Catholic, a Secular and a Calvinist bloc. The Secular bloc comprises, according to Liphart: (a) those without religious affiliation, (b) the Dutch Reformed irregulars (members of the Duch Reformed Church who attend church less than once a week), (c) Catholic irregulars and (d) the 4% adherents of other religions than Catholic, Dutch Reformed or Reformed (p. 30). I think the terms "secular" and "bloc" are misleading if used for such a heterogeneous collection of categories. Still more confusion is created when the author identifies this religious "bloc" with two political blocs, for instance when he speaks of "the secular bloc (i.e. the Liberal plus the Socialist blocs)" (p. 30). How rough this identification is can be read from table 5 on page 31, which shows for instance that 6% of the adherents of the Labor Party belong to the Catholic regulars, whereas no less than 22% of the adherents of one of the protestant parties (the Christian Historical Union) belong to the Dutch Reformed irregulars.

It is a pity that Lijphart's national survey, conducted in November 1964, consisted apparently of only a few questions. This limited severely the possibility of testing one of the convictions with which the book opens, namely that "Social communication across class religious boundary lines is minimal" (p. 2, see also pp. 54-57). Especially with regard to the problem of crosscutting cleavages. I am sorry that the author did not have a look at Dutch survey data available on political opinions within several churches, which make clear that within the churches political progressives confront political conservatives. The book was apparently written too early to take into account most of the Dutch survey data of 1967, which prove that the author's premises about the "firm persistence of a stable, effective, and legitimate parliamentary demccracy, which has served the people well and which has by and large enjoyed their active support or acquiescence" (p. 2) are outdated. To mention only one thing: in 1967 no less than 64% of the Dutch voters agreed or strongly agreed with the statement: "The members of the second chamber do not enough take into consideration what the voters want." This is in clear contradiction to the remark that "the dilemma of whether an elected official should be a representative or a delegate is not a dilemma in Holland: Leaders lead: followers follow" (p. 158). The picture of Dutch politics that one gets from the book is in several respects more that of, say, 1948, than that of 1968.

To the heart of the book belongs the term accommodation, which is used "in the sense of settlement of divisive issues and conflicts where only a minimal consensus exists. Pragmatic solutions are forged for all problems, even those with clear religious-ideological overtones on which the opposing parties may appear irreconcilable, and which therefore may seem insoluble and likely to split the country apart" (p. 103). Some special characteristics of the pattern of the politics of accommodation are (1) the pre-eminent role of the top leaders, (2) the participation of the leaders of all blocs in the settlement and (3) the principle of proportionality in the substance of the settlement (p. 111). The chapter on the spirit of accommodation is, as most other chapters, excellent,

In a final chapter Lijphart argues that the Dutch case, which is according to him a deviant case, does not invalidate the basic pluralist thesis concerning the moderating effect of crosscutting cleavages and cross pressures, but rather suggests a number of amendments to it. The amendments that Lijphart proposes—for instance that overarching cooperation at the elite level can be a substitute for crosscutting affiliations at the mass level—are very much worth study.

However, I do not think the Dutch case is as deviant as Lijphart supposes. Whereas the author concludes that "the politics of accommodation fits perfectly within the context of (amended) pluralist theory as a genuinely alternative model to the model of pluralistic theory based on crosscutting cleavages" (p. 20), I think the Dutch politics of accommodation which Liphart analyzed so well is simply one particular case of pluralist democracy based on crosscutting cleavages. It must be added that there is a growing effort in the Netherlands to strengthen both the element of crosscutting affiliations and democracy. I hope professor Lijphart will enrich us in the future with a further analysis of Dutch politics in transition.—Andres Hooger-WERF, Free University, Amsterdam,

Party Democracy: Politics in an Italian Socialist Federation. By SAMUEL H. BARNES. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1967. Pp. 279, $7.50.)

This volume is an inquiry into the functioning of democracy in modern society by means of a study of the internal politics of the Arezzo Provincial Federation of the Italian Socialist Party. The theoretical point of departure is the line of inquiry begun by Robert Michels in his classic Political Parties and continued by Lipset, Trow and Coleman in Union Democracy; namely, the problematic relationship between complex organization and democracy.

For Barnes the strategic factor of democracy is the existence of multiple autonomous communication channels that tie together the diverse parts of a unit and permit the extensive exercise of influence. The chapters of the book consist of the variables that are presumed to facilitate or hinder the establishment and maintenance of such communication channels.

In addition to an insightful and concise review of Italian politics and a discussion of the development of the socialist party, the bulk of the volume is devoted to a comparative analysis of the attitudes of party leaders on the one hand and followers on the other. The data for this analysis is based on interviews with 58 of the 59 incumbents of formal leadership positions as well as 301 rank and file members. Particular chapters focus on levels of participation and political competence, socialization and recruitment patterns, primary and secondary group influences or membership behavior, the relevance of ideology, membership attitudes toward party politics, communications and party politics and finally, some speculations on democracy and the organization of political parties. These chapters demonstrate that party leaders and activists differ with the rank and file membership along a number of dimensions. The activists come from more middle class backgrounds than the non-activists and also tend to score higher on measures of political competence, political knowledge, efficacy, ideological sensitivity and mass media exposure.

One of the most interesting of these chapters is devoted to a consideration of various conceptions of party democracy held by the membership. Since members' expectations about party democracy in part determine the interpretations they place on the actions of the leaders, respondents were asked to choose one of the following conceptions of democracy: Classic-members are able to participate and influence the policies of the party; Neoliberal-members can choose among various leaders and policies; Marxian-when the party represents the true interests of the most numerous and needy class. The rank and file chose the Marxian conception of democracy in much greater proportions than those with opposite characteristics. And, as this conception emphasized democracy as a goal rather than as a process, the majority chose a view that said nothing about the importance of participation or choice on the part of the individual. This view of democracy as economic equality rather than participation in decision-making was partially offset by the active members, however, the majority of whom valued participation and choice as criteria of internal democracy. It is, consequently, not only skill and party position that encourage activists and leaders to support internal democracy: they are also the ones most ideologically committed to it.

Another central chapter is devoted to communications. There Barnes reports that the most severe limitation on anti-democratic tendencies within the party is the inability of the leadership to dominate all communication channels reaching the membership. He finds that the bulk of the non-participants are not deeply enmeshed in any communications network, whereas the activists are. The latter are not only the most attentive but also the least dependent on the party newspaper and are informed by a variety of media, including radio, television, nonparty newspapers, etc. They thus acquire wide perspectives on party affairs and cannot be deprived of independent, or at least divergent, interpretations of intraparty matters.

Now this inability of the leadership to control all the communication networks reaching the membership is seen by Barnes to be a major factor facilitating democracy. But the behavioral characteristics of the members provide a weak defense against anti-democratic tendencies; the majority simply do not possess the political competence to oppose the leadership. Moreover, there is little in the belief systems of the members that requires democracy. For most, democracy means more equality and more of everything: it is not a process but an end product. If nondemocratic means are more effective for achieving these ends, then they are quite acceptable to the membership.

But, paradoxically, when political competence is in short supply, its value as a commodity rises sharply and since the leaders recognize this and seek to coopt new talent, the party leadership remains an "open stratum." This cooptation process, the continuing factional disputes over party goals and the relatively independent sources of information, combine to facilitate the building of coalitions which bind together levels in order to aggregate the demands of subunits, filter them and translate them into policy alternatives.

The volume concludes with an intriguing discussion of the suitability of the PSI in achieving membership goals; that is, how can the lower social strata who possess low levels of political competence secure capable leadership? Barnes suggests that evaluations of left wing parties should not be based on classical notions of democracy as participation but should concentrate, instead, on the extent to which such organizations increase the numbers in the meaningful communication network. By this criterion the PSI meaningfully mobilizes segments of Italian society that would not otherwise be mobilized.

Overall the volume is imaginatively conceived, tightly argued and makes skillful use of a wide body of literature. But even with these positive qualities, the work does have shortcomings. Barnes emphasizes the point that his conception of democracy as multiple antonomous communication channels is in principle quantifiable, but he never proceeds beyond the definitional level to construct direct measures of communication channels and flows. Because of this limitation, the fundamental task of explaining variation in the dependent variable is rendered difficult. The reader is forced to infer that such channels exist from data on party structure and the behavioral and attitudinal characteristics of the leaders and rank and file members. The volume would have been considerably strengthened by a variety of sociometric data on interactions between leaders and followers as well as records of actual communication flows. Such additional data would give empirical grounding to the view of the party as a communications channel connecting politically relevant units which, in turn, could place cadre, mass, totalitarian and democratic parties within the same analytical framework.

Despite this criticism, there is much of this volume of genuine value for those concerned with the problem of democracy in political parties. Its greatest strength consists in the author's skillful integration of data on the characteristics of party leaders, activists and followers with information on the structural characteristics of the party. In this sense, Party Democracy is a contribution to the line of inquiry begun by Michels and continued by Lipset, Trow and Coleman.—Timothy M. Heinessey, Michigan State University.

L'Attivista di Partito. By Francesco Alberoni, Vittorio Capecchi, Agopik Manoukian, Franca Olivetti, and Antonio Tosi. (Bologna: Societa' Editrice Il Mulino, 1967. Pp. 616. L. 10.000.)

Most social scientists don't read Italian. That fact is probably the only obstacle to this book's becoming a classic in its field. It is a sensitive, theoretically-informed, and methodologically-sophisticated study of the background, beliefs, and behavior of Italian party activists. Fortunately, some of the more important sections of the research will soon be available in English, particularly in a forthcoming volume by Giorgio Galli and Alfonso Prandi, tentatively entitled Patterns of Political Participation in Italy. This latter work will present a summary of the results of a massive series of studies conducted by the Carlo Cattaneo Research Institute on many aspects of elite and mass political behavior in Italy; L'Attivista di Partito reports the findings of one of the studies in this larger research program.

"How is it that some people and not others at a certain moment feel themselves called [to] dedicate their lives to partisan political activity? What weight in their choice had and have the many factors which one can abstractly hypothesize: from childhood and adolescent experiences to family tradition, from social class position to crucial individual or collective experiences in the course of their lives and that of their community? How do they see and judge things: from the grand problems debated and codified in ideological terms to those of daily personal and family experience? What sort of lives do they lead and what weight does their role of activist have among their other roles—what compatibilities and incompatibilities are there? How do they participate in the community and how are they integrated in it and at the same time segregated from it? How do these things differ between the two great Italian parties and how have they changed over time from the period between the wars until today?" (p. 12) These are the questions which the authors of this study set themselves. Obviously, the issues involved are quite broad and have attracted the attention of numerous scholars, with results, however, more often theoretical and speculative than empirical.

The authors sensibly argue that survey research methods are not likely to reach the depths of personal faith and experience of interest to them. They use a technique of extended (6-7 hours), focussed, non-directive conversations with a sample of 108 Communist and Christian Democratic party activists, nine members of each party in each of six middle-sized communities, chosen to represent different regions, stages of socio-economic development, and types of party competition. The authors are understandably diffident about claiming statistical representativeness for their sample, but there seem to be no biases sufficiently striking to call into doubt the main findings. Transcripts of each interview were studied and impressionistically "scored" on the relevant dimensions by a panel of four of the researchers. The data were then subjected to a variety of statistical techniques, from simple 2 × 2 crossbreaks to factor analysis and causal modelling.

Any brief statement cannot adequately summarize the rich, diverse, and intricate conclusions of the research nor convey the fascination and insight provided by the extensive quotations. Three sets of findings seem to this reviewer particularly interesting and important.

One current interpretation of political activism, especially of the "ideological" kind found in Italy, and more especially of communism, traces it to social devience and psychological weakness. This interpretation comes off rather badly when applied to the findings of L'Attivista di Partito. Both Communist and Christian Democratic activists are well-integrated, well-adjusted members of their communities. Their political and ideological dispositions were formed in supportive family and community environments and their active involvement matured gradually in the context of work groups (particularly for the Communists) and religious and other associations (particularly for the Christian Democrats). By and large, these are men at peace with themselves and their immediate environment; the evidence suggests that the intensity of the Communists' commitment to their cause stems less from alienation from "the system" (important though that is) than from involvement in a traditional Communist sub-culture.

In a statistical sense, of course, these activists are "deviants" from the typical patterns of Italian mass political behavior. They are not Almond and Verba's apathetic "subjects." Nor are they, for the most part. Banfield's "amoral familists." On the whole, activists from both parties share some commitment to "ideological" tenets. (In this sense, their motivation is much more "principled" than, for example, Eldersveld's Detroit activists.) This important similarity apart, the Christian Democrats and the Communists differ significantly from each other in both sources and styles of participation. The Party occupies a much more central position in the life and loyalties of the Communist. His emotional commitment to the Party is based. as one respondent said, on "giustizia e fraternita'," on both moral conviction and intense comradeship. The involvement of the Christian Democrat, by contrast, is mediated through the Church and other non-party associations and based on relatively more concrete political concerns. The Communists' view of politics and society is, the authors find, more dichotomous and stereotyped than is that of the democristiani.

This last generalization, however, brings us to perhaps the most significant finding of the study: on nearly every dimension members of both parties are becoming markedly more open, pragmatic, and "democratic" (in the sense normally used in Western liberal democracies). Having interviewed party workers whose periods of maximum activity ranged from 1945-1950 to 1956-1963, the authors are able to provide evidence on the changing nature of party cadres in the post-war period. In both parties the intensity and dogmatism of political activity is declining, as is dichotomous, "black-white" thinking. Acceptance of intra-party differences and willingness to criticize party leaders are increasing among Communists. Fewer and fewer members of the PCI are wholly and unreconcilably opposed to the existing political system. More and more see "the democratic way to socialism" as not merely good tactics, but intrinsically right. Fewer now use the Soviet Union or any other "utopian" models in dealing with Italian social reality. Similarly, Christian Democratic activists are decreasingly "knee-jerk," intolerant anti-Communists, and increasingly they feel themselves independent of the directives of the Church hierarchy. This trend from an activism which is totalitarian, crusading, and antagonistic towards an activism which is more professionalized, rational, and conciliatory is of inestimable importance for Italian politics.

This reviewer's enthusiasm must be tempered by several weaknesses in the book's style, scope, and method. It is composed of separately-authored sections, individually competent, but badly integrated. The theoretical background of the study is brilliantly traced by Francesco Alberoni and Antonio Tosi in a comprehensive and insightful review of the European and American literature on parties, social movements, and political participation. Vittorio Capecchi's advanced statistical treatment of the data is skillful and in many ways innovative. (An English language version of his novel use of causal modelling in typology-construction is available in his "Linear Causal Models and Typologies," Quality and Quantity, vol. I, nos. 1-2 (Jan., 1967) pp. 116-152. This is a new European journal of methodology published by Marsilio Editori in Padova, Italy.) The theoretical and the statistical aspects of the work are, however, virtually independent, so that Capecchi's contributions tend to be essentially tours de force, illustrating methodological tricks, while Alberoni's and Tosi's theoretical questions go unanswered. A short concluding summary by Agopik Manoukian is helpful, but does not succeed in overcoming this gap.

This study like the others in the Carlo Cattaneo series restricts its attention to the two largest Italian parties on the assumption that the Italian system is essentially, as Giorgio Galli claims, "bipartitismo imperfetto," an imperfect two-party system. This reviewer remains unconvinced that one can comprehend Italian politics by looking at only these two parties. Samuel Barnes' recent study of Italian Socialist Party workers provides some of the missing information, but important lacunae remain.

The authors' use of unstructed interviews, disciplined by attempts at categorizing and counting, is the right road for studying political belief systems, but we need to be aware of the possible pitfalls. In particular, we need to consider the objectivity and reliability of the coding operation. The ideal would be "blind" coding, in which ratings of individual dimensions were uncontaminated by knowledge of the respondent's other characteristics. This is prohibitively expensive in most cases, but we must then take the correlations among various traits with some caution. How much of the "stereotyped thinking" of the Communist respondents, for example, was "read into" the interviews by the coders? (This problem also plays havor with the "uncorrelated error terms" assumption of causal modelling.) Minimally, we could have wished for some specification of inter-coder reliability, especially since many of the dimensions involved are quite vague (e.g., "stereotyped thinking" or "dichotomous thinking").

Even taking into account these weaknesses, however, L'Attivista di Partito is one of the most important contributions to comparative political science to appear in recent years.—ROBERT D. PUTNAM, University of Michigan.

Africa: The Politics of Unity. By IMMANUEL WALLERSTEIN. (New York: Random House. 1967. Pp. 274. $4.95.)

Federation in East Africa: Opportunities and Problems. Ed. by Colin Leys and Peter Robson. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1966. Pp. 244. $3.95.)

Professor Wallerstein's Africa: The Politics of Unity, written (as he himself puts it) as a sequel to his Africa: The Politics of Independence, proposes the thesis that the "movement for African unity . . . was, in fact, the most important indigenous political force on the African continent." (228) He examines the main thrust of this movement between 1957 and 1965, and suggests that it lay with an African "revolutionary core" composed of four separate but interlinked segments: (a) the "radical-nationalist states," including Ghana, Guinea, Mali, Tanzania, Congo (B), the U.A.R., and Algeria; (b) the All-African Trade Union Federation (AATUF), which Wallerstein characterizes as a "key popular organization in the avant-garde" of the movement; (c) the "radical opposition parties in independent states," such as the Sawaba of Niger, the Union des Populations du Cameroun (UPC), and the Union Nationale des Forces Populaires (UNFP) of Morocco; and finally (d) "certain liberation movements" from Portuguese Africa, Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, and the Republic of South Africa. The movement itself, according to Wallerstein, found its guiding principles in the goal of modernization through self-discipline and isolation. Isolation does not, of course, mean withdrawal from the world or a refusal to interact with other states; it is the symbol for resistance to neo-colonialism, that new stage of imperialism that seeks domination through means other than outright occupation: alliances, economic dependence, market and investment manipulation, control through the more subtle forms of political, economic, and even cultural conquest. Self-discipline, then, to the "revolutionary core," requires ideological and state structures appropriate to the defense of "isolation," forms that can effectively mobilize human and physical resources toward self-generating and self-sustaining modernization. The means require, therefore, among other things, a radicalization of the political atmosphere throughout Africa, and a commitment to organizational forms—on as wide a scale as possible—that further the aims of the movement.

The above summary does, I hope, as little violence as possible to what is a most carefully and well-developed argument. There is little question that Wallerstein's sympathies lie with the "movement"; he makes the case for it most persuasively, and it would not be impertinent to suggest that its proponents could read his arguments with considerable profit.

Wallerstein suggests that the movement has been impeded, if not stymied by the resistance on the part of various African governments, by those who see "unity as alliance" (Wallerstein's phrase). Concrete manifestations of this approach has been, among others, the creation of various regional and functional organizations. The creation of such organizations by French-speaking African states he interprets as moves to counter the insistent pressure and demands of the "revolutionary core." It is the reaction of the so-called moderates and conservatives. Wallerstein implies that the movement toward African unity is both desirable and perhaps inevitable; the African states, given the triumph of the "movement," will somehow find their way to both political union and political understanding. In the future, perhaps. For the present, I am not so sanguine.

One of the problems raised, and perhaps even caused by the "revolutionary core" of states is that their attempts to create a satisfactory climate for the success of the "movement" has been accompanied by support for various and sundry political organizations whose stated purpose it was to overthrow the governments of the states whence they came. It is no longer a secret that during the Nkrumah period Ghana was a base for many so-called "national liberation movements," that trained in Ghanaian camps for the violent overthrow of the governments of such countries as Niger, Senegal, Ivory Coast, and Cameroon. Such groups found ready support in Guinea, Mali, Algeria, Egypt, and Sudan, all of which governments at one time or another provided both sanctuary and logistical aid. It is irrelevant whether one approved or disapproved of these groups' aims; what is crucial is that the "movement to unity" was expressed, at least one aspect, by concrete attempts to undermine and overthrow other African regimes. The target regimes, it seems, were those with which the "revolutionary core" had the most deeply-felt ideological disagreements. It would be reasonable to suggest that the target governments felt threatened by the "revolutionary core," and that part of their reaction was to reject its leadership in the movement for unity. Regional and functional, organizations were perhaps one way of expressing their suspicion of the revolutionary message. What Wallerstein appears to have overlooked is that it was the tactics, perhaps as much as the ambiguous rhetoric, of the "revolutionary core" that contributed largely to the stultification of the drive to unity on the African continent.

Nor is it entirely clear that the "movement for unity" has been impeded by the more recent organizational and political developments on the continent. What is entirely clear is that whatever the choice of means by this or that state or group, "African unity" remains one of the most potent political symbols on the continent. No leader, no government (be it military or civilian) can afford to disregard its emotive force. The political education of most African leaders has included acceptance of the symbol, and "attentive" African political publics have made it part of the common political language. The current trend-despite "revolutionary core" rhetoric to the contrary—is toward cooperation along pragmatic lines devoted to the solution of common problems. It should, perhaps, be added that the example of political unification provided by the "revolutionary core" -the Ghana-Guinea-Mali union-hardly provided support for its theses. The UAS foundered, unhappily, on the rocks of national political expediency; save for some token moves, none of the partners were willing to commit the resources, political skills, or effort to make the so-called "federation" a reality. Perhaps the "revolutionary core" found the consequences of its rhetoric unpalatable.

The volume edited by Leys and Robson is a happy complement to Wallerstein's discussion. Though published in 1965 (most of the papers were written in 1963) it is immediately relevant to an understanding of the latest attempt at east African unification, the East African Economic Community, inaugurated on December 1, 1967.

The several papers include contributions by Arthur Hazelwood, who edited a volume on African case studies in economic and political union, and Joseph S. Nye, the author of an excellent book on the implications of east African integration. (Arthur Hazelwood (ed.) African Integration and Disintegration (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967); Joseph S. Nye, Panafricanism and East African Integration. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1966). A. H. Birch, Jane Banfield, Dharam Ghai, D. G. R. Belshaw, Tom Mboya, B. Van Arkadie, Peter Newman, S. A. de Smith, Yash Ghai, and the Editors complete the list of contributors. In particular point is the Editors' concluding chapter, which examines the two related questions of "what form of political union is best?" and "what are the prospects for political union?" Given what appears to be at least a temporary abandonment of the goal of East African political organization in favor of a functional union, the Editors' comments are in fact pertinent to the implicit goals of the new Community. The Editors and Contributors would, I venture to guess, endorse the new east African Economic Community as representing a step in the direction of creation the conditions that would favor the emergence of an East African Federation. As the Editors put it, "It appears that the real issue in East African is not so much the possibility of creating a federal government as of creating an East African political system." (189) The Editors, reflecting their own and their contributors' standpoints, suggest that "Federation" can be seen as one constitutional means of entering into the process of creating a common political system." (190) There is, consequently, no one form that is 'best,' but in fact a variety of possible forms of which federation appears as the most feasible, given the satisfaction of various preconditions discussed by the Contributors and Editors. The prospects for federal union would, therefore, be a function of the extent to which political and economic integration can in fact be achieved during the next few years. There are reasonable and not unexpected conclusions, but worth restating in the context of the excellent discussions found in the volume.

Most of the contributions deal with economic and legal matters, and one misses a fuller discussion of the political variable at which the Editors hint so tantalizingly. But that was not their "bag," and the book is not to be faulted for the omission. The book is, perhaps, most useful as a counterpoise to Wallerstein's volume; Wallerstein argues a "movement," something difficult to define and even more difficult to observe; the Leys and Robson volume considers the more concrete, and perhaps less exciting pragmatic realities on the road to African unity. Both are worth reading: both make useful contributions to the continuing discussion of Africa's political and economic future.—VICTOR T. LE VINE, Washington University (St. Louis).

The Politics of Exile: Paraguay's Febrerista Party.
By PAUL H. Lewis. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1968. Pp. 197. $6.00.)

Paraguay's febrerista movement derived its name from a short-lived regime which came to power in February, 1936, and was overthrown by an army coup the next year. Despite its modest governmental success, the regime symbolized an important break with traditional Paraguayan politics. As disparate as their ideological origins were, the febreristas were united by their dislike of weak, ineffective government, and their advocacy of an intensely nationalistic, interventionist regime committed to social and economic reform. The movement drew inspiration from the regime of José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia, Paraguay's first political leader and dictator, who ruled from independence until his death in 1840. Francia's regime was a precocious experiment in autarchy, international isolationism, and totalitarianism. He initiated a collectivised land system, with stateowned farms managed by the military and leased under a system of emphyteusis to peasants who worked them. The farms prospered, but attempts to make Paraguay self-sufficient met little success. Within the boundaries of Francia's will, the system evolved elements of social and economic egalitarianism. The febreristas romanticized the 19th century socialist experiment, but updated their ideology with more modern symbols and European influences. Like the apristas in Peru, the febreristas for all their borrowed symbolism were an indigenous product of their national history and culture.

After 1937 many febrerista leaders left Paraguay for neighboring Argentina and Uruguay. United by common ideological sympathies, hostility to post-1937 regimes, and a desire to return to power, the febreristas maintained an international organization and channels for communication. The persistent divisive and cohesive pressures within the movement form the basic theme of the present book.

Studies of Latin American political parties, not to mention Paraguayan politics, are rare, and this book is a necessary addition to the literature. Drawing upon secondary sources and interviews with exiled leaders, Lewis provides a useful political history of the febrerista movement. Particularly informative is the discussion of the factionalization and rivalries within the movement.

In view of the contribution the author makes. an apparent conceptual dilemma may be less important. The dilemma is whether to stress the historical particularism of the febreristas, or the more general theme of a "politics of exile." As an example of the latter, the febreristas may not be the most obvious case since their's is a politics "in and out of exile." A significant faction of the leadership remained in Paraguay, and participated in national elections. The present regime extended a general amnesty to the febreristas in 1964. As Lewis correctly observes, "... most of the exiles have left Paraguay voluntarily, and in many cases it is lack of work and a low standard of living rather than government action which influenced their decision." The author's evidence clearly reveals that the majority of febrerista leaders are by occupation lawyers-solicitors, doctors, economists -in other words, upper middle-class. Migration of middle-class, educated Paraguayans to Buenos Aires, Montevideo, and Northern Argentina for personal and economic reasons has never been an uncommon phenomena, and may partly explain their political hostility and affiliation with febrerismo.

The author's prefatory suggestion that the politics of exile is "abnormal politics" which "may help to clarify our concept of what is normal" and "lead to a clearer understanding of the functional prerequisites for the existence of legalized parties" hardly simplifies his conceptual framework. Since much of the analysis anticipates the actual period of exile, one wonders whether the author has inadvertently overstressed either the historical antecedents or, more probably, the concept of exile. The conclusions reached about the "difficulties and problems" of the febreristas in exile do not seem to justify the ambitious but ambiguous concept imposed on the analysis.

The conceptual conflict obscures the more vital internal analysis generated by the author's research. Despite assurances that exile has been accepted as "part of the rules of the game in Latin America," the author fails to relate his analysis to other instances in Latin America for comparison. Instead he draws analogies and theory from somewhat alien contexts. Eldersveld's analysis of North American parties (Political Parties: A Behavioral Analysis) seems an awkward model for comparison, no matter how one asserts that both are "party contexts." The resulting comparisons are neither surprising nor particularly revealing.

Despite these reservations, the book presents useful information unobtainable elsewhere, and on a more modest plane is an interesting case study of a Paraguayan political movement. On balance it must be considered an important addition to the literature on Latin American parties.—Ronald H. McDonald, Syracuse University.

Veto-Group Politics: The Case of Health-Insurance Reform in West Germany. By WILLIAM SAFRAN. (San Francisco: Chandler Publishing Company, 1967. Pp. 261. $5.00.)

In many areas of domestic policy, immobilisme characterizes German government as it once characterized the Fourth French Republic. Cabinet stability, the dominant personality of Adenauer, and then the huge parliamentary majority enjoyed by the Great Coalition have obscured the inability of successive German Governments to enact major social and economic reforms. Professor Safran's book illuminates this relatively unexplored theme of stalemate in German politics. It is a case study of legislative failure: the inability of the Adenauer Government, at the height of its power between 1957 and 1961, to obtain passage of a major reform of the system of public health insurance.

Safran explains the intricacies of statutory health insurance in Germany, which by 1960 covered 80 percent of the population and provided free medical care, drugs, and hospitalization, as well as compensation for wages and salaries lost due to illness. Administered by local "sickness funds," the system was financed by compulsory contributions from employers and employees. Demands for extension and equalization of benefits, government subsidies for the "funds," centralization of administration, and a differentiated scale of compensation for physicians according to services rendered, raised fundamental issues which the Government sought to resolve in an omnibus reform bill.

But the very comprehensiveness of the bill was its undoing. It called forth a wide range of conflicting public attitudes, mobilized by a great variety of interest groups. Safran describes the activity of the labor unions, employers' organizations, medical profession, and public health administration in impressive detail, with thorough references to the fugitive source material on these groups. He recounts the bargaining which took place through six years of bill drafting at the ministerial level, and relates the abandonment of the bill after fifteen months of deliberation in a parliamentary committee in which the Government enjoyed a clear majority.

The complexity of the issues which Safran describes, and the multiplicity of the contending groups whose tactics he traces, threaten at times to overwhelm the main lines of his analysis. In the introductory chapter, Safran identifies his chief variables: the formal framework of decision-making in German government, the traditional public attitudes toward health insurance, the established patterns of bargaining, and the aims, cohesion, and resources of the major groups. The data is not, however, presented in these analytical categories. There are successive descriptions of each of the main groups, and extensive stretches of chronological narrative describing the sequence of legislation. The facts are set out clearly, often with the aid of effective tables and diagrams, but only rarely are they used to demonstrate the relationships among the chief variables.

In his conclusion, Safran explains that each of the major groups was able to block the others, but none was able to prevail. Each was weakened by internal divisions, particularly between rank-andfile members and professional leaders who enjoyed institutionalized access to government. The decision-makers in the government, for their part, were unable to strike an effective bargain among the groups. The parliamentary parties could not arrive at coherent positions; the Minister of Labor was unable to justify his bill in terms of the traditionally accepted attitudes toward public health insurance; and the Chancellor operated at such a lofty level of authority that he never reached the members of his parliamentary majority whose support was critical.

The evidence on the interest groups is particularly solid. Their organization and objectives are well set out, and their negotiations at the ministerial and parliamentary committe levels are fully described. But ultimately the bill failed because of the inability of the majority party in Parliament to arrive at an agreed position. On this crucial phase of the legislative process, the author unfortunately offers insufficient information. Despite his excellent account of the treatment of the bill in committee, Safran fails to distinguish among parliamentary sub-systems. This leads him to associate himself with the view that Parliament, regarded as a collectivity, "was ill-prepared to assert itself as a decision maker" (p. 221). A more precise look at the performance of interest aggregation by the CDU/CSU, regarding it as a parliamentary sub-system, might have been more helpful in explaining the failure of the bill in Parliament.

There is some carelessness in the presentation. The names of organizations are not always translated consistently. The DGB is sometimes the German Federation of Trade Unions (p. 16) and sometimes the German Confederation (p. 19); the DII is the Institute of German Industry in the Glossary, but it is presumably the same as the Joint Committee of German Trade and Industry referred to in the text (p. 89); the BDI is both the Federal Association of German Industry (p. 46) and the Federation of German Industries (p. 88). Since the reader must keep many similarsounding organizations distinct, this inconsistency in rendering names in English adds to his difficulty. There are also some factual errors. The Ahlener program of the CDU was written in 1947 as a platform of the CDU in the British zone of occupation, not in 1949, and it cannot be regarded as the program of "a Christian Democratic government" (p. 67). Erich Peter Neumann was not yet a CDU Member of Parliament in 1958 when the public opinion institute of which he was a director made a study of workers' opinions on health insurance (p. 56). But these are minor shortcomings in a highly informative and generally reliable account.

More problematic is the author's occasional lack of detachment. Although he rightly emphasizes at the outset that "with their stress on objectivity and their acceptance of Hegel's definition of the state as reason incarnate," Germans "have tended to regard interest groups with suspicion" (p. 5), Safran himself employs the concept of "objectivity" normatively. He finds parliamentary committees capable of "an objective examination" of bills (p. 170), asserts that civil servants should have drafted the bill "according to the objective necessities" (pp. 218-219), and concludes that "the parliamentarians had failed to protect the government officials—the only group capable of making convincing (if not always totally objective) technical decisions—against the interest groups" (p. 221).

The book was apparently completed in 1964, although a postscript traces events in German health insurance policy through 1966. But since the case of health insurance legislation is only the instrument for illustrating interest group behavior in Germany, it is regrettable that the author has not taken account of the important literature in this field which has appeared in the last several years, notably Gerard Braunthal's study of The Federation of German Industry in Politics.

If case studies are to contribute incrementally to political science, they must be done within a common theoretical framework, and they must relate their findings to each other. Although Safran refers to the works of Eckstein, Finer, Key, LaPalombara, and Truman, he largely leaves it to the reader to determine the significance of his findings for interest group theory generally. But there is no doubt that his book possesses such significance. It is a valuable addition to our understanding of interest group behavior, and of the role of interest groups in blocking policy change in postwar Germany.—Gerhard Loewenberg, Mount Holyoke College.

The Japanese Imperial Institution in the Tokugawa Period. By Herschel Webb. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1968, Pp. 296. $8.50.)

Prof. Webb has written a useful book on the imperial institution in Tokugawa Japan. The study basically deals with three aspects of the Japanese imperial institution: its origin and development up to the year 1600, its major institutional characteristics during the 1600-1867 (or Tokugawa) period, and political theories re-evaluating the imperial institution in this period along with major political events leading up to the Meiji Restoration of 1868.

After introducing the Shinto mythology in which the emperor is considered a direct descendant of the principal deity, the Sun Goddess, the book discusses the early clan system in which various households competed for secular power under the emperor, and the Taika Reform of 645 AD which indisputably established the imperial family's political primacy. The book also explains the compilation of the Taihō ritsuryō code in 701 AD. which not only formalized those governmental institutions which had already evolved in Japan but also created many new institutions imitating those of more advanced Sui and T'ang China.

However, the standardization of the governmental structure hardly prevented its modifications or the creation of additional apparatuses. Despite the fact that in theory the ritsuryō system continued to exist up until the Meiji Restoration, the apex of this system, the emperor, was generally divorced from political power for most of this period, and as power shifted from one group to another, legal and extra-legal arrangements were improvised to authenticate the change that had already taken place.

In the ninth century, for instance, the rise of the Fujiwara family inevitably led to a modification of the system, primarily resulting in the upgrading of the Regent (Sesshō) and the Civil Dictator (Kampaku) to positions of prime political importance. In the eleventh century, as power was briefly returned to the imperial family, the Ex-Sovereign's Private Secretariat (In-no-kurōdodokoro) was converted more or less into a central government itself; and in the twelfth century, the supremacy of the samurai led to the elevation of their Commander-in-Chief for Barbarian Subjugation (Sei-i-Taishōgun) to the secular ruler of Japan and to the establishment of the feudal system which was to prevail for most of the following seven hundred years. Although it is true that during this period the emperor's symbolic status was never really challenged, his political power continued to dwindle, and the imperial institution reached its lowest point in the Tokugawa period.

The book then turns to a discussion of the imperial institution's major characteristics as it obscurely existed during the Tokugawa period. After describing the outline of the imperial palace compound and its major buildings, some of which still remain in Kyoto today, the book presents a brief profile of each of the emperors who reigned during this period and elaborates on the rules governing the imperial family and the methods by which a successor to the throne was chosen and installed. The book also reviews the court nobility and the grade system by which they were stratified, explains court activities including traditional arts and disciplines, rituals and ceremonies, the wealth and income by which the imperial institution was supported, and describes the Shogunal Deputy (Shoshidai) who officially represented the Shogun in the court and also kept close surveillance over political and other activities in and around the court.

Finally Prof. Webb surveys Tokugawa political theories on the imperial institution and some of the political events immediately preceding the Meiji Restoration. One of the major intellectual currents in this period was that of classical studies, which revived scholarly interest in Shintoism and consequently stressed the political role of the imperial institution. Two others, the Hayashi school and the Mito school, were those of Confucianism. Although both of them belonged to the orthodox Chu Hsi branch of Confucianism, the former was the official doctrine at the government academy and remained faithful to the Tokugawa regime. The latter, however, stressed historical studies—especially those clarifying the theoretical basis of the imperial institution—and did much to discredit the rationale of the Tokugawa hegemony. In addition, there were a number of individual scholars such as Yoshida Shōin who not only provided intellectual bases for the Restoration but also trained many of the Restoration and early Meiji leaders.

Against the background of such intellectual development there was a growing recognition that the Tokugawa government was no longer capable of dealing with mounting domestic and external difficulties. On the one hand, the development of the money economy undercut the economic foundation of the feudal rule, and as the Tokugawa failed to defeat one of its subordinate lords, its political authority over other feudal lords declined rapidly. On the other hand, the arrival of Commodore Perry and America's demand to open the country diametrically challenged the Tokukawa seclusion policy, which was the then cornerstone of Japan's foreign policy, and furthermore it was painfully obvious for the Tokugawa that there was no choice but to acquiesce to the American demand. Apparently this is the most important part of the book, and Prof. Webb presents a brilliant account of both the intellectual development and the political chronology-especially those of the Mito school and the Mito domain-of the period immediately preceding the Meiji Restoration.

There is little question that the imperial institution is one of the major topics in the study of Japanese political history. Yet for one reason or another this has been largely ignored by native as well as foreign scholars. Prof. Webb must be congratulated for his contribution in filling much of this important gap in our knowledge. Also the book is highly readable. Despite the fact that the book provides a host of facts and details, its presentation is remarkably lucid, and its coverage admirably objective. In many ways, this seems to represent one of the finest studies carried along the lines of the "institutional" approach in history.

Nevertheless, it is also true that many questions are yet to be answered. One of these is the evaluation of the exact role of the imperial institution in the Japanese political process. Traditionally, two extreme interpretations prevailed. On the one hand, political theorists tended to attribute every political force to the emperor, but on the other hand, historians tended to minimize or ignore the political role of the institution. Although it is admittedly difficult to be precise in a measurement of this sort, it seems probable that the truth lies somewhere between these two extremes. Also a key seems to be a distinction between the emperor and the imperial institution. Thus, even if one readily rejects the proposition that the emperor influenced the making of specific political decisions (although it appears that there were a few rare exceptions to this), one may find it difficult to deny some generalized political role for the imperial institution.

The Meiji Restoration itself is a case in point. Although it is true that the feudal political system rapidly deteriorated, the Tokugawa government nevertheless commanded large well-equipped armed forces and could have opted for a course which would have plunged Japan into a civil war of an extended duration. Instead, the feudal regime capitulated practically without any bloodshed. Is it likely that without the imperial institution and its symbolic status, the transition would have been as dramatic as it in fact was? How about the series of reforms following the Restoration by which samurai themselves quickly dismantled the very system of which they were part and began building a new Japan? Is it probable that Japan could have maintained both a rapid rate of change and a stable political orderwhich are some of the keys in modernizationwithout its superstructure of the imperial institution? Questions such as these are clearly beyond the scope of The Japanese Imperial Institution in the Tokugawa Period, which is by and large descriptive in nature, but the book provides a significant step toward a dynamic and functional analysis of the Japanese imperial institution.—AKIRA KUBOTA, University of Michigan.

Political Institutions and Social Change in Continental Europe in the Nineteenth Century. By EUGENE N. ANDERSON AND PAULINE R. ANDERSON. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967. Pp. 451. $10.00.)

Social scientists have turned increasingly to history as a source of study in the last few years. The nineteenth century especially is a good one for hypothesis testing in the theories of political and social change. The application of new methodologies and new perspectives gained from current research to studies of rapid change in historical context holds promise for enhancing our understanding of conditions in the contemporary world.

Political Institutions and Social Change in Continental Europe in the Nineteenth Century proceeds, however, not from the interest of "a political scientist with a penchant for history" but from that of "a social historian interested in perceiving how change in governmental and political institutions affects and expresses social change." This appears to mean that hypotheses and explicit theory have been abandoned in order to let the facts speak for themselves. Indeed in a few chapters one has the impression of reading essentially unordered note cards from a file. The notes do contain an impressive amount of information gathered painstakingly from a wide range of English, German and French sources although heavy reliance is placed on the views of contemporary thinkers rather than upon an independent assessment of the institutions themselves.

Under such headings as central government, local government, intermediate government, bureaugracy, civil rights, suffrage, political parties and representation, the authors describe the institutions of government in France, Prussia, Austria, Russia, Hungary, Spain and Italy at various times during the nineteenth century. These descriptions are not of the dry formal structure of written constitutions but are of the living procedures and mechanisms of political life. The authors' interest is in the interplay of political forces and their focus is upon the legitimate structures of government which contain and support this interplay. They stress the "close relationship between governmental institutions and practices and social structure" although in a self-imposed limitation only one chapter of eleven is devoted to social composition of the population. Moreover, the close causal relationship between institutional charge and "cultural advance"-which seems to consist of "the emergence of individualism, social mobility and means of political education"-is not hypothesized but assumed. Exactly why or how or even whether cultural advance brings about institutional change is left to the reader's imagination.

The cascade of facts first about Prussia, then France, now Russia, first in 1801, then 1906, now 1870 leaves one with the impression that nineteenth century Europe was somehow homogeneous over time and space. To be sure, there are isolated comparisons of one country and another and there are references to changes in institutions but these are not gathered into an intellectual framework that makes sense of the ferment characteristic of European institutions between the Napoleonic Wars and the First World War. The authors share the view that the movement from absolute monarchy towards democracy was in fact political development or growth. They might, therefore, have sought patterns of political development within countries and compared these to examine the extent of a common pattern. In many ways, the experience of the British was repeated by the French and later by the Prussians and Austrians and finally by the Russians only to be cut short by the revolutions of 1917. In many other ways, of course, the polities were unique. One suspects that the authors think in terms of patterns since every so often they insert such phrases as "the normal practices of an absolutistic government in the first stage of acquiescence in the existence of elections and representative assemblies," but to explicit comparisons they do not commit themselves.

If hypotheses are avoided, causality is not. Longer life expectancy is credited with increased interest in politics. If public services could prolong life, people would demand participation in political affairs to gain these services. Censorship caused public mistrust of all published materials since no one could know whether the work expressed an author's view or only those agreeable to an official. These and several other bald assertions would be worthy of testing.

It is unfortunate that the authors content themselves with these assertions and leave the facts to speak for themselves. The facts refuse to do so, but there is just enough in the book to indicate that the authors could be very good advocates.—Charles Lewis Taylor, Yale University.

The French Parliament: Politics in the Fifth Republic. By Philip M. Williams. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1968. Pp. 136.)

In his latest book, Philip Williams ably contrasts the first and second parliaments of the Fifth Republic to show the evolution of constitutional and political conditions and practice. He uses a number of sound, recent French secondary sources to good advantage. He relieves the necessarily lengthy descriptions of the legal framework and operations under it with many pertinent and pungent quotations and observations. This is a short and thoughtful study, essentially limited to the effects of "constitutional engineering" and concentrates on Parliament.

The constitution of the Fifth Republic established a rationalized parliament with limited powers. From its former status as one of the world's most powerful, the legislature was reduced to subservience to a strong Presidnet, who was not even responsible to it. Indeed the founders of the new regime overreacted to the dangers of a strong legislature and resisted making concessions to parliamentary power and prestige, even though the Assembly had majorities loyal to the Government.

In the first parliament the UNR and the old style conservative parties that had won were strongly Gaullist and much of their leadership was most articulate in support of "Algérie française." It soon became evident that their election was due to their support of deGaulle and not of French Algeria. As Algerian policy shifted in a liberal direction, the Government, loyally supported by the UNR, faced a right-wing opposition much stronger in the Assembly than in the country as a whole and a left-wing opposition underrepresented among the deputies and unwilling to increase parliamentary power for fear it might undermine an Algerian settlement. The first parliament operated in a crisis atmosphere. Algerian policy was administered by deGaulle and the parliament simmered. Many still believed then that the parliamentary aspect of the new constitution would normally prevail over its presidential aspects. This was the period when much was being written of the President's role as an umpire (arbitre). The coup de grace to this concept was administered with the replacement of Debré by Pompidou and the direct election of the President.

The parliamentary elections in 1962 resulted in heavy gains for the UNR and in the decimation of the Right, which lost half of its votes and three quarters of its seats. The Left, while losing votes, won sixty more seats through disciplined second ballot alliances.

By the autumn of 1965 the old opposition parties were in disarray and could not muster a coherent alternative government. The failure of de-Gaulle to be elected in the first round of the presidential elections gave them new heart and sharpened their efforts to federate and cooperate and to work for victory in the next election. While they did not win control of the third parliament in 1967, the gained a further 40 seats and forced the Gaullists to lose seats, even though they made impressive voting gains.

Under the new constitution the Government controlled the parliamentary timetable and could get its business through in reasonable time and the form it desired, for committees could no longer mutilate a bill. In practice the ministers have tended to use their wide discretion in the control of the parliamentary timetable almost as ineptly as had the deputies previously.

Williams cites René Pleven's bitter complaint in 1963 of "empty trough periods followed by weeks of overwork." He suggests that the oral question day on Fridays, conceived by Debré as an effective means to criticize the Government, has not matched expectations. Both opposition and majority members have tended to air only minor constituency grievances, and absenteeism has proved very heavy. Most deputies prefer to "cultivate" their municipal and regional responsibilities.

While, under the first parliament, opposition members had as good a chance as the majority members of seeing their proposals debated and even adopted by the Government, it is suggested that in the second parliament the Cabinet tended to favor the bills introduced by the majority.

Bills are still seriously examined in the committee stage, according to Williams, but the importance of committees has been sharply reduced. No longer can a committee emasculate or reshape a bill. Committees are larger and less cohesive. In practice, however, absenteeism has lead to the attendance of only those members interested in the bill to be discussed and, in this way, unexpectedly has enhanced committee effectiveness.

The Government now employs a useful procedural weapon, the "blocked vote," to be taken on a whole bill. This obliges members to pronounce on a given clause or amendment in the context of the bill as a whole. In his Chapter 4, "Streamlined Legislation," Williams interestingly relates how this procedure tends to penalize the moderates and not the extremists, whose destructive criticism could be beaten off without it. He cites André Colin, chairman of the MRP senators in 1963, deploring Article 44 as "introducing between Government and Parliament the methods and style of the referendum."

The vote of confidence procedure which passes the Assembly automatically, unless a motion of censure is carried, is a drastic weapon which, in combination with conference machinery (Senate-Assembly), can pass into law a bill for which neither house has voted.

In addition, the more publicized weapons employed by the President, by which legislation can acquire legal force without going through Parliament, are the emergency powers under Article 16 and the famous referendum procedure under Article 11.

In spite of this array of procedures reducing the area of legislative self-determination, Mr. Williams says that Parliament, in essence, now has even a better chance to work more effectively in the broad sphere in which it is still competent.

In his opinion, budget debates still provide the most useful occasions for questioning and scrutinizing the Government policies. In the first parliament, with its right-wing majority and predisposition to industry and commerce, half of the amendments and two-thirds of those proposed by the rapporteur general were passed and even the Communists managed to have 28 percent of their amendments accepted.

The second parliament was apparently no less effective, but its pressure was more discreetly exercised behind the scenes. The heavy UNR gains and the increase in the number of ministers chosen from Parliament brought the UNR backbencher to greater prominence. The UNR subject groups have facilitated ministerial consultations within the party in advance of legislation.

The Government is criticized by many for its over emphasis on speedily passing the budget and in the usurpation of the limited debating time available by its majority members, and for abusing the use of the rider on budget measures.

In his overview of the system, Williams suggests that France today has a political executive and an administration strongly autonomous in decision-making. There is an overconcentration of policy-making at the Elysée. Few ministers have been backbenchers and fewer have attained office through their parliamentary performance. The Cabinet does not have to represent the leaders and factions of the parliamentary majority and the various opposition parties are deeply divided among themselves. Pompidou is apparently willing to play a subordinate role as long as deGaulle is President, but a dual-headed executive still poses problems, for the system can only work if the President and the Premier agree.

Recent events confirm Williams' observations. Parliament is not an effective forum for popular grievances, or an effective check on administration, or a meaningful political sounding board for the opposition.

The author, in his last chapter, lightly but thoughtfully touches upon the changing social bases, forces and attitudes, and the impact of economic modernization, which, in essence, have a greater bearing on the new France than does a rationalized parliament. The old parties and ideological conflicts seem hopelessly outmoded and the younger voters, now more numerous than ever and ranging across the political spectrum, respond far less than their elders to historical memories and show far more interest and eagerness for specific reforms and in better living conditions.

At this moment French institutional arrangements are fluid. France has undergone a phase of strong executive leadership which, too, has been found lacking. It is doubtful if it has offered more than the preceding strong legislative phase in integrating interests and legitimizing policy decisions.—Henry C. Galant, Skidmore College.

A Short History of Chinese Communism. By Franklin W. Houn. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentize-Hall, 1967. Pp. 237. $2.45.)

The author of this modest book maintains that he is neither a critic nor an apologist for the Chinese Communists but simply a describer and interpreter of their actions. It is to his credit that he achieves a high degree of objectivity and avoids the moralism which infects so many popular works on China.

While the book could not be accused of being an important contribution to the field of Chinese studies, it does offer a reasonably thorough and comprehensive introduction to the history of the Chinese Communist movement (chapters 1-5) and the Chinese Communist regime (chapters 6-13). As such the book is one of a small number of works appropriate for undergraduate courses on modern China.

Perhaps the most distinctive characteristic of this valuable survey is that the author relies heavily on primary sources except in his chapters on the development of the Chinese Communist revolutionary movement. While his erudite commentary certainly reflects the author's familiarity with major secondary works, this survey would have been strengthened if the author had introduced his reader to the contrasting interpretations and insights of other China specialists. A reader without an extensive background in Chinese studies must rely on Houn's synthesis of conflicting interpretations. For instance, Houn fails to alert his reader to the fact that Professors Cohen and Schram offer interpretations of Mao Tse-tung's thought which are far from identical. While Houn's approach holds the footnotes to a minimum, there is something to be said for introducing students to the pluralism of China scholarship. A good textbook ought to reflect the insights of recent scholarship and not merely describe the latest episodes and crises.

The book also seems to place more emphasis on description than on analysis and interpretation. While this is consistent with the author's desire for impartiality, it does not allow him to stimulate his prospective readers to seek out the "whys" behind events. Moreover, literal description can indeed become misleading especially when one writes of Communist China, For instance, Houn generally seeks to explain the events of the great cultural revolution in terms of the same "conspiracy theory" that Mao himself used to discredit his former colleagues. Houn observes (p. 98) that Liu Shao-ch'i's "infidelities to Mao and his 'revolutionary line' must have most disturbing to Mao and his followers." (See also pages 119 and 126.) Can we in fact rely on Maoist accusations to provide a truthful picture of the actions of P'eng Chen or Liu Shao-ch'i? At best these accusations can only be a starting point for analysis.

The least descriptive and probably the most interesting chapter in this book deals with China's foreign policy. Houn suggests that the Party's major goals are to safeguard the territorial integrity and political independence of the Chinese nation. Houn seems to reject, as well he might, the official American interpretation of Communist China as a yellowish red peril about to engulf Asia and the world. He sees China as a relatively weak nation, conscious of the limits upon its capabilities and seeking to maintain its independence and heighten its prestige in a hostile world.

Outside of the chapter on foreign policy, this is the kind of book which will elicit little emotion from the reader while providing him with a wealth of information. When the author occasionally paraphrases NCNA dispatches too closely (as on p. 193) the book becomes very dull, but the reader's interest and attention is sustained by the author's facility for introducing most paragraphs with an incisive topical sentence. Despite its weaknesses, this is the kind of book that might well be assigned to students beginning their study of modern China.—Dennis M. Ray, California State College at Los Angeles.

Breakthrough in Burma: Memoirs of a Revolution, 1939-1946. By Ba Maw. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1968. Pp. 460, $8.75.) Burma From Kingdom to Republic: A Historical and Political Analysis. By Frank N. Trager. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1966. Pp. 455. $10.00.)

Burma Through Alien Eyes. By Helen G. Trager. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1966. Pp. 239. $6.50.)

Helen Trager's book is entitled Burma Through Alien Eyes, but all three books under review display different ways in which a single country can be assessed dependent upon the observers own perspective. Mrs. Trager (part of the husband-wife team) provides us with the views of missionaries serving in Burma during the 19th century. This fascinating little book portrays the often ill-informed, iaundiced and despairing, yet committed and self-sacrificing views of those seeking to convert a people less than anxious to "see the light." It beautifully displays how these deeply motivated individuals were often inhibited by their own cultural socialization to the point where they could not really understand those whom they are asking to make perhaps the most fundamental change in their lives. Professor Frank Trager's political history of Burma shows a major effort to understand the forces which have influenced Burmese political actions and in several chapters has provided penetrating insights into factors responsible for both domestic and foreign policy decisions made by various political actors. However, even he finds himself too heavily dependent upon European sources, particularly in his description of pre-independence history. Finally, the memoirs of Dr. Ba Maw give us quite a different perspective as that wartime ruler of Burma attempts to explain Burmese nationalist attitudes and his role in the immediate prewar and wartime period. Here we get the views of an extremely articulate, highly political Burmese with strong feelings on western wrongs (including American and British academics), Burmese political personalities and the Japanese occupation. All three books enhance our understanding of both one another and Burmese history. An effort will be made here to concentrate on the contributions of Frank Trager and Dr. Ba Maw. These two authors provide interesting points of contrast on the periods which they mutually cover. Particularly with regard to political personalities, Trager reflects the more standard assessments of individuals such as Aung San while Ba Maw provides fascinating if highly personal sketches. While Trager's book is well documented with western and Burmese source material, Ba Maw presents his own recollections only using western sources as a take-off point for his own views. It is regrettable that both men are weakest in describing the pre-1940 period, Trager primarily relying on traditional western sources and Ba Maw inexplicably passing over all too lightly events in which he was deeply involved, such as the trial of Saya San and his own premiership.

Professor Trager's book is divided into three sections although its two primary divisions are between the first two sections which are given over to the political history of Burma and a third which reviews Burma's foreign policy. If at times the book tends to be too descriptive as in the chapters dealing with pre-independence period and on the relations of Burma with her neighbors, other sections provide us with very challenging and interesting analytic passages, most particularly those assessing the early insurrections, the beginnings of Burmese foreign policy and United States-Burmese relations. Of particular interest is his position that "Burma did not begin as a neutralist nation, she became one," (228) arguing that neutralism was not necessarily a first choice. Finally, it is regrettable that the manuscript was finished in 1965 and does not sufficiently take into account the severe economic difficulties of General Ne Win's regime and later Sino-Burmese tensions. The treatment of the post 1962 coup era at times provides a more optimistic picture than even General Ne Win has been prepared to present. The book is complemented by almost 80 pages of bibliographical notes which will be extremely useful to the specialist in the field.

Dr. Ba Maw's memoirs are primarily concerned with the war years and are an attempt to present that period in the perspective of Burmese nationalism and Dr. Ba Maw-at times it is difficult to assess when the one begins and the other leaves off. Be that as it may, this is the only personal rendition of the war years by one of the wartime leaders such as Sukarno and Aurel who were termed "puppets" by the allies and "patriots" by their following. As such it gives characterizations of the Japanese military and civil leaders far less sweeping than those too often appearing in western history and paeans of praise for fellow wartime cooperators with the Japanese such as Subhas Chandra Bose. As a primarily personal account of characters and events these memoirs need to be read with care, but as a highly articulate apologia for the wartime nationalists it is both fascinating reading and necessary source material. In writing his memoirs Dr. Ba Maw presents personal assessments of individuals active in the nationalist cause and strong indictments of western authors who he feels have maligned him in his wartime activities, particularly John Cady, who he characterizes as "typical of wartime mentality" (367). Those who have had the opportunity of discussing the wartime era with Ba Maw know how strongly he feels about the manner in which his rule has been characterized and this attitude is strenuously presented in a number of pages. Aside from some of his personal views of history Ba Maw himself can be criticized for too often entering into generalities which may give the flavor of nationalist views but are reminiscent of campaign speeches. Yet, one would wish that other wartime leaders, and particularly Sukarno, could provide us with his own views of this period, for like Ba Maw, Sukarno was politician, nationalist, cooperator in the Greater East Asian Prosperity Sphere and a most eloquent spokesman for his beliefs. The volume also includes a useful chronology and a Who's who.

As a three dimensional view of Burma's history these three books add to our all too superficial knowledge of intercultural relations in general and the Burmese political and cultural system in particular.—Fred R. von der Mehden, Rice University.

Régime Interne et Politique Extérieure dans les Pays d'Asie. By Georges Fischer and others. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin, 1966. Pp. 295.)

This volume is composed of five essays, more or less related, focusing on the theme of the influence of environment on foreign policy in the new states of Asia. Chapter 1 ("Etude géneralé"), constituting almost one-third of the book, by Georges Fischer, Director of the Centre Nationale de la Recherche Scientifique, was written especially for this volume and draws both on the work of the other authors and most of the basic scholarly studies in English and French. The remaining four chapters are in the nature of case studies, which were originally presented at a colloquium of the Centre d'étude des relations internationale in late 1963. Of these, Fistié's first essay, "The New States of South and Southwest Asia," is a rather superficial series of case-study summaries dealing with India, Pakistan, Burma, Cambodia, Laos, Malaysia, Indonesia, and the Philippines (only Malaysia is treated in any real depth, and even this must be rather hurried). Fistié's "Thailand" (Chap. 3) is more detailed and useful but it suffers from an overemphasis on the Phibun regime. Bernard Fall's "Les deux Vietnam" (Chap. 4), which is not a rehash of his famous book despite the unfortunate choice of title, provides a good summary of the development of the two foreign policies, though the essay itself departs considerably from the intended thrust of the colloquium. Finally, Claude Cadart's very brief "Note on China from 1949 to 1954" is interesting but seems curiously out of place in a collection that deals almost exclusively with the former colonies of South and Southeast Asia.

The goal of the colloquium, to examine the domestic factors affecting the policy-making process, was an admirable one, given the fact that foreign policy studies have too often ignored this side of the coin. However, it must be noted that, as usually happens when several scholars are brought together in a symposium, very seldom do the various authors feel restricted by the ground rules. Moreover, even in Fischer's introduction, which adheres most closely to the guidelines, one can quibble with several aspects of the study. First, despite his criticisms of a number of scholarly attempts to create more systematic comparative frameworks, his own threefold classification of regimes based on the degree of disruption of traditional social and economic institutions (from China and North Vietnam to Malaysia, Pakistan, and Thailand) adds little to existing theory or to his own essay. Secondly, not all will agree with the weight he assigns to the various domestic factors considered here. To treat history in five pages and dismiss geography in one paragraph while discoursing at such length (30 pages) on the economy and class structure may fit into his own framework but it strikes this reviewer as something of an imbalance.

Despite these and other reservations, this volume has performed a useful service in providing a compendium of valuable information and in calling our attention again to the need to consider the nexus between foreign and domestic politics in all states, Asian and Western, old and new.—ROBERT O. TILMAN, Yale University.

Influencing Voters: A Study of Campaign Rationality. By RICHARD ROSE. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1967. Pp. 288. $5.95.)

Compared to the wealth of information concerning other factors which influence voting behavior, political scientists know little about how the campaign affects the vote, or in fact whether it influences the vote at all. Unfortunately Influencing Voters: A Study of Campaign Rationality does not address itself to this gap in our knowledge. Instead the author, Richard Rose, evaluates the rationality of campaign advertising in recent British elections by the three political parties and by industrial associations and firms opposed to nationalization.

Campaign advertising is broken into categories of activities according to a "paradigm" which parallels Lasswell's communications categories, "Who says What in Which Channel to Whom with What Effect," except for the last category. Simply stated, Rose's outline follows "clients" (politicians, etc.) who engage "media men" to prepare advertising copy, etc. to influence various "audiences" (categories of voters). All this takes place within an "environment" (the "givens" of the campaign situation). If the activities connecting these categories are carried out so as to maximize the vote, then they are evaluated as being rational. Rose's conclusion is "... the rational, vote-maximizing politician, acting with consistency and empirical justification in pursuit of a single electoral goal, is a myth. Campaigners are only imperfectly and intermittently rational." (p. 195).

The book is divided into two major sections. The first section is preceded by an introductory chapter which contains a brief history of campaigning in Britain and the "model." The historical discussion includes an interesting analysis of "political lag" between the development of campaign technology, like the use of surveys, and the willingness of British politicians to fully utilize it.

The first section of the body of the book consists of five chapters devoted to case studies of campaigns waged by various groups in recent elections. Through interviews with many of the activists involved in campaign decisions. Rose retraces the steps taken in these propaganda efforts. He seems unable to rise above a traditional hallmark of the case study in these chapters—excessive detail. The identification of the personnae of the drama will seem especially beside the point to American readers. For example, on pages 38 and 89 we learn that in 1959 and 1962 the following individuals were appointed to publicity positions in the Liberal party, Frank Byers, Rev. Timothy Beaumont, "a publisher," Dominic LeFoe, and "Following the retirement of Miss Phyllis Preston, Pratap Chitnis was named press officer." Of these only Dominic LeFoe, and to a lesser extent, Pratap Chitnis figure importantly in the concerns of the book.

The second section contains five chapters each of which is comparative in some sense. One compares the activities of the industrial groupings included, three compare phenomena across all units of analysis, and the last focuses upon the differences and similarities between American and British campaigning. Although the chapters in this section are more analytical in their orientation, they necessarily repeat many of the details already set out in the narrative chapters. The book also contains an appendix on the rationality of the management of campaign finance and a postscript on the 1966 election.

Several of the points developed in this book are related to points of controversy either within the discipline or within the attentive public. To the argument that there is a unity of action between business interests and the Conservative party, Rose replies in pluralist terms—the immediate goals of these groups so differ that there seems to be minimal coordination and consistency between their propaganda efforts. To the criticism that modern campaign technology will lead to a politics of public relations rather than a politics of principles, he charges that the extent to which Britain ever had a politics of principle is overstated, that, in fact, the motives of British politicians have been mixed historically, and that on balance the morality of campaigning has improved over the past century because of electoral reform. To the related argument that specialists like market research experts have become dominate in British campaigning, he counters that his findings suggest that for the most part the opposite is true—their efforts are largely ignored in favor of the intuitions of the politicians.

Two points concerning the goal of this book should be reviewed in detail. First if I am right that we know little about the influences of campaigns, how do we know if campaigns are being manipulated efficiently to give the desired outcomes. Although Rose indicates that he is evaluating propaganda in terms of our findings in the field of voting behavior, many of his criticisms are based upon common sense models of how to influence voters-models that most of us would have little trouble agreeing with. Thus it is probably effective to use brief slogans and attractive pictures to tell voters what they like to hear, to use surveys to find out what they like to hear, and to try to appeal most to strategically located segments of the electorate.

The reason that Rose is able to make his evaluations is that apparently many campaigns in Britain are so inept or disorganized that they fail to do even the conspicuous. For criticisms on somewhat more narrow grounds we need more information. For example, Rose's discussion of the timing of campaigns is his most solid usage of voting behavior evidence. He says that the findings indicating that most voters make up their minds before the formal campaign starts means that rational propagandists would advertise continuously, not just during the campaign. But it is quite possible that the early deciders are more intensely committed to their party while the late deciders tend to be the less strongly identified. If so, among the latter group the last stimulus before the election may be decisive. This pattern of relationships would argue strongly for concentrating propaganda just before the election when the non-identifiers may be more immediately influenced and while the partisans can still be reinforced. The point of this is that the evidence is as yet too incomplete to make incontrovertible prescriptive statements that go beyond the obvious.

Second, the use of the rationality concept as an evaluational device causes me some discomfort. We can easily achieve a post facto circularity of reasoning with rationality simply by positing a conflicting goal which is more important to the actor than some nominal goal which is not being maximized. My evaluation of your behavior as irrational then often is equivalent to my disagreeing with your ranking of goals, i.e., ranking gentlemanly behavior over winning elections. If so, then it seems preferable to deal with these goals or values explicitly rather than cloaking them in a seemingly objective study of rationality.—Charles F. Chudde, University of Wisconsin.

Southern Africa and the United States. EDITED BY WILLIAM A. HANCE. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1968. Pp. 171. $6.50.)

Unlike many compilations of old and often stale journal articles published to prevent someone from perishing, the present volume consists of four original essays and a conclusion all of high quality. The authors—William Hance, Leo Kuper, Vernon McKay, and Edwin Munger—are thus able to combine both the most recent research and the most recent events into their papers. The subject is divided among the four writers according to their special interests, and although differences of viewpoint emerge, as they must, the conclusion does bring them into perspective.

In the first essay Vernon McKay considers the complex relationships between and among the various African countries and the United States in the light of their different policies and demands. He relates internal and external affairs, including a section on pressure groups operating in this country on behalf of the countries of Southern Africa. Inceed McKay is the only one of the four to deal in any detail with Southern Africa as a whole. The others, despite the book's title, stick to South Africa. Leo Kuper writes of the forces at work among the colored peoples of South Africa and of the vexed problem of race relations. Edwin Munger takes this theme from the other end, discussing the forces of stability and change in the White community in a truly masterly way. Munger's essay is one of the best features of the book and alone makes the book worth reading. William Hance has not only acted as editor and written the conclusion, but has also contributed a lengthy and well-argued section on the feasibility of economic and political disengagement with South Africa. In all any reader will be hard put to it to find any subject of significance not at least touched upon by the authors. Clearly this is a bock meriting the attention of students of international affairs and of Africa.

Despite its many virtues the book inevitably has some shortcomings that diminish its usefulness. It is least valuable to South African area specialists to whom most of the material surveyed is familiar ground. There is not sufficient that is new either in insight or in fact to excite such scholars. But then, perhaps, they are not the intended audience. Being strictly policy oriented as it is, the book is doubtless aimed at present and future makers of foreign policy, but even here there are puzzling aspects. The book assumes a fair background in South African history and politics. There is certainly not enough background for the beginner coming fresh to the area after say, a general introduction to international affairs. But it is precisely a person such as this who stands to benefit most from it. The intelligent reader will probably pick up a good deal on the way, and as the unintelligent reader is unlikely to pick this book the defect may not be serious, but an introductory chapter providing background would have been most helpful to an interested newcomer. The bibliography is also weak from this viewpoint, the selection of some books and the omission of others better known being distinctly odd. An annotated bibliography would have been of particular value, or if this were too time-consuming to complete, at least a grouping of the books to indicate the political commitment of the author. For obvious reasons a book such as the late Brian Bunting's "Rise of the South African Reich," has to be read in the knowledge that Bunting was a Tass correspondent, and this is only one instance. The bibliography is also marred by the absence from it of works cited in the text. As a result checking a citation often involves searching through numbers of footnotes for a title buried among others in the tiny print.

A more substantive defect is, perhaps, the unresolved difference between the authors' perceptions as pragmatic social scientists and their hopes as men steeped in a liberal humane tradition. Meaningful discussion of foreign policy involves the setting of priorities. But in the South African case assignment of priorities is complicated by the character of the regime. The authors recognize that a strong and stable South Africa is important to American interests, but cannot stomach the price of strength and stability. So they are faced with the painful problem of what American policy should be. Should it center on enforcement of a moral standard? And if so, is America in a position to preach morality to others? Is the business of America business? Or is the main goal the preservation of national security, however that elusive term is defined? Or is it the extension of American influence in Africa? If all four are wanted, as they probably are, which comes first, which second, and which follow? The authors are unable to decide. As a result all they can do is to recommend the mixture as before, which is an amalgam of normal relations tinctured with endless admonition. As South Africa is too important to be ignored, and too powerful to be bullied or browbeaten, this policy is self-defeating. It does not satisfy the African states, irritates the South Africans, and does not help the Africans in South Africa. Indeed it more often than not achieves the opposite, for South African whites are convined that concessions are not enough and that what is demanded is their abject surrender-a surrender to which they are not resigned. The authors consider alternative policies, but while calling attention to these alternatives do not take them sufficiently seriously. Their hopes as men clashing with their knowledge as scientists, the authors are unable to revalue American policy towards South Africa. Having said this, it is only fair to say that the authors do essay the effort, and for that they deserve respect even where they fall short.

Although it would be pointless to embark on an expedition to find small faults, there are some which knowledgeable readers will find irritating. McKay for instance insists on lumping the South African, Rhodesian, and Portuguese Governments together as "right-wing." While it is questionable if such categorization is meaningful anywhere, it is irrelevant in Africa. According to some definitions all South African political parties, from the Progressives to the Nationalists, would be classed as "right-wing" while others would arrange them on a left-right spectrum. According to other definitions, the Nationalists, with their emphasis on a planned economy, on state participation or ownership of industry, and on radical social experimentation could well be called "socialists" by American "right-wingers." One has the feeling that the term is put in to "double-damn" a regime or regimes McKay dislikes. One can also quarrel with Leo Kuper's description of the Freedom Charter as "mild socialist doctrine." In their program of 1963 the South African Communist Party admit that implementing the Charter would involve the nationalization of all banking and finance, of most industry, and of land. Such a program goes well beyond what most people conceive of as "mild socialism." But these are relatively small defects which, together with others, do not greatly detract from a good book.

In sum, the authors can be congratulated on an interesting collection of essays that will prove useful to those who make or study foreign policy.—EDWARD FEIT, University of Massachusetts.

Quebec Confronts Canada. EY EDWARD M. CORBETT. (Baltimore: The John Hopkins Press, 1967. Pp. 336. $8.95.)

If you are unfamiliar with the current problems Canada's Confederation is facing, if you are puzzled by what you have read in the newspapers about Quebec's uneasy relations with the rest of the country, and if you would like to get a more thorough introduction to all this from someone who has an articulate view of the situation, read this book. It presents, in a balanced fashion, an overall description of Quebec's unrest and the demands it makes on the rest of Canada, and English Canada's responses to these claims. Though the author may have had some disguised sympathies for those he considers the underdogs in this situation, he has shown an ability not to be swayed by any one side's arguments. But above all, what is most gratifying is the author's familiarity with the multifaceted problems which are a challenge to Canadian unity; the breadth of his information on the political views of representatives from all walks of life in Canadian society is as complete as one would expect from a serious study of this kind.

The author's central idea is that a new self-confidence and a new drive have developed among French Canadians, in political as well as in economic and social matters, in technical as well as in cultural endeavors, and that these people are terribly impatient; the movement cannot be stopped now, and English Canadians will have to make room for the expressions of these aspirations, if they want to keep the Confederation working, The key to the dilemma actually lies in their hands: the question is whether or not they will be willing to satisfy "the new insistence, on the part of French Canadians, on sharing in all the responsibilities and advantages of modern life in all spheres of national existence" (p. 3). According to him, the economic sector will be one of the key spheres, and whether French Canadians get a decent share of economic power will be critical.

These themes gradually develop as the author moves from a short, but precise historical review of the development of Quebec central ideologynationalism-to the intellectual climate which has grown in the last two decades; he shows how a monolithic conservative and clerical outlook has given way to ideological pluralism, though nationalism remain the dominant force. Then he goes on to examine the problems of various sectors in detail: the language issue, the political forces and their positions on Quebec's relations with the rest of the country, the specific constitutional changes that have been proposed, from cooperative federalism to special status and associate state, finally the problem of Quebec's power in social and economic decisions, and the changes that have occurred in these sectors. Then he turns to an analysis of the English Canadian moods toward Quebec, and concludes with a brief-too brief in my view -outlook on what the future holds.

This short conclusion reveals in fact what appears to me to be a weakness of the book. The author has clearly well succeeded in describing the outward dimensions of the Quebec-Canada confrontation. But from this description of the explicit contentions, the author could have pursued in at least two different directions.

One was to try to develop from his account of recent developments some overall view of what the future holds for Canada. But given the complexity of the reality, this is not an easy task, to say the least. The author, however, seems to have been tempted by this avenue, and given his inability to master the multiplicity of factors involved in one global view, he has been led to a frustrating series of "if ..., then ..." statements, which characteristically tend to end many sections and chapters of the book. Too often, the condition is presented as if it were the most important one for Canada's survival.

The other avenue could have been more manageable and, at the same time, intellectually stimulating. It would have consisted in an effort to present a sociological and political inward analysis of the forces which underly Quebec's unrest and give it its full force; ideally this should have been done in comparison with other political movements. But I suppose this was beyond the author's aim. The potential reader should be warned, however, not to expect this kind of analysis. Corbett limits himself to an examination of current political developments and the demands and grievances explicitly expressed by the two groups' representatives; it is journalism, albeit of a very sophisticated kind. This will make the book, incidentally, soon out-dated: in fact, this problem is already apparent, since the author's inquiry seems to have stopped around 1965-66, and many political issues discussed here have since developed far beyond the point at which the author left them.

We unfortunately cannot conclude this review without noting many spelling errors, such as "civil source" for "civil service" (p. 12), "adaption" instead of "adaptation" (twice on p. 186). This is particularly frequent in French references (for instance, p. 33, 115, 239, 312). Finally, the author refers to the National Film Board, as the National Film Office (p. 59), to The Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, as Canadian Journal of Economics (p. 273 n.), and to Albert Breton, as André Breton (p. 32). These are inexcusable errors in an otherwise very well written and well presented book.—Maurice Pinard, McGill University.

The Democratic Revolution in West Indies. Edited by Wendell Bell. (Cambridge: Schenkman Publishing Company, Inc. 1967. Pp. 232. $8.95.)

This volume is a prelude to a series that springs from the West Indies Studies Program at U.C.L.A. Wendell Bell's Jamaican Leaders (1963) and Decisions of Nationhood (1964) are lineal antecedents. The Program represents the most ambitious endeavor, to date, to study aspects of social and political behavior in the English speaking West Indies. More than half the studies in this book are excised or distilled from Ph.D. dissertations and the work, in some instances, suffers from an overdose of tabulation. Furthermore, because of the attempt to forge a common conceptual framework, the authors exhibit an irritating tendency to cite each other repeatedly.

Mr. Vernon Arnett of the Jamaican Parliament, in his Foreword, poses a realistic thesis against which the progress oriented contributors pit their ideas and findings. Arnett argues that while the colonial yoke has been shed, the economic yoke remains, controlled by expatriate firms and landowners who, in turn, are reinforced by a small, vet potent, business and professional middle class. The masses, increasing in numbers in the finite territorial environment of the West Indies, do not enjoy the fruits of this structure. Independence, to Arnett, means the positive and autonomous choice to provide a more equitable distribution of resources and greater opportunities for the whole of the population. He is far from sanguine about the prospects. As for the Bell group, he notes that "some may feel that the study has done too well by us . . . in the presentation of an over-optimistic view of the future." Indeed, one of the characteristics of this volume is the optimistic outlook for egalitarian democracy expressed in its theoretical prose and the contrasting data that is found in its tables.

Bell and Oxall establish a theoretical position which will be familiar to those who have read Decisions of Nationhood. In the design of the book, they set out empirically to support their longitudinal, normative assumptions. They view "much of the political, economic and social change that is going on, in the world today, and has gone on in the recent past as a continuation of the democratic revolution." They focus on "recruitment, socialization and, above all, the performance of new national elites . . ." The extrapolated approach is based upon ten "decisions of nationhood" which are supposed to provide a holistic framework for the succeeding studies. The studies are elitist oriented for the most part, using a positional-reputational scheme to identify leaders. The paradox in this conceptualization and design is the positing of a global theoretical framework on the one hand and the omission, on the other, of exogenous influences in the decision model.

The eight studies cover a variety of topics and approaches and differ in their proximity to the central theme. Three attitudinal studies by Bell and Charles C. Moskos, Jr. adhere to the decision decalogue and are West Indies-wide in scope. The studies that are limited to individual islands are not as tightly integrated, but are interesting for the data and insights they offer. While the questionnaire-interview technique was most often employed, Ivar Oxaal's historical essay on the intellectual background of Trinidad and Raymond W. Mack, Jr.'s impressionistic analysis of class and race in Barbados are well rendered. Mack's finding that "when class boundaries shift rapidly, the boundaries of races also become fluid" could provide the basis for further empirical work.

The writers repeatedly offer disclaimers about the tentativeness of their theories and are candid about the problems of research in this region. Yet, very little attention is given to the body of theory on West Indian society that preceded this project. There is obviously more to West Indian analysis that Eric Williams and C. L. R. James. Lloyd Braithwaite earns an anecdotal note in the Oxaal article; M. G. Smith is acknowledged in the prefatory pages and a footnote, and other writers such as Vera Rubin, R. T. Smith, Sidney Mintz and C. Wagley go unrecognized. These people have built up a theoretical and empirical literature that should not be rejected out of hand in a seminal volume of this kind.

Obliquely the problem arises of field research in the English speaking Caribbean. When a Jamaican politician expresses a belief in progress, just what does he mean in relation to his actions? Island differentiations are important and are not given sufficient attention by Moskos and Bell. Furthermore, most of the research was done in 1960 to early 1962 when the West Indian Federation was in the process of a still birth. Certainly this traumatic event colored the views of political leaders towards independence and freedom. The Oxaal and Mack studies appear most sound quite possibly because they were devoid of interview schedules that raise questions about the conceptualization of the interview items in the first instance. The fact that English is spoken in the West Indies can, as I am sure the writers in this book are aware, be very deceiving. The contextual base, therefore, requires an internal, theoretical analysis and this is where the Bell group falls short. An external, global analysis has been imposed on a varied and complex society without accepting the existing theories that explain this society or devising a new one. Yet, this is an important book. Within the limitations noted, it is carefully done and may prove a landmark in the development of integrated studies in this fascinating region.—Morton Kroll, University of Washington, Seattle, Washington.

Canadian Labor in Politics. By GAD HOROWITZ. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1968. Pp. 273. $7.50.)

Despite considerable evidence to the contrary, Canadian politics continue to be portrayed as a minor variant of the American: while more than two parties compete in a plurality, single-member constituency voting system, the multi-party situation is often regarded as little more than a temporary aberration; the Liberals are the dominant party—they have been in power for 51 of the last 72 years—so they are often considered as the Canadian analogy to the Democrats in this country; another conventional assumption, related to the one about the Liberals, is that the political style of the Canadian labor movement is not much different from that of its American counterpart.

This study helps set the record straight on these and several other points and is a genuine contribution to a developing literature on Canada that is both specific in content and comparative in orientation.

Horowitz traces the history of the political involvement of Canadian labor from the early organization efforts, through the schism between the politically quietistic AFL-affiliated craft unions (TLC) and the activistic CIO-associated industrial unions (CCL), the struggle with the Communists in the 1940's, the association with the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF), the merger between the TLC and the CCL to form the Canadian Labor Congress (CLC) in 1956 and the formation of the New Democratic party (NDP) in 1961. Employing party and union correspondence, minutes and other documents as well as personal interviews across the country, the author analyzes the social composition of the various conventions, the membership of the politically-involved unions and the motivations of the unionists and the leaders of the CCF and NDP. Even had he stopped at this, he would have successfully filled large gaps in knowledge about recent Canadian politics.

Of greater interest, however, is Horowitz' lengthy introduction which makes up one-fifth of the entire book. In it he resorts to a Hartzian approach to try to account for the fact that while "in the United States, organized socialism is dead, in Canada, socialism, though far from national power, is a significant political force and the official 'political arm' of the labour movement" (p. 3). He accepts Louis Hartz' argument in The Liberal Tradition in America that American political values originate with the bearers of liberal individualism who left the Tory end of the spectrum behind them. But he claims that the Canadian value structure is different in that it is not wholly individualistic and liberal. Rather it has a Tory tinge to it-not only a function of the migration north resulting from the American Revolution as Hartz believes but also a product of successive waves of immigration from Great Britain.

A variety of subsidiary factors are listed as being part of the Tory tradition in Canada: the failure of Jacksonian democracy to take root; the ambivalent and centrist character of left-wing liberalism in Canada; and the failure of English-Canada to develop a nationalist cult and the legitimacy of ideological diversity.

Accordingly, Horowitz points out, the Canadian environment is relatively congenial to concepts of community and class while the American, suffused with the ideology of individualism is not. He continues that this Toryism in Canada has been crucial to the development of a socialist movement and notes that Canadian Conservatism is quite unlike its American facsimile and is very close to Canadian socialism in that its underlying assumptions about class and community are similar.

These ideas make a very useful essay in political culture. But then the author, attempting to link these notions with the problem of the continued existence of the CCF and now NDP in the face of the major parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, falls back on the left-right continuum. He characterizes the NDP as a left-wing party, the Liberals as a center group with the Conservatives on the right. Unfortunately, while such a construct may be applicable on some issues, it has no general empirical justification and is meaningless in reference to the behavior of mass publics who, after all, participate in the process if only at election time. Moreover, it is unnecessary. The CCF-NDP has not been swallowed up by the Liberals not so much because of programmatic intransigence on both sides but because the Liberals have responded to the ethnic and religious diversity of the country by emphasizing ethnic and religious issues that give third party interlopers exploitable openings while the Liberals retain power.

Finally, this reviewer differs with the author in his labelling of the NDP as a "socialist" party. At the founding of the CCF in the dark days of the Depression of the 1930's, such an adjective was probably appropriate. However, in the midd'e 1960's, the NDP has been consistently down-playing ideology in favor of a bread-and-butter issue-orientation and face-to-face canvassing in the urban areas in English Canada. The electorate has responded rather favorably and today, the working class identification with the NDP is based on the party's success at projecting this style rather than deep-seated commitment to its long-term programmatic ideas.—Peter Regenstreif, University of Rochester.

Pils:udski's Coup d'Etat. By Joseph Rothschild. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1966, Pp. 435. $10.00.)

Marshal Jozef Pilsudski assuredly belongs to the most important statesmen of the inter-war period. There are two criteria by which he and his acts can be judged—that of the contemporary European political scene from which he cannot be divorced, and that of Polish history of which he was the foremost actor. In his preface to Pilsudski's Coup d'Etat Professor Rothschild emphasized the difficulty of comparing Pilsudski's "guided democracy" with the autocratic regimes of the "new states" which emerged after the Second World War. One might add that it would be equally pointless to judge Pilsudski only in the terms of post-1918 politics. The Polish leader did not fit into the era of the League of Nations. Rather than a world citizen or a European, he was above all a Pole reared in the nineteenth century romanticism which in Poland gave rise to a desperate struggle for national independence.

Professor Rothschild's excellent treatment of the May 1926 "political demonstration" which "degenerated into a military battle" is no doubt a valuable contribution to the study of the technique of a military coup d' etat resulting in the destruction of parliamentary government. It is to the credit of the author that he realized that his "case study," however useful from the more general point of view, was determined by Polish political experience. The events of the May 1926 seizure of power, so masterfully described by the author. would have stood in clearer relief, had he dealt more elaborately with the key position of Pilsudski before and during the First World War, as well as his role of Chief of State in the formative years of modern Poland. Such an inquiry would have revealed that the internal political split stemmed not only from the obvious inadequacies of Polish parliamentarianism or the impatience of its opponents; this clash to a large degree was the continuation of two political orientations—one represented by the impetuous and conspiratorial "socialist," Pilsudski, and the other by the more rationalistic representative of the Right. Roman Dmowski.

Discussion of these two orientations would have greatly enhanced the otherwise well documented analysis of the policies and aims of the May 1926 antagonists. In particular, it would have helped to explain the behavior of the socialists whose support decided the struggle in favor of the Marshal. In fact, the conflict between the Right and the Left in postwar Poland was unusual and bizarre. The authoritarian goals and tactics, which in other European states were pursued by the communists and later by the parties of the extreme Right, in Poland were embraced and put into effect by the socialists. It took them over almost ten years to realize that after November, 1918 Pilsudski-far from being prepared to solve Poland's problems in a "Socialist-Bonapartist" manner-ceased to be a socialist and decided to base his May 1926 regime on the army and the more conservative elements.

Unlike the majority of writers, who regarded Pilsudski either as a savior of Poland, or as a power-seeking autocrat, Professor Rothschild allowed the facts to speak for themselves, thus providing an insight into the complex mind of the Polish leader. Of special interest is the author's discussion of the uncertainties and internal torment of Pilsudski when he ran into conflict with some of his old comrades, such as President Wojciechowski and later Ignacy Daszynski.

It was this curious mixture of ruthlessness and moderation which explained Pilsudski's initial attempt to make peace with his opponents. He tried to reap the rewards of his illegal action without having to bear the burden of its revolutionary character. That he failed to create an atmosphere of conciliation was due to a number of factorsthe inferior qualities of most of his military associates, his erroneous belief that the opposition parties of the Seim would do his bidding, and his inability to provide—apart from the action-related slogans of the Sanacia (moral sanitation)—a meaningful program for his regime. Despite his awareness of the "demoralizing and pattern-setting consequences of an illegal recourse to force for the solution of domestic political crises." Pilsudski proved unable to stop the tragic escalation of his feud with the opposition. In this sense there was a direct and logical relationship between the May seizure of power and the outrages of "Brzesc." Pilsudski himself was overwhelmed by the consequences of this ill-advised and hasty action which was to haunt him until the end of his life. Accompanied as it was by the electoral victory of the "government bloc," largely caused by the intimidation of the opposition, the brutal treatment of its leaders was a milestone in Polish political history which—to use the words of the author—"severed the moral tie between Pilsudski and his nation."

Pilsudski's Coup d'Etat is a scholarly study based on sound research and impressive evidence. The author is unbiased, despite his obvious sympathy for Pilsudski's May coup, with which not everyone would agree. Postwar democracy in Europe-both East and West-suffered from serious weaknesses. But is it necessary to brand Poland or any other European country as being "ripe for dictatorship?" Nor would every one agree with the clearly hostile approach of the writer to Wincenty Witos, the reasons of which are not sufficiently explained. Is it not true that in the last three years of prewar Poland Witos living in exile was regarded as one of the symbols of Polish freedom? To doubt the greatness and patriotism of Pilsudski would be patently wrong. But is it necessary to "give him primary credit for the fact that today the notion of Europe without a Polish state is no longer conceivable?"

Yet Professor Rothschild is to be congratulated for having admirably filled an important gap in our knowledge of East Central European political development.—Vaclay L. Benes, Indiana University.

Dollars, Dependents and Dogma: Overseas Chinese Remittances to Communist China. By Chun-HSI Wu. (Stanford: The Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, 1967. Pp. 231. $7.00.)

Unlike many studies of Communist China that can best be described as long on generalized speculations but short on substantiating facts, Dollars, Dependents and Dogma by Professor Chun-hsi Wu is a thoroughly researched and carefully documented book.

Primarily of interest to China-watching economists, this book purports to analyze the nature and channels of overseas Chinese remittances to the mainland (Chapters I & II); to estimate the volume of such remittances from 1903 to 1964 (Chapters IV & V); to examine the policies and regulations of Communist China toward this supply of foreign exchange (Chapter III; and, finally, to forecast its prospects for the future (Chapter VI).

Because of Communist China's persistent reluctance to release official statistics on many crucial aspects of its governmental operations, this study, typical of studies on Communist China in general, is handicapped by the lack of hard, reliable data. Further complications, as Professor Wu points out, arise from the wide geographical distribution of the overseas Chinese, the diversity of currencies which they remit, and the numerous channels of remittance, some covert, often necessitated by the rigid restrictions imposed by various national governments.

Yet, Wu has succeeded in carrying out his research as scrupulously as can be expected under these circumstances and presents his findings in a most convincing manner. The persuasiveness of the book is strengthened considerably by data which Wu has uncovered from a variety of original sources. In addition to materials in Japanese and Thai, he has exploited several publications in Chinese, not available in English, such as Tsu-kuo (China Monthly), Chin-jih Ta-lu (Mainland Today), Hai-wai Yueh-k'an (Overseas Affairs Monthly), Fei-ching Yen-chiu (Research on Communist China), Ching-chi Tao-pao (Economic Bulletin), and Wen-ti yu Yen-chiu (Issues and Studies). This book demonstrates well the argument that much valuable information on China in Chinese is often overlooked by many Western scholars relying heavily upon translations of government agencies and research institutions which are selective due to the overwhelming volume of Chinese materials available.

Among his major theses, Wu maintains that overseas remittances have decreased since the Chinese Communists' take-over; that despite periodic encouragement by the Communist regime, overseas Chinese only remit between US$25 to $30 million to the mainland out of US$90 to $100 million which is remitted to Hong Kong annually; and that "the present prospects for any significant increase in overseas remittances to mainland China are, without a doubt, not encouraging. Nor do the long term prospects appear to hold much greater promise (p. 148)."

Although of considerable value to economists, this book fails to dwell sufficiently upon several questions of interest to political scientists. During the period of "squeezing," what were Communist China's instruments of coercion in forcing overseas Chinese to remit and how were they actually carried out? What are the Communists' rationalization and attempted solution of the "contradiction" whereby a high percentage of overseas Chinese dependents in Communist China, by virtue of their trensured remittances in foreign exchange, can live more comfortably than ordinary people, or can retain their "capitalistic" possessions while industry and business owned by Chinese receiving no remittance are being "socialized," or can be exempted from work in the communes?

Another weakness of this book is the repetitious and monotonous "Summary and Conclusions" (Chapter VIII) which can be discarded without serious damage to the organization of the book. The "Introduction" by C. F. Remer is flawed by his erroneous view that this book attempts to answer a much broader question—"How is Communist China to make peace with economic interdependence (p. 1)?"—and by his misleading oversimplifications such as his description of Chinese Communist's policy toward remittance in terms of "Grandmother Wong's Hundred Dollars (p. 5)."

This book is produced by lithography and the original typing of the manuscript, from which final copies are photographed, is careless. Words or even sentences are missing. (The sentence which begins with "Ch'en Sung-k'uang . . ." and ends with "has provided us with" on p. 88 is followed, after three tables, on p. 92 by "according to their purposes.") Indentations are used inconsistently. (The subtitle, Remittances from the Philippines, is not indented on p. 112, but other similar subtitles, such as Remittances from Malaysia on p. 106 and Overseas Remittances from Indonesia on p. 116, are indented nine and eight spaces respectively.) Furthermore, words which should be capitalized are not. (The beginning word of a sentence on p. 162 appears in small letter.)

Despite its shortcomings Dollars, Dependents and Dogma is definitely a valuable contribution to the growing, though still inadequate, research on Communist China, a country consistently neglected in courses on comparative government which are culturally oriented toward European political institutions.—YI-CHUN CHANG, University of Delaware.

Ideas and Politics of Chilean Independence 1808– 1833. By Simon Collier. (Cambridge. England: The University Press, 1967. Pp. 396, $12.50.)

This is a careful, competent, thoroughly researched study of the interaction of ideology and events during the formative years of the Chilean nation. The author, a British historian who views ideas as "the lifeblood of political history" (p. xv), intends the book as a contribution to the historiography of the Chilean revolution for independence. But he also offers it as a case study of the political ideas of Latin American independence—"indeed, of Latin American political ideas in general," a subject which, Mr. Collier rightly notes, has been manifestly understudied.

The important political facts of the period of Chilean independence are here, dating from the Spanish imperial crisis induced by the Napoleonic invasion of 1808 and ending with tthe consolidation of a new "autocratic republicanism" in the Chilean constitution of 1833. The author's objective, however, is not to write the definitive history of Chile's struggle for independence. For example, minimum attention is given the military aspects of that struggle. The emphasis is rather on ideas: their sources, especially in French, British, and North American writings and public documents; and how these came to be embodied in Chilean political institutions. At this Mr. Collier is very successful.

The book is also of interest for its analysis of the gradual emergence of the very idea of independence and of a distinct Chilean identity, at least on the part of the small upper stratum that led the process of separation from Spain. The author's analysis shows very clearly the importance in this regard of the nature of the reaction of the Spanish government and its New World agents to initial demands for more autonomy within the framework of the empire.

One or two of the author's judgments may be questioned. Thus he laments the establishment of the Conservative Republic under Diego Portales after 1830 on the ground that further experiments along liberal lines during the first decades of the nineteenth century would have produced an increased measure of freedom or democracy in the long run. The histories of the other Latin American republics during the nineteenth century, however, as well as the social and political realities of the time, cast serious doubt on any such proposition. If the author also provides a more detailed examination of some points than is perhaps necessary, he has nevertheless achieved his goal of giving us an excellent analysis of the interaction of the ideas, events, and institutions during a crucial period in one country's early development.

Mr. Collier's book may also serve as a case study in the adaptation of imported ideas to the problems of constitutional engineering in a new nation, as he intended it to be. Unfortunately, though, in the eyes of a political scientist, the study is not placed within a conceptual framework—the reader must largely extrapolate his own comparative inferences from the material presented. The book remains essentially a history of ideas. Yet other studies will hopefully be forthcoming of the interweaving of ideology and political institutions, both in other Latin American countries and in more recent phases of their development, on the basis of which comparisons can indeed be made. In such a context, this book is at any rate a beginning.

Moreover, for a political scientist, Mr. Collier's book indirectly raises other possibilities for comparative analysis. Thus the Latin struggles of the early nineteenth century may be viewed as the first continent-wide movement for independence, embracing what shortly became 18 separate polities (Cuba and Panama won their independence only much later). Comparisons of the causes, processes, outcomes, and ideologies of those struggles with the anti-colonial movements of the twentieth century should certainly widen the empirical base upon which rests our present understanding of independence movements generally.

A comparative analysis of the revolutions for independence throughout the various parts of the Spanish Empire (and including those places like Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines that did not at the time sever their ties) might also provide new material for the burgeoning analysis of internal wars and their causes. Again, studies of nation-forming in Latin America along the lines of Richard Merritt's Symbols of American Community, 1735-1775, or of early party systems in the mold of William Chambers' recent work on the United States, might be fruitful.

In short, it seems high time that students of comparative politics, as well as students of political thought, expand their perspectives to encompass the long trajectory of Latin American political experience, thus broadening the base on which theory may be constructed. So-called Latin Americanists likewise need to integrate the concerns of systematic comparison more effectively into their own work. With regard to the specific topic of Latin American independence, the historians—and most recently Mr. Collier—have been first in the field. Political scientists, with somewhat different and hopefully explicity comparative concerns, should follow.—Robert H. Dix, Harvard University.

Latin America. Social Structures and Political Institutions. By Jacques Lambert. Translated by Helen Katel. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967. Pp. 413. $10.00.)

This is a skillful English translation of one of the most interesting broad studies of Latin America published in recent years. The author, a specialist on Brazil, is a professor at the University of Lyon, France, and the book first appeared in French in 1963. A note on the jacket states that "the author has added material on developments through 1965," but the bibliography lists several items published in 1966 and one in 1967.

Except for updating of text and bibliography, the new material leaves the original work substantially unchanged. It is essentially a political study. This is clearly apparent in the titles of the last three of the book's four main parts: "Contradictions in Political Life," "Political Forces and Political Parties," and "Political Institutions." And although Part I is entitled "General Features of Latin American Social Structure," and deals chiefly with the latifundio or large estate, its responsibility for lags in social development, and the survival of motivations peculiar to an aristocratic colonial society, the culmination of this analysis is reached in the statement that "Since the 1930's Latin America has tried to make her culture democratic and national," which is surely a political proposition. Moreover, if the book has a central theme, it is that of "presidential dominance," which is announced in the opening chapter and developed at length in Part IV. In both places the subordination of social to political interest is made explicit: in the former, by the assertion (p. 19) that "the chief executive must be given very broad powers because developing countries need this form of government"; in the latter, by the title of the final chapter, "Social Causes of Presidential Dominance: The Crisis of Democracy."

The author is at his best when dealing with politics, though less so with political parties (e.g., Mexico's P.R.I., Colombia's Liberal and Conservatives, and Argentina's Radicals) than with political institutions. His account of these in Part IV is fresh, highly informative and persuasive. His carefully defined concept of presidential dominance is a valuable contribution, and he shows clearly and at considerable length how this dominance has impinged upon the courts, local administration, and the national legislatures-all leading up to the present "crisis of democracy," which he attributes to the contradiction in most of Latin America between a genuine devotion to political democracy and the persistence of archaic and completely undemocratic societies. Unless the latter are transformed "fairly soon" for the benefit of "the backward masses," he sees no hope for political democracy in Latin America.

The other parts of the book are excellent in many respects and the whole gains added value by constantly taking account of the great diversity of Latin America and frequently comparing it with other areas of the world, both developing and advanced. Yet, as a study focused on the present state and future prospects of Latin America, the book suffers from an excessive concern with the dead hand of the past, to the neglect of relatively new dynamic forces of change. Thus, it has much to say about the old latifundio and archaic social survivals, but makes only a very few brief and rather incidental references to industrialization, entrepreneurship, urbanism, communications, and international organizations whose activities are highly relevant to the problems discussed in these pages. The almost complete neglect of radio and television is particularly regrettable, for, as other writers have pointed out, by reaching even the illiterate half of Latin America's population these have done much to stimulate rising aspirations and grave unrest among the area's "backward masses."

In addition, two important topics that are by no means neglected need more searching examination. Agrarian reform is treated too narrowly as a matter of breaking up large estates, whereas there is much more to it than that, as has been pointed out by various specialists, including T. Lynn Smith in a book listed in this one's bibliography (p. 387). Nationalism, too, is treated too narrowly, as a rather simple middle-class phenomenon, whereas in fact it is a complex of several different varieties which find support in one or another of all the principal sectors of Latin American society. Not a single book or article on nationalism is listed in the bibliography.

There are a surprisingly large number of slips of one kind or another, some in the text and more in the bibliography. These include matters of fact, the spelling and accenting of foreign (particularly Spanish) words, and the erroneous attribution of Lyle N. McAlister's important article, "Recent Research and Writings on the Role of the Military in Latin America," to two other writers (p. 391). Also, the Latin American Research Review, in which his article appeared, though cited at this point, is omitted from the list of periodicals on p. 368. The index leaves much to be desired. A university press, especially one so long and favorably known for its publications dealing with Latin America, ought to do much better in the revised and corrected edition of this important book which it is to be hoped will be forthcoming soon.-ARTHUR P. WHITAKER, Riverside, California.

Governing the Commune of Veyrier: Politics in Swiss Local Government. By George A. Codding, IR. (Bureau of Governmental Research: Boulder, University of Colorado, 1967. Pp. 98.)

It is one of the ironies of comparative political analysis that Switzerland—rich in the problems of federalism, modernization, nationalism, democracy, and religious, linguistic and geographical diversity which most interest social scientists—has been thoroughly neglected by Americans throughout this century. Episodic attention has been paid it by a few Europe oriented political sicentists (e.g., Carl Friedrich, Hans Kohn and Karl Deutsch), but there has been no sustained or cumulative interest. For this reason alone the profession owes its gratitude to Professor George A. Codding, Jr. for this, his second book on Switzerland. Like the first (The Federal Gvernment of Switzerland, 1961), Politics in Swiss Local Government is a completely descriptive study; its focus is the commune of Veyrier—a French-speaking settlement in the canton of Geneva.

Because the commune is the basic building block of government throughout Switzerland, Professor Codding apparently hopes through his detailed treatment of local political parties, civic organizations, communal finances, and the structure and functioning of the communal legislature and executive to shed some comparative light on local government in other parts of Switzerland and the world.

Yet despite its accuracy and thoroughness, the book fails in two decisive ways to rise to the level of stimulating comparative analysis. It fails first because Professor Codding simply does not exploit the vital themes to which his data again and again point. Commentary, criticism and analysis are persistantly—even obstinately—eschewed. The decline of farming and the increasing exodus of the young to the cities are noted, but the problems of rural depopulation and communal decline indicated by such demographic statistics remain unexamined. The fact of female suffrage (introduced only recently in Geneva, Lausanne and Neuchâtel), the customary reelection of officials for what often amount to life terms, and the use of the referendum are mentioned in passing, but nowhere are they elaborated in terms of the peculiarly patriarchical, collectivistic and participatory character of Swiss democracy. The five-fold increase in the communal budget since 1945 is dutifully charted, but its significance in conjunction with increasing bureacratization and growing strains on communal resources is left unexplored.

It would be impossible, from Professor Codding's often parochial account, to know that Swiss politics are today dominated at every level by a concern with the maintenance of precarious religious, linguistic and political equilibria in the face of burgeoning Catholic birth rates and immigration by foreign workers; or that the struggle to restrain overemployment and a land boom coupled with the increasingly depressed character of the rural mountain cantons have precipitated an on-going economic crisis which touches every aspect of Swiss life.

This points to the second major difficulty of Professor Codding's work: many of the critical issues noted above fail to find their way into Codding's study because the commune he has chosen as a "political microcosm" of Switzerland (p. 23) is in many ways completely untypical—a weakness which renders the generalizations that can be drawn from his analysis suspect and sometimes erroneous.

Veyrier is, after all, French, while Switzerland is predominantly Germanic-historically as well as constitutionally in its characteristic institutions. The referendum, the initiative, the Landsgemeinde, the separation of the commune into two bodies differentiating residents with federal voting rights from communal citizens with special communal privileges, and the pervading spirit of regionalism and local autonomy (summed up in the notion of Kantönligeist) are exclusively Germanic in origin and spirit. Second, Veyrier is in Codding's own phrase a "bedroom town" of Geneva (p. 16) giving it a population (c. 3000) well above the average, immunity from the economic problems which have plagued many smaller, rural communes, and a broad urban orientation which deemphasizes such traditional communal values as administrative autonomy and limited economic autarky: (most residents work in Geneva and were born outside of Veyrier).

The misleading character of Codding's French-Swiss, urban perspective on Swiss politics are exemplified in his understanding of the referendum as an instrument of public veto (p. 7) rather than of creative public participation, or in his dubious reading of Swiss federalism as more centralist than its American counterpart (p. 2). One wonders whether Professor Codding, in his legalistically justified but unrealistic insistence on the omnipotence of cantonal authority, knows the story of the commune in Graubuenden which when challenged by the canton on its jurisdiction over water power proclaimed "the commune existed long before there was a canton of Graubuenden and denies the canton any right whatsoever to decide questions concerning its existence or justification."

Ultimately, Professor Codding's book justifies only half of its title: it does provide some excellent if painstakingly (almost painfully) detailed material on "Governing the Commune of Veyrier," including reports on the location of fire extinguishers, the schedule for garbage collections, and vacation arrangements for town employees. But it does not effectively illuminate "Politics in Swiss Local Government," and what vision it does offer suffers from an urban, centralist astigmatism caused by overexposure to French-Swiss sources.

One cannot, however, lay on Professor Codding's shoulders the responsibility for decades of neglect. No single study can begin to deal with the rich and diversified political experience of Switzerland. Professor Codding has at least shown the way; let us hope that others will follow—Benjamin R. Barber, University of Pennsylvania.

Politics and the Military in Jordan: A Study of the Arab Legion 1921-1957. By P. J. VATIKIOTIS. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger 1967. Pp. 169. $7.50.)

One of the unpleasant prospects facing the writer on Middle Eastern politics, is the almost unfailing necessity for revising or updating his manuscript upon its completion. Because of the region's uncertainties and instability, the great onrush of events often leaves the scholar in a state of apprehension about the validity of his judgements and hypotheses. This dilemma is clearly illustrated in Prof. Vatikiotis' work on the Arab Legion of Jordan, which contains a 2-part Epilogue. followed by a "trailer" analyzing the consequences of the recent Arab-Israeli confrontation, that culminated in the June 1967 war. None of these occurrences, however, have invalidated the author's conclusions or detracted from the value of the book. A thoroughly documented piece of research, it is based on the published memoires of British officers and Arab leaders, regimental log books, as well as on interviews with various commanders and other participants. As a Greek, born and raised in Jerusalem, with the experience of a decade of distinguished scholarship on the Middle East, no one would be more qualified to write on Jordan's military than Dr. Vatikiotis. The end product is a generally competent and cogent analysis of the Legion's role in the creation and perpetuation of the manifestly unviable Hashemite state. It satisfies the needs of the area specialist in terms of depth and originality, and at the same time provides those pursuing cross-national type of studies with valuable data.

By casting his subject in a comparative framework, the author challenges the Western view of regarding military rulership as deviant from the norms set by the nation-state. Yet in the context of the universalistic Islamic Umma, until recent times the Western concept of the nation-state was alien; and in the case of Jordan the army preceded the state and was instrumental in its creation.

One may analyze the process of nation-building in terms of the interrelated concepts of control and legitimacy—themes that are central to Vatikiotis' thinking. As Dahl asserts, leaders in a political system usually move to acquire legitimacy through various means, thereby reducing their reliance upon naked force. Interestingly, in the case of Jordan the initial reliance on coercive means through the Legion to create the state has become virtually routinized, since the crisis in legitimacy surrounding Hashemite dynastic rule from the outset has never been fully resolved. Indeed, the manner in which Amir Abdullah went about carving out for himself a desert kingdom through British (Churchill) help against Arab nationalist aspirations, provided the bases on which Hashemite legitimacy was repeatedly challenged until recent times. Abdullah's suppression of local Arab nationalists, his alignment with Britain during World War II, followed by his accommodating attitude toward Israel, had the effect of deepening the crisis in legitimacy in the Arab context leading to his assassination in 1951. It was no mere coincidence that whatever legitimacy the throne possessed came from the tribal-beduin component of society -precisely the group from which the elite ground forces of the British-led Legion were mainly recruited; the group that was least affected by nationalist ideology. The absorbtion of the West Bank after 1948 brought into the realm 750,000 Palestinian Arabs, a new anti-Hashemite component whose integration has become Jordan's central problem. The first steps toward integration and therefore the broadening of the base of legitimacy were taken by King Abdullah and pursued by King Husayn with new vigor and determination. Increasing numbers of Palestinians were brought into newly expanded structures such as the Cabinet, the Assembly, the Senate, the bureaucracy and more significantly into the Legion's expanding technical services, where they now predominate. In terms of loyalty to the throne, the new source of recuitment introduced a relatively more educated, and politically susceptible group into the Legion, which along with the townsmen troups (Hadari) of the East Bank, constituted a real threat to the system and to the supremacy of its tribal element. Under these circumstances Husayn's dual strategy has been to maintain control against recalcitrant elements through the use of the Legion's tribal ground forces, while pursuing policies engendering legitimacy.

In contrast to the many detractors and enemies of Husayn, Vatikiotis' attitude is one of admiration for the king's political performance. He attributes the young monarch's success, neither to "courage," nor to "luck," but to his political instincts and shrewdness in recruiting Palestinian political elites and deliberately integrating them into the governmental structure. With the full realization that "Uneasy Lies the Head," the king has skillfully proceeded from an initial traditional (tribal-religious) authority base, toward a limited rational-legal one, which is in turn reinforced by a policy of integration domestically, and the espousal of Arab nationalism externally.

What next for Jordan and King Husayn after such a virtuoso performance? The answer to a large extent, and ironically, will depend on the Israelis, the Legion and the amorphous Arab nationalist movement headed by president Abd al-Nasir. One finds it difficult to understand Israel's insistence on direct negotiations with a king whose consent would almost certainly mean his downfall. On the other hand, with Palestinian fedayeen forces operating freely from the East Bank against Israeli occupation forces, his position is equally untenable. While opposing these raids is politically impossible, each Israeli retaliation is bound to undermine the king's position, especially with respect to the Legionnaires. And finally, had the June war never happened or assuming a near-total Israeli withdrawal, is this type of rule feasible over the long-range in Jordan or anywhere else? Admittedly, the choices are limited for a king, however intelligent and skillful; the Iranian or the Sau'di models are hardly practicable and abdication in favor of a greater Arab unity at present unacceptable to Israel. But then again, Husayn might surprise everyone by opting for a constitutional monarchy or even go the way of Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia.

It is indeed difficult to find serious shortcomings in this opus. One would have hoped for more information on the content of the Legion's educational programs and more quantitative and systematic data on recruitment into the Army and the government, although the usual difficulties facing the researcher in the Middle East would impede such an effort. Systematic studies of elite "circulation" and backgrounds with regard to a large number of Legion commanders and Cabinet-members may constitute an ambitious next step for research. Meanwhile the present volume will remain the definitive work on the military in Jordan.—Richard H. Dekmejian, Suny at Binghamton.

The Latin American Tradition. By CHARLES WAGLEY. (New York; Columbia University Press, 1968. Pp. 225, $6.75.)

This book by a noted anthropologist consists of previously published papers and essays written by the author between 1951 and 1964 which for the most part are not easily come by today. Some of them have been slightly modified for presentation in book form. Through the exposition and examination of shared cultural ties in what he assumes to be a Latin American culture, and of regional and subcultural valuations, the author seeks to explain Latin America to Anglo-Americans and to remind Latin Americans of aspects of their own societies that they often overlook. He also offers a frame of reference to aid further research. In so doing Wagley emphasizes that it is the social anthropologists who will find his suggestions the most congenial.

The introductory chapter, "A Framework for Latin American Culture," specially written for the volume presents the two main elements of the common themes with which all of the papers are concerned i.e., the basic differences between the Latin American culture and that of Anglo-America, and the classification of differences and variations within that culture and society. Admitting that the regional and sub-cultural frame of reference has its shortcomings for social science research and is not the only way of ordering the data Wagley asserts that "a sub-cultural frame of reference combined with a regional division of Latin America provides us with a most useful instrument for thinking about Latin America, although qualitative data may be unavailable within these categories."

This "traditionalist" political scientist ("political philosopher" would be a better identification) found three concerns of the book of the greatest personal interest: the model of behavior for the whole society created by the Iberian gentry in the colonial era which remains to this day; the discussion of "The Dilemma of the Latin American Middle Class," which closes the book, and the explanation of the different views of race that exist in Latin America and in the United States. These subjects have been treated by others, particularly in the past decade or so, including political scientists Stokes and Silvert to name but two but the social anthropologists were most frequently the pioneers. Wagley's second chapter, "An Introduction to Latin American Culture" was originally written for the Foreign Service of the Department of State and issued in 1953.

The culturally elite behavioral model is defined as including "familism, ceremonial and fictive kinship—the compadrazo system—double standards of sexual morals, emphasis upon social class, a disdain for manual labor, high regard for formal etiquette, and emphasis upon the saints and love of display in religion." Wagley notes how this model has persisted throughout history adapting itself to the great variety of historical and physical conditions in the New World so that it influences all sectors of the population with the possible exception of the most isolated Indian communities.

For the student of politics an appreciation of the significance of this aristocratic model affords an entree to the understanding of the distinctiveness of the Latin American political system. It makes him more fully aware of the reasons why the traditionally important social orders, the landed gentry (and their business successors), the church, the military, continue to be accepted as legitimate participants in the political process. It helps explain why those who base their claims to power upon democratic practices have had slow going and why in Latin America the existence of democracy does not by any means obviate the continuing importance of the authoritarian contenders for power within the political system. It suggests, moreover, why Latin America is basically a stable society-one in which there have been few genuine social revolutions and in which reforms develop slowly. The all-pervading cultural elite model was formed in the colonial era when there was no middle class. The bourgeoning of that class has come about in Latin America particularly in the years since the second world war. Wagley notes the disagreement among scholars as to the existence of a class in Latin America reasonably similar to that which developed in Europe and the United States. He himself accepts the existence of a Latin American middle class and treats extensively of its dilemma which he believes lies in the fact that the realities of Latin America run counter to the ideals and needs of the new class. "This sector of the Latin American population is caught up in a dilemma between its liberal ideals and the realities involved in the extension of liberal democracy..." and he lists in detail the material, economic, political and social elements in the big problem of ideals versus realities.

Space permits only the spelling out of the political aspects of the dilemma as he sees them. The middle class is, he believes, energetically interested in politics. It adheres to statism and to honesty and morality in government and politics. Yet it is, with few exceptions, unrepresented by political parties, fearful of both the statist masses and the upper classes. He concludes that "there is no guarantee at all that the development of a strong middle class in Latin America will lead to the strengthening of democratic institutions." As a case study he presents the Brazilian military coup of 1964 which was supported by the middle class. Victims of inflation, fearful of the pro-labor Goulart government, the middle class permitted constitutionalism to be replaced by military rule.

There is no doubt that Wagley is correct in his warning not to expect that the middle class will necessarily aid in the development of Latin American democracy. His examination of the dilemma of this new class is also helpful to an understanding of why it may not aid in developing a progressive society. What this reviewer missed, however, was a failure to enunciate the importance of the middle class desire to emulate the upper classes to an understanding of the middle class action. The European and North American middle classes in the days of their geneses were not as strongly limited by such a tradition. This reviewer has greater doubts than the author concerning the strength of the new middle class democratic ideals. The antidemocratic cultural model that Wagley has explained plays a crucial role in the political attitude and actions of its followers. It predisposes the middle class in Latin America to opt for the Right, the traditionally upper class, than for the Left. (Indeed this all-pervading model also influences the leaders of the workers and the peasantry and is a recognized means of defence by the upper classes of their claims to power.) Wagley surely must beware of this but for some reason he does not underscore the conservative bent of the elite model when he discusses the political action of the middle class when facing their dilemma.

The author's discussion of the priority given to social caste over race, and his note of the milder forms which prejudice and discrimination take in Latin America from those we experience in our own country must be at least called attention to by a reviewer during these days of race consciousness in the United States. And his expressed hope that in the process of "modernization" (his quotes) much of the humanistic tradition of Latin America can be preserved will be seconded by all who are sensitive to the dangers of the all-embracing, all consuming scientific and technological society.—Carroll Hawkins, Michigan State University.

1867: Disraeli, Gladstone and Revolution: The Fassing of the Second Reform Bill. By MAURICE COWLING. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Fress, 1967. Pp. 451. $13.50.)

The Making of the Second Reform Bill. By F. B. SMITH. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Fress, 1966. Pp. 297. $10.50.)

In a recent review Bernard Crick opined that "There can be a genuine text book on British government' the day we have a single natural history of a bill." This, like many of Crick's strictures on the profession, combines exaggeration with insight. But we do sometimes forget that the assumptions of macroanalysis depend upon, and are kept honest by, micro studies. And while the analysis of aggregative data can do more and different things than singular case studies, it cannot entirely replace them as rich sources of generalizations or as chastening reminders of the continuing complexities of political decisions. It may well be that the resurgence of interest in history and biography by political scientists derives in part from this awareness.

The two books considered here demonstrate amply the uses and limits of the case approach. Each was written to celebrate the centenary of the passage of the Second Reform Bill, not by praising it but by unsimplifying and demythologizing the process by which it came to be adopted. As Cowling points out, while sociologists and psephologists have known for some time that mid-Victorian political society was more aristocratic and socially conservative than earlier historians had been unwilling to admit, such knowledge has left little mark on those who have given us our ideas of how political decisions were made at the time. Both he and Smith attempt to show, by focusing on the events of 1866 and 1867, how misleading has been the dominant Liberal historiography as it dealt with the movement for parliamentary reform. In somewhat different ways each author scrutinizes in great detail, and throws into disrepute, the older assumptions that the Second Reform Bill was the natural and inevitable extension of the First; that it was a response by the political elite to mass uprising and the threat of revolution; that in the tangled course of its passage the lines of conflict were chiefly between democrats and anti-democrats; that, in fact, there was much coherence at all to the plans and actions of the principals.

What emerges from both chronicles is a picture of Byzantine maneuvering by party leaders and notables to the virtual exclusion of ideological concern or even of policy in the substantive sense. Overarching the counterpoint and confusion of the innumerable franchise, reapportionment and redistribution measures introduced in these years was the simple fact that both Disraeli and Gladstone believed that any successful reform bill would enhance the position of their party and themselves in the political climate of that day. Thus Smith's conclusion (p. 229) that the bill "survived because a majority of the members of both Houses of Parliament dared not throw it out. They did not want it, they did not like it, they feared what it might do." In the circumstances of the 1860s, before modern British parties had really come into being and when splinters and independent-minded factions abounded, the prize of party advantage went to him most successful in carrying along his own natural supporters and detaching or neutralizing the opposition's presumed supporters. It was, in a day of low party cohesion, a difficult feat. After countless struggles, Gladstone tried and failed in 1366. After more struggles, more intrigue and floods of ambiguity, Disraeli succeeded in welding together enough support to pass a bill more liberal in its electoral provisions than the Liberals were prepared to introduce a year earlier. The full story shows that it was almost as much a matter of chance as of shrewd political calculation.

Neither author is willing to credit the principal actors with essentially democratic intent. Disraeli, whose values were consistently conservative but whose strategy was bound by no fixed guidelines, was quick to rationalize the new act as the flowering of Tory democracy. Thus his words to the Merchant Taylors' banquet:

It is said we are on the verge of a great democratic change. My lords and gentlemen, believe me the elements of democracy do not exist in England (cheers). England is a country of classes, and the change impending in the country will only make those classes more united, more content, more complete and more cordial (cheers).

Gladstone and the Liberal leaders were scarcely more enamoured of mass democracy at the time. Like Key's southern Democrats, the British political class in the 1860s was in implicit agreement that the lower orders should not come to power; similarly, its politics took the form of fluctuating coalitions based largely on personal power and partisan interests rather than on issues and programs. Yet paradoxically, the substance of the Second Reform Bill—the sudden expansion of the electorate that it brought—was in large measure responsible for the unmaking of the mid-Victorian party system and the rise of mass politics in Britain.

Both of these books are thoroughly researched, well written, and overpriced. Neither makes many concessions to the lay reader who lacks prior knowledge of the intricate history of the period. Of the two, Smith's is easily the more straightforward, judicious and succinct. It has a less hammered-at thesis than Cowling's, and unlike the latter extends backwards and forwards from the years 1866-67 and draws in social as well as political materials. Smith also is less airy than Cowling in dismissing the influence of events outside Parliament and the inner circle. and he makes more of the activities of extraparliamentary figures like Bright and of groups like the Reform League. Cowling's book is a highly detailed interpretation of the two critical years leading to the passage of the bill. It is more difficult to follow, but it is superior to Smith's account in several ways. While he does little to relate the proceedings in Westminster to outside social movements-and in fact denies vehemently that there was a direct connection-Cowling shows in revealing detail how Disraeli was able to piece together his majority by playing on the needs of MPs for other legislative largesse and for patronage and honors. Cowling is also willing to let his speculative powers go, tossing out several competing but plausible explanations for the same conundrum and then showing how the historian, using primary materials and certain sets of assumptions, reaches a probabilistic conclusion. This results in a less lucid narrative and a more eccentric style, but for the social scientist a more enlightening book, than Smith's. As those who know Cowling's Nature and Limits of Political Science will surmise, it is also a book vou can argue with.-JAMES B. CHRISTOPH, Indiana University.

Huaylas: An Andean District in Search of Progress. By Paul L. Doughty. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1968. Pp. 284. $12.50.)

In recent decades, Peruvian politics have gradually changed from control by an oligarchy of traditional values to a system of multiple forces in which military guardianship of the peace appears to be a dominant influence. More socio-economic adjustments have occurred during the past twenty years than during a century and a quarter preceding the late 1940's.

When elected municipal governments were revived in 1963, after forty years of appointed councils, students of the Peruvian political system began to note efforts of municipal councils in carrying out reforms of President Fernando Belaúnde. The grass roots level of government took on a meaningful function as another set of calipers in measuring changes in this republic. Councils on the coast were examined by at least some social scientists not limited to Lima for field work. However, dozens of towns in the Andes have been ignored in terms of public affairs, even by ministries of the Peruvian government. Yet the Andes are a vital part of the nation.

This unitary republic is divided for administration into twenty-four departments, each in turn subdivided into provinces, which in turn are subdivided into districts. Professor Doughty, an anthropologist, chose for his field work the Department of Ancash, and finally narrowed his area to the District of Huaylas in the north-central part of Peru.

He gives social scientists a close look at a modern, changing peasant community, the town of Huaylas, and other towns in the district of the same name. He deals with social customs and other facets of society of concern to anthropologists, economists, and geographers. He also devotes considerable emphasis to public works projects, municipal administrators, and the problems of raising municipal funds.

The author presents much information that is missing in the usual ethnographic accounts: extensive data on local government and politics, put into social perspective with tables, maps, and photographs.

Doughty went into Huaylas during 1960-61, again during 1963-64, and briefly in 1966. Much of his data and general references are current, making this volume a handy reference for the Andean region of Peru.

In choosing Huaylas, Doughty found a district and town with excellent municipal records, extensive archives going back to 1889. The author conducted his own census and various surveys. Behavioralists will be pleased to learn that the census forms were printed on IBM cards and analyzed in Lima. The data collected on his questionnaires were transferred to Unisort 5-by-8 marginal punch cards and classified according to the system developed for the Human Relations Area files.

Aside from good local records, Huaylas also proved to be a fertile field to probe in terms of human relationships. The mayor and municipal council and the governor of the district were each eager to have surveys of their human and physical resources. In-depth interviews are only as valid as the rapport between interviewer and interviewee.

As a further vindication of the choice of the site for studying an Andean peasant community, an award should be noted. While this book was in press in 1967, the District of Huaylas was named winner of the silver award given each year by the President of the Republic to a community, district, or province in national recognition for what it has accomplished in its own behalf.

The District of Huaylas has accomplished much, in terms of road construction and civic projects ranging from a free public library to new school buildings.

In the chapter dealing with public works, the jaenc or public collective work force is described in detail. Back in the era of dictator Augusto Leguía, in 1921 the Conscription Law obliged all able-bodied men from twenty-one to fifty years of age to work twelve days a year on road construction, except for the exempted upper classes. The 1930 coup d'etat which ousted Leguia ended that law. The current Constitution, enacted in 1933, in Article 55 prohibits forced labor. Yet Article 135 of the Organic Law of Municipalities states: "In case of a lack of special funds for the maintenance of reads, all capable inhabitants will contribute . . . with personal work . . . or with their funds." Doughty found the faena persisting as one of the most viable of local institutions in the Andes.

In Lima, the Supreme Court has found no conflict between Article 135 of the Municipal Law and Article 55 of the Constitution, but in the coastal cities, community work parties since 1963 have usually been part of the Popular Cooperation Program, Peru's version of VISTA. In the Andes, however, when a road needs completing, the men of the community legally can be put to work. The author explains how it is done.

If Doughty had expanded his notes on the regional aspects of nationalism, political analysts would have been grateful. The book's flaws are minor, such as finding British translations: for example, the Ministry of Hacienda is called the Exchequer instead of Finance or Treasury. But undoubtedly here is a book of marked value to students of Andean Community public life.—Marvin Alisky, Arizona State University.

Disraeli. By ROBERT BLAKE. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1967, pp. 819. $12.50.)

This is a biography in the grand style. Learned, well-written, and exhaustive, it has justly been received with critical acclaim. Blake's approach may seem to modern behavioral scientists old-fashioned and his subject matter far removed from their own interests. However his book should not be dismissed as irrelevant for the student of contemporary politics. The author is careful to avoid the pitfalls of projecting present patterns into the past but he tells us a great deal about the nature of political leadership and politics in an industrializing society.

Like his subject as prime minister in the House of Commons, Blake speaks in the cool and sometimes cynical tones of a man of the world addressing a sophisticated audience. Far from taking a condescending attitude towards his readers, he assumes that they are thoroughly familiar with British politics in the Nineteenth Century and can appreciate his frequent literary allusions. But even those who may not know anything about the "Bedchamber Crisis" and have never read the novels of Max Beerbohm will find this book a fascinating study that judiciously combines careful research with imaginative speculation.

Disraeli's contemporaries and most of his previous biographers found it difficult to comprehend this complex man. It is one of the great accomplishments of this new study that we come to understand him so much better than from the biographies of Monypenny and Buckle or Maurois. Blake is unsurpassed in his astute probing of Disraeli's motives and personality development, though one wishes he had not sought to link them to traits attributed to the "Mediterranean character" and "Jewish race" of his subject. A little less disdain for psychological analysis might have been more rewarding. For instance, what we are told about Disraeli's relationship with his mother and Queen Victoria-his "Faery Queen"-and about his life-long attachment to older women raises some fascinating questions which Blake prefers to leave unanswered. However, one should not take an author to task for refusing to delve into matters which he considers beyond his interest or competence. The same applies to Blake's dictum that the biography of a prime minister does not call for a history of the times, though he might have been well advised to have given greater attention to the broader socio-economic and political conditions under which Disraeli had to operate. The world beyond the governing "Establishment" remains obscure and the stage setting for the leading actor reveals little of the England outside Westminster, the clubs and salons of London Society, and the manor houses of the ruling few.

Disraeli was not a heroic leader and Blake does not indulge in panegyrics. He shows us a brilliant and charming man, but also one who was vain and ruthless in his determination to overcome immense obstacles in his drive for power. When he finally made it to the top of the greasy pole Disraeli was too exhausted to savor it to the fullest. "Power!" he said at the apogee of his success. "It has come to me too late." He was a passionate man, but he lacked the moral fervor of his great rival Gladstone. He had great intellect, but he was no intellectual and considered the Victorian intelligentsia enemies. He was a man of strong conviction, but also an opportunist who used wile and flattery to advance his financial and political fortunes. He played a leading role in the extension of the Franchise in 1867 and as Prime Minister was responsible for a number of important social reform measures, but he was no egalitarian. Queen Victoria referred to her favorite Prime Minister as "a man risen from the people," by which she meant the middle class. But Disraeli thought of himself as an aristocratic defender of Crown, Lords, and Church against the lower classes.

The Disraeli who emerges from this book was above all a superb politician who stood head and shoulders above most of his contemporaries and more than held his own in the company of a Bismark, so different and yet also in some ways so like him. Blake calls him an extraordinary man of genius who, "like most men of genius operating in a parliamentary democracy, . . . inspired a great deal of dislike and no small degree of distrust among the bustling mediocrities who form the majority of mankind"—a judgement which perhaps tells us as much about Disraeli as about his latest biographer.—Lewis J. Edinger, Columbia University.

Mauritania. By Alfred G. Gerteiny. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. 243. $6.00.)

This book is, as noted by the author, the first in English about a "totally neglected and little known country," and is, therefore, a general survey of the geography, people, history, government, and economy of Mauritania, rather than being an analysis in depth of its political system. Professor Gerteiny is a historian who devotes only a small portion of the book to political institutions. His best chapters are neither those on history nor political science, but the ones which deal with the geography of the country and its people, the Moors, and black minorities, the Fulbe, the Halphoolaren, the Sarakoles, the Wolofs, and the Bambara

No doubt the chapters dealing with the Moors, who constitute 73 percent of the Mauritania population of an estimated 850,000, are better because of the greater availability of resource material and because Professor Gerteiny was a perceptive visitor while living among them. It is obvious that hard data in other subject-matter areas is lacking in a country that is 73 percent nomadic, extremely traditional (even slaving is common outside the urban areas), and poorly educated (only eight high school graduated in 1962). Professor Gerteiny has done well with what was available in data. Most of this, as he notes, is in France or Dakar. There is no institution of higher learning in Mauritania or library worthy of the name. There are no Mauritanian scholars; when Mauritania gained independence in 1960, there was only one trained lawyer, Moktar Ould Daddah, who came home from France to rule the country.

Mauritania's future, according to Gerteiny, is hopeful, even if her past and present have not been. The hope, so it seems, stems from two principal sources. One is the prospect for exploitation of mineral resources, primarily iron, in the north and the development of fishing around Port Etienne. The other is the one-party, benevolent dictatorship of the government under the leadership of Moktar Ould Daddah, Moktar is described as a man who realized the need for "balance" in the country: that is, between the basically hostile blacks and whites; between agricultural development near the Senegal River and mineral exploitation in the north; and between East and West by use of "positive neutralism." We are told that the President learned the value of one-party rule from Sekou Touré in Guinea, but that, unlike Touré, Moktar Ould Daddah knows the value of France. He should; Gerteiny estimates that until 1968, when the French-dominated MiFerMa company reaches an annual rate of iron ore production of six million tons, France will have subsidized the country annually, up to as much as 75 per cent of the national income.

The problems are many. As Gerteiny writes, "Sixty per cent of Mauritania is in The Sahara Zone, and half of that conforms with the classical description of the cruel desert. . . ." Four-fifths of the country has less than four inches of rainfall annually; only in a narrow band of 10 to 20 miles in width running along the Senegal River does the rainfall average from 12 to 26 inches. Sand dunes of varying types cover four-fifths of the country.

Of a population of 850,000, only 12,000 earn a regular wage. Eight thousand of these few derive their income as government bureaucrats. Average income in 1965 was approximately $75 a year. Aside from mineral extraction the economy is based upon subsistence agriculture and animal husbandry. Scrawny cattle are pushed from one water hole to another, and when they are marketed, it is usually after a long drive in which they have lost an average of 30 pounds from an already meager frame. Save for some of the more progressive blacks living near the southern border of the country, the average Moor is caught up in a traditional feudal society in which role playing is rather rigidly prescribed, and work is distasteful. The Moor mixes Islam with African mysticism, and fears the black Africans; normal African tribalism is confounded with racism.

One cannot help but draw certain parallels between Ould Daddah and Kwame Nkrumah. Both were educated outside their own countries, only to return near the time of independence. Both saw tribalism as potentially disruptive, and both converted their republics in 1961 to presidential dictatorships to form "guided" democracies. Indeed, as Gerteiny points out, Mauritania differed from other French-speaking colonies of West Africa; it was governed by "indirect rule," more in the British fashion, and contrary to the more direct rule of other French colonies. It, therefore, undoubtedly is true that both saw the problem of nation building in somewhat the same terms. Nkrumah cut off his British ties and was deposed; Ould Daddah has kept Mauritania in the Gaullist sphere so far, and has had the support of French military, political and economic aid. The future, in Gerteiny's terms, is hopeful; in mine, it is very uncertain.—Bruce B. Mason, Arizona State University.

Justice in Communist China. By Shao-chuan Leng. (Dobbs Ferry: Oceana Publications, Inc., 1967. Pp. 196. $6.50.)

Despite its untiring chanting of creative application of Dialectic Materialism to the Chinese situation, the Marxist-Leninist teaching of law as a coercive machinery of class struggle remains a constant article of faith for the Chinese Communists. As Mao Tse-tung-stated in 1949, laws and courts, among other apparatus, are all weapons with which one class oppresses another. They are instruments through which the dominating class consolidates its control, suppresses its enemy and protects its social order. Consequently, for a Communist State existing in a stage when "imperialism still exists, domestic reactionaries still exist, and classes within the country still exist," it is necessary to strengthen such apparatus in order to eliminate other classes and further the cause of communistic harmony. A view which unmistakably echoes the famous Leninist dictum that "Law is a political instrument. It is politics."

Viewing from this perspective, any discussion of the judicial system of Communistic China will at first appear to be a self-contradiction. For if the system is run solely by terror and violence backed up by the coercive apparatus, then the term justice is a meaningless word. The system could, at best, be regarded as a worthless window-dressing showing the hypocritical concern for legal niceties by the Communist leadership. It could never be a safe subject, however, for a disinterested scholarly study in view of the constant meddling exerted by the political dictates of the state.

Such inferences, though seemingly sound, are nevertheless dangerous delusions which could only blind our real understanding of the system and weaken us in the long run. For despite its alleged progressiveness, Communist China, like other polities, must come to realize that justice is not a nicety or luxury but a necessity. Socialist legality undoubtedly must deal effectively with the "antipeople reactionaries" and their political crimes. But, on the other hand, it must also address itself to the daily maintainance of domestic tranquility and satisfy a basic need for some outlet for the feelings of order, of rightness, of reciprocity, or reward and punishment, which exist in all people.

Small wonder that seven years after he came to power, Mao Tse-tung took pains to make the distinction between antagonistic contradictions (contradictions between Communists and their enemies) and non-antagonistic contradictions (contradictions among the people) and spent hours defining the meaning of "enemy" and "people." Although the former contradictions must be dealt with cruelly, violently and summarily, the latter, as he belatedly conceded and advised, must be treated in a "democratic and benevolent" way.

Conceivably, the difficulty involved in studying such a judicial system lies in finding out, among other things, the proper bailiwick of the two contradictions, the apparatus through which political and non-political crimes are prosecuted, and the ways by which decisions are reached in both areas. To be sure, these are not legal questions per se. They are political questions which can be grasped only by employing broader frameworks and fresher approaches. It is here that Mr. Leng's book can be regarded as a significant step.

The book addresses itself primarily to the institutional aspects of the judicial system of Communist China. It is organizationally divided into two parts. The first part deals, chronologically, with the evolution of the system from the 1920's to the present (the most recent data cited in this book dated June, 1966.) The second part analyzes the structural and procedural aspects of the present system. While the first part is inherently informative, the second part is the more interesting and substantial portion of the book. Unhampered by the narrow legalistic concern, the author rightly focused on a broader judicial pattern as the basis of his discussion and avoided a rigid construction of the legal rules. He therefore provides his readers with informations on a variety of organizations through which justice is either ordinarily meted out or frequently sacrificed. Not only familiar organs such as the court, the procuracy and the system of legal counsel are all succinctly treated, extra-legal organs such as the police and other control structures like schools, factories, enterprises, mass organizations as well as mass trials and onthe-spot trials are also included and dealt with in varying degrees of penetration. Reading through it will inevitably lead one to the impression that justice in Communist China, to the extent it exists, is indeed at the mercy of the state. Lacking what is known as judicial independence, extra-legal organs may easily intervene into the merits of a case. The result, needless to say, would more often than not be an application of force rather than an administration of justice.

Confining itself, however, to the institutional aspects alone, the book undoubtedly leaves certain questions to be answered. By treating Communist China as a country in a fluid state of transition, the author did not attempt to draw a line between the two contradictions and understandably refrained from telling us where justice may end and force begin in this system. There is no reason, however, to be equally acquiescent on this issue as it manifested itself during the period covered by this study. For without such a distinction, the study of judicial institutions, however broadly conceived, will appear to be formalistic. The reader is not clearly told about the informal and unwritten practices that govern the intervention of these extra-legal organs. Nor is the reader told about the process through which these organs bring their power to bear. Although party intervention is frequently implied, not a single case, for example, has been fully cited to illustrate the point. As such, the book may be said to have failed to exhaust the utility of the broader framework adopted by the author. It has avoided the most complicated issue in the judicial system of Communist China.

As a relatively slim volume, the number of misprints in this book has reached atrocious proportions. Some of them even obscure or distort the content of the book. An errata will definitely be needed to redress this clerical damage. Also, the citation, translation and transliteration of the Chinese titles need to be standarized. Perhaps an abbreviation in the beginning may well serve this purpose. In any event, obvious shortcomings notwithstanding, Mr. Leng has blazed the trail in a relatively new area. For those who are interested in Chinese Communist affairs in general and its judicial system in particular, this is undoubtedly a vital book.—Chan Lien, The University of Connecticut.

Nationalists Without Nations: The Oligarchy Versus the People in Latin America. By Victor Alba. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1968. Pp. 248. $7.00.)

Another effort has now been made to demonstrate the deficiencies of the Latin American political system by centering upon one set of actors and then censuring them for the societal malaise. Alba's book, however, is distinguished from many others in that it is written with a pervasive understanding of basic Latin American values and of the attitudes that shape Latin American political culture. Alba has had years of experience in Latin America which have allowed him to observe and analyze the varieties of Latin American nationalists and to offer some very telling insights.

The author is trying to answer the question: "Why have Latin American countries fallen so far behind in the race for prosperity and well-being?" The answer is given very early in the study—the oligarchy has encouraged a special type of ersatz nationalism which serves as a substitute for real nationhood—and is discussed for the remainder of the book. The point is made that nationalist stances are taken by landowners, the middle class, various members of the socialist fraternity, professors, students and many others who wish to ease their consciences for being members of an advantaged sector of society. In many instances they take the same position as the anti-imperialist Communists. The upshot of these de facto alliances between the landowners, the middle class and left-wingers, the author maintains, is the tendency to deal with the effects rather than the causes of underdevelopment, while leaving the masses submerged and unassimilated.

The future appears somewhat dim, for any of these groups might turn to the military for support against another group and the armed forces are increasingly available to such overtures. Alba warns that the alternative to a new style of technocratic-militarism, in which, as the author calls them, "Leninist military men" would ultimately ask for Communist collaboration, is the new industrial middle class, interested in economic planning and social reform. The younger elements of the middle class must choose between the oligarchy and its allies and the people.

Though it is not explicity stated, the reader is made aware of Alba's ideational debt to the Aprista program and to its leader, Haya de la Torre. In the prescriptive parts of the book (especially chapter 8) Alba calls for the political unification of the Latin American states, planned industrialization, and agrarian reform in a fashion very reminiscent of proposals espoused in the past by the Aprista movement in Peru. Alba's views also closely coincide with the 1960 Declaration of Lima, (a conference attended by representatives of the Bolivian MNR, the Costa Rican National Liberation Party, the Paraguayan Febreristas, the Peruvian Apristas and the Venezuelan Acción Democrática) from which he quotes:

". . . national and revolutionary movements, formed as a front of the exploited classes, with a genuinely Latin American doctrine and program and with roots in civic majorities, are the most efficacious instruments with which to consummate economic independence and establish social justice in our countries. . . .

(they asserted their) unalterable rejection of Communist totalitarian penetration of Latin America, against which our parties have always fought, as much because of an insurmountable difference in social and political philosophy as because of the deviationist and prejudicial activity and frequent complicity with dictatorships and reactionary forces that have been typical of Communism in Latin America"

The book's best chapters are 6 and 7 which discuss Communist policy in Latin America as it cohabitates with equal alacrity under dictatorial, populist and conservative regimes. The author demonstrates that the Communist Party had little stomach for land reform when in positions of responsibility, as in Chile after World War II. He observes that the espousal of anti-imperialism enhances the credentials of any self-respecting nationalist very much the way anti-clericalism sustained liberalism a century ago. Thus the more moderate an intellectual is on domestic questions the more pro-Russian or pro-Chinese he must be on international affairs. Particularly worth reading are Alba's ironic interpretations of the Latin American artist as intellectual (pp. 152-156) and Latin American professors and students (pp. 159-160).

There are, however, several shortcomings in the book as a contribution to the political science literature on Latin America. There is an overabundant use of polemical sources, categorical and unsubstantiated statements are made and some major concepts are left undefined. The book reads as a personal indictment of the Latin American political system by an advocate of inter-American political union. Given his initial advocacy, he proceeds to find little but cynical and self-interested political leadership and major opposition groups. This gives his account, in several places, an air of unreality and makes it susceptible to the charges of being quite similar to some of the Marxist tracts which Alba himself admittedly shuns.

In several other respects it falls short of giving a balanced analysis of the problems and obstacles to national development. Nationalism is made to appear as some kind of identifiable quotient arrived at by the will of truly responsible leadership yet he has an understandably difficult time defining it in the 1st chapter. Nor is the reader given an explanation of how a nation achieves a sense of nationality, or through what stages it might pass. This makes it difficult to enter into any concerted dialogue with the author. The term "oligarchy," which appears as the single most crucial subject of the book, is not clearly defined. Sometimes the term is used to include only the largest landowners while elsewhere it implies everyone but the unskilled laborers and the peasants. As the "oligarchy" emerges as the bête noire (in this case the landowner) so the author also provides us with the key problem in the scenario-agrarian reform. The "oligarchy" is attributed with an excessive amount of cynicism and an extraordinary amount of omniscience as it wheels and deals in the political process. At the same time, agrarian reform is perceived as the Gordian knot.

Alba's basic thesis that the pseudo-nationalists and oligarchies are responsible for the Latin American countries falling behind in "the race for prosperity and well-being" is premised on the notion that "Spanish America was richer and better organized in 1810 than the poorer and more backward United States." Certainly in terms of entrepreneurial skills, technological knowhow, interchange of goods and services, exploited resources, communications, social mobility and parliamentary experience this view is difficult to substantiate. One is tempted to reflect on the importance of seeing Latin America in historical and comparative perspective.—Peter Ranis, York College, City University of New York.

Prospects for Soviet Society. Ed. By Allen Kassof, (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1968. Pp. 586. $10.00.)

Soviet Politics Since Khrushchev. Ed. by Alex-Ander Dallin and Thomas B. Larson. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1968. Pp. 181. $4.95.)

These two volumes provide a Horn and Hardart-like glimpse of recent trends in the USSR. They are a welcome supplement to the literature, much of which concludes with the Khrushchev era. Both the interdisciplinary nature of the volumes and the limitations of space prevent us from doing more than indicating the issues raised in these 25 essays and rendering some critical judgments as to the general nature of the enterprise.

The collection edited by Princeton sociologist, Allen Kassoi, grew out of a series of conferences sponsored by the Council on Foreign Relations and is considerably broader in scope than its title indicates. Most of the eighteen essays are expert summaries of developments in a particular field over the whole Soviet experience. In this respect, one is tempted to number the volume among the best of the several collections published to mark the -50th Anniversary of the October Revolution—except that the thrust of the latter portion of each essay is directed towards predicting future trends rather than evaluating past deeds.

With the exception of John Campbell's essay on the "International Environment," the editor has kept the focus on the USSR domestic scene. Economists Arcadius Kahan and Herbert Levine write on agriculture and industry respectively. Jeremy Azrael contributes a chapter on the CPSU and Princeton historian, James Billington, writing poetically on a subject dear to his heart-Soviet Intellectuals—will provide political scientists a short course in his Icon and the Axe. One must be impressed here as elsewhere in the volume by editor Kassof's ability to marshal indisputable experts in various sub-fields of Soviet Studies: Sidney Ploss on Interest Groups, Thomas Wolfe on the Military, William Medlin on Education, Alexander Vucinich on Science, and Mark Field on the Family. In the latter treatment is a moving section on the effects of the Detskie Doma on orphans, with the author concluding that "the Engelsian dream of freeing the family from its socialization function may be chimerical." Of interest too are significant essays in areas usually neglected: Population, Leisure, and Stratification by, respectively, Warren Eason, Paul Hollander, and Dartmouth sociologist Robert Feldmesser.

Especially noteworthy is Cyril Black's comparative view of Soviet and Western development:

In the perspective of fifty years, the comparative ranking of the USSR in composite economic and social indices per capita has probably not changed significantly. So far as the rather limited available evidence permits a judgment, the USSR has not overtaken any country on a per capita basis since 1917 with the possible exception of Italy, and the nineteen or twenty countries that rank higher than Russia today in this regard also ranked higher in 1900 and 1917.

The chef d'oeuvre in this volume is Vernon Aspaturian's essay on the Non-Russian Nationalities. Twice the average length of the other contributions, it is a significant and well-argued—though not uncritical—apologia for Soviet nationality policy. The author's distinction between "russianization" (as in "hellenization") and "russification" is carefully delineated. Even those who will not agree with critics of Professor Aspaturian's views must regret his failure to give the reader a clearer idea of the political problems confronting the Soviet regime because of continued non-Russian nationalism.

By way of general comment, one is astonished that Leon Lipson's too brief essay on Law is the only concerted attention paid to civil liberties, a domestic concern that would seem to be the fundamental issue when discussing the "Prospects for Soviet Society." A lengthy volume might have been considerably shortened by avoiding background information in many of the essays; e.g., "The Ukrainians constitute a compact unit in the southwestern region of the Soviet Union." Finally, the markedly high quality of the collection and its copious documentation are made less useful by an inadequate index.

The Dallin-Larson series of seven essays is narrower in scope, presenting detailed summaries of events in key areas of Soviet politics since Khrushchev's fall from grace. It is interesting to sense here as in the Kassof volume how well Nikita Khrushchev wears with the passing of timemuch like our own Harry Truman. Alec Nove writes on Economic Policy, Jerry Hough presents an excellent and thorough study of reforms in government and administration, Thomas Wolfe again writes on military policy. There is considerably more attention paid to foreign affairs in this work with William Zimmerman contributing an essay on "Soviet Perceptions of the United States" and Aspaturian on foreign policy. Regrettably, here as in the other volume, there was not time to assess Soviet aims in the wake of the Middle East crisis. Both Wolfgang Leonhard and Richard Lowenthal present insightful interpretations of the domestic political scene in broad strokes. The editors are to be congratulated for successfully avoiding what might have been a highly repetitious series of essays. The publishers deserve thanks for leaving footnotes where they belong.—WILLIAM PARENTE, Antioch College.

The Dynamic of Mexican Nationalism. By Frederick C. Turner. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1968. Pp. 350. $8.50.)

Starting just about a hundred years ago, Mexico began in earnest the slow process of nation building, constructing the railroads, opening up the mines, and developing the commercial agriculture which in time would permit the evolution of an internally oriented economy and growing interdependence among all of the regions of the republic. Only about fifty years ago did this material development result in a definitive break with past social-political patterns during the decade-long period of disruption known as the Revolution of 1910. Even so, writers of the thirties and forties could still speak of "Many Mexicos," or of the continuing process of forging a fatherland (forjando patria), for Mexico still was not fully unified into a single nation. To some extent the integration process is not complete today, but a sense of the Mexican nation is deeply enough felt and widely enough held to permit consideration of the factors which helped to implant nationalism in a majority of the country's citizens. Professor Turner's The Dynamic of Mexican Nationalism provides such a discussion.

Using a combined historical-analytical approach, the author shows how a mixture of xenophobia brought on by difficulties with Spain, France, and the United States and gradual physical-economic development provided a base of common attitudes which could relate to some of the shared values growing out of four centuries of Spanish-Roman Catholic influence to spark a national revolutionary movement after 1910. If in the beginning by no means all sectors of the population supported the Revolution, or even knew it had occurred, a large enough nucleus of citizens shared its integrating goals to permit the spread of a sense of national purpose. The bulk of this study describes the historical events and social mechanisms used to involve the greatest part of the populace in a generally shared, nationally oriented value system. Considering the nature of the study, not much emphasis is placed upon the important contribution to consensus made incidentally by mass communications and transportation as a by-product of technology. Instead, the book stresses the conscious efforts of the Revolutionary governments and of individual Mexicans to use the new conditions affecting the masses to instill more shared norms in the citizenry. Improved economic performance and more flexible social relations, coupled with breaking down of some of the divisive aspects of church and intellectual activities, are shown to reduce the gulf between the masses and the elites. Marked expansion of the educational system does the same, though far too few persons receive sufficient formal training to make them really effective participants in national life. Instead, the study suggests, most Mexicans are socialized into an awareness of the wider world and given a feeling of belonging to single social-political entity through less formal devices, particularly literature, drama, and the popular arts—music, films, and more recently radio and television.

Mr. Turner's findings are slightly more optimistic than my own. My experience indicates that Mexico still has a way to go before the majority of its citizens acquire that sense of near absolute assurance of personal and national worth and identity which permits easy acceptance of divergence from generally approved norms. Similarly, despite greater willingness on the part of many citizens to accept critical discussion of specific conditions in their country, whether from other Mexicans or foreigners, a majority of the population continues to react negatively to such analysis. This kind of chauvinistic nationalism is perfectly understandable in a people still striving to consolidate their sense of national identity, but it is symptomatic of unresolved integration problems. Mexico has accomplished much in forging the bonds of constructive nationalism, as Mr. Turner so ably demonstrates, but the process is not yet complete. If some Mexicans find this judgment from a foreigner unpalatable, especially from a gringo, let me suggest that some of their brethren in our own southwest or the many inhabitants invelved in the crisis of the cities could tell them that the process of national integration is not yet complete in the United States either.—ROBERT E. Scott, University of Illinois.

Population and Political Systems in Tropical Africa. By Robert F. Stevenson. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1968. Pp. 306, $10.00.)

For the most part, Mr. Stevenson's book is nothing other than a critique of Fortes' and Evans-Pritchard's African Political Systems. Right from the outset, one is confronted with a temptation which is often difficult to resist; the urge to admire the courage of a man who dares to attack a sacred cow. African Political Systems is regarded as a classic in social anthropology, and its authors have acquired the status of the founding fathers in the area of political anthropology. To the extent that Population and Political Systems in Tropical Africa takes issue with the classic, it demands careful attention.

Admittedly, the purpose of the author is to show that there is a demonstrable relationship between the density of a population and the complexity of a political system. He writes: "In short,

I am solely and exclusively interested in discussing their (Fortes' and Evans-Pritchard's) assertion that African data indicate that in Africa, at least, there is no relationship at all between population density and state" p. 17.

He does not argue that there is any direct causal or invariant connection between the two variables. Nor is he contending that in all state societies there will always be population densities higher than those in non-state societies. He merely attempts to show that "... there is a highly probable though indirect relationship between population density and state organization" p. 18.

According to Stevenson, two propositions, with regard to the two variables of population density and complexity of political systems, can be deduced from African Political Systems:

- States are correlated with high population densities; stateless societies with low population densities.
- II. States are correlated with low population densities; stateless societies with high population densities p. 14.

The authors of African Political Systems denied the validity of both propositions, but an examination of the six cases presented in their book will suggest that the second proposition is valid. This tends to obfuscate the authors' stand and invalidate their contention. Robert Stevenson challenges the no-relationship stand of Evans-Pritchard and Fortes. In addition, he vigorously contests the relationship which their data seem to imply.

The methodology of the authors is criticised and the accuracy of some of their data questioned. Stevenson thinks it is unfortunate that food-gathering bands were omitted from their sample by definition. He is skeptical about the fact that all the states cited were in the southeastern part of Africa and questions their judgment for not including any of the recognized major African states in the sample. Perhaps his more serious criticisms are threefold:

- that the sample of the authors was not truly representative of the studies included in the book;
- that, in many cases, population estimates were grossly incorrect;
- that the authors used, in a strictly synchronic context, data from the colonial period in order to test generalizations concerning the formation process of indigenous states.

Broadly speaking, Stevenson's investigation can be divided into several parts. First is the comprehensive analysis of the cases presented in African Political Systems. Then, there is the demographic inquiry where he looks at contemporary population patterns in Africa and tries to interpret what they show regarding the relationship between density of population and indigenous state formation. Finally, there is a concentration on a special case, the Ibos of southeastern Nigeria, which he considers to be an apparent, but not real, major exception.

His critical analysis of the cases in African Political Systems indicates that there is a general pattern of a positive relationship between state formation and high population density. In most of the cases, however, there is no cause-effect relationship between the two variables. The relationship seems more complex, and it involves commercial communication, political and economic organization, and population density in a threeway nexus of complex but reciprocal interactions.

The author's contribution to the understanding of traditional African political systems lies in his reconsideration of the Ibo traditional political system. To say this is not to give him undue primacy; nor should it be construed as a denial of appropriate honor to Professor Dike. Stevenson's uniqueness is in his articulation of the case. He spells out Fried's criteria for statehood and applies the criteria to the Ibo case. In his opinion, the Aro satisfied Fried's primary and secondary functions. He concludes:

In terms of Fried's criteria, then, the Aro organization would seem to constitute a state. The major distinction between the Aro and a state like Dahomey would seem to be in the Aro concentration on crucial nerve centers, trade routes, and markets rather than on a circumscribed and bounded region as such pp. 210-11.

Perhaps not every reader will grant the status of statehood to Aro, but it will be difficult to dispute that a process of state formation was well underway in Iboland. Personally, I do sympathize with the author's position; it is not gratuitous to regard the Aro as a state. One important point must not go unnoticed; states need not come only in one structural form. Indigenous African states are no exception. While we must accept the Sudanic states with their "conventional, centralized, monarchical model" as a type most common to indigenous African states, we must also be cognizant of the probablity of other structural models. Pobert Stevenson seems to argue that the Aro represents a model, different from the classic structural model.

In balance, I feel that the author has achieved his stated objective and he has done so painstakingly. He has drawn upon almost all available resources relevant to his subject (Evans-Pritchard's Essays in Social Anthropology is conspicuously absent from Stevenson's bibliography) and articulated his argument rather meticulously, perhaps, sometimes, too meticulously. This is not a book for a casual reader. A serious student of African history, politics, political anthropology, anthropology, and even geography will find it rewarding. It is a happy example of the fruitfulness of the inter-disciplinary approach.

However, there were times when I wondered if Stevenson had not been too harsh on the authors of African Political Systems. After all, Evans-Pritchard in the 1950's was among the first to admonish his colleagues to shift away from the static and synchronic analysis and move towards the diachronic study of societies. In fact, he specifically wanted them to consider the histories of the societies they study. I find this passage from his Essays in Social Anthropology most redeeming.

But with the bath water of presumptive history, the functionalists have also thrown out the baby of valid history. They say . . . that even when the history of a society is recorded it is irrelevant to a functional study of it. I find this point of view unacceptable. The claim that one can understand the functioning of institution, at a certain point of time without knowing how they have come to be what they are, or what they were later to become, as well as a person who, in addition to having studied their constitution at that point of time, has also studied their past and future is to me an absurdity. Moreover, so it seems to me, neglect of the history of institution prevents the functionalist anthropologist not only from studying diachronic problems but also from testing the very functional constructions to which he attaches most importance, for it is precisely history which provides him with an experimental situation p. 21.

Perhaps the fact that the book was originally written as a dissertation may be partly responsible for the unusually sharp tone of the author. Incidentally, it may also explain the somewhat dry style. Of course, this may also be the case of the subject matter dictating the style of its writer.—VICTOR A. OLORUNSOLA, Iowa State University.

Friends Not Masters: A Political Autobiography. By Mohammad Ayub Khan. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1967. Pp. 275. $7.50.)

Pakistan's Development: Social Goals and Private Incentives. By Gustav F. Papanek. (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1967. Pp. 354, $8.95.)

These two books complement each other in an admirable fashion. Friends Not Masters may be described as the memoirs of a man in power who has tried to justify his seizure of political power in terms of the political stability and national unity that his country gained following his intervention. But he has not told us anything about how Pakistan achieved phenomenal economic progress under his regime. It is to the credit of Dr. Papanek that he has described in such a lucid and graphic manner the story of Pakistan's impressive economic development.

There are two dominant themes in President Ayub's political autobiography—political stability and foreign policy. The theme of political stability is familiar in the sense that Pakistan had to be saved from incessant squabbles among politicians and regional strife by the intervention of General Ayub and the imposition of martial law. President Ayub has defended the new political system consisting of a dominant President, a docile legislature, and a controlled electroate that he has ushered in under the Constitution of 1962. In his defense, he can point out that the former political process under the parliamentary system, given the existing social structure and regional cleavages of the country, could not and did not generate encugh political power in the executive for purposes of maintaining national unity and promoting economic growth. Therefore, under the new system the primary need is to mobilize and consolidate considerable political power in the hands of the executive. But the crucial question from the point of view of long-term political stability is has the President been successful in using this power for creating national and regional consensus and in mobilizing adequate economic resources for purposes of economic growth? The President has been successful in the latter objective and not in the former. In spite of economic growth and the ostensible political support that he has gathered through the system of Basic Democracies, the President has bitterly recorded: "On a number of occasions I have been accused, abused, and vilified, subjected to all kinds of rumours and slanders, all thoroughly unjustified and untrue, by some of the biggest blackguards in the country. and I have swallowed it." The President is justified in complaining about the acerbity in the attacks of the opposition. However, the failure of the regime in the art of skillful manipulation and minimization of its coercive machinery and above all the sense of political alienation that exists in East Pakistan and some of the urban areas of West Pakistan are factors which cannot be brushed aside as inconsequential.

It is in articulating the emerging trends of the foreign policy of his country that President Avub displays a level of skill and sophistication which has seldom been equalled by an Asian statesman. He explains why and how Pakistan had to give a new orientation to its foreign policy after the American decision to give military aid to India when that country was faced with Chinese incursicn in 1962. He conceives of Pakistan's relations with each of the big powers, the U.S., the U.S.R. and China, in terms of bilateral equations and how each such equation would be determined by the limits of tolerance of third parties. In other words, Pakistan would align itself with a power like the United States or China, but the extent of cordiality and the support that Pakistan would give to the major objectives of each of these powers would have to be so skillfully manipulated that each power would give maximum assistance to Pakistan. Ayub by no means is the first or the original expositor of such a policy. However, President Ayub can claim credit for the new course that has been charted for Pakistan's foreign policy and for the sense of pragmatism and shrewd assessment of the geopolitical interests of the big powers on which this foreign policy rests.

Papanek's book not only provides a fascinating account of Pakistan's economic development, but also the role played by the main actors, namely, the administrators and the businessmen, in this drama of development. Dr. Papanek describes in an illuminating manner how Pakistan, having inherited the authoritarian traditions of the British bureaucratic system and a hard core of competent administrators, first decided in favor of direct controls and how these controls on the whole turned out to be deterrent rather than stimulating for economic growth. Direct controls resulted in incorrect decisions, delays, excessive stocks, errors in the direction of investment, and in composition of imports.

The United States when faced with the problem of acute depression adopted certain economic measures under the New Deal legislation which, drawing on the ideas and policy proposals of Keynesian economics, avoided the alternative approach of drastic direct administrative controls of a totalitarian variety. Papanek's book suggests that a developing country like Pakistan, faced with the problem of scarce resources and mounting population, can also adopt indirect controls exercised through the price mechanism and fiscal measures and progressively dismantle a number of direct controls. What is more, he has tried to demonstrate that Pakistan by embarking on a policy of indirect controls in 1959 and at the same time discarding a number of direct administrative controls has been able to forge ahead economically in an impressive manner. Dr. Papanek, while recommending a system of indirect controls, does not suggest that Pakistan should adopt a pure type of capitalist or free enterprise system. He assigns a prominent place to government intervention and innovative economic policies. The system that he advocates is one where the machinery of government will be used to harness self-interest of the individual and particularly the entrepreneur to social goals. However, it may be added that Pakistan's rapid economic growth since 1959 cannot be attributed only to the dismantling of several direct controls because the latter action was facilitated largely by the generous grants of economic aid that Pakistan received from the United States during the early 1960's.—KHALID B. SAYEED, Queen's University, Canada.

The Administration of the White Australia Policy.
By A. C. Palfreeman. (Melbourne: Melbourne University Press, 1967. Pp. 184.)

From the establishment of the Commonwealth of Australia in 1901 until 1958, and in effect until 1966, it was the policy of all Australian governments to prevent the entry of non-whites as permanent residents, subject only to specified exceptions on family and business grounds. This was the White Australia policy, probably the most widely-known product of the Australian polity. Though it had economic as well as racialist origins and justifications, the policy and its title were all too clearly the product of a time when racial pride was both blatant and narrow. 'We are more British than the people of Great Britain,' said Prime Minister W. M. Hughes in 1919, adding gnomicly, 'and we are held firmly to the great principle of the White Australia because we know what we know.' The last twenty years have seen the abandonment by all parties of the belief that Australia should remain overwhelmingly British in ethnic origin, and there can be no doubt that that change is real and permanent. The last ten years have also seen some modification of the policy of excluding non-white immigrants on principle, but no-one, not even the men who drafted the changes, can know whether they are sheer window-dressing or the beginning of a process which will produce if not a multi-racial society then at least a significant proportion of Asian-Australians.

Mr. Palfreeman's book thus comes at a convenient time, though it is plain that the policy changes of 1966 were highly inconvenient for him and necessitated some insertions and revisions. The content of his quite short book is very much what its title declares. The larger and better part of it is a study of the principal administrative rules and their application from 1901 to 1966, together with a necessary summary of the statutes which gave them validity. The book does not pretend to be a history of the policy in any other sense than this, still less to be a critique or an apology, though elements of all these things are to be found in it.

Though great issues were involved in the policy of exclusion, as we need no reminding now, the administration of the laws by which it was expressed inevitably was a matter of day-to-day decisions which in themselves were usually trivial and often had an element of burlesque. In 1901. Australia had a Chinese population of about 30,000, and the subsequent history of non-white immigration was predominantly concerned with enabling Chinese-Australian restauranteurs, market gardeners and other small business men to bring into the country a sufficient number of assistants to maintain their distinctively Chinese businesses in the manner to which they and their customers were accustomed. The result, as Mr. Palfreeman's account shows, was a rich growth of bureaucratic distinctions and a jargon in which to implement them. The most memorable example of the latter is 'Liberal Attitude Status,' meaning not, of course, the status of people who held a liberal attitude but that bundle of rights possessed by a favoured group of non-white immigrants towards whom the Department of Immigration, in its own opinion, adopted a liberal attitude. Mr. Palfreeman himself sometimes falls victim to the stylistic contagion of his materials, referring in one place to 'the traditional policy of optimum exclusion of non-Europeans,' but on the whole he gives a lucid and illuminating account of how a series of little consistencies and little anomalies become a formidable, if distinctly creaking, body of rules. No one need puzzle further over such problems as how large a Chinese restaurant had to be before the Department of Immigration would agree to the admission of three cooks from China to work in it. The answer to this question, and to dozens of others of the same order, are carefully set out in this book. Mr. Palfreeman acknowledges the assistance of the Department in his research, and it is certainly not his purpose to condemn its officers, past or present. Nor does it appear from his account that they should be condemned. Nevertheless, when viewed from the present time, the record has an air of shabby complexity and misplaced ingenuity, while sometimes, especially those past instances which involved the deportation of the non-white husbands and wives of Australians. it has a more painful and shameful quality. Sometimes Mr. Palfreeman permits himself a subdued irony. For example:

Clearly, the administration of the White Australia policy by this time had become quite elaborate and sophisticated, and no doubt was founded upon carefully considered, albeit obscure, desiderata about who should enter for temporary residence.

The broader aspects of the policy and its critics, which do not really come within the scope of the title, are handled summarily and even uncertainly. Mr. Palfreeman summarizes the possibily portentous statement of the Minister for Immigration in February 1966, which opened the way to some non-white immigration, and quotes it in full in an appendix. One can sympathize with his uncertainty as to what this change really portends, but he also appears to take both sides of the argument to which it gives rise. He refers in one place to 'the existing policy of exclusion,' appearing to discount the significance of the change altogether, but in another place says that the administration of the policy as it now exists 'could well be the deciding factor in finally sealing the coffin of the White Australia policy,' implying that the policy is already dead or at least moribund. Political attitudes to White Australia, and particularly the abandonment of at least the phrase itself by nearly all the political parties, are handled too briefly and in some respects misleadingly. But Mr. Palfreeman has very helpfully illuminated what was previously the most obscure aspect of the very debatable subject of non-white immigration to Australia, and that is a considerable task and a considerable service.—D. W. RAWSON, Australian National University, Canberra.

Thailand: The War That Is, The War That Will Be. By Louis E. Lomax. (New York: Random House, 1967. Pp. 175, $4.95.)

Louis E. Lomax is a man with a deep, admirable, and completely understandable emotional involvement in the quest for social justice in the United States. His previous three books have all dealt with various aspects of this problem, and his new book on Thailand is closely related to this theme despite its subject matter and, perhaps, despite the intent of its author. There is little in Thailand for the area specialist or for layman inquisitive about the area. In fact, this volume abounds in overstatements, understatements, and misstatements about Thailand, and the uninformed reader should be warned of this in advance. Yet this is not a book without its rewards. Before turning to these, however, let me briefly describe the plot.

Louis Lomax had proceeded as far as Cambodia enroute to Hanoi when his invitation was unexpectedly rescinded. Rather than waste his trip he diverted himself to Thailand, and for this detour he reports that he will always remain grateful to Ho Chi Minh because "Thailand . . . is where the action is (p. x)." In Thailand Lomax interviewed numerous officials (including a lengthy session with the powerful American Ambassador, who did not emerge as one of the author's favorite personalities), intellectuals, peasants, surrendered guerrillas, and practicing communists in serene Bangkok and in the troubled Northeastern and Southern provinces. His thesis (so far as one can say that this book has a thesis) is that an undeclared and unacknowledged war is in progress in Thailand, that in this stage it is strikingly similar to the beginnings of the Vietnamese conflict, and that once the United States has lost in Vietnam it will shift its full-scale operations to Thailand. Thus, Lomax is reporting "the war that is" and prophesying "the war that will be." It is a thesis that is intended to needle both Thais and Americans, and, indeed, reactions on both sides indicate that Lomex has been very successful in this.

The really interesting aspects of this book stem from neither the author's reportage nor his prophesies. The book is far more fascinating for the insights it provides into the dilemmas facing many perceptive, inquiring, and responsible American critics of a liberal bent. Lomax is innately anticommunist enough that he is frightened by the thought of a communist regime in power in Thailand, but he is constantly troubled by the unarticulated suspicion that of all the persons he interviewed only two groups—the Peace Corps and the communists—seemed seriously concerned about the physical and psychic well being of the Thai masses. And, despite his conditioned reflex against communism, Louis Lomax is equally and more consciously concerned about the exploitation of the underprivileged by the establishment, whether he finds it among Negro sharecroppers in Mississippi or among the Phu-Thai of Northeast Thailand. Moreover, while Lomax apparently looks forward with some misgivings to the day when the liberals shall have become the isolationists and the conservatives the "globalists," he nevertheless seems to presume that there is little the United States can or should do in Thailand. He seems to be trying to tell us that the fatal flaw in this tragedy is that in the end the tyranny of the establishment will bring about the destruction of the system. And Thailand is not alone in being victimized by an establishment. In answer to his implied question, "what can change American military policy toward Thailand?," Lomax replies:

if the Congress and the people rise as one and cry "Halt!" to the military-industrial complex, those men of war Dwight Eisenhower so passionately warned us against, then American men will no longer die in the wrong place, for the wrong reasons, and at the wrong time (p. 161).

Louis Lomax is caught up in a whole series of contemporary American dilemmas, and his book on Thailand's internal problems is more illuminating for its obiter dicta on America than for its major theme.—ROBERT O. TILMAN, Yale University.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW, AND ORGANIZATION

Arms Control and the Atlantic Alliance: Europe Faces Coming Policy Decisions. By Karl W. Deutsch. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1967. Pp. 167. $5.95.)

As a factual report on the attitudes of French and West German elites toward arms control and related areas in 1964, this study is excellent. My criticism of it stems not from its methods of data collection or what it reports at a descriptive level but from (1) its almost complete failure to give any theoretical interpretation to its content, (2-the form in which this content is communicated, and (3) the validity of some inferences made from the data.

The study involved interviews with 147 elite respondents in France, and 163 in West Germany, from several different occupational categories.¹ France and West Germany were singled out for detailed study because of the decisive influence their leaders certainly will have on the success or failure of arms control and disarmament, and political integration, in Western Europe. In fact, at the end of the study Deutsch proposes to institutionalize the pre-eminent position of these two major continental powers in a Four-Power NATO Executive Committee that would also include Britain and the United States, with each country sharing more or less equally in the direction and control of the future Atlantic Alliance.

¹ Methodological details of the sampling and interviewing are given in the companion volume to the book under review, Karl W. Deutsch, Lewis J. Edinger, Roy C. Macridis, and Richard L. Merritt, France, Germany and the Western Alliance: A Study of Elite Attitudes on European Integration and World Politics (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons 1967).

For such a short book, it provides some pretty ponderous reading. The book's appendices, giving a large summary table, the interview schedule, and a statistical breakdown of the responses to most of the questions in the schedule, comprise 60 of the book's 147 pages. When the tables in the main body of the book are added to the appendices, only about half the book is left over to text.

The bulk of this "text" is a summary of the statistics given in the tables and appendices. (As if the statements in the text are not to be believed or really must be checked, many are cross-referenced to the questions and response breakdowns in the appendices.) In page after page chock full of figures, Deutsch presents the survey results on the general attitudes of the French and West German elites toward aims control and disarmament and their specific attitudes toward each other, other countries, European integration, NATO, German reunification, the French force de frappe, and the MLF (multilateral nuclear force) proposal. He finds widespread support from both the French and German elites for disarmament and arms control on a worldwide scale, though the two elites differ to some extent on such questions as the desirability of MLF and an independent nuclear force.

The topics explored are clearly important, and the responses of each elite by age, occupation, etc. are revealing in the sense of not always being "obvious." Deutsch argues that this kind of quantitative research can yield information about changes in political conditions before they are manifest even to astute observers, citing a correspondent's report of strong French support for President de Gaulle's attack on NATO over a year after the quantitative data were in.

Yet even after the condensation of "several thousand pages of typescript, tables, and computer printout" (p. ix), the study more resembles a code and data book than an interpretative analysis. There is little doubt about Deutsch's ability to digest prodigious amounts of data. When presented serially and in such overwhelming detail, however, the task of culling the most important findings from even these predigested data, and grasping their broader significance, becomes a task of heroic proportions. The quantitative responses to question after question leave one with a sense of bewilderment and finally loss in trying to relate back the figures to those given in the previous paragraphs and the preceding chapters.

This is not a criticism that the details shouldn't be filled in but rather that they should be developed within a theoretical framework that makes them interpretable at a higher level of analysis. Because no model of the process of attitude and opinion formation is offered—or even a set of hypotheses that relate responses in different substantive areas to the processes of consensus formation or political integration—the question of how things got the way they are and what their cumulative impact is tend to go unanswered.

This failure to anchor the study theoretically by making the assumptions of the analysis explicit and tracing out their logical implications has repercussions on the validity of some inferences drawn from the data. In one of the few statistical tests reported—that age accounts for less than 10 percent of the variance observed (p. 68)—the inference drawn that present attitudes are likely to persist for some time is simply not a logical consequence in the absence of a model that relates cross-sectional variance explained to longitudinal fluctuations. The conclusion that "the development of . . . a French-German consensus is likely to require far more than ten years, even under favorable conditions" (p. 15) is another unsupported inference from the data; to make such a projection (why not five or twenty years?), what is needed is not only the "broadly based evidence" that Deutsch calls for but a specification of the empirical indicators used to define operationally "consensus" and an analysis of their differential rates of change over time. Finally, the conclusion that the French Fifth Republic is not "a surface phenomenon that will vanish after President de Gaulle" (p. 73) may or may not turn out to be true; the important point is, however, that this inference presupposes a theoretical perspective which is not made explicit: that the influence of the intellectuals and nonbusiness interest groups, who were least willing to give the Republic after de Gaulle a long lease on life, will not turn out to be significant.

Deutsch is at his best when he steps back somewhat from his data and speculates on the future of the Atlantic Alliance. His plea for a loosened alliance unbridled by United States assertions of hegemony does seem to touch the contours of favorable elite opinion. It is unfortunate that these recommendations spring more from an attempt to surface "trends" in the data than from a theory which Deutsch might have given us and used his data to test (as he has superbly done in earlier studies).—Steven J. Brams, Syracuse University.

Propaganda and World Public Order: The Legal Regulation of the Ideological Instrument of Coercion. By B. S. Murry. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1968. Pp. 310. $10.00.)

The encomia with which this book comes readily equipped and packaged are enough to propagandize a timid reviewer before he gets a chance to object. On the front jacket flap Professor Richard Falk says the book is "undoubtedly the most profound and comprehensive study of this important subject yet available," while the back flap echoes in the words of Professor J. B. Whitton that "the present work is superior to anything I have read on the subject." In a glowing foreword Professor Lasswell declares "it is as sure as any prognosis can be that his work will be accepted as the landmark treatise on an elusive topic."

I found it instead an elusive treatise on a landmark topic. Some day, perhaps, a great book might be written on the legal and political questions involved in attempting to regulate the use of propaganda-what Professor Murty calls (throughout the book and rather ponderously) the "ideological instrument of coercion." Even as purely normative political theory, the question of whether, and if so what types of, propaganda should be regulated offers fascinating potential. Although Professor Murty does not shrink from offering prescriptions, his book suffers not only from a basic lack of psychological realism but also from a lack of concrete examples of propaganda that he would allow or disallow in his repeated goal of securing "minimum" world public order.

In the first place, what is propaganda? Professor Murty talks extensively about it in 294 tightly printed pages, but for a central organizing concept the best he can offer is that it is an "ideological instrument of coercion," while the latter term is defined—straight out of the Encyclopedia Britannicz—as "moral or physical compulsion by which a person is forced to do or to refrain from doing some act apart from his own voluntary action." Leaving out physical compulsion as irrelevant, this leaves us with moral compulsion. That, says Professor Murty, occurs when a person is "subjected to a high degree of constraint in the choice of alternatives in shaping his conduct." How many alternatives? A "few," says Professor Murty, and those are "attended with expectations of high cost and low gains." (p. 28).

But in what sense are alternatives restricted by propaganda? Are they physically removed? Morally deflected? Are we talking about a recipient of propaganda whose visual horizons become clouded as a result of the insistent message, who sees fewer alternatives than are really there? The housewife who homes in on a particular brand of soup without "seeing" all the others on the supermarket shelves? Or has someone, working with the propagandist, actually removed all the other brands?

And how about conflicting messages? Professor Murty has a large blind spot for the informative effects of conflicting propaganda. Busy with the task of trying to regulate one stream of propaganda, his schemata would probably become too complex if he had to acknowledge that a second stream could neutralize the first. (It's hard for anyone looking at "law" with the evident awe that Professor Murty evinces to say that two wrongs can make a right.)

Clearly a basic problem with the book is lack of specificity—despite the numerous sources and even examples that are cited. Just what image or concept bothers the author? I got the impression that cases such as the Japanese warmongering machine that was in full force in the 1930's is something that the author would like, somehow, to suppress under international law. But there is no detailed study—as might, for example, be undertaken by factor analysis-of the relation between internal propaganda and external aggressive behavior, or even more important, of whether one may infer a causal relationship between propaganda and aggressiveness. Propaganda might be a result rather than a cause, and as such could be useful in alerting other nations to the propagandizing state's intentions.

The author alludes in passing to several studies of the content analysis of propaganda, as he also alludes to gestalt psychology and "Pavlov's conditioning theory" (no mention of Skinner). Content analysis, of course, is not directly relevant to the author's purpose, which is to indicate how propaganda can and should be legally regulated. But an awareness of the numerous levels of commitment, motivation, and cognitive dissonance that research in content analysis demonstrates would have served the author well in his attempt to lay down rules for legal regulation. Rather than simply stating that many of the questions are matters of degree, he would have seen that the question is whether any lines can be drawn at all. If Japanese propaganda brought on the second world war, should the United States immediately silence the John Birch society? From an international law standpoint, how can the other nations force the United States to silence the Birchites? Would such an attempt to force a country to take steps against the freedom of speech of its own citizens itself lead to world war three? Or is propaganda bad only if its emanates (is controlled by?) official sources? What should we have done with Hitler, who constantly preached peace? The author has considerable trouble with the results of the Nuremberg trials which did not hold as criminal any propaganda per se. He writes that if Goebbels had been one of the defendants he would not have been acquitted, but the evidence he cites from the trials indicates that a Goebbels conviction would have been based on participation in a conspiracy to initiate a war of aggression and not on his radio broadcasts. Although the author does a commendable job of summarizing the history of propaganda as a concept of international law, his analysis progressively falters as matters are brought up to date.

Professor Murty's heavy reliance throughout on organizing categories derived from the writings of Professor Lasswell gives the book a sense of organization that is not really there. Some chapter headings, for instance, are: "clarification of policy," "audience," "objectives," "situation and capability," "strategies," "outcome," "decision process." These umbrella words overlap all over the place, with the result that matters brought up in "objectives" are repeated in a later chapter called "outcome" and again in the chapter called "decision process." We read the chapter on "audience" only to find that audience has little if anything to do with the analysis. Chapter headings become titles of index-card boxes in which the cards are reshuffled indiscriminately. This is not to blame Professor Lasswell, whose brilliance and acuity if anything transcended his cumbersome terminology in his pioneering works on propaganda and related subjects. Rather, it seems to be a by-product of the main stream of behavioralism these days, which finds in outlying tributaries jargon-infested studies which to the nondiscerning reader cast disrepute on the main stream itself. Professor Murty simply made use of the wrong types of methodology.—Anthony A. D'AMATO, Northwestern University.

The Common Aid Effort. By MILTON J. ESMAN AND DANIEL S. CHEEVER. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1967. Pp. 421. $7.50.)

This book addresses itself to the manner in which Western industrialized countries can more rapidly reduce the well-being gap between themselves and the poverty-ridden nations of the Third World. The authors' main hypothesis is that the North-South "confrontation between the rich and the poor is likely to be the most important and enduring problem in international affairs." (p. ix) Contending that cooperation among the donor nations can significantly increase the effectiveness of help given to the poorer countries, this study centers on the Development Assistance Committee (DAC) of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). The member nations of the OECD include the fourteen members of NATO, the three European neutral states of Austria, Sweden and Switzerland, and Spain and Japan. The United States, France, Great Britain and Western Germany have played the leading role in the evolution of DAC, DAC assists "the donors by enabling them to perceive their national interests in terms of larger objectives and wider perspectives than would be the case if there were no common aid forum." (p. 6).

The first chapter in The Common Aid Effort reviews the evolution of aid from UNRRA to the Marshall Plan in the aftermath of the Second World War, and in the context of the Cold War which followed. During the fifties, many newly independent, impoverished nations became recipients of foreign aid. Despite this assistance the average per capita income in the developed countries is more than seven-times that of the backward nations, or, to put it differently, "30.2 percent of the world's population receives 75.5 percent of its goods and services." (p. 21) Since the Soviet Union and Communist China have also entered the arena of developmental competition, the income gap between industrialized countries, whether they be market or centrally planned economies, and the poorer nations continues to widen. Almost all of the developing countries' economic performance falls short of their aspirations, "thus increasing their frustrations and the probability of violence." (p. 23) During the period 1954-63, OECD member countries contributed over eight-times the amount of aid furnished by the communist countries. The communist aid program, however, helped to stimulate the OECD countries to begin to think about a common aid effort. The Western industrialized nations have moved in that direction despite the uncertainty that "economic aid will promote democratic societies, economic stability, international cooperation, or improved commercial relations." (p. 25)

The authors frequently refer to the concept of foreign aid strategy and seem to believe that DAC could provide the forum for such a strategy. Strategy implies the selection of a common goal, the choosing of intermediate-phased objectives, and allocation of adequate resources with which to achieve them. Chapter 4, "The Development Assistance Committee," negates the possibility of a foreign aid strategy being developed within that mechanism. "The DAC was conceived and remains essentially as a framework or a forum for governmental representatives to discuss, rationalize, and, where possible, cooperate, coordinate, and harmonize national aid policies and operations." (p. 144) In fact, "there is little public evidence that development policies are considered in the DAC in terms of a coordinated free world political strategy." (p. 145)

The various member nations of DAC regard the value of their membership in this committee from differing perspectives. Some members of the U. S. Congress believe that DAC can be used to induce its members "to accept a larger and more equitable proportion of the common aid and defense burden, of which they believe the United States is now shouldering too large a share." (p. 182) Yet the American contribution to foreign aid has been dropping so rapidly that we may no longer have the leverage to induce contributions from other countries. In 1951, foreign aid appropriations represented 2.2 percent of the U. S. national GNP, whereas in 1967 it represented 2.9 percent of a GNP that was well over twice as large.

France, which frequently sees advantage in acting individually, values information gained from the exchange of ideas within the DAC working parties. West Germany, anxious to achieve acceptability in world affairs, values participation in a common aid effort which also helps to promote export opportunities. "The United Kingdom has become increasingly convinced of the DAC's utility." Informed Britishers believe "the common strategy and even coordinated action may be required...." (p. 185)

In the concluding chapter, the authors reassert that "one of the major international tensions for the next half-century at least will be the confrontation between the rich nations and the poor." (p. 323) A different point of view was presented by George W. Ball in an article entitled, "3½ Super Powers," which appeared in LIFE Magazine on Merch 29, 1968. Ball urged that the creation of a stable and prosperous Europe should be our highest policy goal. This reviewer agrees with Ball that "at least for the next several decades, the discontent of poorer nations does not threaten world destruction."

Esman and Cheever contend to the contrary—that the North-South problem "cannot be ignored because modern technology has created a web of interdependencies that interlinks the fates of all nations. Neither distances nor traditional systems of control nor overwhelming military power can shield the industrialized nation from events that take place in the emerging countries." (p. 324-325) The developing countries' tactic of pressuring the incustrialized nations to help them is abetted by the "growing current opinion in most of the industrialized countries that favor foreign aid for a combination of humanitarian, commerical, and political reasons." (p. 325) This statement is too optimistic. The United States has stressed the Alliance for Progress as the key to development in Latin America. Yet, during the last year, there has been a decline in living standards as the population explosion in Latin America far outpaces advances in industrial and agricultural productivity.

U. S. leadership and greater commitment to foreign aid is absolutely essential for more effective development in the Third World. "Since leadership belongs to the United States, the slackening of American performance will result at best in stabilization and at worst in a reduction in the European efforts." (p. 359-360) The retrenchment program initiated by Trudeau in Canada, the inward turning of most European countries, and the dissenchantment which many Americans hold toward their country's involvement in world problems, make it unlikely that the pressing needs of the developing countries will be satisfied.

The authors of this book have made an objective and low-key appraisal of one of the most important problems facing mankind. If the aid which is desirable, or even necessary, will not be given, one can only hope that George Ball's assessment of the poorer nations proves to be correct: "They can create local situations of instability and they can appeal to the conscience or cupidity of the industrialized nations, but they do not, given reasonable prudence on our part, have the capacity to precipitate major world conflict." (LIFE Magazine, March 29, 1968, p. 83.)—WILLIAM R. KINT-NER, University of Pennsylvania.

Defense of the Realm: British Strategy in the Nuclear Epoch. By R. N. ROSECRANCE. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1968. Pp. 308. $7.50.)

This book presents a careful analysis of the evolution of British military strategy from 1946 to 1966 with particular emphasis on the formative years from the end of World War II to the Suez disaster. The story of British defense policies is told largely in chronological historical narrative. American strategy is a constant reference point. The author takes particular care to demonstrate that far from being a mirror image on a smaller -scale, or worse still an impotent dependency of the United States, Great Britain initially showed greater vision and realism and experienced unrivaled successes in strategy and diplomacy. Rose--crance believes that British postwar influence reached its "zenith" in 1954-55: "All of her military adventures, with the possible exception of the retention of the Suez base, were successful. The atomic bomb had been developed independently; the hydrogen bomb was well on the way. . . . In Europe and overseas, Britain maximized her influence" (pp. 192-3). And then came Suez and the awful revelation of weakness, incapacity and dependence upon the United States.

Indeed, how the mighty had fallen! If, before Suez "British courses in world affairs were often not much less ambitious than those of the United States" (p. 216), after that debacle "Britain could no longer be regarded as a major world power; she could scarcely be viewed as a major regional power" (p. 233). Rosecrance briefly and skillfully traverses the period since Suez, ending his narrative with a series of recommendations designed to enhance British power in the future. Summarized, these are: reduce British overseas commitments to the bone; turn vigorously to Europe; join the Common Market: establish special ties with Germany; and—the most interesting and provocative suggestion-arrange, with American concurrence, a British nuclear "trusteeship" that would make it possible for the British to commit an Americanassisted nuclear deterrent for Europe in the form of British Polaris submarines (modified for Poseidon missiles), a deterrent system in which the Europeans alone would participate (details of the scheme are found on pp. 278 ff.). In short, Britain's future lies with Europe and strategic initiatives on her part can make her an influential partner.

There is much to commend the reader to this work. It is strong on analysis of British nuclear strategy. Of special interest is Rosecrance's detailed account of a key "global strategy paper of 1952," which is alleged to have been of lasting influence on British, American and NATO strategies. The author pays particular attention to the linkage between British and American strategy, evaluating the interrelationship from one period to the next. It provides under one cover a comprehensive analysis of America's most important postwar ally.

Rosecrance argues persuasively, if not uniquely, that Britain skillfully enhanced her power by operating as broker between Europe and the United States while at the same time building her own nuclear forces and sustaining numerous far-flung commitments in the Middle East and Asia. It was by any account a remarkable achievement, even if in subsequent years things have not turned out so well on any of these accounts.

On the other hand, the book is marred by a tendency toward hyperbole and anglophilia. The author exaggerates the heights and depths of British power, perhaps for dramatic effect, as he also overstates British influence upon American strategy. In particular, he seizes upon the global strategy paper of 1952, proclaiming its historic significance and pervasive influence, but then admits that Churchill rejected its implications (p. 176) and, indeed in the end, that "the global strategy paper was not really carried out" (pp. 178-9). No doubt the paper was very important in terms of doctrine even if not carried into operational policy, but in this matter, as in too many others, the author simply overstates his case. Likewise Rosecrance claims that NATO "was virtually" Ernest Bevin's "personal creation" (p. 259); that in Korea and Indo-China "it was British influence which prevented a redirection of American energies toward the Far East and maintained NATO resolve" (p. 233). According to Rosecrance, the British first enunciated a strategy of nuclear deterrence, were first to recognize the deficiencies in the Lisbon agreements, were first to build a nuclear force without a putative foe in mind, and unlike the Americans, succumbed neither to the excesses of massive retaliation nor to over-reliance upon conventional forces.

These are all matters of slight exaggeration and/or disputable propositions. They are more in the nature of annoyances, however, than they are serious factual or analytical defects. Most of them appear to arise out of an implicit admiration for the plucky British, an admiration which this reviewer shares. But the constant comparison, often invidious, with American policies has hardly ever really got any point to it. Thus, we are treated at the very outset to the following statement: "Britain has certainly made her mistakes in her postwar military policy, but they do not, on balance, seem greater than those made by the United States" (p. vii). Perhaps Rosecrance is urging us to give the British more credit than we do. There is no other apparent motive.

I do not mean to suggest that Rosecrance applied only praise to the British. He is not only incisive in his analysis of British policies in general, but he lays bare their major deficiencies over time. And whether or not it is germane to argue that the British developed a nuclear strategy "first." he clearly sees its defects, especially when the British after Suez refuse to face up to the deficiencies revealed by and caused by that event. I have yet to see a more lucid account of the factors contributing to British influence prior to the Suez crisis nor a more accurate assessment of the reasons why subsequently Great Britain, in spite of its position as third most powerful nuclear nation, has experienced a waning influence in Europe and in Washington.

For those who have read Rosecrance's other major book, Action and Reaction in World Politics: International Systems in Perspective (Boston: Little, Brown, 1963), I owe at least this passing comment: Defense of the Realm bears virtually no relationship to the theoretical framework and general conclusions of the earlier work. Indeed, where in 1963 Rosecrance concluded that internal (domestic) factors were the most importent variables contributing to foreign policy behavior, in the book under review one has the impression that British strategy evolved in response to external pressures (the international system). But then, Rosecrance did not apply that framework to this analysis.—David W. Tarr, University of Wisconsin.

Nuclear Weapons Safety and the Common Defense. By Joel Larus. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1967. Pp. 171. $6.50.)

Thirteen days before this book was published, Fresident Johnson invited additional outside inspection of U. S. nuclear facilities, thus restressing the relativity of hitherto secret information when world goals are at stake. Thirty-eight days after publication, a SAC B-52 carrying four hydrogen bombs crashed in North Star Bay near Thule. Almost immediately, former Defense Secretary Robert McNamara ordered SAC B-52 alert training flights disarmed of their nuclear weapons. Rarely do events so aptly frame a book.

The growth in both numbers and kinds of nuclear weapons implies the possibility of nuclear accidents-particularly, unintended nuclear detonation and contamination. The chances of accidents some time, somewhere may be 1 in a million, 1 in 100, or as the author accepts Sydney Hook's laconic estimate, just high or low. Purely and simply, Professor Larus argues that civilization has a common interest in sharing information about nuclear weapons safety. "Pure and simple" doesn't cescribe the job he took on, however, Separating the single interest objective of nuclear weapons safety from all other questions of nuclear weapons management takes a lawyer's rhetoric and a political scientist's diorism. Fortunately the author is both lawyer and skilled political scientist, Nuclear Weapons Safety and the Common Defense makes its case eminently readably, conservatively, and remarkably freely of the polemics and tortuous calculations of owning nuclear weapons.

Professor Larus finds two main kinds of radioactivity accidents, along with the conventional two reasons why they happen—human and mechanical. One kind of accident is an "unauthorized, unintentional, or inadvertent" nuclear explosion. The second kind, of somewhat higher probability, is a nuclear mishap, e.g., a weapon rupture that contaminates the environment with fissionable radioactive material without setting off the fissionable material. He weaves a briefing on administrative, economic, and technical nuclear weapons management and safeguards into the fabric of his case-without sacrificing scholarship or punch.

The worst kind of accident has not happened at this writing, but nuclear weapons accidents arehardly unique. The United States admits a dozen so-called "Broken Arrow" incidents since Hiroshima. Professor Larus, working entirely from unclassified data, searches out hard indications of at least another nine. Thus the average is about one U. S. accident a year since World War II. How many more there have been, no one knows. Possessors have been even less willing to talk about arms safety than about arms proliferation.

For many persons, and not just lay observers, the most dangerous consequence of nuclear weapons accidents is nuclear war. And so it doubtless is. But there is an important difference between "most dangerous" and "most likely." Herman Kahn and others concluded that the world was most accident prone during the late 1950s and into the 1960s, i.e., there existed the least manageable combination of political trust and mechanical controls on nuclear weapons. Since then, the superpowers have devoted time, money and experience to reduce to a "very slim possibility" the chances that a "faulty communications signal, a mentally deranged airman, or any other unfortunate mishap could trigger a Russo-American nuclear exchange." But as one likelihood subsided, others arose: the threat that France, China, and would-be possessors have not spent and will not allocate the money and know-how to play it safe with multikiloton weapons. One might add that tactical subkiloton weapons, by whomever possessed, are equally risky though the author barely mentions battlefield nuclear devices.

A fourth of the book deals with nuclear weapons proliferation—the "spreading fires of Prometheus." The length of this section leaves some question as to whether a much more concise statement about arms spread would not better have supported his critical variable of multiple possessors in calculating accident probabilities. It is not that Professor Larus' discussion is not consistent with most published research and thinking in nuclear arms proliferation, i.e., that arms spread is a matter of politics, not cosmic pathology, and can be studied even as other political behavior is studied. It is consistent, and precisely because it is, this part of the book seems to undermine the author's main point that nuclear weapons safety is a separable area for negotiation and that nuclear weapons safety "involves all states without exception."

Not all states, however, would be directly involved in Professor Larus' proposal for internationalizing nuclear weapons safeguards. His program rests on an assumption that all nations must take part in talks about safeguards relevant to their respective levels of nuclear military capability—an assumption that the anti-proliferation pact talks didn't validate. He offers three procedural rules for international safety talks, all three of which have been observed in the past, though infrequently all on the same topic at the same time:

talks would progress from least sensitive to most sensitive information; participant states would have to qualify by demonstrating nuclear military capability relevant to safety information being exchanged; and all resulting information would be shared. His four-stage exchange of information begins with relatively inocuous discussion, politically, about safe storage and basic weapons transport. It progresses finally to mobile, solid fuel dilivery systems. Thoughtful prescriptions and their details should not be summarized, as is done here. But Professor Larus' program itself resembles an unclassified summary of a classified technical-diplomatic agenda that one devcutly hopes someone is working on. Considering that the plan comes from the editor of From Collective Security to Preventive Diplomacy, one concludes that Professor Larus deliberately sketched the program broad brush in the knowledge that is more important now to recognize the problem than detail its resolution. National decisions to opt for nuclear weapons safety must, at some point, pass political tests.

Nuclear Weapons Safety and the Common Defense is not only a book about a fresh, hard, real problem of science and politics. It is at once a model of unclassified digging into an area shrouded by classification, and a pedagogically valuable example of excruciating discrimination, by and large, between more political and less political functions of international intercourse.—
Timothy Alden Williams, Kansas State University.

The Insecurity of Nations: International Relations in the Twentieth Century. By Charles Yost. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger for the Council on Foreign Relations, 1968. Pp. 276. $6.50.)

This book is of interest both to the general public and to specialists, but for different reasons, The theme of interest to the concerned public is that contemporary views of national security are outmoded; the present quest for security can produce only insecurity. If chaos caused by new weapons is to be prevented, a new international system based on nations that are not nations in the old sense of the term must be constituted. Certainly this message, coming as it does, from a distinguished American diplomat, is important. However, for the specialist, neither the analysis of international politics nor the prescription for the future is as interesting as the insight the book provides into the author himself. As a reflection of the assumptions and perceptions of one important member of the diplomatic establishment, and as a record of his views of American policy, it is a fascinating and sometimes frightening volume.

Throughout the book the perceptions and misperceptions, the preconceptions and indoctrination of leaders is stressed. The opening chapters, although cursory and conventional in their survey of twentieth century international history and the forces alleged to underlie our present insecure condition, lay bare the author's assumptions and preconceptions. From these chapters it is apparent that the author is the apotheosis of the humane, liberal, cultivated gentleman whose values and views are challenged by contemporary events. Modern developments, whether scientific, technological or cultural, seem to have been mainly disastrous. The net effect of the twentieth century has been to undermine the old faiths. Science has given a "secular option between heaven and hell" but has disavowed the responsibility for choice; intellectuals have recorded the confusion of mind and soul but have not offered any constructive alternatives: the technological means for solving major problems of production exist, yet the potential is unrealized. Moreover, these advances have created far greater public problems: complex bureaucracies limit flexibility and make problem solving difficult; new developments in weaponry constantly escalate the arms race and inhibit control. All of these developments are disturbing, but for Ambassador Yost they have shattered an orderly world that once existed, the world congruent with the values and goals acquired in another era.

After setting out the underlying causes of international insecurity, the author proceeds to examine the major East-West confrontations in the post-war period. It is frightening to find that in nearly every major confrontation or policy choice, the conflict with the USSR over Japan at the end of the war, the problem of nuclear controls, the assessment of Communist China, the German problem, the posting of the Seventh Fleet to the Formosa Straits, as well as in Laos and Vietnam, the policy chosen was based on misread intentions, faulty intelligence, misplaced confidence and above all, on a failure to take the long view of "what the total society needs." Reality was misread because perceptions and judgments were based on irrelevant past experiences. Further, modernity in the form of research institutes, bureaucracies, and the pressures of an uninformed public, also contributed to failure. Added to these factors was the frantic pace of modern life itself which inhibited diplomatic reflection.

In the third section of the book entitled "Reflections and Conclusions," Ambassador Yost suggests an alternative to anarchy. This section while expressing hope, is hardly optimistic. The alternatives posed require an extraordinary vision and great good will on the part of individual leaders. Essentially he argues that "realpolitik" is now utopian and thus formerly utopian solutions are now realistic. The quest for security by individual nations through the arms race has failed; now a new interpretation of national security and interest based not in terms of glory and prestige but in terms of the welfare needs of the individual is necessary. The United Nations, and its peace keeping arm especially, must be strengthened. Once again the notion of national interest is elusive. A national interest conceived in terms of individual welfare need not be as uniform as he implies; furthermore, individual needs may well be fulfilled by policies of prestige and glory. Ultimately, the solution, if there is one, is to be found in the pressures of an "enlightened public opinion." Unfortunately, if information is already too abundant, and mistaken pre-conceptions as well as mis-perceptions rife among leaders, it is difficult to see how pressures from a public only incidentally concerned could be of assistance. Beyond this, the fundamental problem, the fact that we have not "learned to adapt our inherited emotional drives to the new environment" does not seem to be solved. Perhaps this volume can serve to enlighten public opinion. Most certainly the foreign policy making process it describes does not inspire confidence even though the goals of Ambassador Yost himself are commendable.—Keith R. Legg, University of Florida.

Elite Images and Foreign Policy Outcomes: A Study of Norway. By Philip M. Burgess. (Columbus: The Ohio State University Press, 1967. Pp. 179. $6.25.)

On the eve of the invasion by Nazi Germany in April, 1940, Norwegian leaders assumed that geographical isolation, non-involvement in the issues that divided the major powers, and a strong "peace tradition" would permit their country to remain neutral in World War II, as it had done during World War I. The decision of the Norwegian government, almost exactly nine years later, to become a charter member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was based on a diametrically opposed set of premises about the nature of and conditions for national security. The linkage between the "strategic images," as revealed by elite pronouncement (the independent variable), and Norwegian foreign policy outcomes (the dependent variable) is the subject of this interesting book. Less attention is devoted to the antecedents of elite images although, as in the case of Glenn Paige's recent The Korean Decision, Burgess' study reveals the importance of the analogieswhether valid or not-which decision-makers find in history.

The first chapter, a brief but exhaustively documented survey of Norwegian foreign policy prior to World War II, emphasizes the elements of Norway's historical experience out of which a strategic image supporting neutralist policies developed. Chapter II examines the effects of the Nazi invasion on the thinking of the government in exile in London. To Foreign Minister Halvdan Koht, the military catastrophe of 1940 could be explained by German malice rather than by any basic flaw in the pre-war strategic image. Opposing this view was that of Trygve Lie, who succeeded Koht as Foreign Minister in 1941. The policy outcome of Lie's image was an alliance with Great Britain, the first such military agreement in Norway's history.

The third chapter examines Norway's policy in the immediate post-war period. Historical experience had "proved" to Lie and his successor Halvard Lange, that neutrality was bankrupt, that Norway's geographical position was strategic rather than peripheral in great power rivalries, and that, rather than seeking to isolate themselves from great power conflicts, small nations such as Norway could best serve their security needs by working to make the United Nations an effective "bridge" between the United States and the Soviet Union. Not until 1948 did Norwegian leaders perceive that international tensions had undermined the ability of the United Nations to carry out its security-related functions. The fourth chapter examines how this strategic image initially led to exploration of two policy choices—membership in a Scandinavian bloc attached to the West or direct membership in the Western alliance—and ultimately to the decision to join NATO. This is the most interesting part of Burgess' analysis, in part because he compares the strategic images held by Norwegian, Danish and Swedish leaders to demonstrate convincingly that incompatible images prevented the formation of a Scandinavian alliance.

Among the conclusions presented in the fifth and final chapter, two stand out. First, Burgess concludes that elite images have considerable explanatory power for negative explanation (which policy alternatives were not adopted), as well as for predicting the course of action ultimately selected: "(I)mages and outcomes corresponded very closely, and potential mediating factors were not sufficiently powerful to alter the outcome. Examining only elite images would have left unexplained certain of the tactical domestic and diplomatic maneuvers that were reviewed above, but the final outcome, given the alternatives, was predictable from the images structure itself" (page 160). Second, the finding in other studies that an individual's images are highly resistant to change is supported; thus, modification of authoritative images is most likely to result from change of decision-makers, as in the case of Koht's replacement by Lie.

Among the merits claimed for the concept "strategic image," beyond its apparent ability to explain some important aspects of foreign policy, is its suitability for comparative analysis. This is a valid and important point. In a field that is scarcely overburdened with truly comparative studies, such concepts should be exploited to the fullest extent possible. But those who are induced to replicate this study will find that the absence of an operational definition of "strategic image" makes it difficult to do so. These images appear to include such cognitive components as structure of the international system, nature and source of threat to national security, and the like, as well as an affective or valuational dimension. But nowhere are the rules for coding foreign policy statements made explicit. A more precise distinction between elements of the concept might also stimulate inquiry into some interesting questions of a comparative nature. Which aspects of the strategic image are most important for explaining policy outcomes? Under what circumstances? For what types of nations? In short, Burgess' study suggests that "strategic image" is a concept with considerable potential, but until it is made operational its utility for the comparative or cumulative study of foreign policy will fall short of its promise.—OLE R. Holsti, University of British Columbia.

Cyprus: Conflict and Conciliation, 1954-1958. By STEPHEN G. XYDIS. (Columbus: The Ohio State University Press, 1967. Pp. 704. $15.00.)

This volume, essentially a study of diplomatic effort exerted through the United Nations (the United Nations General Assembly and the Assembly's Political Committee), traces the discussion and action in connection with the Greek Government's five recourses to the world body concerning Cyprus over the period indicated in the title. The author devotes special attention to the positions taken by Greece, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, respectively, but without limiting his account to these states. American readers will find references at various places to the position or views of the United States chief of mission to Greece (as at pp. 83, 137-140, 184, 247, 249); these, as the author explains in his preface (p. xi), are based upon Greek diplomatic sources rather than American archival records.

Particularly instructive are the author's analyses of the views expressed and the positions taken by the representatives of particular members of the United Nations in the long-drawn-out effort looking to the disposition of the Cyprus problem. The very nature of the problem was a subject of some disagreement. As the author suggests (p. 4), the dispute was an "imperfect" one, protagonists and antagonists being allies. The moves concerning Cyprus are described (at p. 23) as "symptoms of irrational behavior in international conflict." While Greece's spokesmen sought self-determination for the island (which their opponents in argument sought to identify with enosis), Turkey's representatives advocated partition for the Cypriots (p. 108), or an Anglo-Turkish-Greek condominium (p. 176). In the course of the discussions there was reference to the Cyprus problem as one which was not a "straight-forward colonial problem" (p. 294) and a spokesman for Greece observed that Greece was separated from a friendly and allied country (the United Kingdom) only by the Cyprus question (p. 321). Self determination, a British spokesman observed at one point in the discussions, had to be applied in a manner suitable to each particular case, and it meant self determination for all—a description which a Greek spokesman challenged (p. 422).

Viewed from the standpoint of an international system of law and organization, the developments with respect to the ease of Cyprus before the United Nations bodies elicited observations to the effect that there was need for a sense of international responsibility in order for a state to play the role of a member of an international society (p. 552). There was further reference to a "primitive society" which, like the United Nations, has neither courts nor police, and which is "primarily a collection of third parties" (p. 557).

At various places in the volume the author has drawn attention to matters of interest to students of international law. One of these was a suggestion (reported to have been made by an American Secretary of Embassy) to the effect that Cyprus might become a mandate or trusteeship (p. 141). There was reference to "domestic" jurisdiction questions (as at pp. 194, 209, 221, 303), to possible recourse to the European Commission on Human Rights (pp. 194-195, 239-240) and to the Cyprus question from the point of view of NATO and the "cohesion of the West" (p. 259). One speaker pointed out (p. 313) that Cyprus was not an "ethnic personality." There is indication at various places of positions which Commonwealth states took in the voting on issues presented (as at p. 493).

The limitations of a brief review preclude more than an illustrative mention of the processes which were involved in the Cyprus case before the United Nations in the selected period. The subsequent developments pertaining to Cyprus underline (1) the seriousness of the continuing problem, and (2) the difficulty of arriving at a solution which would be consistent with principles of the United Nations Charter and with the responsibility of the major states to cooperate in seeking a solution. That the coming of independence to Cyprus has not solved the problem is underlined by the continued United Nations force (UNFIYP) on the island. The basis for an understanding of the still-existing problem of Cyprus is enriched by the detailed account and analysis which Professor Xydis has provided.—ROBERT R. WILSON, Duke University.

U. S. Policy and the Security of Asia. By Fred Greene. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1968. Pp. 429. $9.95.)

This eighth volume in the Council on Foreign Relations' series on the United States and China in World Affairs concentrates on American security interests and commitments in Asia. The approach is as confusing and as contradictory as the subject itself. Although he is obviously well aware of the broader setting in which security questions must be considered, especially in Asia, the author seldom gives more than passing lip-service to the larger aspects of security problems. Doubtless it is true that "security questions deserve close study in their own right," but it does not follow that they can properly be considered apart from other issues and considerations. Thus this study gives an unbalanced picture of the existing situation in Asia and of the prospects for effective American involvement in Asian defense.

So many of the studies sponsored by the Council on Foreign Relations, perhaps because of the limits imposed upon them, lack depth and focus, and this one is an extreme example of the defects of such an approach. Professor Greene is a competent and well-informed student of Asian affairs. It is a pity that he forced his study so rigidly into the Council's mold.

The author argues that Communist China's growing nuclear capability enhances the Communist threat in Asia. Although this means, in his view, that "grim confrontations among nuclear states are in the offing" in Asia, he believes that the United States must commit itself to the containment of Chinese power, and that to do this its "vital interest" and "long-range goal" are "the creation of a balance of power" in Asia (note the word "creation"). Presumably this is to be achieved by reshaping its alliance policies and its alliance system ("the United States must broaden, rather than narrow, existing alliances"), and by "extensive American participation in Asian security affairs" and "an ever-deepening involvement in Asia."

Much of the book is a realistic analysis of the existing situation and future prospects in Asia, which provides ample proof of the difficulties, indeed probably of the impossibility, of implementing the proposed balance-of-power, containment, alliance, and involvement policies. The real difficulty lies not in the author's understanding of the situation in Asia but in his compulsive tendency to offer prescriptions which seem to have little chance of implementation, and which indeed seem likely to defeat the stated objectives if they could be implemented.

A concern for the Asian balance of power is logical enough, although it has an old-fashioned ring. A recommendation for reshaping and strengthening the American alliance system in Asia seems rather unrealistic in the light of the many evidences that the period of the maximum effectiveness of such a system has passed and that, with a few exceptions, there is little support for it among Asian nations today. The call for "an ever-deepening American involvement in Asia," presumably still referring to military involvement, seems to fly in the face of recent experience, and of the wishes of most of America's Asian allies—although it is clear, as the author states, that the leaders of some Asian states are more fearful of an American withdrawal than of increasing American involvement in Asian affairs.

A more balanced view was recently expressed by Congressman Clement J. Zablocki, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, in commenting on the views expressed by witnesses during hearings on U.S. policy in Asia and the Pacific: "Witnesses . . . saw the future U. S. role in Asia and the Pacific as being somewhat less visible than today, but no less important. American power. wealth, and influence would be devoted with maximum flexibility to fostering Asian regionalism, promoting Asian economic progress and assisting Asians' ability to resist certain types of threats to their region's peace and stability. Among those threats would be attempts at nuclear blackmail by the Communist Chinese."

In spite of his desire for a tough line on China and for a neutralization of Chinese nuclear power, Professor Greene wants the United States to avoid "a frozen security posture" and to display "both firmness and a willingness to negotiate." In Vietnam he believes that "the iron test . . . is to demonstrate American determination to block Communist expansion-even in the face of a severe setback." He argues that "As a prerequisite for an Asian nation to decide not to produce nuclear weapons, the United States will have to extend broad, credible, and permanent security guarantees. . . . America's moral obligation in this regard will rise in proportion to its efforts to dissuade these states from producing their own weapons." Realizing that credible and effective American guarantees, especially in the Indian subcontinent, are probably out of the question, he considers other alternatives: "joint nuclear forces of some sort," a "collective-defense arrangement" between Japan and India, "some type of nuclear alliance" with the United States, a joint Soviet-American guarantee, separate but parallel U. S.-Soviet assurances, and a British guarantee, which, incredibly, he regards as "the most realistic and attractive of the 'outside guarantee' approaches."

Professor Greene touches upon a multitude of subjects. His coverage of the security picture in Asia, and of America's security interests, and commitments, is comprehensive, if rather confused, and his recommendations have the virtues of boldness, even though their impracticality is often demonstrated in the author's own words. His analysis, in short, is much sounder that his conclusions and recommendations.—Norman D. Palmes, University of Pennsylvania.

The Art of Diplomacy. By THOMAS A. BAILEY.
(New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1968. Pp. 303. $2.50.)

The preface of this book portends a sense of humor. In it, Professor Bailey states: "I have set forth 267 basic guidelines or maxims" on the art of diplomacy. My first reaction was one of delight. An instructor would have no difficulty in making up exam questions for ten years without repeating himself.

Taken separately, these guidelines or maxims seem routine. The following is a fair sampling: "Study your opponent's strengths and weaknesses"; "tactfulness is the essence of diplomacy"; "flexibility facilitates policy"; "criticism at home weakens policy abroad"; "foreign friendship cannot be bought"; "miscalculation is often the mother of war"; and finally, "armament and disarmament both entail risks." Historical illustrations are provided for each. Taken as a whole they are like quick silver do's and don't's. Should one "keep the diplomatic initiative" always, sometimes, or never? Is it true that "unhappy allies are potential enemies"—and how can we make them happy or should we?

On behalf of Professor Bailey, it must be said that his book is kind of ingerious. It is not easy to ferret out 267 guidelines or maxims, and there may be some point to it. We are not ordinarily aware of all the things that diplomats and decision-makers could do or should think of, and after all 267 is more manageable than say 503.

Does all this mean that we should not be writing policy-oriented books, that The Prince should no longer be assigned reading, that Harold Nicolson's importance has diminished with the decline in boudoir diplomacy, that the Foreign Affairs Quarterly should turn itself into another Journal of Conflict Resolution? I think not. There is still opportunity to whisper in the King's ear, to persuade the powerful, and to bend theory into resipes for action that the harried decision-maker will listen to and use. But, the way to do it is through specific policy proposals about concrete situations.

The difficulty with what we might call Professor Bailey's preceptual approach is that there are contrary precepts for every occasion. Much of Mr. Bailey's advice can provoke the opposite kind of guidance, viz. whereas "the Secretary [of State] should rise above politics," there are times when he would be better advised to immerse himself in their cover. And, it should be added, that when precepts do not admit of their converse, they are simply amusing, viz., "send envoys who are persona grata."

Professor Bailey wants his book to be read by the President, "denizens of Foggy Bottom," and other relevants, and this is a legitimate and important goal for scholars. The goal can best be sought in two ways-by ideas and augmentation and by careful diplomatic history. Scholars have been in the forefront of these suggesting that the USG has not recognized the extent to which Western Europe is now stronger and more desirous of making its own decisions, that power relations in the current international context do not amount to very much, that there is such a thing as "overkill." that the conflict in South Vietnam would involve great cost without a clear or pleasing solution, that our policy priorities were not clear,—and the list is large and impressive. All of these ideas and arguments have found listeners in high places, have given greater depth, subtlety, and incisiveness to the internal governmental debates. The garbage and paper responsibilities of these in government is so great that perspective and freshness are bound to be somewhat lacking. Yet, there are always enough people who count who want ideas to make for an eager audience.

Careful diplomatic history is also relevant and helpful. Despite all the shibboleths about historical analogies, argument by such analogy is commonplace and irreplaceable in discussions of strategy and high policy. By so contrasting and comparing one gets a sense of where things are and what things mean. Of course, this can be a dangerous game, and that is why such histories must be careful to draw attention to their singularity. Moreover, when well done, these historical studies provide insight into ingeniousness and ingenuousness—the former always in need and the latter ever present. One of the big problems of policymaking is simply being able to think of all the alternatives that are both distinct and doable. The familiar policy triangle of one ridiculous extreme, the other ridiculous extreme, and the "middle way" is really not exhaustive, but who is ingenious enough to think of the other choices.

Stressing ideas and history means not trying to be too relevant to actual policy-making. The closer most scholars push toward a time, a place, an act of decision, the more off-base they are likely to be. Invariably, issues arise in the bureaucracy in a special, hard-to-divine way. An agency Policy Planning Staff, Office of the Secretary of Dejense.

Enemies in Politics. By DAVID J. FINLAY, OLE R. HOLSTI, AND RICHARD R. FAGAN. (Chicago: Rand McNally and Co., 1967. Pp. 257. $7.50.)

The notion of focussing attention on the idea of the enemy in politics is intriguing. Here is a fundamental concept involved to a greater or lesser degree in the functioning of virtually every political system extant. Anyone who could make some novel and valid general statements about the relationship between different kinds of political systems and the conceptions of the enemy they employ would be making a very important contribution to the discipline of political science.

The authors of Enemies in Politics, to their credit, raise and begin to explore some of the questions which might lead to such general statements. But they do not take us far along the way to formulating and testing the sort of hypotheses we would be interested in.

The book consists mainly of three separate studies begun independently by each of the co-authers. Holsti offers a content analysis of John Foster Dulles' public pronouncements about Soviet Russia. He finds, not surprisingly, that Dulles viewed the Soviet-American conflict as one rooted in ideological and moral differences rather than merely in clashing national interests. Throughout his six years as Secretary of State, he described the Soviet Union and its leaders as materialistic, despotic, aggressive and atheistic, his emphasis on Communist moral shortcomings increasing toward the end of his term in office. He consistently referred to Soviet policy as hostile to the United States, and even when he perceived particular Soviet actions as less hostile, he attributed these not to any change in motives or in the nature of the Communist system, but to Communist weakness and the firmness of American policies. "The obvious conclusion," Holsti notes, "one with which Dulles fully agreed, is that increasing the pressure on one's opponents will make them even less aggressive. Quite apart from the actual issues involved in a conflict, to the extent that both parties adopt this theory of the other's behavior, there is little prospect for its peaceful resolution"

Finlay reviews the evolution of the idea of the enemy in pre- and post-independence Ghana. Under Kwame Nkrumah's direction, the threat posed by the forces of colonialism, and later neo-colonialism, served as an all purpose rallying point.

mah, suspension of elections, and comprehensive party control of the schools and mass media. The rationale by which these developments were justified involved identifying internal enemies with their external counterparts. Since Nkrumah and his ruling Convention People's Party were Ghana's only effective leaders in the struggle against neo-colonialism, those who opposed them were clearly serving the neo-colonialist enemy.

A similar conceptual fusion of internal and external enemies. Fagan finds, has been a key element in the official ideology of Fidel Castro's "mobilization regime" in Cuba. A content analysis of editorials appearing in the daily newspaper ElMundo during 1961 and 1962 reveals that more than 60% dealt with national or international issues, or infused domestic issues with important international overtones. The most frequent themes of these editorials were criticism and defiance of the United States and its allies and praise for the Soviet Union and the Cuban revolution. By transmitting these themes energetically to the masses through the media, the armed forces, mass organizations, schools and the Cuban Communist Party, the new regime has helped to legitimize its programs, spur the masses to action, and provide new (Communist) models for the Cuban nation and people to emulate.

In a short concluding chapter attempting to summarize the significance of these three "case studies," the authors state the limitations of their own book very precisely:

The cases, organized around a common theme but differing markedly in research style, system level and subject matter, do not provide the sort of data base from which one feels comfortable in launching inductive generalizations not already launched from other platforms. Even less do we feel moved to treat the studies as rigorous tests of the theoretical ideas set forth in Chapter I. There is much in the studies which supports and confirms the generalizations of the first chapter, but the former were not originally designed to test the latter, and they cannot honestly be made to do so post facto (p. 232).

Given these limitations, the authors content themselves with identifying some questions which warrant further investigation: to what extent is the choice of enemies determined by individual leaders as opposed to the historical and cultural milieu in which they operate? Under what conditions do national political elites come to organize political life around the fusion of internal and external enemies cited earlier? What kinds of conceptions of enemies are functional, and what kinds of dysfunctional, to various political systems?

These are fascinating and important political questions, and we can only join the authors of Enemies in Politics in hoping that their preliminary explorations will stimulate some more systematically designed investigation of the nature and functions of political enmity in the near future.— Sheldon Appleton, The Charter College of Oakland University.

The Road to Jerusalem. By WALTER LAQUEUR. (New York; Macmillan, 1968, Pp. 368, $6.95.)

Given the background of Arab-Israeli strife and the drama of the Six Day War, the 1967 crisis is a legitimate subject for instant history, but given the wealth of passions, it is also full of pitfalls. Two books to take seriously are Theodore Draper's Israel and World Politics and the volume here under review. The two bear much comparison, for they go over almost identical ground, share many conclusions, and hold a common pro-Israeli sympathy. Both have done plenty of homework. Laqueur, however, is the victim of his own polemical style. He is eminently readable: he is more clever. erudite, and entertaining than Draper: but his ironies and innuendoes becloud his analysis. His half-hearted acknowledgments of Arab views and interests, hastily rebutted in the same breath, are of little help; his Israelis are real men, his Arabs are newspaper stereotypes, and this gives his book a bit of the flavor of a "Jewish Western." Draper emerges as more lucid and instructive, and, at heart, more serious.

These overtones aside, Laqueur presents a detailed, well-documented account of the road to the 1967 war, plus some interesting interpretations of national policies, particularly those of the Soviet Union and of Israel. He supplies a motive for the Soviets to have deliberately misled the Syrians and Egyptians into believing that large Israeli forces were poised for an attack on Syria in mid-May: to wit, that the Syrian regime was in danger of collapse, that the Soviets were incapable of bolstering it on their own, and that therefore they created a war scare in order to draw Egypt in on Syria's side and bring Nasser's prestige, adroitness, and steadying influence to bear on the madmen in Damascus. The thesis is interesting, though not fully spelled out: why should the Soviets, as Laqueur suggests, have seen this game as free of risks, and why should Nasser have fallen into it so readily? On the other hand, Laqueur shows some ground for doubt that the alleged Israeli buildup was really what moved Nasser, in which case his initial motives, and those of the Soviets, are all the more mysterious. Did Nasser aim only at a limited diplomatic success—the removal of UNEF -and a boost to his sinking prestige, and only later decide to close the Straits of Tiran in a rash moment? Did he want war-"a return to 1948"-or only "a return to 1956"? No one, of course, can give us a definitive answer; perhaps, as Draper puts it, Nasser's problem was that he himself did not know. But Laqueur does not grasp this question clearly, for at some points he gives us one answer, and elsewhere the other. Furthermore, he passes over evidence (cited in detail by Draper) that the Soviets were alarmed to see Nasser close the Straits, and seems surprisingly ready to assume that their policy stemmed from confidence in Egypt's ablity to fight.

On the Israeli side, Laqueur goes into much absorbing detail about Cabinet deliberations, the insistence of the generals that Israel must attack with the least possible delay, and the effects of Abba Eban's efforts to enlist Western diplomatic support. The primary concern, he insists, became Egypt's military buildup in Sinai rather than the closing of the Straits; Israel's very existence was at stake. Meanwhile, Eban's lack of success reinforced the urge for unilateral action. It emerges clearly that the generals were determined on a pre-emptive attack, and the only question was how soon. Yet we also learn that the generals in Tel Aviv-like those in the Pentagon-were certain of an Israeli victory, that they they did not expect an Egyptian attack, and that many soldiers were granted leave as late as June 3. A more sustained analysis of this anomaly, in place of extended accounts of Jewish mothers sending fruitcakes to the front, etc., would be helpful.

The most glaring analytical gap concerns American policy, of which we get only a casual assertion that the Israelis appealed for help in Washington in vain, plus the implication that the June 5 attack had tacit advance approval—points that are clearly contradicted by Draper, who establishes that United States initiatives had by no means played themselves out.

Laqueur's narrative ends on June 5, followed only by a puzzlingly lengthy analysis of world public and official opinion on the crisis. It is curious that he chooses to call his book The Road to Jerusalem, for this title can only refer to Israel's subsequent conquest and annexation of the Arab city, an action that had nothing to do with the stated reasons why Israel went to war in the first place. It does, inadvertently, remind us that the significance of the 1967 war lies not only in the narrow-minded opportunism with which the Arabs arranged for their own defeat, but also that with which the Israelis celebrated their victory.—MALCOLM H. KERR, University of California, Los Angeles.

The Politics of the Common Market. By W. Harr-Ley Clark. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1967. Pp. 180. $4.95.)

However muddy the waters of European integration may appear, the institutions of the European Communities have continued to develop, and the political patterns surrounding them have grown in complexity. A number of books and articles are available to provide a background for observing this shifting pattern. To take a few examples, Leon Lindberg's excellent study, The Political Dynamics of European Economic Integration, published in 1963, is still highly relevant and has been made more valuable by Lindberg's more recent articles; and the articles in the April-July 1967 number of Government and Opposition highlight various aspects of politics and decision making in the Communities.

In addition to works such as these, books of a more basic nature have appeared. These are largely directed toward courses on international relations and European government and are designed to provide a brief descriptive introduction to the structure and politics of the Communities. Although varying greatly in quality, the books in this category face similar problems. Their brevity works against a nuanced and detailed exposition, and they run the risk that certain specific information will be rapidly outdated.

It is in this context that Professor Clark's book is to be considered. Writing before the Treaty fusing the executives of the three Communities was ratified, he attempts to introduce not only the formal structure of the European Economic Community, but the relationships between its component elements as they have developed. He presents a chapter on each of the components—the Council, the Commission, the Commission's growing administration, the European Parliament and the Court of Justice. These are complemented by chapters on interest groups and public opinion in the Communities, on relationships between the E.E.C. and other states and on implications for world and European politics. Within the limitations which he has set for himself, Professor Clark has provided a useful introduction; many of the criticisms one could make would be directed more toward the limitations than what was done within

Yet there are criticisms to be made. Many statements in the book are too strong or potentially misleading, even when accompanied by qualifications. One is struck by such assertions as, "The Council has done more to unify Europe than any other institution in the history of the Continent." In other places Professor Clark presents good material in such manner as to lessen its effect. The discussion of public opinion provides one example: although it contains valuable information, it could easily confuse students. And in concluding that E.E.C. economic regulations may have broad effects on attitude, Professor Clark makes a meaningful point; but the conclusion is scarcely strengthened by the statement, "Women's fashions and the format of women's magazines is already 'unified' for instance, as is the European taste in toys." There are also statements of questionable relevance to the current situation. For example, in view of the fact that the Parliament has never exercised its power to remove the Commission, and is unlikely to do so in the near future, Professor Clark is not directing students toward central political problems when he says, "There is a crying need for at least some provision for the dissolution of Parliament by the Commission if the removal power is used too often."

More seriously, discussions of certain points are less complete than they need be, even in a brief book. Disproportionate attention is given relatively unimportant subjects to the detriment of more important matters. By drastically reducing such sections as the four page discussion of the location of a permanent European capital, the author could give more attention to other problems. The book would benefit from a clearer picture of the actual politics of the Communities. One possibility would be a more extensive discussion of the Commission's power base. In this the various references to the 1965-66 crisis could be drawn together to illustrate better the interactions between the Commission and the member states. (And with regard to the crisis one might question Professor Clark's tendency to minimize its effects.) One could make a similar request for more focus in discussions of all the Community components and better integration of the parts.

In conclusion, The Politics of the Common Market does not say anything particularly new about the European Communities and does not provide as much information as it could and should. However it is a useful introduction and is better than other attempts of its kind. It serves to illustrate the need for more and better classroom materials dealing with the substance of politics in the European Communities.—Robert L. Peterson, The University of Iowa.

Economic Development and American Foreign Policy, 1943-62. By David A. Baldwin. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966. Pp. 291. $7.95.)

Atlantic Economic Co-operation. The Case of the O.E.C.D. By HENRY G. AUBREY. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1967. Pp. 214. $6.00.)

These two books in a very real sense complement each other. Professor Baldwin has examined from an historical and analytical framework the shift in American official attitudes about foreign aid, while Professor Aubrey has explored in depth the structure and function of the OECD. In the former, Baldwin reveals the extent of the confusion that exists in the discussions of development aid by pointing to the varied uses of the term "soft loan," which can cover financial transactions as varied as those permitting repayment over "a long period" of time but in dollars, to repayment in local currency, including the borrowing nation's, over a shorter period of time. To classify this type of transaction he notes that among business men such loans are generally thought of as "bad," a rather interesting commentary considering that many government officials who are instrumental in shaping and administering the programs involved hold a contrary view.

After this brief introductory chapter the author traces the elements of continuity and change in American aid policy. From the outset, and one might argue to this moment, the view has been widely held in the United States that there is a direct causal relationship between the existence of poverty and the appeal of communism, the existence of mass social and economic distress and danger to the peace. This assumption, plus the shift in Soviet policy from opposition to support of foreign aid, has made it possible for the nation to veer from its traditional view that the flow of trade and finance is almost exclusively a private sector matter to one in which the Government takes a much more active role. This is not to say that during the period under study, 1943-1962, the Government became the major agency for foreign development, for Baldwin reveals that although the amount of public funds varied, the guiding principles were keep the amount small (relative to private expenditure abroad), maintain American controls over its use, and shape the aid policy in such a way as to minimize competition with private investors (p. 22).

Other shifts in policy also occurred. For example, despite the opposition to scft loans, Congress eventually adopted a soft loan scheme with enthusiasm, the reason being that by 1953 the storage of agricultural commodities under the subsidy program had reached excessively costly proportions. The scheme aided in the disposal of much of the wheat, and since it was sold for local currency it did not create a repayment problem. Eventually, under President Kennedy, the Government adopted a policy in support of long term low interest loans.

Despite these changes the author points out that U. S. economic development policy remained essentially conservative throughout, and this affected its role in the multilateral banking and trade agencies of which it became a member. Thus institutions like the IBRD are very much influenced by American economic philosophy, which is the result of the Bank's voting system and the predominant positions Americans hold in the upper echelons of these organizations. This at least partially explains the accusation that the World Bank and the IFC have, broadly speaking, a conservative social philosophy. Both take into consideration the political and social conditions in the country requesting a loan rather than decide solely on the basis of the merits of the project for which help is sought. Although this may appear to be a normal precaution for any banking institution (contrary to Baldwin's assertions), it would appear that the judgement rendered is strongly influenced by American values regarding these conditions. Furthermore, according to the author, several of those who received important appointments in the Bank had earlier opposed its creation and policies (p. 57).

Because he was interested primarily in revealing the political dimensions of U.S. involvement in multilateral aid programs, he did not provide any description of what these various development agencies are expected to accomplish nor how they function. Baldwin reveals the nature of U.S. influence, that Congress is even more conservative in its thinking than the Administration, and the general sympathy for this position by organizations such as the IBRD. But there is much repetition here arising from the way in which the book is structured. One wonders if a revision of the study to explore certain important questions might not have improved the work. For example, how does U. S. economic philosophy compare with that of other major capitalist states who hold positions of importance in these agencies. Difficult though it might be to get detailed information, it would be of great importance to know what projects have not been acceptable to the Bank, and what national development strategies have had to be employed to make proposals acceptable. Likewise it would be useful to know what differences, if any, are reflected in the views of the banking institutions and industrial firms in the U.S. regarding development policy. One might also ask whether clear-cut differences in party or sectional views exist re development strategy in the Congress. Any additional knowledge along these lines might have been of greater benefit to the reader than the many pages of disagreement with other authors who discussed foreign aid.

But for those interested in increasing their understanding of the many phases of foreign aid legislation and the assumptions which may underlie the positions taken, the Baldwin book will prove quite useful.

The Aubrey study is a more narrowly focused one concerned with the operations and structure of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, the working philosophy behind it—in particular the American influence—and the author's views regarding changes which would help to make it more effective. For example, he points to the need to improve its performance by stressing specific kinds of linkages—supply and demand, production and trade, etc. (pp. 128-9), and the need to generate new ideas in the economic policy committee (pp. 149-50). But perhaps even more than urging reforms, the author seems to consider it his mission to explain and seek support for the Organization. That Professor Aubrey sees it as providing great benefit is quite clear. This does not, however, prevent him from recognizing some of its weaknesses and the validity of some of the criticism that has been levelled against it by the lesser developed countries. As a successor to the OEEC it has been concerned primarily with questions of increasing production, with financial stability, with freeing trade, and with other matters pertaining to manpower needs and production. Only after these problems were addressed were the OEEC and the OECD interested in aiding underdeveloped countries. Even the goal of liberalizing the terms of trade does not necessarily work to the advantage of the primary producing countries. As the author points out, there were even splits between the members of OECD, the "seven" wanting an inter-governmental approach to planming and trade, the "six" wanting a gradual movement toward supranationality, at least in economic affairs. The U.S., Aubrey finds, seemed to be in a contradictory position, approving both the views of the "six" and also supporting GATT which stood for ending discrimination in trade.

In this book, as in Baldwin's, evidence is cited of the conservative position the U. S. has taken, particularly in matters of trade liberalization and soft loans—i.e., of the long term, low interest type. The author defines U. S. policy as restrictive and cautious (p. 59), and its desire to establish a closer relationship between the NATO and the OECD has diminished its standing with the non-NATO members. He makes it quite obvious that in his opinion the U. S. sees trade in large measure as a political weapon. In that respect it is in the same camp as the Soviet Union.

Nor, for that matter, has the OECD done much to help the developing states in re their three major problems,—lagging demand for raw materials, instability of their prices in world markets, and inadequate access of their industrial products in the markets of the economically advanced countries. (Even the GATT has not been of major benefit to them because of its general trade objectives.)

There is little doubt that Aubrey sees the benefits of OECD in terms of its ability to educate governments and publics of the need for change in economic policies. In turn, "ability" is translated by the author as "objective." Because he finds that OECD was not established as a supra-national body, he does not urge efforts to re-direct its policy. This may be considered realism, but as so many have noted, in the area of civil liberties such a position tends to accept and extend the influence of the supporters of the status quo. Certainly it does little to build up strong pressure for the very changes which the author himself notes are necessary to face some of the major problems in international economic relations today.—Maurice Waters, University of the West Indies.

Australia Faces Southeast Asia: The Emergence of a Foreign Policy. By Amry and Mary Belle Vandenbosch. (Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1967. Pp. 175. $5.75.)

Australia Faces Southeast Asia is the collaborative effort of a man and wife team, the senior author being a recognized authority on Southeast Asia. The book is designed as a general review of the postwar setting in which Australia has lived, made appraisals, and devised and conducted her external affairs. It is a book which illustrates the dilemmas faced by a Western "middle power" which has attempted to adapt to and coexist with its volatile Asian environment, while seeking adequate security arrangements. Consistent with Professor Vandenbosch's established interest in the area, considerable attention is devoted to illustrating the governing themes of the book by drawing on the Dutch New Guinea and Malaysian "confrontation" disputes.

The survey character and easy, uncluttered style of the book recommend it to the general reader. It is not, however, a book which says anything particularly new, or says it very differently, or with greater subtlety of argument, than do existing works. Furthermore, it contains a disappointing number of shortcomings which materially detract its scholarly appeal.

First, Australia Faces Southeast Asia has some exceptionally curious emphases. For instances, in discussing Labor's foreign policy in the 1940's, the authors expend considerable detail on the wartime ANZAC Pact with New Zealand and the Manus Island dispute with America. The criticism here is that such Labor foreign policy directions as the search for a regional security alliance, and accommodation to a non-European Commonwealth, are hardly mentioned at all—even though they are fundamental subjects and which carried far beyond Labor's removal from office in 1949.

Collaterally, a number of themes which are discussed at length have some of their obvious dimensions omitted. Menzies' Malayan troop commitment announcement in 1955, although characterized as "a very important document of Australian foreign and defense policy," is not connected to America's reluctance to countenance a standing force for the recently evolved SEATO. Commitments under ANZUS are broached, but the construction of the United States naval signal station in Western Australia is in no way related to the Austral-American alliance, toward which it was decidedly designed to contribute.

The book also contains some unfortunate oversimplifications or misconstructions. The authors argue that the Government's near-defeat in the 1961 elections reflected strong public antagonism toward Indonesia's apparent ability to get away with provocative behavior over Dutch New Guinea. In fact, while the public was hostile to Indonesia's behavior, the 1961 election was decided almost entirely on economic and other domestic issues. Foreign policy, as survey research data demonstrate, played almost no part in determining electoral behavior. The authors allude to the size of Australia's "overseas" civil aid contributions. In fact, the scope of such contributions becomes much less impressive when qualified to mean that "overseas" includes aid to Australian Papua and New Guinea. The authors cite a quantum jump in Australian defense spending from $282 million to $1.1 billion. In fact, they confuse dollars and pounds and fail to identify the increase as being spread over a period of years.

The Vandenbosches also have some difficulties with basic facts. They identify Evatt and Calwell as Labor Leader and Deputy Leader, respectively, in a debate staged early in 1950-although these titles were not achieved until more than a year later. They say that an embassy was installed in Taipei in 1956—although the decision to do so was not taken until 1966, after a change of leadership from Menzies to Holt. They cite Churchill's remark that, under Labor in World War Two, "conscription even for home defence was banned," with the clear implication that this was the position throughout the duration of the war. In truth, Labor inherited conscription for domestic service from the preceding Government, and proceeded to legislate conscription for limited overseas duty.

Other, miscellaneous caveats could also be entered. For instance, some introductory comments on domestic politics and foreign policy are not pursued throughout the balance of the book. Remarks by individual Opposition members are often made to appear as if they represented Labor Party policy, which was not necessarily so. Newspaper editorial opinions are often made to appear as if they represented public opinion, which again was not necessarily so.

In the large, then, while Australia Faces Southeast Asia has its value, its drawbacks at least outweigh its merits. Perhaps a more sensitive research effort would have helped. A number of important sources, including nearly all Australian periodical literature and survey data, are neglected. When sources are cited, they are not always the most representative. Much of the discussion of Labor's wartime policy, for instance, draws upon Churchill's history of the Second World War. Churchill was not the most reliable observer of Australian conditions, and it is a pity that pertinent Australian sources are here, as elsewhere, mysteriously absent.—Henry S. Albinski, The Pennsylvania State University.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

The sixty-fifth Annual Meeting of the Association will be held September 2-6, 1969, at the Commodore Hotel, New York City.

The Executive Committee of the American Political Science Association has decided that, beginning with the 1968 meetings, the minutes of meetings of the Council and of the annual and special meetings of the Association's membership will be reported in P.S. rather than, as heretofore, in the Review.

ARTICLES ACCEPTED FOR FUTURE PUBLICATION*

March, 1969

- Joel D. Aberbach, University of Michigan, "Alienation and Political Behavior"
- David W. Adamany, Wesleyan University, "The Party Variable in Judges' Voting: Conceptual Notes and a Case Study"
- Stephen J. Cimbala, University of Wisconsin, "Foreign Policy as an Issue Area: An Exploratory Analysis"
- Thomas R. Dye, Florida State University, "Income Inequality and American State Politics"
- Arthur S. Goldberg, University of Rochester, "Social Determinism and Rationality as Bases of Party Identification"
- Dean Jaros and Gene L. Mason, University of Kentucky, "Party Choice and Support for Demagogues"
- Arthur L. Kalleberg, University of Minnesota, "Concept Formation in Normative and Empirical Studies"
- Lawrence B. Mohr, University of Michigan, "Determinants of Innovation in Organizations"
- Douglas W. Rae, Yale University, "Decision-Rules and Individual Values in Collective Choice"
- R. J. Rummel, University of Hawaii, "Indicators of Cross-National and International Patterns"
- Peter G. Snow, University of Iowa, "The Class Basis of Argentine Political Parties"
- Raymond E. Wolfinger, Stanford University, and Fred I. Greenstein, Wesleyan University, "Comparing Political Regions: The Case of California"

June, 1969

- F. M. Barnard, University of Saskatchewan, "Culture and Political Development: Herder's Insights"
- Richard W. Boyd, Indiana University, "Presidential Elections: An Explanation of Voting Defection"
- John F. Manley, University of Wisconsin, "Wilbur D. Mills: A Study in Congressional Influence"
- Norman H. Nie, University of Chicago, Bingham G. Powell, University of California, Berkeley, and C. Kenneth Prewitt,

- University of Chicago, "Social Structure and Political Participation: Developmental Relationships, I"
- Richard G. Niemi, University of Rochester, "Majority Decision-making with Imperfect Agreement on Norms"
- James H. Oliver, University of Maryland, "Citizen Demands and the Soviet Political System"
- Kenneth Prewitt, University of Chicago, and Heinz Eulau, Stanford University, "Political Matrix and Political Representation: Prolegomenon to a New Departure from an Old Problem"
- Howard Rosenthal, Carnegie-Mellon University, "The Electoral Politics of Gaullists in the Fourth Republic: Ideology or Constituency Interest?"
- Bruce M. Russett, Yale University, "Who Pays for Defense?"
- Giovanni Sartori, University of Florence, "Politics, Ideology, and Belief Systems"
- Robert A. Schoenberger, University of Michigan, "Campaign Strategy and Party Loyalty: The Electoral Relevance of Candidate Decision-making in the 1964 Congressional Elections"
- Henri Theil, University of Chicago, "The Desired Political Entropy"

September, 1969

- Graham T. Allison, Harvard University, "Conceptual Models and the Cuban Missile Crisis"
- Charles F. Cnudde and Donald J. McCrone, University of Wisconsin, "Party Competition and Welfare Policies in the American States"
- Richard M. Merelman, University of California, Los Angeles, "The Development of Political Ideology: A Framework for the Analysis of Political Socialization"
- Ira Sharkansky, University of Wisconsin, and Richard I. Hofferbert, Cornell University, "Dimensions of State Politics, Economics, and Public Policy"
- * Production exigencies may occasionally necessitate publication of articles in issues other than those given in this listing.

 $= \left(\left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \left(\frac{1}{2} \right) + \frac{1}{2$

INDEX TO V	OLUME LXII
1878: Disraeli, Gladstone and Revolution: The Passing of the Second Reform Bill. Maurice Cowling. Noted by James B. Christoph	Betancourt. Hacia America Latina Demo- cratica e Integrada
Lawyers and the Courts: A Sociological Study of the English Legal System, 1750- 1965. Noted by Theodore L. Becker 297	Representatives, 1836-1860. Noted by James J. Best
Abernethy, David B. Note on Okei Arikpo, The Development of Modern Nigeria 998	Levy, Origins of the Fifth Amendment 1334 Alford, Robert R. and Eugene C. Lee.
A Body-Incorporate: City-County Separa- tion in Virginia. Chester W. Bain. Noted	Voting Turnout in American Cities 796 Alford, Robert R. and Harry M. Scoble.
by Wendell Bedichek	Sources of Local Political Involvement 1192 Ali, Chaudhri Muhammad. The Emergence
ment. John Locke. Noted by Fred H. Willhoite	of Pakistan. Noted by Ralph Braibanti. 649 Alisky, Marvin. Note on Paul L. Doughty,
Abshire, David M. Note on Joseph L. Morrison, W. J. Cash: Southern Prophet:	Huaylas: An Andean District in Search of Progress
A Biography and Reader	Allen, William Sheridan. The Nazi Seizure of Power: The Experience of a Single
by Gilbert R. Winham	German Town, 1930-1935. Noted by G. Bingham Powell, Jr
King of Hawaii. Noted by Robert Horwitz	The American Chief Executive: The Presidency and the Governorship. Joseph E.
The Administration of the White Australia Policy. A. C. Palfreeman. Noted by D. W. Rawson	Kallenbach. Noted by Leslie Lipson 626 The American Far Right: A Case Study of Billy James Hargis and Christian Crusade.
The Admirals' Hobby. Vincent Davis. Noted by J. C. Ries	John H. Redekop. Noted by Robert A. Schoenberger 982
Adrian, Charles R. and Charles Press. Decision Costs in Coalition Formation 556	American Federalism in Perspective. Aaron Wildavsky, ed. Noted by Roscoe C.
Africa: The Politics of Unity. Immanuel Wallerstein. Noted by Victor T. Le Vine 1354	Martin
Agency Requests, Gubernatorial Support and Budget Success in State Legislatures. Ira	ism and Realism. Donald Brandon. Noted by John T. Holden 683
Sharkansky	AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: COMMUNITY POLITICS On the Neo-Elitist Critique of Community
Mikhail Bor. Noted by George R. Feiwel 1010 Ake, Claude. A Theory of Political Integration. Noted by Henry Teune 978	Power. Richard M. Merelman 451 Policy Maps of City Councils and Policy Outcomes: A Developmental Analysis.
Alba, Victor. Nationalists Without Nations: The Oligarchy Versus the People in Latin	Heinz Eulau and Robert Eyestone 124 Sources of Local Political Involvement.
America. Noted by Peter Ranis 1383 Alberoni, Francesco, Vittorio Capecchi,	Robert R. Alford and Harry M. Scoble 1192 AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: CONGRESS
Agopik Manoukian, Franca Olivetti and Antonio Tosi. L'Attivista di Partito.	The House and the Federal Role: A Computer Simulation of Roll-Call Voting.
Noted by Robert D. Putnam	Michael J. Shapiro 494 The Institutionalization of the U. S. House
Imperial Germany, 1888–1918. Lamar Cecil. Noted by Edward L. Pinney 270 Albinski, Henry S. Note on Amry and	of Representatives. Nelson W. Polsby 144 A Measure of the Population Quality of
Mary Belle Vandenbosch, Australia Faces Southeast Asia; The Emergence of a	Legislative Apportionment. Henry F. Kaiser
Foreign Policy	the House of Representatives. Charles O. Jones

Organization Theory and the Explanation of Important Characteristics of Congress. Lewis A. Froman, Jr	matic Recognition. Peter G. Filene. Noted by William B. Ballis	301
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: ELECTIONS AND VOTING BEHAVIOR	Blau and Otis Dudley Duncan. Reviewed by M. Kent Jennings	596
The Repeal of Fair Housing in California: An Analysis of Referendum Voting. Raymond E. Wolfinger and Fred I. Greenstein	America's Political Dilemma: From Limited to Unlimited Democracy. Gottfried Dietze. Noted by Peter Bachrach	1310
R. Alford and Eugene C. Lee	Change in Continental Europe in the Nineteenth Century. Noted by Charles Lewis Taylor	1360
A Comparative Analysis of State and Federal Judicial Behavior: The Reapportionment Cases. Edward N. Beiser	Nineteenth Century. Noted by Charles Lewis Taylor	1360
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: POLITICAL PARTIES	Noted by Kenneth S. Sherrill	1342
Motivation, Incentive Systems, and the Political Party Organization. M. Margaret Conway and Frank B. Feigert 1159 AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: POLITICAL SOCIALIZA-	Appleton, Sheldon. Note on David J. Finlay, Ole R. Holsti, and Richard R. Fagan. Enemies in Politics	1402
ITION Image of a President: Some Insights into the Political Views of School Children. Roberta S. Sigel	Europe Faces Coming Policy Decisions. Karl W. Deutsch. Noted by Steven J. Brams	1391
The Malevolent Leader: Political Socializa- tion in an American Sub-culture. Dean Jaros, Herbert Hirsch and Frederic J.	Three Essays on Ideology and Develop- ment. Noted by Irving Louis Horowitz The Art of Conjecture. Bertrand de Jouvenal.	1321
Fleron, Jr	Reviewed by James A. Robinson The Art of Diplomacy. Thomas A. Bailey.	236
Civics Curriculum in the United States. Kenneth P. Langton and M. Kent Jen-	Noted by Leslie H. Gelb	,
nings	Simpson. Noted by L. L. Wade And Promises to Keep: The Southern Conference for Human Welfare, 1933-1948. Thomas A. Krueger. Noted by Emory
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: STATE POLITICS Agency Requests, Gubernatorial Support and Budget Success in State Legislatures. Ira	F. Via	269
Sharkansky	Issues of Political Development. Reviewed by Arpad von Lazar	24 3
mental Expenditures. Allan G. Pulsipher and James L. Weatherby, Jr	English Politics and Economics During the Crimean War. Noted by Charles Mark	668
form, and the Judicial Process. Wilfred E. Rumble, Jr. Noted by Michael A. Weinstein	Anderson, Thornton. Russian Political Thought: An Introduction. Noted by R. V. Daniels.	612
The American Party Systems. William Nisbet Chambers and Walter Dean Burnham, eds. Reviewed by A. E. Kier Nash 1275	Andrain, Charles F. Note on Herbert J. Spiro, ed., Patterns of African Development	284
Americans and the Soviet Experiment, 1917– 1933: American Attitudes Toward Russia from the February Revolution Until Diplo-	Andrews, William G. Note on Alfred Grosser, French Foreign Policy Under de Gaulle	1018

Annuaire Suisse de Science Politique— Schweizerisches Jahrbuch für Politische Wissenschaft. Noted by William R.		Australia Faces Southeast Asia: The Emer- gence of a Foreign Policy. Amry and Mary Belle Vandenbosch. Noted by Henry S.
Keech	666	Albinski
cisims of his review of Bernard J. Frieden,		Thought of Karl Marx. Noted by David
"Metropolitan America: Challenge to		M. Ricei	1309
Federalism."	1272
Anton, Thomas J. Note on Bernard J.		Bachrach, Peter and Morton S. Baratz.
Frieden, Metropolitan America: Challenge		Communication on Richard M. Merelto Federalism	623	man's "On the Neo-Elitist Critique of Antonio Gramsci and the Origins of Italian		Community Power."	1268
Communism. John M. Cammett. Noted		Bachrach, Peter. Note on Gottfried Dietze,
by Sidney G. Tarrow	253	America's Political Dilemma: From Lim-
Arikpo, Okei. The Development of Modern		ited to Unlimited Democracy	1310
Nigeria. Noted by David B. Abernethy	998	Bachrach, Peter. Note on William E. Con-
Arms Control Arrangements for the Far		nolly, Political Science and Ideology	599
East. Noted by Dale Pontius	687	Back to Back: The Duel between FDR and
Arms Control for the Late Sixties. James E.		the Supreme Court. Leonard Baker, Noted
Dougherty and J. F. Lehman, Jr., eds.		by C. Herman Pritchett	631
Noted by William P. Gerberding	678	Bailey, Thomas A. The Art of Diplomacy.
Asamoah, Obed Y. The Legal Significance		Noted by Leslie H. Gelb	1401 of the Declarations of the General Assembly		Bain, Chester W. A Body Incorporate: City-of the United Nations. Noted by A. R.		County Separation in Virginia. Noted by
Headley	693	Wendell Bedichek	640
Ashcraft, Richard. Locke's State of Nature:		Bain, Joe S., Richard E. Caves and Julius
Historical Fact or Moral Fiction?	898	Margolis. Northern California's Water
Ashford, Douglas E. Morocco-Tunisia:		Industry. Noted by Ashley L. Schiff	634
Politics and Planning. Reviewed by		Baker, Leonard. Back to Back: The Duel
George Lenczowski	587	between FDR and the Supreme Court.
Ashford, Douglas E. National Development		Noted by C. Herman Pritchett	631 and Local Reform: Political Participation		Balassa, Bela. Trade Liberalization Among
in Morocco, Tunisia and Pakistan. Re-		Industrial Countries: Objectives and Alter-viewed by George Lenczowski	587	natives. Noted by David S. Ball	692
Ashford, Douglas E. Perspectives of a Moroc-		Baldwin, David A. Economic Development can Nationalist. Reviewed by George		and American Foreign Policy 1943-1962.
Lenczowski	587	Noted by Maurice Waters	1405
Asian Drama: An Inquiry into the Poverty		Baldwin, George B. Planning and Develop-of Nations. Gunnar Myrdal. Reviewed by		ment in Iran. Noted by Marvin Zonis.	645
	1278	Balinsky, Alexander, Abram Bergson, John
Aspaturian, Vernon V. The Soviet Union in		N. Hazard and Peter Wiles. Planning
the World Communist System. Noted by	000	and the Market in the U.S.S.R.: the 1960's.
Nish Jamgotch, Jr.	690	Noted by Arthur W. Wright	655
Atlantic Economic Co-operation. The Case		Ball, David S. Note on Bela Balassa, Trade of the O.E.C.D. Henry C. Aubrey. Noted	1405	Liberalization Among Industrial Coun-	600
by Maurice Waters	1400	tries: Objectives and Alternatives	692
The Atlantic Idea and its European Rivals.		Ballis, William B. Note on Peter G. Filene.
Harold Van B. Cleveland. Reviewed by Stuart A. Scheingold	1206	Americans and the Soviet Experiment, 1917–1933: American Attitudes Toward
Aubrey, Henry C. Atlantic Economic Co-		Russia From the February Revolution
operation. The Case of the O.E.C.D. Noted	•	Until Diplomatic Recognition	301
by Maurice Waters	1405	Bankwitz, Philip C. F. Maxime Weygand	901
Auerbach, Jerold S. Labor and Liberty: The	1100	and Civil-Military Relations in Modern
LaFollette Committee and the New Deal.		France. Noted by John N. Colas	1004
Noted by Douglas Camp Chaffey	989	Baratz, Morton S. and Peter Bachrach.	1001
Aus Nächster Nähe: Lebenserinnerugen.		Communication on Richard M. Merel-
Vol. I. 1884-1927. Mit der Kraft des		man's "On the Neo-Elitist Critique of
Geistes. Vol. II. 1927-1967. Arnold		Community Power."	1268
	1204	Rephar Reniemin P. Note on George A

Codding, Jr., Governing the Commune of Veyrier: Politics in Swiss Local Govern-		Separation in Virginia Behind the Shield: The Police in Urban	640
ment	1374	Society. Arthur Niederhoffer. Noted by Neal Milner	625
on Science and Government	985	The Reapportionment Cases Bell, Wendell, ed. The Democratic Revolution in West Indies. Noted by Morton	788
Barnes, Samuel H. Note on Umberto Melotti, Cultura e partecipazione sociale nella citta in transformazione	273	Kroll. Benes, Vaclav, Andrew Gyorgy and George Stambuk. Eastern European Government	1368
Barnes, Samuel H. Party Democracy: Politics in an Italian Socialist Federation.	210	and Politics. Noted by Carl Beck Benes, Vaclav L. Note on Joseph Roths-	289
Noted by Timothy M. Hennessey Barnett, A. Doak. Cadres, Bureaucracy, and Political Power in Communist China.	1351	child, Pilsudski's Coup d'Etat Benjamin, Roger W. and John H. Kautsky. Communism and Economic Development	1370 110
Reviewed by Bruce D. Larkin Barnett, A. Doak. China After Mao. Re-	963	Benjamin, Roger W. Review of A. Doak Barnett, China After Mao	588
viewed by Roger W. Benjamin Barry, Donald D. Note on Isaac Deutscher, The Unfinished Revolution: Russia 1917-	588	Benjamin, Roger W. Review of Francois Geoffrey-Dechaume, China Looks at the World	588
1966	662	Benjamin, Roger W. Review of Hans Granqvist, The Red Guard Benjamin, Roger W. Review of Merle	588
Beyle	269	Goldman, Literary Dissent in Communist China	588
Peking, Hanoi	686	the Danish Resistance Movement, 1940- 1945: A Study of the Wartime Broadcasts of the BBC Danish Service. Noted by States and Asia	685	Harold Graves	298
ed., Scandinavian Political Studies Baylis, Thomas A. Note on Lewis J.	237	mercier-Quelquejay. Islam in the Soviet Union. Noted by Robert A. Rupen	1002
Edinger, ed., Political Leadership in Industrialized Societies: Studies in Comparative Analysis	644	Bergson, Abram, John N. Hazard, Peter Wiles and Alexander Balinsky. Planning and the Market in the U.S.S.R.: the
Beals, Alan R. and Bernard J. Siegel. Divisiveness and Social Conflict. Noted		1960's. Noted by Arthur W. Wright Berlin: The Wall is Not Forever. Eleanor	655
by Roger D. Masters	618	Lansing Dulles. Noted by William E. Wright Bernd, Joseph L., ed. Mathematical Appli-	295
Court. Noted by Bradley C. Canon Beaney, William M. Note on Paul A. Freund. On Law and Justice	$\frac{265}{1335}$	cations in Political Science, II. Noted by Alden E. Lind	615
Beaufre, André. NATO and Europe. Reviewed by Stuart A. Scheingold	1296	cations in Political Science, III. Reviewed by Herbert F. Weisberg	1294
Beck, Carl. Note on Kurt London, ed., Eastern Europe in Transition Beck, Carl. Note on Vaclav Benes, Andrew	289	Berzins, Alfred. The Two Faces of Co- Existence. Noted by W. W. Kulski Best, James J. Note on Thomas B. Alex-	312
Gyorgy and George Stambuk, Eastern European Government and Politics Becker, Theodore L. Note on Brian Abel-	289	ander. Sectional Stress and Party Strength: A Study of Roll-Call Voting Patterns in
Smith and Robert Stevens, Lawyers and the Courts: A Sociological Study of the		the U. S. House of Representatives, 1836–1860 Betancourt, Romulo. Hacia America Latina	633
English Legal System, 1750-1965 Bedichek, Wendell. Note on Chester W. Bain A Rody Incorporate: City-County	297	Democratica e Integrada. Noted by Robert J. Alexander	685

Noted by Marian D. Irish	684	Pakistan	649
Cess	269	Outlooks	980
Beyond Ideology: The Revival of Political		Brakeman, Louis F. Note on Stephen D.
Theory. Dante Germino. Reviewed by		Kertesz, The Quest for Peace Through
Harry Girvetz	958	Diplomacy	679
Beyond Vietnam: The United States and		Brams, Steven J. Measuring the Concentra-
Asia. Edwin O. Reischauer. Noted by		tion of Power in Political Systems	461
George G. Bauroth	685	Brams, Steven J. Note on Karl W. Deutsch,
Bidault, Georges. Resistance: The Political		Arms Control and the Atlantic Alliance:
Autobiography of Georges Bidault. Noted	*	Europe Faces Coming Policy Decisions	1391
by Michael R. Gordon	1003	Brandon, Donald. American Foreign Policy
Bienen, Henry. Tanzania: Party Transformation and Economic Development.		Beyond Utopianism and Realism. Noted by John T. Holden	200
Noted by Paul Saenz	653	Brass, Paul R. Coalition Politics in North	683
Biographical Dictionary of Republican	000	India	1174
China. Vol. I. Howard L. Boorman, ed.		Brass, Paul R. Note on Michael Brecher,	1112
Book note	298	Nehru's Mantle: The Politics of Succession
Blake, Robert. Disraeli. Noted by Lewis		in India	293
J. Edinger	1380	Braunthal, Gerard. Note on Goetz Briefs,
Blau, Peter and Otis Dudley Duncan. The		ed., Laissez-faire-Pluralismus: Demokratie
American Occupational Structure. Re-		und Wirtschaft des gegenwärtigen Zeital-viewed by M. Kent Jennings	596	ters	1009
Bliss, Howard. Note on Robert Lemaignen,		Braunthal, Gerard. The Federation of L'Europe au berceau: souvenirs d'un		German Industry in Politics. Noted by	001
technocrate	304	George K. Romoser	664
Bloomfield, Lincoln P. Review of Alf Ross, The United Nations: Peace and Progress	roe	Brayman, Harold. Corporate Management in a World of Politics: The Public, and
Bloomfield, Lincoln P. Review of David W.	586	Governmental Problems of Business. Noted
Wainhouse and Associates. International		by Oliver Garceau	625
Peace Observation: A History and Forecast	586	Brczilian Planning: Development Politics	020
Blue, Richard N. Note on Edgar A. and	•••	and Administration. Robert T. Dal-
Kathryn R. Schuler, Public Opinion and		and. Reviewed by John T. Dorsey,
Constitution Making in Pakistan	647	Jr	245
Bolingbroke and His Circle: the Politics of		The Brazilian Revolution of 1930 and the Nostalgia in the Age of Walpole. Isaac		Aftermath. Jordan M. Young. Noted by
Kramnick. Noted by James V. Elliott	1312	Robert T. Daland	282
Bombwall, K. R. The Foundations of Indian	4000	Breakthrough in Burma: Memoirs of a Revo-
Federalism. Noted by Baljit Singh	1008	lution, 1939-1946. Ba Maw. Noted by	1000
Boorman, Howard L., ed. Biographical		Fred R. von der Mehden Brecher, Michael. Nehru's Mantle: The	1363
Dictionary of Republican China, Vol. I. Book note	298	Politics of Succession in India. Noted by
Bor, Mikhail. Aims and Methods of Soviet	200	Paul R. Brass	293
Planning. Noted by George R. Feiwel	1010	Brecht, Arnold. Aus Nächster Nähe: Leben-	200
Boston University Papers on Africa, Transi-		serinnerugen. Vol. I. 1884-1927. Mit der tion in African Politics. Jeffrey Butler and		Kraft des Geistes. Vol. II. 1927-1969.
A. A. Castagno, eds. Noted by Fred G.		Noted by Gordon A. Craig	1304
Burke and John R. Nellis	283	Briefs, Goetz, ed. Laissez-faire-Pluralismus:
Bowman, Lewis. Note on Andrew Buni,		Demokratie und Wirtschaft des gegen-
The Negro in Virginia Politics, 1902-	400	wärtigen Zeitalters. Noted by Gerard	***
1965	638	Braunthal	1009
Bowman, Lewis. Note on Jack D. Fleer, North Carolina Politics: An Introduction	1347	British Broadcasting and the Danish Re- sistance Movement, 1940-1945: A Study
Boynton, George R. Note on William C.	4041	of the Wartime Broadcasts of the BBC
Mitchell, Sociological Analysis and Poli-		Danish Service. Jeremy Bennett. Noted
tics: The Theories of Talcott Parsons	250	by Harold Graves	298
Braibanti, Ralph. Note on Chaudhri		The British General Election of 1966. D. E.
Muhammad Ali, The Emergence of		Butler and Anthony King. Noted by

Bernard Hennessy	296	by Bernard Hennessy	296
The Sea in Modern Strategy	1019	Boston University Papers on Africa, Transition in African Politics. Noted by Fred G. Burke and John R. Nellis
State Court Policy Impact and Functions in a Local Political System	983	Butterfield, Herbert and Wight, Martin, eds. Diplomatic Investigations: Essays in the Theory of International Politics.
The Communist States and the West. Noted by Jonathan Harris	311	Noted by Don C. Piper Butwell, Richard and Amry Vandenbosch.	679
Brown, Bernard E. Note on James M. Clark. Teachers and Politics in France: A Pressure Group Study of the Federation		The Changing Face of Southeast Asia. Noted by Frank C. Darling	313
de l'Education Nationale	275	Cadres, Bureaucracy, and Political Power in Communist China. A. Doak Barnett.
behari Majumdar, History of Indian Social and Political Ideas—From Ram-		Reviewed by Bruce D. Larkin	963
mohun to Dayananda	611	Bureaucracy. Noted by Henry J. Steck Cammett, John M. Antonio Gramsci and the Origins of Italian Communism. Noted	1000
Communications. Noted by Ellen B. Pirro	607	by Sidney G. Tarrow	253
Buni, Andrew. The Negro in Virginia Politics, 1902-1965. Noted by Lewis	•	Metropolitan America: Fiscal Patterns and Governmental Systems. Noted by
BowmanBunzel, John H. Anti-Politics in America:	638	Robert L. Lineberry	621
Reflections on the Anti-Political Temper and its Distortions of the Democratic		Planning Reforms in the Soviet Union, 1962–1966	656
Process. Noted by Kenneth S. Sherrill. Burgess, Philip M. Elite Images and Foreign	1342	Canada and "Imperial Defense" I. A Study of the Origins of the British Common-
Policy Outcomes: A Study of Norway. Noted by Ole R. Holsti	1398	wealth's Defense Organization, 1867-1919. Richard A. Preston. Noted by Hiram M.	900
Burke, Fred G. and John R. Nellis. Note on Jeffrey Butler and A. A. Castagno,		Stout	306
eds., Boston University Papers on Africa, Transition in African Politics Burks, Ardoth W. Note on Allen B. Color	283	Gideon Rosenbluth. Reviewed by Gilbert R. Winham	965
Burks, Ardath W. Note on Allan B. Cole, George O. Totten, and Cecil H. Uyehara, Socialist Parties in Postwar Japan	277	Noted by Peter Regenstreif	1369
Burks, Ardath W. Note on George Oakley Totten, III, The Social Democratic Move-		1963: The Problems of a Middle Power in Alliance. Jon B. McLin. Reviewed by
ment in Prewar Japan Burma from Kingdom to Republic: A His-	277	Gilbert R. Winham	965
torical and Political Analysis. Frank N. Trager. Noted by Fred R. vonder Mehden	1363	the 25th Parliament. Allan Kornberg. Noted by Dean L. Yarwood Canon, Bradley C. Note on Max Freedman,	997
Burma through Alien Eyes. Helen G. Trager.	1363	William M. Beaney and Eugene Rostow, Perspectives on the Court	265
Burner, David. The Politics of Provincial- ism: The Democratic Party in Transition,		Cantril, Hadley and Lloyd A. Free. The Political Beliefs of Americans: A Study of
1918-1932. Noted by Jay S. Goodman Burnham, Walter Dean and William Nisbet Chambers, eds. The American Party	987	Public Opinion. Noted by Aage Clausen Capecchi, Vittorio, Francesco Alberoni, Agopik Manoukian, Franca Olivetti, and	1345
Systems. Reviewed by A. E. Keir Nash Burns, E. Bradford. ed. Perspectives of Brazilian History. Noted by Jordan M.	1275	Antonio Tosi. L'Attivista di Partito.	1352
Young	281	The "Intensity" Problem and Democratic	r.
Butler, D. E. and Anthony King. The British General Election of 1966. Noted		Theory	. 5

The Democratic Experiment: American Political Theory	1316	Cha-les Evans Hughes: Politics and Reform in New York, 1905-1910. Robert F.	,
Carey, George W. Note on Neal Riemer, The Revival of Democratic Theory	1316	Wesser. Noted by Frederick H. Schaps- meier	630
Carmen, Ira H. Movies, Censorship and the		Charlot, Jean. L'Union pour la Nouvelle
Law. Noted by Robert S. Gerstein Caroe, Olaf. Soviet Empire: The Turks of Central Asia and Stalinism. Noted by	266	République: Etude du pouvoir au sein d'un parti politique. Noted by John E. Schwarz Chapsal, Jacques. La Vie Politique en	294
Richard F. Rosser	661	France Depuis 1940. Noted by James M. Clark	294
Centre. Noted by Stephen F. Cohen	659	Cheever, Daniel S. and Milton J. Esman.
The Case of the Trotskyite-Zinovievite Ter-		The Common Aid Effort. Noted by rorist Centre. Noted by Stephen F. Cohen	659	William B. Kintner	1393
Casstevens, Thomas W. A Theorem about Voting	205	Chen, Lung-Chu and Harold Lasswell. Formosa, China, and the United Nations
Castagno, A. A. and Jeffrey Butler, eds.	200	—Formosa in the World Community.
Boston University Papers on Africa,		Noted by Douglas Mendel, Jr	673
Transition in African Politics. Noted by		China After Mao. A. Doak Barnett. Re-	010
Fred G. Burke and John R. Nellis	283	viewed by Roger W. Benjamin	588
Catholic Action in Italy: The Sociology		China Looks at the World. François Geofof a Sponsored Organization. Gianfranco		frey-Dechaume. Reviewed by Roger
Poggi. Noted by Joseph Lopreato	255	W. Benjamin	588
A Causal Model of Civil Strife: A Com-		Christoph, James B. Note on F. B. Smith,
parative Analysis Using New Indices.		The Making of the Second Reform Bill	1378
Ted Gurr	1104	Christoph, James B. Note on Maurice
Caves, Richard E., Joe S. Bain and Julius		Cowling, 1878: Disraeli, Gladstone and
Margolis. Northern California's Water		Revolution: The Passing of the Second Re-
Industry. Noted by Ashley L. Schiff	634	form Bill	1378
Cecil, Lamar. Albert Ballin: Business and		Cities in a Race With Time: Progress and Politics in Imperial Germany, 1888-	070	Foverty in America's Renewing Cities.
1918. Noted by Edward L. Pinney Censorship of the Movies: The Social and	270	Jeanne R. Lowe. Noted by Vincent L.	619
Political Control of a Mass Medium.		Marando	019
Richard S. Randall. Noted by Robert J.		La Vie Politique en France Depuis 1940	294
Steamer	1332	Clark, James M. Teachers and Politics in	201
Chaffey, Douglas Camp. Note on Jerold S.	200	France: A Pressure Group Study of the
Auerbach, Labor and Liberty: The La-		Fédération de l'Education Nationale.
Follette Committee and the New Deal	989	Noted by Bernard E. Brown	275
Chambers, William Nisbet and Walter		Clark, W. Hartley. The Politics of the Com-
Dean Burnham, eds. The American		mon Market. Noted by Robert L.
Party Systems. Reviewed by A. E. Keir		Feterson	677
Nash	1275	Claude, Richard. Note on Samuel Krislov,
Chambers, William Nisbet. Note on		The Negro in Federal Employment	637
Richard P. McCormick, The Second		Claus Spreckles: The Sugar King of Hawaii.	1044
American Party System: Party Formation	1990	Jacob Adler. Noted by Robert Norwitz.	1340
in the Jacksonian Era	1990	Clausen, Aage. Note on Lloyd A. Free and Hadley Cantril, The Political Beliefs of Dollars, Dependents and Dogma: Over-		Americans: A Study of Public Opinion.	1345 seas Chinese Remittances to Communist		Clem, Alan L. Prairie State Politics: Popular	10.10
China	1371	Democracy in South Dakota. Noted by
The Changing Face of Southeast Asia. Amry		John H. Fenton	1333
Vandenbosch and Richard Butwell.		Cleveland, Harold Van B. The Atlantic Idea
Noted by Frank C. Darling	313	and its European Rivals. Reviewed by
Chapman, John W. and J. Roland Pennock.		Stuart A. Scheingold	1296
Nomos X: Representation. Reviewed by		Cnudde, Charles F. and Donald J. Mc-
James A. Steintrager	1289	Crone. Communication on Forbes and
Charisma and Factionalism in the Nazi		Tufte, "A Note of Caution in Causal
Party. Joseph Nyomarkay. Reviewed by	200	Modelling"	1269
H. P. Secher	590	Cnudde, Charles F. Note on Richard Rose,

Influencing Voters: A Study of Campaign Rationality	1365	"The Politics of the European States" Communication by Kramer, Gerald H. on	1271
Coalition Politics in North India. Paul R.		Thomas Casstevens' "A Theorem About	0 = =
Brass	1174	Voting"	955
Commune of Veyrier: Politics in Swiss Local Government. Noted by Benjamin R. Barber	1374	"myth" that communist governments have never been voted into power in a free election	1272
Cohen, Stephen F. Note on The Case of the Anti-Soviet Trotskyite Centre	659	Communication by Lineberry, Robert L. and Edmund P. Fowler on Wolfinger and
Cohen, Stephen F. Note on The Case of the		Field, "Political Ethos and the Structure	000
Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Centre Colas, John N. Note on Philip C. F. Bank- witz, Maxime Weygand and Civil-Military	659	of City Government"	230
Relations in Modern France	1004	the State Functions as a Religion, What Are We to Do Then to Save Our Souls?"	577
H. Uyehara. Socialist Parties in Postwar Japan. Noted by Ardath W. Burks	. 277	Communication by Merelman, Richard M. on criticisms of his article "On the Neo-
Collier, Simon. Ideas and Politics of Chilean Independence 1808-1833. Noted by Rob- ert H. Dix	1372	Elitist Critique of Community Power Communication by Modelski, George and Jean-Luc Vellut on Russett, et al.,	1269
Colombia: The Political Dimensions of	~ ~ .~	"National Political Units in the Twen-	050
Change. Robert H. Dix. Noted by Kenneth F. Johnson	996	tieth Century: A Standardized List" Communication by Neubauer, Deane E. on	952
The Common Aid Effort. Milton J. Esman and Daniel S. Cheever. Noted by William R. Kintner	1393	criticisms of his article "Some Conditions of Democracy"	581
The Commonwealth Bureaucracy. Gerald E. Caiden. Noted by Henry J. Steck		and Hamblin, "Socio-economic Variables and Voting for the Radical Left: Chile,
Communication by Anton, Thomas J. on criticisms of his review of Bernard J.	1000	1952"	578
Frieden's "Metropolitan America: Challenge to Federalism"	1272	David Singer and Melvin Small, on criticisms of their article "National
Communication by Bachrach, Peter and		Political Units in the Twentieth Century:	0.55
Morton S. Baratz on Richard M. Merelman's "On the Neo-Elitist Critique of Community Power"	1268	A Standardized List"	955
Communication by Cnudde, Charles F. and	1200	Politics: The Global System"	1268
Donald J. McCrone on Forbes and Tufte, "A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling"	1269	Communication by Verba, Sidney on Louis Lipsitz' "If, As Verba Says, the State
Communication by Cutright, Phillips on Deane E. Neubauer's "Some Conditions	×#0	Functions as a Religion, What Are We to Do Then to Save Our Souls?"	576 of Democracy"	578	Communication by Wolfinger, Raymond E. and John Osgood Field on criticisms of their article "Political Ethos and the article "A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling"	1270	Structure of City Government"	227
Communication by Frieden, Bernard J. on Thomas J. Anton's review of his book	-	Roger W. Benjamin and John H. Kautsky	110
"Metropolitan America: Challenge to Federalism"	1271	The Communist Movement in Iran. Sepehr Zabih. Noted by Marvin Zonis	645
Communication by Friedman, Edward on the December 1967 issue of the REVIEW	231	The Communist States and the West. Adam Bromke and Philip E. Uren, eds. Noted
Communication by Haas, Michael on Rus-	LUI	by Jonathan Harris	311 set et al., "National Political Units in the Twentieth Century: A Standardized	050	A Comparative Analysis of State and Federal Judicial Behavior: The Reappor-	700
List"	952	tionment Cases. Edward N. Beiser COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT	788
Robert A. Rupen's review of his book		Coalition Politics in North India. Paul R.

Brass	1174	T. Patterson. Reviewed by David R.
Communism and Economic Development.		Mayhew
Roger W. Benjamin and John H.		Congressional Ethics: The Conflict of Interest
Kautsky	110	Issue. Robert S. Getz. Noted by Irwin
Comparing Communist Nations: Prospects		N. Gertzog	990
for an Empirical Approach. Paul Shoup	185	Congressional Insurgents and the Party
Factions and Coalitions in One-Party Japan:		System, 1909-1916. James Holt. Noted
An Interpretation Based on the Theory of		by Delmer Dunn	988
Games. Michael Leiserson	770	The Congressional Process: Strategies, Rules
Group Influence and the Policy Process in		and Procedures. Lewis A. Froman, Jr.
the Soviet Union. Joel J. Schwartz and		Noted by Eugene Eidenberg	263
William R. Keech	840	Connolly, William E. Political Science and	200
Majority vs. Opposition in the French	010	Ideology. Noted by Peter Bachrach	599
National Assembly, 1956-1965: A Gutt-		Conservatism, Personality and Political Ex-	000 man Scale Analysis. David M. Wood	88	tramism. Robert A. Schoenberger	868
Measuring Social and Political Require-	00	Contemporary Radical Ideologies: Total-
	•	itarian Thought in the Twentieth Century.
ments for System Stability in Latin America. Ernest A. Duff and John F. Mc-	1105	A. James Gregor. Noted by James H.	1907
Camant	1125	Meisel	1307
Political Development and Socioeconomic		Content Analysis of Communications. Rich-
Development: The Case of Latin America.	000	ard W. Budd, Robert K. Thorp and
Martin C. Needler	889	Lewis Donohew. Noted by Ellen B.	0.05
The Recruitment of Candidates for the Can-		Pirro	607
adian House of Commons. Allan Kornberg		Contracting for Atoms. Harold Orlans.
and Hal H. Winsborough	1242	Noted by Don E. Kash	981
The Soviet Central Committee: An Elite		Conway, M. Margaret and Frank B.
Analysis. Michael P. Gehlen and Michael		Feigert. Motivation, Incentive Systems,
McBride	1232	and the Political Party Organization	1159
Soviet Elections as a Measure of Dissent: The		Cooper, Joseph. Note on Jackson Turner
Missing One Percent. Jerome M. Gillison	814	Main, The Upper House in Revolutionary
Soviet Elite Participatory Attitudes in the		America, 1763–1788	1331
Post-Stalin Period. Milton Lodge	827	Corbett, Edward M. Quebec Confronts
The Structure of Political Conflict in the		Canada. Noted by Maurice Pinard	1367
New States of Tropical Africa. Aristide		Corporate Management in a world of Politics:
R. Zolberg	70	The Public, Political and Governmental
Comparative Political Development: The		Problems of Business. Harold Brayman.
Precedent of the West. G. Lowell Field.		Noted by Oliver Garceau	625
Noted by Warren L. Mason	280	Correspondance d'Alexis de Tocqueville et de
Comparing Communist Nations: Prospects		Gustave de Beaumont. Texte Établi, for an Empirical Approach. Paul Shoup	185	Annoté et Préfacé par André Jardin.
Competitive Interference and Twentieth Cen-		Reviewed by Melvin Richter	234
tury Diplomacy. Richard W. Cottam.		Cottam, Richard W. Competitive Inter-
Noted by Andrew Scott	304	ference and Twentieth Century Diplomacy.
The Concept of Ideology and Other Essays.		Noted by Andrew Scott	304
George Lichtheim. Noted by George		Couloumbis, Theodore A. Greek Political
Kateb	600	Reaction to American and NATO In-
The Conflicted Relationship: The West and		fluences. Noted by Stephen G. Xydis	302
the Transformation of Asia, Africa, and		Cowling, Maurice. 1878: Disraeli, Gladstone
Latin America. Theodore Geiger. Re-		and Revolution: The Passing of the Second viewed by H. Bradford Westerfield	242	Reform Bill. Noted by James B. Chris-
Congress and the Citizen-Soldier. William F.		toph	1378
Levantrosser. Noted by Lewis A. Fro-		Cox, Archibald. The Warren Court: Con-man, Jr	263	stitutional Decision as an Instrument of Congress and the Constitution: A Study of		Reform. Noted by J. Woodford Howard,
Responsibility. Donald G. Morgan. Noted		J=	1329
by Dale Vinyard	986	Cox, Arthur M. Prospects for Peacekeeping.
Congressional Conservatism and the New		Reviewed by Lawrence S. Kaplan	961
Deal: The Growth of the Conservative		Cox, James L. Note on Harold Kaplan,
Condition in Congress 1088-1080 Temps		I'rham Political Systems: A Functional

Analysis of Metro Toronto	643	mans. Noted by Elke Frank Davidson, Roger H. Note on Charles O. Jones, Every Second Year: Congressional
Vol. I. 1884-1927. Mit der Kraft des Geistes. Vol. II. 1927-1967		Behavior and the Two-Year Term Davies, A. F. Private Politics: A Study of Five Political Outlooks. Noted by Karl	980
Perspectives. John Plank, ed. Reviewed by Richard R. Fagen		Braithwaite	980
Noted by Samuel H. Barnes Cutright, Phillips. Communication on	273	W. Rae	261
Deane E. Neubauer's "Some Conditions of Democracy"	578	Noted by J. C. Ries	1344
1958. Stephen C. Xydis. Noted by Robert R. Wilson	1399	Aid Davison, W. Phillips. International Political	680
Czempiel, Ernst-Otto. Das amerikanische Sicherheitssystem 1945–1949—Studie zur Aussenpolitik der bürgerlichen Gesell-		Communication. Reviewed by Karl W. Deutsch Deane, Herbert A. The Political and Social	969
schaft. Noted by John H. Herz	300	Ideas of St. Augustine. Noted by David G. Smith	979
Culture	878	taire en Belgique: Mecanismes D'Acces et Images. Noted by Jeffrey L. Obler	274
Daland, Robert T. Brazilian Planning: Development Politics and Administration.		Decision Costs in Coalition Formation. Charles R. Adrian and Charles Press	556
Reviewed by John T. Dorsey, Jr Daland, Robert T. Note on Jordan M. Young, The Brazilian Revolution of 1930 and the Aftermath	245	Defense of the Realm: British Strategy in the Nuclear Epoch. R. N. Rosecrance. Noted by David W. Tarr	1395
Dallin, Alexander and Thomas B. Larson, eds. Soviet Politics Since Khrushchev. Noted by William Parente	1385	Vatikiotis, Politics and the Military in Jordan: A Study of the Arab Legion 1921–1957	1375
D'Amato, Anthony A. Note on B. S. Murty, Propaganda and World Public Order: The Legal Regulation of the Instrument		Democracy's Dilemma: The Totalitarian Party in a Free Society. Benjamin E. Lippincott. Noted by Kurt P. Tauber.
of Coercion	1392	The Democratic Experiment: American Political Theory. Vol. I. Neal Riemer. Noted by George W. Carey
tion Danilevsky: A Russian Totalitarian Philos-	612	The Democratic Republicans of New York: The Origins, 1763-1797. Alfred F. Young.	1010
opher. Robert E. MacMaster, Note by Rolf H. W. Theen	256	Reviewed by Manning J. Dauer The Democratic Revolution in West Indies.	594
Darling, Frank C. Note on Amry Vanden- bosch and Richard Butwell, The Changing Face of Southeast Asia	313	Wendell Bell, ed. Noted by Morton Kroll	1368
Das amerikanische Sicherheitssystem 1945– 1949—Studie zur Aussenpolitik der bür- gerlichen Gesellschaft. Ernst-Otto Czem-	.*	1952-1962: Changes in the Old Alliance. Jay S. Goodman. Noted by Vernon M. Goetcheus	984
piel. Noted by John H. Herz Dauer, Manning J. Review of Alfred F. Young. The Democratic Republicans of	300	Dennis, Jack. Note on Harmon Zeigler, The Political Life of American Teachers. Dennis, Jack. Note on Harmon Zeigler,	1339
New York: The Origins, 1763-1797 Dauer, Manning J. Review of Carl F. Prince, New Jersey's Jeffersonian Republicans: The Genesis of an Early Party	594	The Political World of the High School Teacher	1339
Machine	595	1945-1953d'Entrèves, Alexander Passerin. The Notion	688

of the State: An Introduction to Political	. •	Urban Politics: State Court Policy Impact
Theory. Noted by Maynard Smith	1319	and Functions in a Local Political System.
Deutsch, Karl W. Arms Control and the		Noted by Irvin H. Bromall	983
Atlantic Alliance: Europe Faces Coming		Dollars, Dependents and Dogma: Overseas
Policy Decisions. Noted by Steven J.		Chinese Remittances to Communist China.
Brams	1391	Chun-hsi Wu. Noted by Yi-chun Chang	1371
Deutsch, Karl W., Lewis J. Edinger, Roy		Dorrestic Sources of Foreign Policy. James
C. Macridis and Richard L. Merritt.		N. Rosenau. Noted by Paul Y. Ham-
France, Germany and the Western Alliance;		mond	299
A Study of Elite Attitudes on European		Donald, Aida DiPace. Note on Theodore
Integration and World Politics. Reviewed		Sorenson, Kennedy	260
by Donald D. Searing	240	Donohew, Lewis, Richard W. Budd and
Deutsch, Karl W. Review of W. Phillips		Robert K. Thorp. Content Analysis of
Davison, International Political Com-		Communications. Noted by Ellen B.
muncation	969	Pirro	607
Deutscher, Isaac. The Unfinished Revolu-		Donovan, John C. The Politics of Poverty.
tion: Russia 1917-1967. Noted by Donald		Noted by John H. Strange	636
D. Barry	662	Dorpalen, Andreas. Note on Ferdinand A.
Deutschlands Araberpolitik im zweiten Welt-		Hermens and Theodor Schieder, Staat, krieg. Heinz Tillman. Noted by Gerhard		Wirtschaft und Politik in der Weimarer
von Glahn	305	Republik, Festschrift für Heinrich Brüning	665
Deutschlands Beziehungen zu Frankreich,		Dorsett, Lyle W. The Pendergast Machines.
Grossbritannien, Belgien sowie deutsche		Noted by Douglas Fox	1337
Entwaffung Reparationen, Völkerbund und		Dorsey, John T., Jr. Review of Robert T.
internationale Abrüstung, Dezember 1925		Daland. Brazilian Planning: Develop-bis Juli 1926, Akten zur deutschen aus-		ment Politics and Administration	245
wartigen Politik, 1918-1945. Vol. I. Hans		Dougherty, James E. and J. F. Lehman,
Rothfels et al., eds. Noted by Stanley		Jr., eds. Arms Control for the Late Sixties.
Suval	675	Noted by William P. Gerberding	678
The Development of Modern Nigeria. Okei		Doughty, Paul L. Huaylas: An Andean
Arikpo. Noted by David B. Abernethy	998	District in Search of Progress. Noted by
The Development of Political Attitudes in		Marvin Alisky	1379
Children. Robert D. Hess and Judith V.		Draper, Theodore. Abuse of Power. Noted
Torney. Noted by Lester W. Milbrath	1348	by Gilbert R. Winham	686
Dexter, Anthony Lewis. Note on Daniel		Droz, Jacques. Le Socialisme Democratique,
Katz and Robert L. Kahn, The Social		1864-1960. Noted by William Ebenstein	257
Psychology of Organizations	1306	Druks, Herbert. Harry S. Truman and the
Dexter, Byron. The Years of Opportunity:		Russians, 1945-1953. Noted by Lee
The League of Nations, 1920–1926. Noted		Denson	688
by Whitney T. Perkins	1014	Duff, Ernest and John F. McCamant.
Dietze, Gottfried. America's Political Di-		Measuring Social and Political Require-
lemma: From Limited to Unlimited	1910	ments for System Stability in Latin	1105
Democracy. Noted by Peter Bachrach	1310	America	1125
Diplomatic Investigations: Essays in the Theory of International Politics. Herbert	,	Dulles, Eleanor Lansing. Berlin: The Wall
		Is Not Forever. Noted by William E.	905
Butterfield and Martin Wight, eds. Noted	679	Wright Dumhoff, G. William. Who Rules America?	295
by Don C. Piper	013	Noted by Andrew Hacker	1901
J. Edinger	1380	Duncan, Otis Dudley and Peter Blau. The	1301
Divisiveness and Social Conflict. Alan R.	1000
Beals and Bernard J. Siegel. Noted by	•	American Occupational Structure. Reviewed by M. Kent Jennings	596
Roger D. Masters	618	Dunn, Delmer. Note on James Holt, Con-	000
Dix, Robert H. Colombia: The Political	010	gressional Insurgents and the Party Sys-
Dimensions of Change. Noted by Kenneth		tem, 1909–1916	988
F. Johnson	996	Dunner, Joseph. Note on Bernard K.	000
Dix, Robert H. Note on Simon Collier,		Johnpoll, The Politics of Futility: The
Ideas and Politics of Chilean Independence		General Jewish Workers Bund of Poland,
1808–1833		1917–1943	667
Dolhegre Kenneth M. Trial Courts in		The Dunamic of Mexican Nationalism	501

Frederick C. Turner. Noted by Robert		The Elite in the Welfare State. Piet Thoenes,
E. Scott	1386	ed. Noted by Dwaine Marvick	603
The Dynamics of Compliance: Supreme		Elliott, James V. Note on Isaac Kramnick,
Court Decision-Making from a New		Bolingbroke and His Circle: The Politics
Perspective. Richard M. Johnson. Re-		of Nostalgia	1312 viewed by Sheldon Goldman	1285°	Ellul, Jacques. The Technological Society.
		Noted by William R. Nelson	603
Earl, Donald. The Moral and Political		The Emergence of Pakistan. Chaudhri
Tradition of Rome. Noted by Deane E.		Muhammad Ali. Noted by Ralph Brai-
Neubauer	609	banti	649
Earl Warren: A Political Biography. Leo		The Emergent American Society. Lloyd
Katcher. Noted by Clifford M. Lytle	631	Warner et al. Noted by Andrew Hacker	1301
Eastern Europe in Transition. Kurt London,		Enemies in Politics. David J. Finley, Ole
ed. Noted by Carl Beck	289	R. Holsti and Richard R. Fagan. Noted
Eastern European Government and Politics.		by Sheldon Appleton	1402
Vaclar Benes, Andrew Gyorgy and		Engelman, F. C. and M. A. Schwartz.
George Stambuk. Noted by Carl Beck	289	Political Parties and the Canadian Social
Ebenstein, William. Note on Jacques		Structure. Noted by Bernard K. John-
Droz. Le Socialisme Democratique, 1864-		poll	278
1960	257	Epstein, Fritz T. Note on Gabor Erdelyi,
Economic Development and American For-		prep. German Periodical Publications	660
eign Policy, 1943-1962. David A. Bald-		Epstein, Fritz, T. Note on Karol Maichel, win. Noted by Maurice Waters	1405	Soviet and Russian Newspapers at the
Economic Evaluation of Urban Renewal:		Hoover Institution	660
Conceptual Foundation of Benefit-Cost		Epstein, Klaus. The Genesis of German
Analysis. Jerome Rothenberg. Noted by		Conservatism. Noted by John Rodman	1007
David J. Olson	993	Erdelyi, Gabor, prep. German Periodical
Economic Policies Toward Less Developed		Publications. Noted by Fritz T. Epstein	660
Countries. Harry G. Johnson. Noted by		Erdman, Howard L. The Swatantra Party
George M. Platt	682	and Indian Conservatism. Reviewed by
Edinger, Lewis J., ed. Political Leadership		Susanne Hoeber Rudolph	1293
in Industrialized Societies: Studies in		Esman, Milton J. and Daniel S. Cheever.
Comparative Analysis. Noted by Thomas		The Common Aid Effort. Noted by Wil-
A. Baylis	644	liam R. Kintner	1393
Edinger, Lewis J. Note on Robert Blake,		An Essay on Marxian Economics. Joan
Disraeli	1380	Robinson. Noted by George R. Feiwel	1010
Edinger, Lewis J., Roy C. Macridis,		Eulau, Heinz and Robert Eyestone. Policy
Richard L. Merritt and Karl W. Deutsch.		Maps of City Councils and Policy Out-
France, Germany and the Western Alli-		comes: A Developmental Analysis	124
ance; A Study of Elite Attitudes on Euro-		The Eurocrats. Altiero Spinelli. Reviewed
pean Integration and World Politics. Re-		by Ronald Inglehart	593 viewed by Donald D. Searing	240	The European Common Market and the
Eidenberg, Eugene. Note on Lewis A.		World. Werner Feld. Noted by Vernon
Froman, Jr. The Congressional Process:		C. Warren, Jr	1020
Strategies, Rules and Procedures	263	Every Second Year: Congressional Behavior
Eidenberg, Eugene. Note on Randall B.		and the Two-Year Term. Charles O.
Ripley, Party Leaders in the House of		Jones. Noted by Roger H. Davidson	980
Representatives	1325	Eyestone, Robert and Heinz Eulau. Policy
Eisenberg, Ralph. Note on Malcolm E.		Maps of City Councils and Policy Out-
Jewell, Legislative Representative in the	•	comes: A Developmental Analysis	124
Contemporary South	1341
Eisenstein, Louis and Elliot Rosenberg. A		Factions and Coalitions in a One-Party
Stripe of Tammany's Tiger. Noted by		Japan: An Interpretation Based on the
Theodore J. Lowi	642	Theory of Games. Michael Leiserson	770
Electronic Journalism. William A. Wood.		Fagen, Richard R., David J. Finlay, and
Noted by David L. Paletz	639	Ole R. Holsti. Enemies in Politics. Noted
Elite Images and Foreign Policy Outcomes:		by Sheldon Appleton	1402
A Study of Norway. Philip M. Burgess.		Fagen, Richard R. Politics and Communica-
Noted by Ole P. Heleti	1308	tion Noted by Ellan B. Pirra	607

Fagen, Richard R. Review of John Plank,		eds. Race and the News Media. Noted by ed., Cuba and the United States: Long-		David L. Paletz	639
Range Perspectives		Fitzgibbon, Russell H. Note on Edward
Fagen, Richard R. Review of Maurice		J. Williams, Latin American Christian
Zeitlin, Revolutionary Politics and the		Democratic Parties	279
Cuban Working Class		Fleer, Jack D. North Carolina Politics: An
Fagin, Henry and Leo F. Schnore. Urban		Introduction. Noted by Lewis Bowman
Research and Policy Planning. Noted by		Fleron, Frederic J., Jr., Dean Jaros and
Frank Smallwood	620	Herbert Hirsch. The Malevolent Leader:
Fainsod, Merle. Some Reflections on Soviet-	020	Political Socialization in an American
American Relations	1093	Sub-culture	564
The Fall of Sukarno. Tarzie Vittachi. Noted	1000	Fogelman, Edwin. Note on Fred M.	00.
by William Liddle	670	Frohock, The Nature of Political Inquiry	973
	010	Food and Fiber in the Nation's Politics.	914
Federation in East Africa: Opportunities and Problems. Colin Leys and Peter		Charles M. Hardin. Noted by H. George	00
Robson, eds. Noted by Victor T. Le	107/	Frederickson	994
Vine	1354	Forbes, Hugh and Edward R. Tufte. Com-
The Federation of German Industry in		munication on criticisms of their article
Politics. Gerard Braunthal. Noted by		"A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling"	1270
George K. Romoser	664	Forbes, Hugh Donald and Edward R.
Feigert, Frank B. and M. Margaret Con-		Tufte. A Note of Caution in Causal
way. Motivation, Incentive Systems, and		Modelling	1258
the Political Party Organization	1159	Force, Order and Justice. Robert E. Osgood
Feit, Edward. Note on William A. Hance,		and Robert W. Tucker. Noted by Philip
ed., Southern Africa and the United States	1366	Green	1012
Feiwel, George R. Note on Joan Robinson,		The Foreign Aid Programs of the Soviet Bloc
An Essay on Marxian Economics	1010	and Communist China: An Analysis.
Feiwel, George R. Note on Mikhail Bor,		Kurt Muller. Noted by Marshall I.
Aims and Methods of Soviet Planning	1010	Goldman	1021
Feld, Werner. The European Common		Formosa, China, and the United Nations-
Market and the World. Noted by Vernon		Formosa in the World Community. Lung-
C. Warren, Jr	1020	Chu Chen and Harold Lasswell. Noted
Fenton, John H. Note on Alan L. Clem,		by Douglas Mendel, Jr	673
Prairie State Politics: Popular Democracy		The Foundations of Indian Federalism. K. R.
in South Dakota	1333	Bombwall. Noted by Baljit Singh	1008
Ferguson, Yale H. Note on Jerome Slater,		Fowler, Edmund P. and Robert L. Line-
The OAS and United States Foreign		berry. Communication on Wolfinger and Policy	308	Field, "Political Ethos and the Structure
Field, G. Lowell. Comparative Political		of City Government"	230
Development: The Precedent of the West.		Fox. Annette Baker and William T. R.
Noted by Warren L. Mason	280	Fox. NATO and the Range of American
Field, John Osgood and Raymond E.		Choice. Reviewed by Stuart A. Scheingold	1296
Wolfinger. Communication on criticisms of	\	Fox. Douglas. Note on Lyle W. Dorsett, their article "Political Ethos and the		The Pendergast Machine	1337
Structure of City Government"	227	Fox, William T. R. and Annette Baker
Filene, Peter G. Americans and the Soviet		Fox. NATO and the Range of American Experiment, 1917-1933: American At-		Choice. Reviewed by Stuart A. Schein-
titudes Toward Russia From the February		gold	1296
Revolution Until Diplomatic Recognition.		France, Germany, and the Western Alliance:
Noted by William B. Ballis	301	A Study of Elite Attitudes on European
Finer, S. E. Pareto and Pluto-Democracy:	001	Integration and World Politics. Karl W.
The Retreat to Galapagos	440	Deutsch, Lewis Edinger, Roy C. Mac-
Finlay, David J., Ole R. Holsti and Richard	110	ridis and Richard L. Merritt. Reviewed
R. Fagan. Enemies in Politics. Noted by		by Donald D. Searing	240
Sheldon Appleton	1402		₽ ±0
Fischer, Georges et al. Régime Interne et	¥ 202	Fank, Elke. Note on Eugene Davidson, The Trial of the Germans	1019
Politique Extérieure Dans les Pays d'Asie.		Frederickson, H. George. Note on Charles	1013
Noted by Robert O. Tilman	1364	M. Hardin, Food and Fiber in the Nation's
	1004		004
Fisher, Paul L. and Ralph L. Lowenstein,		Politics	994

Free, Lloyd A. and Hadley Cantril. The Political Beliefs of Americans: A Study of Public Opinion. Noted by Aage		System. Andrew M. Scott. Noted by Frederic Wurzburg	1016
Clausen		Alliance: Its Status and Prospects. Reviewed by Frederick H. Hartmann
Court. Noted by Bradley C. Canon French Foreign Policy Under de Gaulle, Alfred Grosser. Noted by William G.	265	Galtung, Johan. Theory and Methods of Social Research. Noted by Fred M. Frohock	617
Andrews		Galant, Henry C. Note on Philip M. Williams, The French Parliament: Politics in the Fifth Republic	1361
Henry C. Galant	1361 1314	Garceau, Oliver. Note on Harold Brayman. Corporate Management in a World of Politics: The Public, Political and Govern-
Freund, Paul A. On Law and Justice. Noted by William M. Beaney		mental Problems of Business The Garden and the Wilderness: Religion and	625
Fried, Robert C. Review of Seymour Martin Lipset and Stein Rokkan, eds. Party Systems and Voter Alignments: Cross- National Perspectives	960	Government in American Constitutional History. Mark DeWolfe Howe. Reviewed by Thomas S. Schrock	597
Frieden, Bernard J. Communication on Thomas J. Anton's review of his book	300	The Soviet Central Committee: An Elite Analysis	1232
"Metropolitan America: Challenge to Federalism"	1271	Geiger, Theodore. The Conflicted Relation- ship: The West and the Transformation of Asia, Africa and Latin America. Re-
Challenge to Federalism. Noted by Thomas J. Anton	623	viewed by H. Bradford Westerfield Gelb, Leslie H. Note on Thomas A. Bailey. The Art of Diplomacy	242 1401
Hitler and the United States, 1939-1941. Reviewed by H. P. Secher	590	The Genesis of German Conservatism. Klaus Epstein. Noted by John Rodman
Friedman, Edward. Communication on the December, 1967 issue of the Review Friedrich, Carl J. Some Thoughts on the	231	Geoffrey-Dechaume, François. China Looks at the World. Reviewed by Roger W. Benjamin	588
Relation of Political Theory to Anthropology	536	Gerbroding, William P. Note on James E. Dougherty and J. F. Lehman, Jr., eds.,
Friends Not Masters: A Political Auto- biography. Mohammad Ayub Khan. Noted by Khalid B. Sayeed	1388	Arms Control for the Late Sixties The German Army and the Nazi Party, 1933-39. Robert O'Neill. Reviewed by	678
Frohock, Fred M. Note on Johan Galtung. Theory and Methods of Social Research	617	H. P. Secher	590
Frohock, Fred M. The Nature of Political Inquiry. Noted by Edwin Fogelman Froman, Lewis A., Jr. Note on William F.	973	Erdelyi, prep. Noted by Fritz T. Epstein Germany and the Atlantic Alliance: The	660
Levantrosser, Congress and the Citizen-Soldier	263	Integration of Strategy and Politics, James L. Richardson. Noted by Charles B. Robson	676
Froman, Lewis A., Jr. Organization Theory and the Explanation of Important Characteristics of Congress	518	Germino, Dante. Beyond Ideology: The Revival of Political Theory. Reviewed by Harry Girvetz	958
Froman, Lewis A., Jr. The Congressional Process: Strategies, Rules and Procedures.		Gerstein, Robert S. Noted on Ira H. Carmen. Movies, Censorship and the Law	266
Noted by Eugene Eidenberg The Function of "China" in Marx, Lenin, and Mao. Donald M. Lowe. Noted by	263	Gerteiny, Alfred G. Mauritania. Noted by Bruce B. Mason	1381
Mostafa Rejai	1310	Congressional Ethics: The Conflict of Interest Issue	990
Administration. Paul Y. Hammond The Functioning of the International Political	57	Conflict of Interest Issue. Noted by Irwin N. Gertzog	990

Gil, Frederico G. Note on John Bartlow Martin. Overtaken by Events: The Domin- ican Crisis from the Fall of Trujillo to the	,	in Swiss Local Government. George A. Codding, Jr. Noted by Benjamin R. Barber
Civil War	310	Granqvist, Hans. The Red Guard. Reviewed by Roger W. Benjamin	588
Measure of Dissent: The Missing One Percent	814	Grant, Bruce. Indonesia. Noted by William R. Liddle
Gillin, Donald G. Note on John E. Rue,		Graves, Harold. Note on Jeremy Bennett,	670
Mao Tse-tung in Opposition 1927–1935 Gillin, Donald G. Warlord: Yen Hsi-shan	669	Eritish Broadcasting and the Danish Resistance Movement, 1940-1945: A Study in Shansi Province, 1911–1949. Noted by by Chi Hsi-sheng	292	of the Wartime Broadcasts of the BBC Danish Service	298
Ginsburgs, George. Note on George G. S. Murphy, Soviet Mongolia. A Study of the		Gresk Political Reaction to American and NATO Influences. Theodore A. Cou-
Oldest Political SatelliteGirvetz, Harry. Review of Dante Germino,	. 291	loumbis. Noted by Stephen G. Xydis Green, Philip. Note on Robert E. Osgood	302
Beyond Ideology: The Revival of Political Theory	958	and Robert W. Tucker, Force, Order and Justice	1012
Glock, Charles Y., ed. Survey Research in the Social Sciences. Noted by Betty H. Zisk	251	Greene, Fred. U. S. Policy and the Security of Asia. Noted by Normal D. Palmer	1400
Goerner, E. A. Peter and Caesar: The	201	Greenstein, Fred I. and Raymond E.	1400
Catholic Church and Political Authority. Noted by Glenn Tinder	610	Wolfinger. The Repeal of Fair Housing in California: An Analysis of Referendum
Goetcheus, Vernon M. Note on Jay S. Goodman. The Democrats and Labor in		Voting Gregor, A. James. Contemporary Radical	7 53
Rhode Island, 1952–1962: Changes in the Old Alliance	984	Ideologies: Totalitarian Thought in the Twentieth Century. Noted by James H.
Goldman, Marshall I. Note on Kurt Muller, The Foreign Aid Programs of the Soviet		Meisel	1307
Bloc and Communist China: An Analysis	1021	Uses of Functional Analysis	425
Goldman, Marshall I. Soviet Foreign Aid. Noted by Leon M. Herman	689	Grosser, Alfred. French Foreign Policy Under de Gaulle. Noted by William G.
Goldman, Merle. Literary Dissent in Com- munist China. Reviewed by Roger W.		Andrews	1018
BenjaminGoldman, Sheldon. Review of Richard M.	588	dal, Asian Drama: An Inquiry into the Poverty of Nations	1278
Johnson, The Dynamics of Compliance:		Group Influence and the Policy Process in	12.0
Supreme Court Decision-Making from a New Perspective	1285	the Soviet Union. Joel J. Schwartz and William R. Keech	840
Goldman, Sheldon. Review of William K. Muir, Jr., Prayer in the Public Schools:		Gugin, David. Note on Ralph Horwitz, The Political Economy of South Africa	652
Law and Attitude Change	1285	Gunnell, John G. Political Philosophy and Time. Noted by George Kateb	1303
The Politics of Provincialism: The Demo-	0.97	Gurr, Ted. A Causal Model of Civil Strife:	1000
cratic Party in Transition, 1918-1932 Goodman, Jay S. The Democrats and Labor	987	A Comparative Analysis Using New Indices	1104
in Rhode Island, 1952-1962: Changes in the Old Alliance. Noted by Vernon M.		Guyot, James F. Note on William R. Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism	648
Gordon, Michael R. Note on Georges	984	Gyorgy, Andrew, George Stambuk and Vaclav Benes. Eastern European Govern-
Bidault. Resistance: The Political Auto- biography of Georges Bidault	1003	ment and Politics. Noted by Carl Beck	289
Gosnell, Harold F. Note on J. R. Pole, Political Representation in England and		Haas, Michael. Communication on Russett et al., "National Political Units in the
the Origins of the American Republic Gottlieb, Gidon. The Logic of Choice: An	608	Twentieth Century: A Standardized List"	952
Investigation of Rule and Rationality. Noted by Stuart S. Nagel		Havia America Latina Democratica e Inte-
Governing the Commune of Veyrier: Politics	1000	grada. Romulo Betancourt. Noted by Robert J. Alexander	685

		•
Hacker, Andrew. Note on Arnold M. Rose, The Power Structure: Political Process in	1901	Marxism: A Re-Examination	974
	1301	Barnes, Party Democracy: Politics in an Italian Socialist Federation	1351
Hacker, Andrew. Noted on Lloyd Warner et al., The Emergent American Society	1301	and Anthony King, The British General Election of 1966	296
Hammond, Paul Y. A Functional Analysis of Defense Department Decision-Making in the McNamara Administration	57	Hennessy, Mary L. and Kenneth O. Warner. Public Management at the Bar- gaining Table. Noted by Donald P. Spren-
Hammond, Paul Y. Note on James N. Rosenau, Domestic Sources of Foreign	0.	gel	992
Policy	299	Goldman, Soviet Foreign Aid	689
Hance, William A., ed. Southern Africa and the United States. Noted by Edward Feit	1366	Hermens, Ferdinand A. and Theodor Schieder, eds., Staat, Wirtschaft und	:
Hardgrave, Robert L., Jr. Review of Lloyd		Politik in der Weimarer Republik, Fest-
I. Rudolph and Susanne H. Rudolph,		schrift für Heinrich Brüning. Noted by
The Modernity of Tradition: Political	1280	Andreas Dorpalen	665
Development in India Hardin, Charles M. Food and Fiber in the	1200	Herz, John H. Note on Ernst-Otto Czem- piel; Das amerikanische Sicherheitssystem
Nation's Politics. Noted by H. George		1945–1949—Studie zur Aussenpolitik der
Frederickson	994	bürgerlichen Gesellschaft	300
Harris, Jonathan. Note on Adam Bromke		Hess, Robert D. and Judith V. Torney.
and Philip E. Uren, eds., The Communist		The Development of Political Attitudes in
States and the West	.311	\ Children. Noted by Lester W. Milbrath	1348
Harris, Jonathan. Note on Rodger Swear-	•	Hindus, Maurice. The Kremlin's Human	- ingen, ed., Soviet and Chinese Communist		Dilemma: Russia After Half a Century of Power in the World Today	311	Revolution. Noted by Peter Juviler	286
Harris, Joseph P. Note on Marie Seton,	651	Hirsch, Herbert, Frederic J. Fleron, Jr.
Panditji: A Portrait of Jawaharlal Nehru Harry S. Truman and the Russians 1945-	651	and Dean Jaros. The Malevolent Leader: Political Socialization in an American
1953. Herbert Druks. Noted by Lee		Sub-culture	564
Denson	688	History of Indian Social and Political Ideas
Hartmann, Frederick H. Review of Charles		-From Rammohun to Dayananda. Bi-	•
O. Lerche, Last Chance in Europe: Bases		manbehari Majumdar. Noted by D.
for a New American Policy	239	MacKenzie Brown	611
Hartmann, Frederick H. Review of Edgar		Hohenberg, John. Between Two Worlds.	601
S. Furniss, Jr., ed., The Western Alliance: Its Status and Prospects	239	Noted by Marian D. Irish	684
Hawkins, Carroll. Note on Charles Wagley.	209	American Foreign Policy Beyond Utopian-
The Latin American Tradition	1377	ism and Realism	683
Hayek, Friederich A. Studies in Philosophy,	,	Holsti, Ole R., David J. Finlay and Richard
Politics and Economics. Reviewed by		R. Fagan. Enemies in Politics. Noted by
William C. Mitchell	968	Sheldon Appleton	1402
Hayward, Fred M. Note on Robert W. July,		Holsti, Ole R. Note on Philip M. Burgess,
The Origins of Modern African Thought:		Elite Images and Foreign Policy Out-	1000
Its Development in West Africa During	1919	comes: A Study of Norway	1398
the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries Hazard, John N., Peter Wiles, Alexander	1919	Hollander, Paul. Note on Alex Simirenko, ed., Soviet Sociology: Historical Antece-
Balinsky and Abram Bergson. Planning		dents and Current Appraisals	252 and the Market in the U.S.S.R.: the		Holmes, Jack E. Politics in New Mexico.	202
1960's. Noted by Arthur W. Wright	655	Noted by Roy D. Morey	641
Headley, A. R. Note on Obed Y. Asamoah,		Holt, James. Congressional Insurgents and
The Legal Significance of the Declarations		the Party System, 1909-1916. Noted by of the General Assembly of the United		Delmer Dunn	988
Nations	.693	Holt, Robert T. and John E. Turner. The
Heller, Walter W. New Dimensions of Political Flances C.		Political Basis of Economic Development:
ical Economy. Reviewed by Harvey C. Mansfield	248	An Exploration in Comparative Political	583
Hendel, Samuel. Note on Irving M. Zeitlin,	410	Analysis. Reviewed by Gerald A. Weiner Hoogerwerf, Andries. Note on Arend	900

Lijphart, The Politics of Accommodation:		for an Effective Congress. Harry M. Scoble.
Pluralism and Democracy in the Nether-		Noted by John H. Kessel	1326
lands	1349	"If, As Lipsitz Thinks, Political Science
Horowitz, Gad. Canadian Labor in Politics.		Is To Save Our Souls, God Help Us!"
Noted by Peter Regenstreif	1369	Communication by Sidney Verba	576
Horowitz, Irving Louis. Note on Raymond		If, As Verba Says, the State Functions as a
Aron, The Industrial Society: Three Es-		Religion, What Are We To Do Then To says on Ideology and Development 1	1321	Save Our Souls? Lewis Lipsitz	527
Horwitz, Ralph. The Political Economy of		The Illusion of Permanence: British Im-
South Africa. Noted by David Gugin	652	perialism in India. Francis G. Hutchins.
Horwitz, Robert. Note on Jacob Adler,		Noted by Jorgen Rasmussen	307
Claus Spreckles: The Sugar King of		Image of a President: Some Insights into the
Hawaii 1	1346	Political Views of School Children.
Houn, Franklin W. A Short History of		Roberta S. Sigel	216
Chinese Communism. Noted by Dennis		Imperial America: The International Politics
M. Ray 1	1362	of Primacy. George Liska. Noted by
The House and the Federal Role: A Computer		Clifton E. Wilson	681
Simulation of Roll-Call Voting. Michael		Imperial Japan's Higher Civil Service
J. Shapiro	494	Examinations. Robert M. Spaulding, Jr.
Hovet, Thomas, Jr. Note on David Mit-		Reviewed by Edwin O. Reischauer	966
rany, A Working Peace System	303	Indonesia. Bruce Grant. Noted by William
Howard, J. Woodford, Jr. Note on Archi-		R. Liddle	670
bald Cox, The Warren Court: Constitu-		The Industrial Society: Three Essays on tional Decision as an Instrument of		Ideology and Development. Raymond
•	1329	Aron. Noted by Irving Louis Horowitz.	1321
Howard, J. Woodford, Jr. On the Fluidity		Influencing Voters: A Study of Campaign of Judicial Choice	43	Rationality. Richard Rose. Noted by
Howe, Mark DeWolfe. The Garden and the			1365
Wilderness: Religion and Government in		Inglehart, Ronald. Review of Altiero
American Constitutional History. Re-		Spinelli, The Eurocrats	593
	597	The Insecurity of Nations: International
Hsi-sheng, Chi. Note on Donald G. Gillin,		Relations in the Twentieth Century.
Warlord: Yen Hsi-shan in Shansi Prov-		•	1397
	292	The Institutionalization of the U.S. House
Huaylas: An Andean District in Search of		of Representatives. Nelson W. Polsby	144
Progress. Paul L. Doughty. Noted by	. 0 = 0	The "Intensity" Problem and Democratic
	1379	Theory. Willmoore Kendall and George	_
Hughes, Colin A. and John S. Western. The		W. Carey	5
Prime Minister's Policy Speech: A Case		The Intermediaries: Third Parties in Inter-
Study in Televised Politics. Noted by	000	national Crises. Oran R. Young. Noted	1010
.	999	by David W. Wainhouse	1018
Hulicka, Irene M. and Karel Hulicka.		International Peace Observation: A History
Soviet Institutions, The Individual and Society. Noted by Ellen Mickiewicz	650	and Forecast. David W. Wainhouse, and Associates. Reviewed by Lincoln P.
Hulicka, Karel and Irene M. Hulicka.	658	Bloomfield	586
Soviet Institutions, The Individual and		International Political Communication. W.	900
	658	Phillips Davison. Reviewed by Karl W.
Hutchins, Francis G. The Illusion of Per-	000	Deutsch	969
manence: British Imperialism in India.		International Regions and the International	505
	307	System: A Study in Political Ecology.
Hyneman, Charles S. Popular Government	001	Bruce M. Russett. Reviewed by Michael in America: Foundations and Principles.		K. O'Leary	970
Reviewed by Neal Riemer	284	International Relations	0.0
		National Attributes as Predictors of Dele-
Ideas and Politics of Chilean Independence		gate Attitudes at the United Nations. Jack
1808-1833. Simon Collier. Noted by		E. Vincent	916
Robert H. Dix	372	Some Reflections on Soviet-American Rela-
Ideology and Electoral Action: A Compara-		tions. Merle Fainsod	1093
tive Case Study of the National Committee		Interstate Compacts in the Political Process

Weldon V. Barton. Noted by Thad L. Beyle	269	and Otis Dudley Duncan, The American Occupational Structure	596
Economic and Social Revolution. Richard H. Sanger. Noted by Paul F. Power	1023	tive in the Contemporary South. Noted by Ralph Eisenberg	1341
The Invention of the American Political Parties. Roy F. Nichols. Noted by James S. Young	268	Johnpoll, Bernard K. Note on F. C. Engel- mann and M. A. Schwartz, Political Parties and the Canadian Social Structure	278
Ionescu, Ghita. Communication on Robert A. Rupen's review of his book "The		Johnpoll, Bernard K. The Politics of Futility. The General Jewish Workers	210
Politics of the European States'' Ionescu, Ghita. The Politics of the European Communist States. Noted by Robert A.	1271	Bund of Poland, 1917-1943. Noted by Joseph Dunner	667
Rupen	663	and John Nottingham, The Myth of Mau Mau: Nationalism in Kenya	285
Between Two Worlds	684	Johnson, Harry G. Economic Policies Toward Less Developed Countries. Noted by George M. Platt	682
quejay. Noted by Robert A. Rupen The Islamic Law of Nations. Shaybani	1002	Johnson, Kenneth F. Note on Robert H. Dix, Colombia: The Political Dimensions	000
Siyar. Noted by Moshe Perlmann Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad Abduh and Rashid	671	of Change	996
Rida. Malcolm H. Kerb. Reviewed by Fauzi M. Najjar	972	from a New Perspective. Reviewed by Sheldon Goldman	1285
Israel on the Road to Sinai, 1949-1956. Ernest Stock. Noted by George Kirk	691	Johnston, J. Paul. Note on Donald Atwell Zoll, The Twentieth Century Mind	259
Issues of Political Development. Charles W. Anderson, Fred R. von der Mehden, and Crawford Young, eds. Reviewed by		Jones, Charles O. Every Second Year: Con- gressional Behavior and the Two-Year Term. Noted by Roger H. Davidson	980
Arpad von Lazar	243	Jones, Charles O. The Minority Party and Policy-Making in the House of Repre-	404
Jackson, Carlton. Presidential Vetoes: 1792- 1945. Noted by Robert J. Kulishek	628	Jouvenal, Bertrand de. The Art of Con-	481
Jamgotch, Nish, Jr. Note on Vernon V. Aspaturian, The Soviet Union in the World Communist System	690	jecture. Reviewed by James A. Robinson Juggernaut: The Russian Forces, 1918- 1966. Malcolm Mackintosh. Noted by	236
The Japanese Communist Movement, 1920-1966. Robert A. Scalapino. Reviewed by		Roman Kolkowicz	658
Solomon B. Levine The Japanese Imperial Institution in the Tokugawa Period. Herschel Webb. Noted	1300	African Thought: Its Development in West Africa During the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Noted by Fred M.
by Akira Kubata	1358	HaywardJung, Hwa Yol. Note on Alfred Schutz,	13 13
facé par). Correspondance d'Alexis de Tocqueville et de Gustave de Beaumont.		The Phenomenology of the Social World Justice in Communist China. Shao-Chuan	614
Reviewed by Melvin Richter Jaros, Dean, Herbert Hirsch and Frederic J. Fleron, Jr. The Malevolent Leader:	234	Leng. Noted by Chan Lien Juviler, Peter H. and Henry W. Morton, eds. Soviet Policy-Making: Studies of	1382
Political Socialization in an American Sub-culture	564	Communism in Transition. Noted by Carl A. Linden	288
Jennings, M. Kent, and Kenneth P. Lang- ton. Political Socialization and the High School Civics Curriculum in the United		Juviler, Peter. Note on Maurice Hindus, The Kremlin's Human Dilemma: Russia After Half a Century of Revolution	286
States. Jennings, M. Kent and Richard G. Niemi. The Transmission of Political Values from	852	Kahn, Robert L. and Daniel Katz. The Social Psychology of Organizations.
Parent to Child	169	Noted by Anthony Lewis Dexter Kaiser, Henry F. A Measure of the Popula-	1306

tion Quality of Legislative Apportionment Kallenbach, Joseph E. The American Chief Executive: The Presidency and the Gover-	208	Ideology and Electoral Action: A Comparative Case Study of the National Committee for an Effective Congress	1326
norship. Noted by Leslie Lipson (Kaplan, Harold. Urban Political Systems: A Functional Analysis of Metro Toronto.	626	Kessel, John H. Note on Leroy N. Riesel- bach, The Roots of Isolationism: Congres- sional Voting and Presidential Leader-
Noted by James L. Cox	643	ship in Foreign Policy	632
Kaplan, Lawrence S. Review of Arthur M. Cox, Prospects for Peacekeeping	961	Khan, Mohammad Ayub. Friends Not Masters: A Political Autobigoraphy.
Kaplan, Lawrence S. Review of Jeremy J.	J 01	Noted by Khalid B. Sayeed	1388
Stone, Strategic Persuasion: Arms Limita-		King, Anthony and D. E. Butler. The
tions through Dialogue	961	British General Eelection of 1966. Noted	296
Miller, World Order and Local Disorder:		by Bernard Hennessy	290
The United Nations and Internal Con-		Century. John Leddy Phelan. Noted by
▼	961	Robert G. Wesson	1006
Kaplan, Morton A. Note on Herbert J. Spiro, World Politics: The Global System	694	Kintner, William R. Note on Milton J. Esman and Daniel S. Cheever, The Com-
Kash, Don E. Note on Harold Orlans, Con-	094	mon Aid Effort	1393
	981	Kirk, George. Note on Manfred W. Wen-
Kassof, Allen, ed. Prospects for Soviet		ner, Modern Yemen, 1918-1966	647
•	.385	Kirk, George. Note on Ernest Stock, Israel	601
Katcher, Leo. Earl Warren: A Political Biography. Noted by Clifford M. Lytle	631	on the Road to Sinai, 1949-1956 Kleusner, Samuel Z., ed. The Study of Total	691
Kateb, George. Note on George Lichtheim,	001	Eocieties. Noted by C. P. Wolf	601
The Concept of Ideology and Other		Kneese, Allen V. and Stephen C. Smith,
	600	eds. Water Research. Noted by Ashley L.	004
Kateb, George. Note on John G. Gunnell, Political Philosophy and Time	1303	Schiff	634
Katz, Daniel and Robert L. Kahn, The	.000	and Government. Sanford A. Lakoff, ed.
Social Psychology of Organizations. Noted		Noted by Bernard Barber	985
· · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·	1306	Kolmehl, Kenneth. Note on Lee Metcalf
Kautsky, John H. and Roger W. Benjamin. Communism and Economic Development.	110	and Vic Reinemer, Overcharge	264
Keech, William R. and Joel J. Schwartz.	110	Kogan, Norman. Review of Sidney G. Tarrow, Peasant Communism in Southern
Group Influence and the Policy Process		Italy	1282
	840	Kolkowicz, Roman. Note on Malcolm
Keech, William R. Note on Annuaire		Mackintosh, Juggernaut: The Russian	a z o
Suisse de Science Politique—Schweizer- isches Jahrbuch für Politische Wissen-		Forces, 1918-1966	658
schaft	666	The Recruitment of Candidates for the
Kendall, Willmoore and George W. Carey.		Canadian House of Commons	1242
The "Intensity" Problem and Democratic	E	Kornberg, Allan. Canadian Legislative Be-
Theory Kennedy. Theodore C. Sorenson. Noted by	5	havior: A Study of the 25th Parliament. Noted by Dean L. Yarwood	997
Aida DiPace Donald	260	Kort, Fred. A Nonlinear Model for the Kerb, Malcolm. Islamic Reform: The Po-		£nalysis of Judicial Decisions	546
litical and Legal Theories of Muhammad		Kramer, Gerald H. Communication on
Abduh and Rashid Rida. Reviewed by Fauzi M. Najjar	972	Thomas Casstevens' "A Theorem About Voting"	955
Kercz, Jerzy F., ed. Soviet and East		Kramnick, Isaac. Bolingbroke and His
European Agriculture. Noted by Roy D.		Circle: The Politics of Nostalgia. Noted
Laird	290	by James V. Elliott	1312
Kerr, Malcolm H. Note on Walter Laqueur, The Road to Jerusalem	1403	The Kremlin's Human Dilemma: Russia After Half a Century of Revolution.
Kertesz, Stephen D. The Quest for Peace		Maurice Hindus. Noted by Peter Juviler	286
Through Diplomacy. Noted by Louis		Krislov, Samuel. The Negro in Federal Em-	_
F. Brakeman	679	ployment. Noted by Richard Claude	637
Kessel, John H. Note on Harry M. Scoble.		Kroll, Morton, Note on Wendell Bell, ed.,

The Southern Conference for Human Welfare. Noted by Emory F. Via	279
The Japanese Imperial Institution in the Tokugawa Period	239 373 279 377 352
Kulski, W. W. Note on Alfred Berzins, The Two Faces of Co-Existence	373 279 377 352 619
tical Institutions. Jacques Lambert. Noted by Arthur P. Whitaker	279 377 352 619
sell H. Fitzgibbon	377 352 619
mittee and the New Deal. Jerold S. Auerbach. Noted by Douglas Camp Chaffey. 989 La Fonction Parlementaire en Belgique: Mecanismes D'Acces et Images. Frederic Debuyst. Noted by Jeffrey L. Obler	352 619
La Fonction Parlementaire en Belgique: Mecanismes D'Acces et Images. Frederic Debuyst. Noted by Jeffrey L. Obler	619
Laird, Roy D. Note on Jerzy F. Kercz, ed., Soviet and East European Agriculture 290 Laissez-faire-Pluralismus: Demokratie und Wirtschaft des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters. Goetz Briefs, ed. Noted by Gerard Braunthal	619
Laissez-faire-Pluralismus: Demokratie und Wirtschaft des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters. Goetz Briefs, ed. Noted by Gerard Braunthal
Lakoff, Sanford A., ed. Knowledge and Power: Essays on Science and Government. Noted by Bernard Barber	294
Lambert, Jacques. Latin America: Social Structures and Political Institutions. Noted by Arthur P. Whitaker
Lang, Gladys Engel and Kurt. Politics and Voting Turnout in American Cities	297
Television, Noted by Bradbury Seasholes 1327 Lefever, Ernest W. Uncertain Mandate.	7 96
	287
Langton, Kenneth P. and M. Kent Jennings. Political Socialization and the High School Civics Curriculum in the United the General Assembly of the United Nations. Obed Y. Asamoah. Noted by A. R. Headley	693
States
Thompson, Organizations in Action 246 lations in the Twentieth Century 13 La Porte, Todd. Review of Victor H. Vroom, ed., Methods of Organizational porary South. Malcolm E. Jewell. Noted	397
	341
Noted by Malcolm H. Kerr	678
nett, Cadres, Bureaucracy, and Political Power in Communist China	58 4
Soviet Politics Since Krushchev. Noted by William Parente	J.J.E
Larus, Joel. Nucleur Weapons Safety and the Common Defense. Noted by Timothy Based on the Theory of Games	770
Alden Williams	211

Howard Bliss	304	Social Democracy in Germany, 1878-1890.
Lemercier-Quelquejay, Chantal and Alex-		Noted by Edward L. Pinney	270
andre Bennigsen. Islam in the Soviet		Lien, Chan. Note on Shao-chuan Leng,
Union. Noted by Robert A. Rupen	1002	Justice in Communist China	1382
Lenczowski, George. Review of Douglas		Lijphart, Arend. The Politics of Accom-
E. Ashford, Morocco-Tunisia: Politics and		modation: Pluralism and Democracy in Planning	587	the Netherlands. Noted by Andries
Lenczowski, George. Review of Douglas E.		Hoogerwerf	1349
Ashford, National Development and Local		Lijphart, Arend. The Trauma of Decolon-
Reform: Political Participation in Moroc-		ization: The Dutch and West New Guinea.
co, Tunisia and Pakistan	587	Noted by James C. Scott	314
Lenczowski, George. Review of Douglas E.		Lind, Alden E. Note on Joseph L. Bernd,
Ashford, Perspectives of a Moroccan		ed., Mathematical Applications in Polit-
Nationalist	587	ical Science, II	615
Leng, Shao-chuan. Justice in Communist		Linden, Carl A. Note on Henry W. Morton
China. Noted by Chan Lien	1382	and Peter H. Juviler, eds., Soviet Policy-
Lenin: The Man, The Theorist, The Leader:		Making: Studies of Communism in Tran-
A Reappraisal. Leonard Schapiro and		eilion	288
Peter Reddaway, eds. Noted by Alfred		Lindsay, David. Communication on the
G. Meyer	1001	"myth" that communist governments
Lerche, Charles O. Last Chance in Europe:		have never been voted into power in a
Bases for a New American Policy. Re-		free election	1272 viewed by Frederick H. Hartmann	239	Lineberry, Robert L. and Edmund P.
Le Socialisme Democratique, 1864-1960.		Fowler. Communication on Wolfinger
Jacques Droz. Noted by William Eben-		and Field, "Political Ethos and the Struc-stein	257	ture of City Government"	230
L'Europe au berceau: souvenirs d'un tech-		Lineberry, Robert L. Note on Alan K.
nocrate. Robert Lemaignen. Noted by		Campbell and Seymour Sacks, Metro-
Howard Bliss	304	politan America: Fiscal Patterns and
Levantrosser, William F. Congress and the		Governmental Systems	621
Citizen-Soldier. Noted by Lewis A. Fro-		Lippincott, Benjamin E. Democracy's man, Jr	263	Dilemma: The Totalitarian Party in a Free
Le Vine, Victor T. Note on Colin Leys and		Society. Noted by Kurt P. Tauber	1315
Peter Robson, eds., Federation in East		Lipset, Seymour Martin and Stein Rokkan,
Africa: Opportunities and Problems	1354	eds. Party Systems and Voter Alignments:
Le Vine, Victor T. Note on Immanuel		Cross-National Perspectives. Reviewed by
Wallerstein, Africa: The Politics of Unity	1354	Robert C. Fried	960
Levine, Solomon B. Review of Robert A.		Lipsitz, Lewis. Communication on criticisms
Scalapino, The Japanese Communist		of his article "If, As Verba Says, the Movement, 1920-1966	1300	State Functions as a Religion, What Are
Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Fifth		We to Do Then to Save Our Souls?"	577
Amendment. Noted by Dean Alfange, Jr.	1334	Lipsitz, Lewis. If as Verba Says, the State
Lewis, Paul H. The Politics of Exile: Para-		Functions as a Religion, What Are We to guay's Febrerista Party. Noted by Ronald		Do Then to Save Our Souls?	527
H. McDonald	1356	Lipsky, Michael. Protest as a Political
Leys, Colin and Peter Robson, eds. Federa-		Resource	1144
tion in East Africa: Opportunities and		Lipson, Leslie. Note on Joseph E. Kallen-
Problems. Noted by Victor T. Le Vine	1354	bach, The American Chief Executive:
A Liberal State At War: English Politics		The Presidency and the Governorship	626 and Economics During the Crimean War.		Liska, George. Imperial America: The
Olive Anderson. Noted by Charles Mark	668	International Politics of Primacy. Noted
Lichtheim, George. The Concept of Ideology		by Clifton E. Wilson	681 and Other Essays. Noted by George		Li Ta-chao and the Origins of Chinese
Kateb	600	Marxism. Maurice Meisner. Noted by
Liddle, William. Note on Tarzie Vittachi,		Mostafa Rejai	1310
The Fall of Sukarno	670	Literary Dissent in Communist China.
Liddle, William R. Note on Bruce Grant,		Merle Goldman. Reviewed by Roger W.
Indonesia	670	Benjamin	588
Lidtle Vernon I. The Outlaned Party		Looks John Tong Tracts on Congrument

Philip Abrams, ed. Noted by Fred H. Willhoite	614	Madron, Thomas Wm. Note on W. J. M. Mackenzie, Politics and Social Science	075
Locke's State of Nature: Historical Fact or Moral Fiction? Richard Ashcraft	898	Magid, Alvin. Note on Wolfgang R. Stol- per, Planning Without Facls: Lessons in	975
Lodge, Milton. Soviet Elite Participatory	090	Resource Allocation from Nigeria's De-
Attitudes in the Post-Stalin Period	827	velopment	654
Loewenberg, Gerhard. Note on William		Maichel, Karol, comp. Soviet and Russian
Safran, Veto-Group Politics: The Case of		Newspapers at the Hoover Institution: A
Health-Insurance Reform in West Ger-	1055	Catalog. Noted by Fritz T. Epstein	660 many	1357	Main, Jackson Turner. The Upper House in
Concepts of Rule and Rationality. Gidon		Revolutionary America, 1765-1788. Noted by Joseph Cooper
Gottlieb. Noted by Stuart S. Nagel	1308	Majority vs. Opposition in the French Na-	1001
Loman, Louis E. Thailand: The War That		tional Assembly, 1956-1965: A Guttman
Is, The War That Will Be. Noted by		Scale Analysis. David M. Wood	88
Robert O. Tilman	1390	Majumdar, Bimanbehari. History of Indian
London, Kurt, ed. Eastern Europe in	000	Social and Political Ideas—From Ram-
Transition. Noted by Carl Beck	289	mohun to Dayananda. Noted by D.	611
Lopreato, Joseph. Note on Gianfranco Poggi, Catholic Action in Italy: The		MacKenzie Brown The Making of the Second Reform Bill. F. B.	611
Sociology of a Sponsored Organization	255	Smith. Noted by James B. Christoph	1378
Loveday, P. and A. W. Martin. Parliament	-00	Malapportionment, Party Competition, and	20.0
Factions and Parties: The First 30 Years		the Functional Distribution of Govern-of Responsible Government in New South		mental Expenditures. Allan G. Pulsipher
Wales, 1856-1889. Noted by John Orbell	1000	and James L. Weatherby, Jr	1207
Lowe, Donald M. The Function of "China"		The Malevolent Leader: Political Socializa-in Marx, Lenin and Mao. Noted by	1910	tion in an American Sub-culture. Dean
Mostafa Rejai	1310	Jaros, Herbert Hirsch, and Frederic J. Fleron, Jr	564
Time: Progress and Poverty in America's		Manoukian, Agopik, Francesco Alberoni,	501
Renewing Cities. Noted by Vincent L.		Vittorio Capecchi, Franca Olivetti, and
Marando	619	Antonio Tosi. L'Attivista di Partito.
Lowenstein, Ralph L. and Paul L. Fisher.		Noted by Robert D. Putnam	1352
eds. Race and the News Media. Noted by		Mansfield, Harvey C. Review of Walter
David L. Paletz	639	W. Heller, New Dimensions of Political	040
Lowi, Theodore J. Note on Louis Eisen- stein and Elliot Rosenberg, A Stripe of		Economy	248
Tammany's Tiger	642	John E. Rue. Noted by Donald G.
L'Union pour la Nouvelle République:	012	Gillin	669
Etude du pouvoir au sein d'un parti poli-		Marando, Vincent L. Note on Derek Senior, tique. Jean Charlot. Noted by John E.		ed., The Regional City: An Anglo-Amer-
Schwarz	294	ican Discussion of Metropolitan Planning	619
Lytle, Clifford M. Note on Leo Katcher,		Marando, Vincent. Note on Edward O.
Earl Warren: A Political Biography	631	Laumann, Prestige and Association in an
Mackenzie, W. J. M. Politics and Social		Urban Community: An Analysis of an Urban Stratification System	619
Science. Noted by Thomas Wm. Madron	975	Marando, Vincent L. Note on Jeanne R.	010
Mackintosh, Malcolm. Juggernaut: The		Lowe, Cities in a Race With Time: Prog-
Russian Forces, 1918-1966. Noted by		ress and Poverty in America's Renewing
Roman Kolkowicz	658 [′]	Cities	619
MacMaster, Robert E. Danilevsky, A		Margolis, Julius, Richard E. Caves and	•
Russian Totalitarian Philosopher. Noted	oge	Joe S. Bain. Northern California's Water	ġ94
by Rolf H. W. Theen	256	Industry. Noted by Ashley L. Schiff Mark, Charles. Note on Olive Anderson,	634
J. Edinger and Richard L. Merritt.		A Liberal State at War: English Politics
France, Germany, and the Western Al-		and Economics During the Crimean War	668
liance; A Study of Elite Attitudes on		Martin, A. W. and P. Loveday. Parliament
European Integration and World Politics.		Factions and Parties: The First 30 Years
Reviewed by Donald D. Searing	240	of Responsible Government in New South

Wales, 1856-1889. Noted by John Orbell Martin, John Bartlow. Overtaken by Events:	1000	ica	1125
The Dominican Crisis from the Fall of Trujillo to the Civil War. Noted by Fre-		ican Party System: Party Formation in the Jacksonian Era. Noted by William Nisbet	•
derico G. Gil	310	Chambers	1330
Martin, L. W. The Sea in Modern Strategy.	010	McCrone, Donald and Charles F. Cnudde.	1000
Noted by Bernard Brodie	1019	Communication on Forbes and Tufte, "A	-
Martin, Roscoe C. Note on Aaron Wil-	1010	Note of Caution in Causal Modelling"	1260
davsky, ed., American Federalism in		McDonald, Ronald H. Note on Paul H.	1200
Perspective	624	Lewis, The Politics of Exile: Paraguay's
Marvick, Dwaine. Note on Piet Thoenes,	024		1956
The state of the s	600	Februsia Party	1356
ed., The Elite in the Welfare State	603	McLin, Jon B. Canada's Changing Defense
Marx in the Mid-Twentieth Century: A		Folicy, 1957-1963: The Problems of a
Yugoslav Philosopher Reconsiders Karl		Middle Power In Alliance. Reviewed by	005
Marx's Writings. Gajo Petrovic. Noted		Gilbert R. Winham	965
by Edward D. Wilde	613	McShea, Robert J. The Political Philosophy	1000
Marxism: A Re-Examination. Irving M.	0 101	of Spinoza. Noted by Stanley Rosen	1323
Zeitlin. Noted by Samuel Hendel	974	A Measure of the Population Quality of
Mason, Bruce B. Note on Alfred G. Ger-		Legislative Apportionments. Henry F.
teiny, Mauritania	1381	Kaiser	208
Mason, Warren L. Note on G. Lowell		Measuring the Concentration of Power in
Field, Comparative Political Development:		Political Systems. Steven J. Brams	461
The Precedent of the West	280	Measuring Social and Political Requirements
Masters, Roger D. Note on Alan R. Beals		for System Stability in Latin America.
and Bernard J. Siegel, Divisiveness and		Ernest A. Duff and John F. McCamant.	1125
Social Conflict	618	Meehan, Eugene J. Note on Oran R. Young,
Mathematical Applications in Political		Systems of Political Science	1322
Science, II. Bernd, Joseph L., ed. Noted		Meisel, James H. Note on A. James Gregor,
by Alden E. Lind	615	Contemporary Radical Ideologies: Totali-
Mathematical Applications in Political		tarian Thought in the Twentieth Century	1307
Science, III. Joseph L. Bernd, ed. Re-		Meisner, Maurice. Li Ta-chao and the viewed by Herbert F. Weisberg	1294	Origins of Chinese Marxism. Noted by
Mauritania. Alfred G. Gerteiny. Noted by		Mostafa Rejai	1310
Bruce B. Mason	1381	Merelman, Richard M. Communication on Maw, Ba. Breakthrough in Burma: Memoirs		criticisms of his article "On the Neo-of a Revolution, 1939-1946. Noted by		Elitist Critique of Community Power"	1269
Fred R. von der Mehden	1363	Methodology
Maxime Weygand and Civil-Military Re-		$M \epsilon a suring$ the Concentration of Power in lations in Modern France. Philip C. F.		Political Systems, Steven J. Brams	461
Bankwitz. Noted by John N. Colas	1004	National Political Units in the Twentieth
Meyer, Arno J. Politics and Diplomacy of		Century: A Standardized List. Bruce M.
Peacemaking: Containment and Counter-		Russett, J. David Singer and Melvin revolution at Versailles, 1918-1919. Noted		Small	932 by Whitney T. Perkins	1014	A Nonlinear Model for the Analysis of
Mayhew, David R. Review of James T.		Judicial Decisions. Fred Kort	546
Patterson. Congressional Conservatism and		A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling.
and the New Deal: The Growth of the		Hugh Donald Forbes and Edward R.
Conservative Coalition in Congress, 1933-		Tufte	1258
1939	1298	Political Science and the Uses of Functional
Mazrui, Ali A. Towards a Pax Africana: A		Analysis. A. James Gregor	425
Study of Ideology and Ambition. Noted		Probabilism and the Number of Units
by Herbert J. Spiro	258	Affected Measuring Influence Concentra-
McBride, Michael and Michael P. Gehlen.		ion. Bruce M. Russett	476
The Soviet Central Committee: An Elite		A Salience Dimension of Politics for the
Analysis	1232	Study of Political Culture. Moshe M.
McCamant, John F. and Ernest A. Duff.		Ozudnowski	878
Measuring Social and Political Require-		A Theorem about Voting. Thomas W.
ments for System Stability in Latin Amer-		Casstevens	205

Milbrath, Lester W. Note on Robert D.		Nayar. Noted by Theodore P. Wright,	650
Hess and Judith V. Torney, The Develop- ment of Political Attitudes in Children	1348	Jr	000
Melotti, Umberto. Cultura e partecipazione		A. Hayek, Studies in Philosophy, Politics	060
sociale nella citta in transformazione. Noted by Samuel H. Barnes	273	and Economics	968
Mendel, Douglas, Jr. Note on Lung-Chu	213	and Politics: The Theories of Talcott	-
Chen, and Harold Lasswell, Formosa,		Parsons. Noted by George R. Boynton	250
China and the United Nations—Formosa		Mitrany, David. A Working Peace System.
in the World Community	673	Noted by Thomas Hovet, Jr	303
Meranto, Philip. The Politics of Federal Aid		Modelski, George and Jean-Luc Vellut.
to Education in 1965: A Study in Political		Communication on Russett et al, "Na-
Innovation. Noted by Lawrence K.		tional Political Units in the Twentieth
Pettit	635	Century: A Standardized List"	952
Merelman, Richard M. On the Neo-Elitist		Modern Yemen, 1918-1966. Manfred W.
Critique of Community Power	451	Wenner. Noted by George Kirk	647
Merritt, Richard L., Karl W. Deutsch,		The Modernity of Tradition: Political
Lewis J. Edinger, and Roy C. Macridis.		Development in India. Lloyd I. Rudolph
France, Germany, and the Western Al-		and Susanne H. Rudolph. Reviewed by	1000
liance; A Study of Elite Attitudes on		Robert L. Hardgrave, Jr	1280
European Integration and World Politics. Reviewed by Donald D. Searing	940	The Moral and Political Tradition of Rome. Donald Earl. Noted by Deane E. Neu-
Metcalf, Lee and Vic Reinemer. Over-	240	bauer	609
charge. Noted by Kenneth Kofmehl	264	Morey, Roy D. Note on Jack E. Holmes,	000
Methods of Organizational Research. Victor	201	Politics in New Mexico	641
H. Vroom, ed. Reviewed by Todd La		Morgan, Donald G. Congress and the Consti-	•
Porte	246	tution: A Study of Responsibility. Noted
Metropolitan America: Challenge to Federal-		by Dale Vinyard	986
ism. Bernard J. Frieden. Noted by		Morocco-Tunisia: Politics and Planning.
Thomas J. Anton	623	Douglas E. Ashford. Reviewed by George
Metropolitan America: Fiscal Patterns and		Lenczowski	587
Governmental Systems. Alan K. Campbell		Morrison, Joseph L. W. J. Cash: Southern and Seymour Sacks. Noted by Robert L.		Prophet: A Biography and Reader. Noted
Lineberry	621	by David M. Abshire	991
Meyer, Alfred G. Note on Leonard Schapiro		Morton, Henry W. and Peter H. Juviler, and Peter Reddaway, eds., Lenin: The		eds. Soviet Policy-Making: Studies of Man, The Theorist, The Leader: A Reap-	1001	Communism in Transition. Noted by Carl	000
praisal	1001	A. Linden	288
Mickiewicz, Ellen. Note on Karel Hulicka, and Irene M. Hulicka, Soviet Institutions,		Motivation, Incentive Systems, and the Political Party Organization. M. Margaret
The Individual and Society	658	Conway and Frank B. Feigert	1159
Mickiewicz, Ellen Propper. Soviet Political	000	Movies, Censorship and the Law. Ira H.
Schools: The Communist Party Adult		Carmen. Noted by Robert S. Gerstein.	266
Instruction System. Noted by Joel J.		Muir, William K. Jr. Prayer in the Public
Schwartz	276	Schools: Law and Attitude Change. Re-
Miller, J. D. B. The Politics of the Third		viewed by Sheldon Goldman	1285
World. Noted by Jack C. Planodile	1017	Muller, Kurt. The Foreign Aid Programs of
Miller, Linda B. World Order and Local		the Soviet Bloc and Communist China:
Disorder: The United Nations and Internal		An Analysis. Noted by Marshall I. Gold-	1001
Conflicts. Reviewed by Lawrence S.	001		1021
Kaplan	961	Murphy, George G. S. Soviet Mongolia. A
Milner, Neal. Note on Arthur Niederhoffer, Behind the Shield: The Police in Urban		Study of the Oldest Political Satellite. Noted by George Ginsburgs	291
Society	625	Murty, B. S. Propaganda and World Public	LOL
The Minority Party and Policy-Making in	020	Order: The Legal Regulation of the Ideothe House of Representatives. Charles O.		logical Instrument of Coercion. Noted by
Jones	481	Anthony A. D'amato	1392
Minority Politics in the Punjab. Baldev Raj		Myrdal, Gunnar. Asian Drama: An Inquiry into the Poverty of Nations. Reviewed by		in India. Michael Brecher. Noted by

Jean Grossholtz	1278	Paul R. Brass	293
The Myth of Mau Mau: Nationalism in	•	Nellis, John R. and Fred G. Burke. Note on
Kenya. Carl H. Rosberg, Jr. and John		Jeffrey Butler and A. A. Castagno, eds.,	,
Nottingham. Noted by David H. Johns.	285	Boston University Papers on Africa,
		Transition in African Politics	283
Nagel, Stuart S. Note on Gidon Nottlieb,		Nelson, William R. Note on Jacques Ellul,
The Logic of Choice: An Investigation of		The Technological Society	603
the Concepts of Rule and Rationality		Neubauer, Deane E. Communication on Najjar, Fauzi M. Review of Malcolm Kerb,		criticisms of his article "Some Conditions	701
Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal		of Democracy"	581
Theories of Muhammad Abduh and Rashid Rida	972	Neubauer, Deane E. Note on Donald Earl, The Moral and Political Tradition of
Nash, A. E. Keir. Review of William Nisbet	514	Rome	609
Chambers and Walter Dean Burnham,		New Dimensions of Political Economy.	003
The American Party Systems		Walter W. Heller. Reviewed by Harvey
National Attributes as Predictors of Delegate	12.0	C. Mansfield	248
Attitudes at the United Nations. Jack E.		New Jersey's Jeffersonian Republicans:
Vincent	.916	The Genesis of an Early Party Machine.	٠
National Development and Local Reform:		Carl F. Prince. Reviewed by Manning J.
Political Participation in Morocco,		Dauer	595
Tunisia and Pakistan. Douglas E. Ash-		Newman, Dale A. Note on James L. Price,
ford. Reviewed by George Lenczowski	587	Organizational Effectiveness: An Inventory
National Political Units in the Twentieth	•	of Propositions	1320
Century: A Standardized List. Bruce M.		Nichols, Roy F. The Invention of the Ameri-
Russett, J. David Singer and Melvin		can Political Parties. Noted by James S.
Small	932	Young	268
"National Political Units in the Twentieth		Niederhoffer, Arthur. Behind the Shield:
Century: A Standardized List," Russett		The Police in Urban Society. Noted by et al. Communication by George Modelski	0.50	Neal Milner	625 and Jean-Luc Vellut	952	Niemi, Richard G. and M. Kent Jennings.
"National Political Units in the Twentieth		The Transmission of Political Values from	100
Century: A Standardized List," Russett		Parent to Child I Baland Ban	169
et al. Communication by Michael Haas Nationalists Without Nations: The Oligarchy	952	Nomos X: Representation. J. Roland Pennock and John W. Chapman, eds. Re-
Versus the People in Latin America.		viewed by James A. Steintrager	1289
Victor Alba. Noted by Peter Ranis	1383	A Nonlinear Model for the Analysis of	1200
NATO and Europe. André Beaufre. Re-	1000	Judicial Decisions. Fred Kort	546 viewed by Stuart A. Scheingold	1296	North Carolina Politics: An Introduction.	- ·
NATO and the Range of American Choice.		Jack D. Fleer. Noted by Lewis Bowman	1347
William T. R. Fox and Annette Baker		Northern California's Water Industry. Joe
Fox. Reviewed by Stuart A. Scheingold.	1296	S. Bain, Richard E. Caves and Julius
The Nature of Political Inquiry. Fred M.		Margolis. Noted by Ashley L. Schiff	634
Frohock. Noted by Edwin Fogelman	973	A Note on Censorship. Gordon Tullock	1265
Nayar, Baldev Raj. Minority Politics in the		A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling.
Punjab. Noted by Theodore P. Wright,		Hugh Donald Forbes and Edward R.
Jr	650	Tufte	1258
The Nazi Seizure of Power: The Experience		The Notion of the State: An Introduction of a Single German Town 1930-1935.		to Political Theory. Alexander Passerin	1910
William Sheridan Allen. Noted by G.	079	d'Entrèves. Noted by Maynard Smith	1919
Bingham Powell, Jr	272	Nottingham, John and Carl H. Rosberg, Jr. The Myth of Mau Mau: Nationalism and Socioeconomic Development: The Case		in Kenya. Noted by David H. Johns.	. 285 of Latin America	889	Nuclear Weapons Safety and the Common	. 200
The Negro in Federal Employment. Samuel	-50	Defense. Joel Larus. Noted by Timothy
Krislov. Noted by Richard Claude	637	Alden Williams	1396
The Negro in Virginia Politics, 1902-1965.		Nyomarkay, Joseph. Charisma and Fac-
Andrew Buni. Noted by Lewis Bowman.	638	tionalism in the Nazi Party. Reviewed by
Mohan's Mantle, The Delition of Sugaragion		H P Sacher	500

		,
The OAS and United States Foreign Policy. Jerome Slater. Noted by Yale H. Fer-			1012
guson	308	The Outlawed Party: Social Democracy in Germany, 1878–1890. Vernon L. Lidtke. Noted by Edward L. Pinney	270
Mecanismes D'Access et Images O'Leary, Michael K. Review of Bruce M.	274	Overcharge. Lee Metcalf and Vic Reinemer. Noted by Kenneth Kofmehl	264
Russett, International Regions and the International System: A Study in Political Ecology	970	Overtaken by Events: The Dominican Crisis from the Fall of Trujillo to the Civil War. John Bartlow Martin. Noted by Fred-
O'Leary, Michael Kent. The Politics of American Foreign Aid. Noted by Vincent	310	erico G. Gil	310
Davis	680	Pakistan's Development: Social Goals and Private Incentives. Gustav F. Papanek. Noted by Khalid B. Sayeed	1388
Antonio Tosi. L'Attivista di Partito. Noted by Robert D. Putnam	1352	Paletz, David L. Note on Paul L. Fisher and Ralph L. Lowenstein, Race and the
Olorunsola, Victor A. Note on Robert F. Stevenson, Population and Political Systems in Tropical Africa	1386	News Media Paletz, David L. Note on William A. Wood, Electronic Journalism	639 639
Olson, David J. Note on Jerome Rothenberg, Economic Evaluation of Urban Re-	1000	Palfreeman, A. C. The Administration of the White Australia Policy. Noted by D.	000
newal: Conceptual Foundation of Benefit- Cost Analysis	993	W. Rawson
On the Fluidity of Judicial Choice. J. Woodford Howard, Jr.	43	U. S. Policy and the Security of Asia Panditji: A Portrait of Jawaharlal Nehru.
On Law and Justice. Paul A. Freund. Noted by William N. Beaney	1335	Marie Seton. Noted by Joseph P. Harris Papanek, Gustav F. Pakistan's Develop- ment: Social Goals and Private Incentives.	651
Power. Richard M. Merelman O'Neill, Robert. The German Army and the	451	Noted by Khalid B. Sayeed	1388
Nazi Party, 1933-39. Reviewed by H. P. Secher.	590	lin and Thomas B. Larson, eds., Soviet Politics Since Khrushchev	1385
Orbell, John. Note on P. Loveday and A. W. Martin, Parliament Factions and Parties: The First 30 Years of Responsible	÷	Parente, William. Note on Allen Kassof, ed., Prospects for Soviet Society Pareto and Pluto-Democracy: The Retreat	1385
Government in New South Wales, 1856–1889	1000	to Galapagos. S. E. Finer Parliament Factions and Parties: The First	440
Ordeshook, Peter C. and William H. Riker. A Theory of the Calculus of Voting	25	30 Years of Responsible Government in New South Wales, 1856–1889. P. Loveday
Organizational Effectiveness: An Inventory of Propositions. James L. Price. Noted by Dale A. Newman	1320	and A. W. Martin. Noted by John Orbell Parsons, Malcolm B. Note on Richard Polenberg, Reorganizing Roosevelt's Gov-	1000
Organization Theory and the Explanation of Important Characteristics of Congress.		ernment: The Controversy Over Executive Reorganization 1936–1939	627
Lewis A. Froman, Jr	$\frac{518}{246}$	Party Building in a New Nation: The Indian National Congress. Myron Weiner. Re-	501
son. Reviewed by Todd La Porte The Origins of Malay Nationalism. William R. Roff. Noted by James F. Guyot	648	viewed by Avery Leiserson Party Democracy: Politics in an Italian Socialist Federation. Samuel H. Barnes.	584
The Origins of Modern African Thought: Its Development in West Africa During the	_ 300	Noted by Timothy M. Hennessey Party Leaders in the House of Representatives.	1351
Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Robert W. July. Noted by Fred M. Hayward	1313	Randall B. Ripley. Noted by Eugene Eidenberg	1325
Origins of the Fifth Amendment. Leonard W. Levy. Noted by Dean Alfange, Jr Orlans, Harold. Contracting for Atoms.		Party Systems and Voter Alignments: Cross- National Perspectives. Seymour Martin Lipset and Stein Rokkan, eds. Reviewed
Noted by Don E. Kash	981	by Robert C. Fried Patterns of African Development. Spiro,	960

Herbert J., ed. Noted by Charles F.	20.4	• •	1367
Andrain	284	Pincus, John. Trade, Aid and Development. Reviewed by H. Bradford Westerfield	242
servatism and the New Deal: The Growth		Pinney, Edward L. Note on Vernon L.
of the Consevative Coalition in Congress,		Lidtke., The Outlawed Party: Social
1933-1939. Reviewed by David R. May-		Democracy in Germany, 1878-1890	270
_	1298	Pirer, Don C. Note on Herbert Butterfield
Peaceful Coexistence: International Law in	1400	and Martin Wight, eds., Diplomatic In-the Building of Communism. Bernard A.		vestigations: Essays in the Theory of Ramundo. Noted by W. W. Kulski	312	International Politics	679
Peasant Communism in Southern Italy.	0	Pirro, Ellen B. Note on Richard R. Fagen,	0,0
Sidney G. Tarrow. Reviewed by Norman		Politics and Communication	607
	1282	Pirro, Ellen B. Note on Richard W. Budd,
The Pendergast Machine. Lyle W. Dorsett.	1202	Robert K. Thorp, and Lewis Donohew,
Noted by Douglas Fox	1337	Content Analysis of Communications	607
Pennock, J. Roland and John W. Chapman,	1001	Plank, John, ed. Cuba and the United States:	001
eds. Nomos X: Representation. Reviewed		Long-Range Perspectives. Reviewed by
by James A. Steintrager	1280	Richard R. Fagen	1291
Perkins, Whitney T. Note on Arno J.	1200	Planning and Development in Iran. George	1201
Mayer, Politics and Diplomacy of Peace-		B. Baldwin. Noted by Marvin Zonis	645 making; Containment and Counterrevolu-		Planning and the Market in the U.S.S.R.:	010
tion of Versailles, 1918–1919	1014	the 1960's. Alexander Balinsky, Abram
Perkins, Whitney T. Note on Byron Dexter,	1014	Bergson, John N. Hazard, and Peter
The Years of Opportunity: The League		Wiles. Noted by Arthur W. Wright	655 of Nations, 1920–1926	1014	Planning Reforms in the Soviet Union, 1962-	000
Perlmann, Moshe. Note on Shaybani, Siyar.	1014	1966. Eugene Zaleski. Noted by Robert
The Islamic Law of Nations	671	Campbell	656
Perspectives of a Moroccan Nationalist.	017	Planning Without Facts: Lessons in Resource	000
Douglas E. Ashford. Reviewed by George		Allocation from Nigeria's Development.
Lenczowski	587	Wolfgang F. Stolper. Noted by Alvin
Perspectives of Brazilian History. E. Brad-	301	Magid	654
ford Burns, ed. Noted by Jordan M.		Plano, Jack C. Note on J. D. B. Miller, The	001
Young	281	Politics of the Third World	1017
Perspectives on the Court. Max Freedman,	201	Platt, George M. Note on Harry G. John-	1011
William M. Beaney and Eugene V.		son, Economic Policies Toward Less
Rostow. Noted by Bradley C. Canon	265	Developed Countries	682
Pesonen, Pertti, ed. Scandinavian Political	200	Poggi, Gianfranco. Catholic Action in Italy:	002
Studies. Reviewed by Christian Bay	237	The Sociology of a Sponsored Organization.
Peter and Caesar: The Catholic Church and	201	Noted by Joseph Lopreato	255
Political Authority. E. A. Goerner. Noted		Pole, J. R. Political Representation in	200
by Glean Tinder	610	England and the Origins of the American
Peterson, Robert L. Note on W. Hartley,	010	Republic. Noted by Harold F. Gosnell	608
Clark, The Politics of the Common Market	677	Polenberg, Richard. Reorganizing Roose-	000
Petrovic, Gajo. Marx in the Mid-Twentieth	•••	velt's Government: The Controversy Over
Century: A Yugoslav Philosopher Recon-		Executive Reorganization 1936-1939.
siders Karl Marx's Writings. Noted by		Noted by Malcolm B. Parsons	627
Edward D. Wilde	613	Policy Maps of City Councils and Policy
Pettit, Lawrence K. Note on Philip Mer-		Outcomes: A Developmental Analysis.
anto, The Politics of Federal Aid to		Heinz Eulau and Robert Eyestone	124
Education in 1965: A Study in Political		The Political Basis of Economic Develop-	-
Innovation	635	ment: An Exploration In Comparative
Phelan, John Leddy. The Kingdom of Quito		Political Analysis. Robert T. Holt and in the Seventeenth Century. Noted by		John E. Turner. Reviewed by Gerald A.
Robert G. Wesson	1006	Weiner	583
The Phenomenology of the Social World.		The Political Beliefs of Americans. A Study
Alfred Schutz. Noted by Hwa Yol Jung.	614	of Public Opinion. Lloyd A. Free and
Pilsudski's Coup d'Etat. Joseph Rothschild.		Hadley Cantril. Noted by Aage Clausen	1345
Noted by Vaclav L. Benes	1370	The Political Consequences of Electoral Laws.
Pinerd Maurice Note on Edward M Cor-		Donales W. Rea. Noted by John Sprague	606

The Political Creature. Peter Zollinger.	Theory. Willmoore Kendall and George
Noted by Sidney Waldman 1318 Political Development and Socioeconomic	W. Carey
Development: The Case of Latin America.	Moral Fiction? Richard Asheraft 898
Martin C. Needler 889	A Note on Censorship. Gordon Tullock 1265
The Political Economy of South Africa.	Pareto and Pluto-Democracy: The Retreat
Ralph Horwitz. Noted by David Gugin 652	to Galapagos. S. E. Finer
Political Institutions and Social Change in Continental Europe in the Nineteenth	Protest as a Political Resource. Michael Lipsky
Century. Eugene N. Anderson and Paul-	Some Thoughts on the Relation of Political ine R. Anderson. Noted by Charles Lewis	Theory to Anthropology. Carl J. Friedrich 536
Taylor	A Theory of the Calculus of Voting. William
Political Leadership in Industrialized Soci-	H. Riker and Peter C. Ordeshook 25
eties: Studies in Comparative Analysis.	Political Theory and the Rights of Man. D.
Lewis J. Edinger, ed. Noted by Thomas	Raphael, ed. Noted by John Rawls 977
A. Baylis	The Political World of the High School Teacher. Harmon Zeigler. Noted by Jack
Harmon Zeigler. Noted by Jack Dennis 1339	Dennis
Political Participation in Communist China.	Politics and Communication. Richard R.
James R. Townsend. Noted by John E.	Fagen. Noted by Ellen B. Pirro 607
Rue 995	Politics and Diplomacy of Peacemaking:
Political Parties and the Canadian Social	Containment at Counterrevolution at Ver-
Structure. F. C. Engelmann and M. A.	sailles, 1918-1919. Arno J. Mayer. Noted
Schwartz. Noted by Bernard K. John-	by Whitney T. Perkins 1014
poll	Politics and Social Science. W. J. M. Mac- kenzie. Noted by Thomas Wm. Madron 975
Gunnell. Noted by George Kateb 1303	Politics and Television. Kurt and Gladys
The Political Philosophy of Spinoza. Robert	Engel Lang. Noted by Bradbury Sea-
J. McShea. Noted by Stanley Rosen 1323	sholes
Political Protest in the Congo. Herbert Weiss.	Politics and the Military in Jordan: A Study
Reviewed by Crawford Young 1287	of the Arab Legion 1921-1957. P. J. Vati-
Political Representation in England and the	kiotis. Noted by Richard H. Dekmejian 1375
Origins of the American Republic, J. R.	Politics in Brazil, 1930-1964. Thomas E.
Pole. Noted by Harold F. Gosnell 608	Skidmore, Noted by Jordan M. Young. 281
Political Science and Ideotory. William E. Connolly. Noted by Peter Bachrach 599	Politics in New Mexico. Jack E. Holmes. Noted by Roy D. Morey
The Political and Social Ideas of St. Augus-	The Politics of Accommodation: Pluralism
tine. Herbert A. Deane. Noted by David	and Democracy in the Netherlands. Arend
G. Smith	Lijphart. Noted by Andries Hoogerwerf 1349
Political Science and the Uses of Functional	The Politics of American Foreign Aid.
Analysis. A. James Gregor 425	Michael Kent O'Leary. Noted by Vincent
Political Socialization and the High School	Davis
Civics Curriculum in the United States.	The Politics of the Common Market. W. Hart-
Kenneth P. Langton and M. Kent Jennings	ley Clark. Noted by Robert L. Peterson. 677
Political Television. Bernard Rubin. Noted	The Politics of Conformity in Latin America. Claudio Veliz, ed. Noted by Kenneth N.
by Bradbury Seasholes	Walker
Political Theory	The Politics of Exile: Paraguay's Febrerista
A Causal Model of Civil Strife: A Com-	Party. Paul H. Lewis. Noted by Ronald parative Analysis Using New Indices.	H. McDonald
Ted Gurr	The Politics of Federal Aid to Education in Conservatism, Personality and Political Ex-	1965: A Study in Political Innovation.
tremism. Robert A. Schoenberger 868	Philip Meranto. Noted by Lawrence K.
Decision Costs in Coalition Formation. Charles R. Adrian and Charles Press 556	Pettit
If, as Verba Says, the State Functions as a	Legislative Interaction. Peter A. Toma.
Religion, What Are We to Do Then to	Noted by John M. Richardson, Jr 1340
Save Our Souls? Lewis Lipsitz 527	The Politics of Futility: The General Jewish
The "Intensity" Problem and Democratic	Workers Bund of Poland, 1917-1943.

Bernard K. Johnpoll. Noted by Joseph Dunner.	667	Price, James L. Organizational Effective- ness: An Inventory of Propositions.	1000
The Politics of Poverty. John C. Donovan. Noted by John H. Strange The Politics of Provincialism: The Demo-	636	Noted by Dale A. Newman	1320
cratic Party in Transition, 1918-1932. David Burner. Noted by Jay S. Goodman	987	Hughes and John S. Western. Noted by Kenneth H. Thompson	999
The Politics of the European Communism States. Ghita Ionescu. Noted by Robert A. Rupen	663	Prince, Carl F. New Jersey's Jeffersonian Republicans: The Genesis of an Early Party Machine. Reviewed by Manning J.
The Politics of the Third World. J. D. B.		Dauer	595
Miller. Noted by Jack C. Plano Polsby, Nelson W. The Institutionaliza-	1017	Pritchett, C. Herman. Note on Leonard Baker, Back to Back: The Duel between
tion of the U.S. House of Representatives. Pontius, Dale. Note on Arms Control	144	FDR and the Supreme Court Private Politics: A Study of Five Political	631
Arrangements for the Far East Popular Government in America: Founda-	687	Outlooks. A. F. Davies. Noted by Karl Braithwaite	980
tions and Principles. Charles S. Hyneman. Reviewed by Neal Riemer	1984	Probabilism and the Number of Units Affected: Measuring Influence Concentra-
Population and Political Systems in Tropical	1201	tion. Bruce M. Russett	4 76
Africa. Robert F. Stevenson. Noted by Victor A. Olorunsola	1386	Propaganda and World Public Order: The Legal Regulation of the Ideological Instru-
Powell, G. Bingham, Jr. Note on William Sheridan Allen, The Nazi Seizure of		ment of Coercion. B. S. Murty. Noted by Anthony A. D'amato	1392
Power: The Experience of a Single German Town. 1930-1935	272	Prospects for Peacekeeping. Arthur M. Cox. Eeviewed by Lawrence S. Kaplan	961
Powell, Sandra. Communication on "Socio-	212	Prespects for Soviet Society. Allen Kassof, economic Variables and Voting for the Radical Left: Chile, 1952."	578	ed. Noted by William Parente Protest as a Political Resource. Michael	1385
Power, Paul F. Note on Richard H. Sanger, Insurgent Era: New Patterns of Political		Lipsky Psychiatry and Public Affairs. Reports and	1144
Economic and Social Revolution The Power Structure: Political Process in	1023	Symposia of the Group for the Advance-
American Society. Arnold M. Rose.		ment of Psychiatry. Reviewed by Harold D. Lasswell	249
Noted by Andrew Hacker	1301	Public Management at the Bargaining Table. Kenneth O. Warner and Mary L. Hen-
in South Dakota. Alan L. Clem. Noted by John H. Fenton	1333	nessy. Noted by Donald P. Sprengel Public Opinion and Constitution Making in	992
Prayer in the Public Schools: Law and		Pakistan, 1958-1962. Edgar A. and
Attitude Change. William K. Muir, Jr. Reviewed by Sheldon Goldman	1285	Kathryn R. Schuler. Noted by Richard N. Blue	647
Prelude to Downfall: Hitler and the United States, 1939-1941. Saul Friedlander.		Pulsipher, Allan G. and James L. Weather- by, Jr. Malapportionment, Party Competi-
Reviewed by H. P. Secher	590	ion, and the Functional Distribution of Governmental Expenditures
Wann. Noted by Peter Woll		Putnam, Robert D. Note on Francesco
Presidential Vetoes: 1792-1945. Carlton Jackson. Noted by Robert J. Kulisheck.	628	Alberoni, Vittorio Capecchi, Agopik Manoukian, Franca Olivetti, and Antonio
Press, Charles and Charles R. Adrian. Decision Costs in Coalition Formation	556	Tosi, L'Attivista di Partito	1352
Prestige and Association in an Urban Com-		Quebec Confronts Canada. Edward M. Cormunity: An Analysis of an Urban Strati- fication System. Edward O. Laumann.		bett. Noted by Maurice Pinard The Quest for a United Germany. Ferenc A.
Noted by Vincent L. Marando Preston, Richard A. Canada and "Imperial	619	Váli. Noted by James H. Wolfe The Quest for Peace Through Diplomacy.	674
Defense": A Study of the Origins of the British Commonwealth's Defense Organi-		Stephen D. Kertesz. Noted by Louis F. Brakeman	679
zation, 1867-1919. Noted by Hiram M.		Page and the Manne Madia Poul I Fisher

170 1 2 T Y		a a b u	00=
and Ralph L. Lowenstein, eds. Noted by	200	George G. Bauroth	685
David L. Paletz	639	Reischauer, Edwin O. Review of Robert M.
Rackow, Felix. Note on John W. Spanier, The Truman-MacArthur Controversy and		Spaulding, Jr., Imperial Japan's Higher Civil Service Examinations	966
the Korean Ear	629	Rejai, Mostafa. Note on Donald M. Lowe,	900
Rae, Douglas W. Note on James D. Davis,	020	The Function of "China" in Marx, Lenin,
Springboard to the White House: Presi-		and Mao	1310
dential Primaries: How They Are Fought		Rejai, Mostafa. Note on Maurice Meisner, and Won	261	Li Tachao and the Origins of Chinese
Rae, Douglas W. The Political Consequences		Marxism	1310 of Electoral Laws. Noted by John Sprague	606	Reorganizing Roosevelt's Government: The
Ramundo, Bernard A. Peaceful Coexistence:		Controversy Over Executive Reorganization
International Law in the Building of Com-		1936-1939. Richard Polenberg. Noted by munism. Noted by W. W. Kulski	312	Malcolm B. Parsons	627
Randall, Richard S. Censorship of the		The Repeal of Fair Housing in California:
Movies: The Social and Political Control		An Analysis of Referendum Voting. Ray-of a Mass Medium. Noted by Robert J.		mond E. Wolfinger and Fred I. Green-	m = 0
	1332	stein	753
Ranis, Peter. Note on Victor Alba, Nation-		Resistance: The Political Autobiography of alists Without Nations: The Oligarchy	1909	Georges Bidault. Georges Bidault. Noted	1009
Versus the People in Latin America Raphael, D., ed. Political Theory and the	1383	by Michael R. Gordon	1000
Rights of Man. Noted by John Rawls	977	Riemer. Noted by George W. Carey	1316
Rasmussen, Jorgen. Note on Francis G.	J.,	The Revolutionary Personality: Lenin,	1010
Hutchins, The Illusion of Permanence:		Trotsky, Gandhi. Victor E. Wolfenstein.
British Imperialism in India	307	Noted by Arnold A. Rogow	604
Rawls, John. Note on D. Raphael, ed.,		Revolutionary Politics and the Cuban Work-
Political Theory and The Rights of Man	977	ing Class. Maurice Zeitlin. Reviewed by
Rawson, D. W. Note on A. C. Palfreeman.		m	1291
The Administration of the White Australia		Ricci, David M. Note on Shlomo, Avineri,
Policy	1389	The Social and Political Thought of Karl
Ray, Dennis M. Note on Franklin W.			1309
Houn, A Short History of Chinese Com-		Richardson, James L. Germany and the munism	1362	Atlantic Alliance: The Integration of
The Recruitment of Candidates for the Can-		Strategy and Politics. Noted by Charles	070
adian House of Commons. Allan Kornberg	1040	B. Robson	676
and Hal H. Winsborough	1242	Richardson, John M., Jr. Note on Peter A. Toma, The Politics of Food for Peace:
by Roger W. Benjamin	588	Executive-Legislative Interaction	1340
Reddaway, Peter and Leonard Schapiro, eds.,	1,00	Richter, Melvin. Review of Correspondance	1010
Lenin: The Man, The Theorist, The		d'Alexis de Tocqueville et de Gustave de
Leader: A Reappraisal. Noted by Alfred		Beaumont. Texte Établi, Annoté et
G. Meyer	1001	Préfacé Par André Jardin	234
Redekop, John H. The American Far Right:		Riemer, Neal. The Democratic Experiment:
A Case Study of Billy James Hargis and		American Political Theory. Vol. I. Noted
Christian Crusade. Noted by Robert A.			1316
Schoenberger	982	Riemer, Neal. Review of Charles S. Hyne-
Regenstreif, Peter. Note on Gad Horowitz,		man, Popular Government in America:	1004
	1369		1284
Régime Interne et Politique Extérieure Dans		Riemer, Neal. The Revival of Democratic	1916
les Pays d'Asie. Georges Fischer et al. Noted by Robert O. Tilman	1364	Theory. Noted by George W. Carey Ries, J. C. Note on Vincent Davis, The	1910
The Regional City: An Anglo-American Dis-	TOOT		1344
cussion of Metropolitan Planning. Derek		Rieselbach, Leroy N. The Roots of Isolation-	1011
Senior, ed. Noted by Vincent L. Marando	619	ism: Congressional Voting and Presiden-
Reinemer, Vic and Lee Metcalf. Overcharge.		tial Leadership in Foreign Policy. Noted
Noted by Kenneth Kofmehl	264	by John H. Kessel	632
Reischauer, Edwin O. Beyond Vietnam:		Riker, William H. and Peter C. Ordeshook.
The United States and Asia. Noted by		A Theory of the Calculus of Voting	25

Ripley, Randall B. Party Leaders in the	Rosenthal, Albert H. The Social Programs
House of Representatives. Noted by	of Sweden, A Search for Security in a Free
Eugene Eidenberg	25 Society. Noted by Arne J. Stokke	1005
The Road to Jerusalem. Walter Laqueur.	Ross, Alf. The United Nations: Peace and
Noted by Malcolm H. Kerr 14
Roazen, Paul. Freud: Political and Social	field	586
Thought. Noted by William Leiss 13	,
Robinson, James A. Review of Bertrand	Soviet Empire: The Turks of Central Asia
	36 and Stalinism	661
Robinson, Joan. An Essay on Marxian	Rostow, Eugene V., Max Freedman and Economics. Noted by George R. Feiwel. 10
Robson, Charles B. Note on James L.	Court. Noted by Bradley C. Canon	265
Richardson, Germany and the Atlantic	Rothenberg, Jerome. Economic Evaluation
Alliance: The Integration of Strategy	of Urban Renewal: Conceptual Founda-76 tion of Benefit-Cost Analysis. Noted by Robson, Peter and Colin Leys, eds. Feder-	David J. Olson	993
ation in East Africa: Opportunities and	Rothfels, Hans et al., eds. Deutschlands Problems. Noted by Victor T. Le Vine. 13.
Rodman, John. Note on Klaus Epstein,	nien, Belgien sowie deutsche Entwaffung
The Genesis of German Conservatism 100	• •
Roff, William R. The Origins of Malay	tionale Abrüstung, Dezember 1925 bis Juli
Nationalism. Noted by James F. Guyot 6	,
Rogow, Arnold A. Note on E. Victor	Politik, 1918–1945. Vol. I. Noted by
Wolfenstein, The Revolutionary Person-	Stanley Suval	675
, ,,	04 Rothschild, Joseph. Pilsudski's Coup d'Etat.
Rokkan, Stein and Seymour Martin Lipset,		1370
eds. Party Systems and Voter Alignments:	Rubin, Bernard. Political Television. Noted
Cross-National Perspectives. Reviewed by		1327
	Rudolph, Lloyd I. and Susanne H. Rudolph.
Romoser, George K. Note on Gerard Braun-	The Modernity of Tradition: Political thal, The Federation of German Industry	Development in India. Reviewed by	1000
_	T 1	1280
The Roots of Isolationism: Congressional	Rudolph, Susanne H. and Lloyd I. Rudolph.
Voting and Presidential Leadership in Foreign Policy. Leroy N. Rieselbach.	The Modernity of Tradition: Political Development in India. Reviewed by 280
Rosberg, Carl H., Jr. and John Notting-	Rudolph, Susanne Hoeber. Review of	400
ham. The Myth of Mau Mau: National-	Howard L. Erdman, The Swatantra	•
ism in Kenya. Noted by David H. Johns 28		503
Rose, Arnold M. The Power Structure:	Rue, John E. Mao Tse-tung in Opposition	.200
Political Process in American Society.		669
Noted by Andrew Hacker 130		000
Rose, Richard. Influencing Voters: A Study	Political Participation in Communist
of Campaign Rationality. Noted by	·	995
Charles F. Cnudde	85 Rumble, Wilfred E., Jr. American Legal	•
Rosecrance, R. N. Defense of the Realm:	Realism: Skepticism, Reform, and the British Strategy in the Nuclear Epoch.	Judicial Process. Noted by Michael A.
Noted by David W. Tarr 139		.336
Rosen, Stanley. Note on Robert J. McShea,	Rupen, Robert A. Note on Alexandre
The Political Philosophy of Spinoza 132
Rosenau, James N. Domestic Sources of		.002
Foreign Policy. Noted by Paul Y. Ham-	Rupen, Robert A. Note on Ghita Ionescu, mond	9 The Politics of the European Communist
Rosenberg, Elliot and Louis Eisenstein.		663
A Stripe of Tammany's Tiger. Noted by	Russett, Bruce M. International Regions
Theodore J. Lowi
Rosenbluth, Gideon. The Canadian Econ-	Political Ecology. Reviewed by Michael
omy and Disarmament. Reviewed by	•	970
Gilbert R. Winham 96	5 Russett, Bruce, M., J. David Singer and

Melvin Small. Communication on criticisms of their article "National Political Units in the Twentieth Century: A Standardized List."	955	NATO and the Range of American Choice Schieder, Theodor and Ferdinand A. Hermens. Staat. Wirtschaft und Politik in der Weimarer Republik, Festschrift für	1296
Russett, Bruce M., J. David Singer and Melvin Small. National Political Units in the Twentieth Century: A Standardized		Heinrich Brüning. Noted by Andreas Dorpalen	665
List	932	and Stephen C. Smith, eds. Water Research	634
fluence Concentration The Russian Empire 1800-1917. Hugh Seton-Watson. Reviewed by Frederick	476	Richard E. Caves, and Julius Margolis, Northern California's Water Industry Schnore, Leo F. and Henry Fagin. Urban	6 34
C. Barghoorn	1276	Research and Policy Planning. Noted by Frank Smallwood	620
Daniels	612	Personality and Political Extremism Schoenberger, Robert A. Note on John H.	868
Sacks, Seymour and Alan K. Campbell. Metropolitan America: Fiscal Patterns and Governmental Systems. Noted by		Redekop, The American Far Right: A Case Study of Billy James Hargis and Christian Crusade	982
Robert L. Lineberry Saenz, Paul. Note on Henry Bienen, Tan-	621	Schrock, Thomas S. Review of Mark De- Wolfe Howe. The Garden and the Wilder-	002
zania: Party Transformation and Eco- nomic Development	653	ness: Religion and Government in American Constitutional History	597
Case of Health-Insurance Reform in West Germany. Noted by Gerhard Loewenberg	1357	Opinion and Constitution Making in Pakistan. Noted by Richard N. Blue	647
A Salience Dimension of Politics for the Study of Political Culture. Moshe M. Czudnowski	878	Schuler, Kathryn R. and Edgar A. Public Opinion and Constitution Making in Pakistan. Noted by Richard N. Blue	647
Sanger, Richard H. Insurgent Era: New Patterns of Political, Economic and Social	010	Schutz, Alfred. The Phenomenology of the Social World. Noted by Hwa Yol Jung	614
Revolution. Noted by Paul F. Power Sayeed, Khalid B. Note on Gustav F. Papanek, Pakistan's Development: Social	1023	Schwartz, Joel J. and William R. Keech. Group Influence and the Policy Process in the Soviet Union	840
Goals and Private Incentives	1388	Schwartz, Joel J. Note on Ellen Propper Mickiewicz, Soviet Political Schools: The	0.40
Ayub Khan, Friends Not Masters: A Political Autobiography Scalapino, Robert A. The Japanese Com-	1388	Communist Party Adult Instruction System	276
munist Movement, 1920-1966. Reviewed by Solomon B. Levine	1300	Political Parties and the Canadian Social Structure. Noted by Bernard K. Johnpoll	278
Scandinavian Political Studies. Pertti Pesonen, ed. Reviewed by Christian Bay Schapiro, Leonard and Peter Reddaway,	237	Schwarz, John E. Note on Jean Charlot, L'Union pour la Nouvelle République: Etude du pouvoir au sein d'un parii
eds. Lenin: The Man, The Theorist, The Leader: A Reappraisal. Noted by Alfred	1001	politique Scoble, Harry M. and Robert R. Alford.	294
G. Meyer. Schapsmeier, Frederick H. Note on Robert F. Wesser, Charles Evans Hughes: Politics	1001	Scoble, Harry M. Ideology and Electoral Action: A Comparative Case Study of the	1192
and Reform in New York, 1905-1910 Scheingold, Stuart A. Review of André Beaufre, NATO and Europe		National Committee for an Effective Congress. Noted by John H. Kessel Scott, Andrew. Note on Richard W. Cottam,	1326
Scheingold, Stuart A. Review of Harold Van B. Cleveland, The Atlantic Idea and		Competitive Interference and Twentieth Century Diplomacy	304
its European Rivals	1296	Scott, Andrew M. The Functioning of the International Political System. Noted by Frederic Wurzburg	1016

Scott, James C. Note on Arend Lijphart,		of the Democratic Process	1342
The Trauma of Decolonization: The Dutch		A Short History of Chinese Communism.
and West New Guinea	314	Franklin W. Houn. Noted by Dennis M.
Scott, Robert E. Note on Frederick C.		Ray	1362
Turner, The Dynamic of Mexican Na-		Shoup, Paul. Comparing . Communist tionalism	1386	Nations: Prospects for an Empirical
The Sea in Modern Strategy. L. W. Martin.		Approach	185
Noted by Bernard Brodie	1019	Siegel, Bernard J. and Alan R. Beals.
Searing, Donald D., Review of Karl W.		Livisiveness and Social Conflict. Noted
Deutsch, Lewis J. Edinger, Roy C.		by Roger D. Masters	618
Macridis and Richard L. Merritt, France,		Sigel, Roberta S. Image of a President:	0.10
Germany and the Western Alliance; A		Some Insights into the Political Views of
Study of Elite Attitudes on European		School Children	216
Integration and World Politics	240	Simirenko, Alex, ed. Soviet Sociology: His-	210
Seasholes, Bradbury. Note on Bernard.		torical Antecedents and Current Ap-
Rubin, Political Television		p-aisals. Noted by Paul Hollander	0.50
Seasholes, Bradbury. Note on Kurt and	1021	Simpson, Smith. Anatomy of the State De-	252
			0.45
Gladys Engel Lang, Politics and Televi-	1907	partment. Noted by L. L. Wade	267
sion	1021	Singer, J. David, Bruce M. Russett and
Secher, H. P. Review of Joseph Nyomarkay,		Melvin Small. Communication on criti-
Charisma and Factionalism in the Nazi	700	cisms of their article "National Political Party	590	Units in the Twentieth Century: A
Secher, H. P. Review of Robert O'Neill, The		Standardized List"	955
German Army and the Nazi Party, 1933-		Singer, J. David, Bruce M. Russett and
39	590	Melvin Small. National Political Units in
Secher, H. P. Review of Saul Friedlander,		the Twentieth Century: A Standardized
Prelude to Downfall: Hitler and the		List	932
United States, 1939-1941	590	Singh, Baljit. Note on K. R. Bombwall,
The Second American Party System: Party		The Foundations of Indian Federalism	1008
Formation in the Jacksonian Era. Richard		Siyer, Shaybani. The Islamic Law of Na-
P. McCormick. Noted by William Nisbet		tions. Noted by Moshe Perlmann	671
	1330	Skidmore, Thomas E. Politics in Brazil,
Sectional Stress and Party Strength: A		1930-1964. Noted by Jordan M. Young	281
Study of Roll-Call Voting Patterns in the		Slater, Jerome. The OAS and United States
U.S. House of Representatives, 1836-1860.		Foreign Policy. Noted by Yale H. Fer-
Thomas B. Alexander. Noted by James J.		guson	308
Best	633	Small, Melvin, Bruce M. Russett and J.
Senior, Derek, ed. The Regional City: An		David Singer. Communication on criti-
Anglo-American Discussion of Metro-		cisms of their article "National Political politan Planning. Noted by Vincent L.		Units in the Twentieth Century: A
Marando	619	Standardized List"	955
Seton, Marie. Panditji: A Portrait of		Small, Melvin, Bruce M. Russett and J.
Jawaharlal Nehru. Noted by Joseph P.		David Singer. National Political Units in
Harris	651	the Twentieth Century: A Standardized
Seton-Watson, Hugh. The Russian Empire		List	932
1801-1917. Reviewed by Frederick C.		Smallwood, Frank. Note on Leo F. Schnore
Barghoorn	1276	and Henry Fagin, Urban Research and
Shapiro, Michael J. The House and the		Policy Planning	620
Federal Role: A Computer Simulation		Smith, David G. Note on Herbert A.
of Roll-Call Voting	494	Deane, The Political and Social Ideas of Sharkansky, Ira. Agency Requests, Guber-		Si. Augustine	979
natorial Support and Budget Success in		Smith, F. B. The Making of the Second Re-
	1220	form Bill. Noted by James B. Christoph	1378
Sherrard, Thomas D., ed. Social Welfare		Smith, Maynard. Note on Alexander Pas-and Urban Problems. Noted by York		serin d'Entrèves, The Notion of the State:
	1348	An Introduction to Political Theory	1319
Sherrill, Kenneth S. Note on John H.		Smith, Stephen C. and Allen V. Kneese,
Bunzel, Anti-Politics in America: the		eds. Water Research. Noted by Ashley L.
Anti-Political Temper and its Distortions		Schiff	634

.

The Social and Political Thought of Karl Marx. Shlomo Avineri. Noted by David M. Ricci	1309	munism in Transition. Peter H. Juviler and Henry W. Morton, eds. Noted by Carl A. Linden	288
The Social Democratic Movement in Prewar Japan. Totten, George Oakley, III. Noted by Ardath W. Burks	277	Soviet Political Schools: The Communist Party Adult Instruction System. Ellen Propper Mickiewicz. Noted by Joel J.
The Social Programs of Sweden, A Search for Security in a Free Society. Albert H. Rosenthal. Noted by Arne J. Stokke	1005	Schwartz Soviet Politics Since Krushchev. Alexander Dallin and Thomas B. Larson, eds. Noted	276
The Social Psychology of Organizations. Daniel Katz and Robert L. Kahn. Noted		by William Parente	1385
by Lewis Anthony Dexter		Current Appraisals. Alex Simirenko, ed. Noted by Paul Hollander The Soviet Union in the World Communist	252
Socialist Parties in Postwar Japan. Allan B. Cole, George O. Totten and Cecil H.		System. Vernon V. Aspaturian. Noted by Nish Jamgotch, Jr	690
Uyehara. Noted by Ardath W. Burks Sociological Analysis and Politics: The Theories of Talcott Parsons. William C.	277	Spanier, John W. The Truman-MacArthur Controversy and the Korean war. Noted by Felix Rackow	629
Mitchell. Noted by George R. Boynton Some Reflections on Soviet-American Re-	250	Spaulding, Robert M. Jr. Imperial Japan's Higher Civil Service Examinations.	nec
lations. Merle Fainsod	1093 536	Reviewed by Edwin O. Reischauer Spinelli, Altiero. The Eurocrats. Reviewed by Ronald Inglehart	966 593
Sorenson, Theodore C. Kennedy. Noted by Aida DiPace Donald	260	Spiro, Herbert J. Communication on Kap- lan's review of his book "World Politics:	1960
ert Alford and Harry M. Scoble Southern Africa and the United States. Wil-	1192	The Global System"	1268
liam A. Hance, ed. Noted by Edward Feit	1366	Andrain	284
World Today. Rodger Swearingen, ed. Noted by Jonathan Harris	311	Ideology and Ambition	258
The Soviet Central Committee: An Elite Analysis. Michael P. Gehlen and Michael McBride	1232	System. Noted by Morton A. Kaplan Sprague, John. Note on Douglas W. Rae. The Political Consequences of Electoral	694
Soviet and East European Agriculture. Jerzy F. Karcz, ed. Noted by Roy D. Laird	290	Laws	606
Soviet Elections as a Measure of Dissent: The Missing One Percent. Jerome M. Gilison Soviet Elite Participatory Attitudes in the	814	Warner and Mary L. Hennessy, Public Management at the Bargaining Table Springboard to the White House: Presidential	992
Post-Stakin Period. Milton Lodge Soviet and Russian Newspapers at the Hoover Institution: A Catalog. Karol Maichel, comp. Noted by Fritz T. Ep-	827	Primaries: How They are Fought And Won. James D. Davis. Noted by Douglas W. Rae	. 26 1
Soviet Empire: The Turks of Central Asia and Stalinism. Olaf Caroe. Noted by	660	marer Republik, Festschrift für Heinrich Brüning. Ferdinand A. Hermens, and Theodor Schieder, eds. Noted by Andreas
Richard F. Rosser	661 689	Dorpalen	665
Soviet Institutions, The Individual and Society. Karel Hulicka and Irene M. Hulicka. Noted by Ellen Michiewicz	658	ernment and Politics. Noted by Carl Beck Steamer, Robert J. Note on Richard S. Randall, Censorship of the Movies: The	289
Soviet Mongolia. A Study of the Oldest Political Satellite. George G. S. Murphy.		Social and Political Control of a Mass Medium	1332
Noted by George Ginsburgs Soviet Policy-Making: Studies of Com-	291	Steck, Henry J. Note on Gerald E. Caiden, The Commonwealth Bureaucracy	1000

Steintrager, James A. Review of J. Roland Pennock and John W. Chapman, eds.,	1000	Systems of Political Science. Oran R. Young. Noted by Eugene J. Meehan	1322
Nomos X: Representation	1289	m : D : M :
Stevens, Robert and Brian Abel-Smith.		Tanzania: Party Transformation and Econom-
Lawyers and the Courts: A Sociological		ic Development. Henry Bienen. Noted	050
Study of the English Legal System, 1750-	007	by Paul Saenz	653
1965. Noted by Theodore L. Becker	297	Tarr, David W. Note on R. N. Rosecrance,
Stevenson, Robert F. Population and Polit-		Defense of the Realm: British Strategy in	1005
ical Systems in Tropical Africa. Noted	1000	the Nuclear Epoch	1395
by Victor A. Olorunsola	1386	Tarrow, Sidney G. Note on John M. Cam-
Stock, Ernest. Israel on the Road to Sinai.	001	mett, Antonio Gramsci and the Origins	050
1949–1956. Noted by George Kirk	691	of Italian Communism	253
Stokke, Arne J. Note on Albert H. Rosen-		Tarrow, Sidney G. Peasant Communism in thal, The Social Programs of Sweden, A	400*	Southern Italy. Reviewed by Norman	* 0.00
Search for Security in a Free Society	1005	Kogan	1282
Stolper, Wolfgang R. Planning Without		Tauber, Kurt P. Note on Benjamin E.
Facts: Lessons in Resource Allocation from		Lippincott, Democracy's Dilemma: The
Nigeria's Development. Noted by Alvin		Totalitarian Party in a Free Society	1315
Magid	654	Taylor, Charles Lewis. Note on Eugene N.
Stone, Jeremy J. Strategic Persuasion: Arms		Anderson and Pauline R. Anderson,
Limitations through Dialogue. Reviewed		Political Institutions and Social Change in by Lawrence S. Kaplan	961	Continental Europe in the Nineteenth
Stout, Hiram M. Note on Richard A.		Century	1360
Preston, Canada and "Imperial Defense":		Teachers and Politics in France: A Pressure
A Study of the Origins of the British Com-		Group Study of the Federation de l'Edumonwealth's Defense Organization, 1867-		cation Nationale. James M. Clark. Noted	~==
1919	306	by Bernard E. Brown	275
Strange, John H. Note on John C. Donovan,		The Technological Society. Jacques Ellul.
The Politics of Poverty	636	Noted by William R. Nelson	603
Strategic Persuasion: Arms Limitations		Teune, Henry. Note on Claude Ake, A	٥=٥ through Dialogue. Jeremy J. Stone. Re-		Theory of Political Integration	978 viewed by Lawrence S. Kaplan	961	Thailand: The War That Is, The War That
A Stripe of Tammany's Tiger. Louis		Will Be. Louis E. Loman. Noted by	1000
Eisenstein and Elliot Rosenberg. Noted	0.10	Robert O. Tilman	1390
by Theodore J. Lowi	642	Theen, Rolf H. W. Note on Robert E.
The Structure of Political Conflict in the		MacMaster, Danilevsky, A Russian	050
New States of Tropical Africa. Aristide R.	=0	Totalitarian Philosopher	256
Zolberg	7 0	A Theorem About Voting. Thomas W.
Studies in Philosophy, Politics and Econom-		Casstevens	205
ics. Friedrich A. Hayek. Reviewed by	000	A Theory of the Calculus of Voting. William	~=
William C. Mitchell	968	H. Riker and Peter C. Ordeshook	25
The Study of Total Societies. Samuel Z.	001	A Theory of Political Integration. Claude	070
Klausner., ed. Noted by C. P. Wolf	601	Ake. Noted by Henry Teune	978
Survey Research in the Social Sciences.		Thoenes, Piet, ed. The Elite in the Welfare	000
Charles Y. Glock, ed. Noted by Betty H.	071	State. Noted by Dwaine Marvick	1003
Zisk	251	Theory and Methods of Social Research.
Suval, Stanley. Note on Hans Rothfels,		Johan Galtung. Noted by Fred M. Fro-	017
Deutschlands Beziehungen zu Frankreich,		hock	617
Grossbritannien, Belgien sowie deutsche		Thompson, James D. Organizations in	040
Entwaffung Reparationen, Völkerbund und		Action. Reviewed by Todd La Porte	246 internationale Abrüstung, Dezember 1925		Thompson, Kenneth H. Note on Colin A.
bis Juli 1926 Akten zur deutschen auswarti-	675	Hughes and John Western, The Prime
gen Politik, 1918–1945. Vol. I	675	Minister's Policy Speech: A Case Study	000
The Swatantra Party and Indian Conserva-		in Televised Politics	999
tism. Howard L. Erdman. Reviewed by Susanne Hoeber Rudolph	1909	Thorp, Robert K., Lewis Donohew and
Swearingen, Rodger, ed. Soviet and Chinese	1293	Richard W. Budd. Content Analysis of
Communist Power in the World Today.		Communications. Noted by Ellen B.	607
Noted by Jonathan Harris	311	Pirro Tillmann, Heinz. Deutschlands Araber-	007
ATOVOR DE VOIRGIAM MALES	O X T	AMERICAN, ANDREAS AFORDORES AFORDER

politik im zweiten Weltkrieg. Noted by		by Felix Rackow	629
Gerhard von Glahn	305	Tucker, Robert W. and Robert E. Osgood.	•
Tilman, Robert O. Note on Georges Fischer,		Force, Order and Justice. Noted by Philip et al., Régime Interne et Politique Ex-		Green	1012
térieure Dans les Pays d'Asie	1364	Tufte, Edward R. and Hugh Donald
Tilman, Robert O. Note on Louis E. Loman,		Forbes. A Note of Caution in Causal
Thailand: The War That Is, The War		Modelling	1258
That Will Be		Tufte, Edward R. and Hugh Forbes. Com-
Tinder, Glenn. Note on E. A. Goerner,	•	munication on criticisms of their article
Peter and Caesar: The Catholic Church and		"A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling"
Political Authority	610	Tullock, Gordon. A Note on Censorship	1265
Toma, Peter A. The Politics of Food for		Turner, Frederick C. The Dynamic of
Peace: Executive-Legislative Interaction.	4040	Mexican Nationalism. Noted by Robert	4000
Noted by John M. Richardson, Jr	1340	E. Scott.	1386
Torney, Judith V. and Robert D. Hess.		Turner, John E. and Robert T. Holt. The
The Development of Political Attitudes in	1010	Political Basis of Economic Development:
Children. Noted by Lester W. Milbrath	1348	An Exploration in Comparative Political	F00
Tosi, Antonio, Francesco Alberoni, Vittorio		Analysis. Reviewed by Gerald A. Weiner	583
Capecchi, Agopik Manoukian, Franca		The Twentieth Century Mind. Donald At-	~~~
Olivetti. L'Attivista di Partito. Noted by	1050	well Zoll. Noted by J. Paul Johnston	259
Robert D. Putnam	1352	The Two Faces of Co-Existence. Alfred	010
Totten, George O., Cecil H. Uyehara and		Berzins. Noted by W. W. Kulski	312
Allan B. Cole. Socialist Parties in Post-	077	Two Tracts on Government. John Locke.
war Japan. Noted by Ardath W. Burks	277	Philip Abrams, ed. Noted by Fred H.	014
Totten, George Oakley, III. The Social		Willhoite	614
Democratic Movement in Prewar Japan.	077	Theoretain Mandata Emport W. Lofover
Noted by Ardath W. Burks	277	Uncertain Mandate, Ernest W. Lefever.	1997
Towards a Pax Africana: A Study of Ide- ology and Ambition. Ali A. Mazrui. Noted		Reviewed by Crawford Young	. 1401
by Herbert J. Spiro	258	The Unfinished Revolution: Russia 1917-1967. Isaac Deutscher. Noted by Donald
Townsend, James R. Political Participation	400		662
in Communist China. Noted by John E.		D. Barry The United Nations: Peace and Progress.	004
Rue	995	Alf Ross. Reviewed by Lincoln Bloom-
Trade, Aid and Development: The Rich and	330	field	586
Poor Nations. John Pincus. Reviewed by		United States Policy and the Third World:	000
H. Bradford Westerfield	242	Problems and Analysis. Charles Wolf.
Trade Liberalization Among Industrial		Reviewed by Arpad von Lazar	243
Countries: Objectives and Alternatives.		The Upper House in Revolutionary America,	~10
Bela Balassa. Noted by David S. Ball	692	1763-1788. Jackson Turner Main. Noted
Trager, Frank N. Burma from Kingdom to	00-		1331
Republic: A Historical and Political		Urban Political Systems: A Functional	2002
Analysis. Noted by Fred R. von der		Analysis of Metro Toronto. Harold Kap-
Mehden	1363	lan. Noted by James L. Cox	643
Trager, Helen G. Burma Through Alien		Urban Research and Policy Planning. Leo
Eyes. Noted by Fred R. von der Mehden	1363	F. Schnore and Henry Fagin. Noted by
The Transmission of Political Values from		Frank Smallwood	620
Parent to Child. M. Kent Jennings and		Uren, Philip E., and Adam Bromke, eds.
Richard G. Niemi	169	The Communist States and the West. Noted
The Trauma of Decolonization: The Dutch		by Jonathan Harris	311
and West New Guinea. Arend Lijphart.		U.S. Policy and the Security of Asia. Fred
Noted by James C. Scott	314	Greene. Noted by Norman D. Palmer	1400
Trial Courts in Urban Politics: State Court		Uyehara, Cecil H., Allan B. Cole and
Policy Impact and Functions in a Local		George O. Totten. Socialist Parties in Political System. Kenneth M. Dolbeare.		Postwar Japan. Noted by Ardath W.
Noted by Irvin H. Bromall	983	Burks	277
The Trial of the Germans. Eugene Davidson.
Noted by Elke Frank	1013	Vali, Ferenc A. The Quest for a United
The Truman-MacArthur Controversy and		Germany. Noted by James H. Wolfe	674
the Korean War. John W. Spanier. Noted		Vandenbosch, Amry and Mary Belle.

Australia Faces Southeast Asia: The		Development	243
Emergence of a Foreign Policy. Noted by		von Lazar, Arpad. Review of Charles Wolf,
	1407	United States Policy and the Third World:
Vandenbosch, Amry and Richard Butwell.		Problems and Analysis	243
The Changing Face of Southeast Asia.		Voting Turnout in American Cities. Robert
Noted by Frank C. Darling	313	R. Alford and Eugene C. Lee	796
Vandenbosch, Mary Belle and Amry.		Vroom, Victor H., ed. Methods of Organiza-
Australia Faces Southeast Asia: The		tional Research. Reviewed by Todd La
Emergence of a Foreign Policy. Noted by		Porte	246
Henry S. Albinski	1407
Vatikiotis, P. J. Politics and the Military in		Wade, L. L. Note on Smith Simpson,
Jordan: A Study of the Arab Legion 1921-		Anatomy of the State Department	267
1957. Noted by Richard H. Dekmejian.	1375	Wagley, Charles. The Latin American Tradi-
Veliz, Claudio, ed. The Politics of Confor-		ticn. Noted by Carroll Hawkins	1377
mity in Latin America. Noted by Kenneth		Wainhouse, David W. and Associates.
N. Walker	1011	International Peace Observation: A His-
Vellut, Jean-Luc and George Modelski.		tory and Forecast. Reviewed by Lincoln P.
Communication on Russett, et al., "Na-		Bloomfield	586
tional Political Units in the Twentieth		Wainhouse, David W. Note on Oran R.
Century: A Standardized List"	952	Young, The Intermediaries: Third Parties
Verba, Sidney. Communication. "If, As		in International Crises	1018
Lipsitz Thinks, Political Science Is To		Waldman, Sidney. Note on Peter Zollinger,	1020
Save Our Souls, God Help Us!"	576	The Political Creature	1318
Veto-Group Politics: The Case of Health-	0.0	Walker, Kenneth N. Note on Claudio Veliz,
Insurance Reform in West Germany. Wil-		The Politics of Conformity in Latin Amer-
liam Safran. Noted by Gerhard Loewen-		ica	1011
berg	1357	Wallerstein, Immanuel. Africa: The Poli-	1011
Via, Emory F. Note on Thomas A. Krueger,	1001	tics of Unity. Noted by Victor T. Le Vine	1254
And Promises to Keep: The Southern		Wann, A. J. The President as Chief Admin-	1001
Conference for Human Welfare	260	istrator. Noted by Peter Woll	1220
	269		1990
Vietnam Triangle: Moscow, Peking, Hanoi.		Warlord: Yen Hsi-shan in Shansi Province,
Donald S. Zagoria. Noted by George G.	200	1911-1949. Donald G. Gillin. Noted by	900
Bauroth	686	Chi Hsi-sheng	292
Vincent, Jack E. National Attributes as		Warner, Kenneth O. and Mary L. Hen-
Predictors of Delegate Attitudes at the		nessy. Public Management at the Bargain-	000
United Nations	916	ing Table. Noted by Donald P. Sprengel	992
Vinyard, Dale. Note on Donald G. Morgan,		Wainer, Lloyd, et al. The Emergent American	1001
Congress and the Constitution: A Study		Society. Noted by Andrew Hacker	1301 of Responsibility	986	The Warren Court: Constitutional Decision
Vittachi, Tarzie. The Fall of Sukarno. Noted		as an Instrument of Reform. Archibald
by William Liddle	670	Cox. Noted by J. Woodford Howard, Jr.	1329
von der Mehden, Fred R., Crawford Young		Warren, Vernon C., Jr. Note on Werner and Charles W. Anderson, eds. Issues of		Feld, The European Common Market and Political Development. Reviewed by Arpad		the World	1020 von Lazar	243	Water Research. Allen V. Kneese and von der Mehden, Fred R. Note on Ba Maw,		Stephen C. Smith, eds. Noted by Ashley
Breakthrough in Burma: Memoirs of a		L. Schiff	634
Revolution, 1939-1946	1363	Waters, Maurice. Note on David A. Bald-von der Mehden, Fred R. Note on Frank		win, Economic Development and American
N. Trager, Burma from Kingdom to Re-		Foreign Policy 1943-62	1405
public: A Historical and Political Analysis	1363	Waters, Maurice. Note on Henry C. Aub-von der Mehden, Fred R. Note on Helen		rey. Atlantic Economic Co-operation. The
G. Trager, Burma Through Alien Eyes	1363	Case of the O.E.C.D	1405
von Glahn, Gerhard. Note on Heinz Till-		Weatherby, James L., Jr. and Allan G.
mann, Deutschlands Araberpolitik im	• †	Pulsipher. Malapportionment, Party Com-
Zweiten Weltkrieg	305	pstition, and the Functional Distribution
von Lazar, Arpad. Review of Charles W.		of Governmental Expenditures	1207
Anderson, Fred R. von der Mehden, and		Webb, Herschel. The Japanese Imperial
Crawford Young, eds., Issues of Political		Institution in the Tokugawa Period.

Noted by Akira Kubata		1960's. Noted by Arthur W. Wright Willbern, York. Note on Thomas D. Sher- rard, ed., Social Welfare and Urban
Basis of Economic Development: An Exploration in Comparative Political Analysis	583	Problems	1348
Weiner, Myron. Party Building in a New Nation: The Indian National Congress.		ed	614
Reviewed by Avery Leiserson	584	Christian Democratic Parties. Noted by Russell H. Fitzgibbon	279
Skepticism, Reform, and the Judicial Process	1336	Politics in the Fifth Republic. Noted by Henry C. Galant
Bernd, ed., Mathematical Applications in Political Science, III	1294	Larus, Nuclear Weapons Safety and the Common Defense
Weiss, Herbert. Political Protest in the Congo. Reviewed by Crawford Young Wenner, Manfred W. Modern Yemen, 1918-	1287	Wilson, Clifton E. Note on George Liska, Imperial America: The International Politics of Primacy	681
1966. Noted by George Kirk	647	Wilson, Robert R. Note on Stephen G. Xydis, Cyprus: Conflict and Resolution, 1954-1958	1399
1910. Noted by Frederick H. Schaps- meier	630	Winham, Gilbert R. Note on Theodore Draper, Abuse of Power	686
Wesson, Robert G. Note on John Leddy Phelan, The Kingdom of Quito in the Seventeenth Century	1006	Winham, Gilbert R. Review of Gideon Rosenbluth, The Canadian Economy and Disarmament	965
Westerfield, H. Bradford. Review of John Pincus, Trade, Aid and Development	242	Winham, Gilbert R. Review of John B. McLin, Canada's Changing Defense	000
Westerfield, H. Bradford. Review of Theodore Geiger, The Conflicted Relationship: The West and the Transformation of Asia,	040	Policy, 1957-1963: The Problems of a Middle Power in Alliance	965
Africa and Latin America	242	The Recruitment of Candidates for the Canadian House of Commons	1242
by Frederick H. Hartmann	239	and Reader. Joseph L. Morrison. Noted by David M. Abshire	991
Case Study in Televised Politics. Noted by Kenneth H. Thompson Whitaker, Arthur P. Note on Jacques Lam-	999	Third World: Problems and Analysis. Reviewed by Arpad von Lazar	243
bert, Latin America: Social Structures and Political Institutions	1373	ed., The Study of Total Societies	601
Who Rules America? B. William Dumhoff. Noted by Andrew Hacker Wight, Martin and Herbert Butterfield,	1301	The Quest for a United Germany Wolfenstein, E. Victor. The Revolutionary Personality: Lenin, Trotsky, Gandhi.	674
eds. Diplomatic Investigations: Essays in the Theory of International Politics. Noted	670	Noted by Arnold A. Rogow Wolfinger, Raymond E. and Fred I. Green-	604
by Don C. Piper	679	stein. The Repeal of Fair Housing in California: An Analysis of Referendum Voting	753
Martin	624	Wolfinger, Raymond E. and John Osgood Field. Communication on criticisms of their article "Political Ethos and the	,
A Yugoslav Philosopher Reconsiders Karl Marx's Writings	613	Structure of City Government"	227
Wiles, Peter, Alexander Balinsky, Abram Bergson and John N. Hazard. Planning and the Market. in the U.S.S.R.: the		President as Chief Administrator Wood, David M. Majority vs. Opposition in the French National Assembly, 1956—	1338

1965: A Guttman Scale Analysis Wood, William A. Electronic Journalism.	88	Young, James S. Note on Roy F. Nichols, The Invention of the American Political
Noted by David L. Paletz	639	Parties	268
Noted by Thomas Hovet, Jr World Order and Local Disorder: The United	303	Burns, ed., Perspectives of Brazilian History	287
Nations and Internal Conflicts. Linda B. Miller. Reviewed by Lawrence S. Kaplan	961	Young, Jordan M. Note on Thomas E. Skidmore, Politics in Brazil , 1930-1964	281
World Politics: The Global System. Herbert	901	Young, Jordan M. The Brazilian Revolution	201
J. Spiro. Noted by Morton A. Kaplan	694	of 1930 and the Aftermath. Noted by Robert T. Daland	000
Wright, Arthur W. Note on Alexander Balinsky, Abram Bergson, John N.		Young, Oran R. The Intermediaries: Third	282
Hazard, and Peter Wiles, Planning and		Parties in International Crises. Noted by the Market in the U.S.S.R.: the 1960's Wright, Theodore P., Jr. Note on Baldev	655	David W. Wainhouse Young, Oran R. Systems of Political Science.	1018
Raj Nayar, Minority Politics in the		Noted by Eugene J. Meehan	1322
Punjab	650	Yarwood, Dean L. Note on Allan Korn-	-
Wright, William E. Note on Eleanor Lan- sing Dulles, Berlin: The Wall is Not For-	•	berg, Canadian Legislative Behavior: A Sindy of the 25th Parliament	997
ever	295	• •
Wu, Chun-hsi. Dollars, Dependents and Dogma: Overseas Chinese Remittances		Zabih, Sepehr. The Communist Movement in Iran. Noted by Marvin Zonis	645
to Communist China. Noted by Yi-chun		Zaleski, Eugene. Planning Reforms in the	0.20
Chang	1371	Soviet Union, 1962-1966. Noted by	050
Wurzburg, Frederic. Note on Andrew M. Scott, The Functioning of the International		Robert Campbell	656
Political System	1016	Moscow, Peking, Hanoi. Noted by George	ese
Xydis, Stephen G. Cyprus: Conflict and		G. Bauroth	686
Resolution, 1954-1958. Noted by Robert		American Teachers. Noted by Jack Den-
R. WilsonXydis, Stephen G. Note on Theodore A.	1399	nis	1339
Couloumbis, Greek Political Reaction to		High School Teacher. Noted by Jack
American and NATO Influences	302	Dennis	1339
The Years of Opportunity: The League of		Zeitlin, Irving M. Marxism: A Re-Examina- tion. Noted by Samuel Hendel	974
Nations, 1920-1926. Byron Dexter. Noted		Zeitlin, Maurice. Revolutionary Politics and	0.7
by Whitney T. Perkins	1014	the Cuban Working Class. Reviewed by	1001
Yost, Charles. The Insecurity of Nations: International Relations in the Twentieth		Richard R. Fagen	1291
Century. Noted by Keith R. Legg	1397	ed., Survey Research in the Social Sciences	251
Young, Alfred F. The Democratic Republi- cans of New York: The Origins, 1763—		Zolberg, Aristide R. The Structure of Poli- tical Conflict in the New States of Tropical
1797. Reviewed by Manning J. Dauer	594	Africa	70
Young, Crawford, Charles W. Anderson,		Zoll, Donald Atwell. The Twentieth Century	250
and Fred R. von der Mehden, eds. Issues of Political Development. Reviewed by		Mind. Noted by J. Paul Johnston Zollinger, Peter. The Political Creature .	259
Arpad von Lazar	243	Noted by Sidney Waldman	1318
Young, Crawford. Review of Ernest W.	100	Zonis, Marvin. Note on George B. Baldwin,	645
Lefever, Uncertain Mandate Young, Crawford. Review of Herbert Weiss,	1287	Planning and Development in Iran Zonis, Marvin. Note on Sepehr Zabih, The	645
Political Protest in the Congo	1287	Communist Movement in Iran	645

The American Political Science Review

BOARD OF EDITORS

Austin Ranney, Manag	ing Editor University of Wisconsin	Melvin Richter,	City University of New York
Fred I. Greenstein,	Wesleyan University	John E. Turner,	University of Minnesota
Harvey C. Mansfield,	Columbia University	Vernon Van Dyke,	University of Iowa
Warren E. Miller,	University of Michigan	Myron Weiner.	Massachusetts Institute of
Walter F. Murphy,	Princeton University	migron women,	Technology

VOLUME LXII 1968

Copyright, 1969, by
THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

GEORGE BANTA COMPANY, INC MENASHA, WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

Number 1-March, 1968

The "Intensity" Problem and Democratic Theory. Willmoore Kendall and George W. Carey A Theory of the Calculus of Voting. William H. Riker and Peter C. Ordeshook	5 25
On the Fluidity of Judicial Choice. J. Woodford Howard, Jr	43 57
The Structure of Political Conflict in the New States of Tropical Africa. Aristide R. Zolberg Majority vs. Opposition in the French National Assembly, 1956–1965: A Guttman Scale Analysis. David M. Wood	70 88
Communism and Economic Development. Roger W. Berjamin and John H. Kautsky Policy Maps of City Councils and Policy Outcomes: A Developmental Analysis. Heinz Eulau	110 and Robert Eyestone. The Institutionalization of the U.S. House of Representatives. Nelson W. Polsby The Transmission of Political Values from Parent to Child. M. Kent Jennings and Richard G. Niemi.	124 144 169
BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ESSAY Comparing Communist Nations: Prospects for an Empirical Approach. Paul Shoup	185
RESEARCH NOTES A Theorem about Voting. Thomas W. Casstevens.	205
A Measure of the Population Quality of Legislative Apportionment. Henry F. Kaiser . Image of a President: Some Insights into the Political Views of School Children. Roberta S.	208
Sigel	$\frac{216}{227}$
Book Reviews and Notes. James W. Prothro (ed.).	233
Announcements	316
Number 2—June, 1968
Political Science and the Uses of Functional Analysis. A. James Gregor.	425
Pareto and Pluto-Democracy: The Retreat to Galapagos. S. E. Finer	$\frac{440}{451}$
Measuring the Concentration of Power in Political Systems. Steven J. Brams	461
Russett	476 481
Shapiro	494
Froman, Jr	518
Souls? Lewis Lipsitz	527
Some Thoughts on the Relation of Political Theory to Anthropology. Carl J. Friedrich	536 546 556
Hirsch, and Frederic J. Fleron, Jr	564 576
Book Reviews and Notes. James W. Protho (ed.)	582
Announcements	695
Number 3—September, 1968
The Repeal of Fair Housing in California: An Analysis of Referendum Voting. Raymond E. Wolfinger and Fred I. Greenstein.	753
Factions and Coalitions in One-Party Japan: An Interpretation Based on the Theory of Games. Michael Leiserson.	770
A Comparative Analysis of State and Federal Judicial B∋havior: The Reapportionment Cases. Edward N. Beiser	788
Voting Turnout in American Cities. Robert R. Alford and Eugene C. Lee	796

Soviet Elections as a Measure of Dissent: The Missing One Percent. Jerome M. Gilison	814
Soviet Elite Participatory Attitudes in the Post-Stalin Period. Milton Lodge	827
Group Influence and the Policy Process in the Soviet Union. Joel J. Schwartz and William R. Keech	840
Political Socialization and the High School Civics Curriculum in the United States. Kenneth P. Langton and M. Kent Jennings	852
Conservatism, Personality and Political Extremism. Robert A. Schoenberger	868
A Salience Dimension of Politics for the Study of Political Culture. Moshe M. Czudnowski Political Development and Socioeconomic Development: The Case of Latin America. Martin C.	878
Needlet	889
Locke's State of Nature: Historical Fact or Moral Fiction? Richard Ashcraft	898
National Attributes as Predictors of Delegate Attitudes at the United Nations. Jack E. Vincent.	916
National Political Units in the Twentieth Century: A Standardized List. Bruce M. Russett, J.
David Singer, and Melvin Small	932
Communications to the Editor	952
Book Reviews and Notes. Richard F. Fenno (ed.)	957
Announcements	1024
Number 4—December, 1968
Some Reflections on Soviet-American Relations. Merle Fainsod	1093
A Causal Model of Civil Strife: A Comparative Analysis Using New Indices. Ted Gurr	1104
Duff and John F. McCamant	1125
Protest as a Political Resource. Michael Lipsky	1144 Motivation, Incentive Systems, and the Political Party Organization. M. Margaret Conway and
Frank B. Feigert	1159
Coalition Politics in North India. Paul R. Brass	1174
Sources of Local Political Involvement. Robert R. Alford and Harry M. Scoble	1192
penditures. Allan G. Pulsipher and James L. Weatherby, Jr	1207
Agency Requests, Gubernatorial Support and Budget Success in State Legislatures. Ira
Sharkansky.	1220
The Soviet Central Committee: An Elite Analysis. Michael P. Gehlen and Michael McBride	1232
The Recruitment of Candidates for the Canadian House of Commons. Allan Kornberg and Hal H. Winsborough	1242
A Note of Caution in Causal Modelling. Hugh Donald Forbes and Edward R. Tufte	1258
A Note on Censorship. Gordon Tullock	1265
Communications to the Editor.	1268
Book Reviews and Notes. Richard F. Fenno (ed.).	1274
Announcements	1408
Index to Volume LXII. Nancy B. Edgerton and Mary H. Grossman	1410

•

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President
David Easton*
University of Chicago

President-Elect
KARL W. DEUTSCH*
Harvard University

Vice Presidents

James W. Fesler Yale University Hans J. Morgenthau University of Chicago VERNON VAN DYKE University of Iowa

Secretary
BERNARD L. KRONICK
University of Santa Clara

Treasurer
FRANCIS E. ROURKE
Johns Hopkins University

Program Chairman
ROBERT E. LANE*
Yale University

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK*
1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036

Managing Editor, APSR
AUSTIN RANNEY*
University of Wisconsin

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officiis

1968-1969

HOLBERT N. CARROLL
University of Pittsburgh
CHARLES O. JONES
University of Arizona
MERLE KLING

Washington University, St. Louis

Roy C. Macridis
Brandeis University
PAUL L. PURYEAR
Fisk University
ROBERT A. SCALAPINO

University of California, Berkeley

GLENDON SCHUBERT

York University, Toronto

Daniel Wit

Northern Illinois University

1969-1970

GORDON E. BAKER*

University of California, Santa Barbara

Samuel Dubois Cook
Duke University
Josephine E. Milburn
Simmons College
Joseph L. Nogee
University of Houston

A. F. K. Organski University of Michigan

FRANK J. SORAUF*

University of Minnesota

HERBERT J. SPIRO

University of Pennsylvania

FREDERICK M. WIRT Denison University

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW ALBERT SHAW Frederic N. Judson JAMES BRYCE A. LAWRENCE LOWELL WOODROW WILSON SIMEON E. BALDWIN ALBERT BUSHNELL HART W. W. WILLOUGHBY JOHN BASSETT MOORE ERNST FREUND JESSE MACY MUNROE SMITH HENRY JONES FORD PAUL S. REINSCH LEO S. ROWE WILLIAM A. DUNNING HARRY A. GARFIELD JAMES W. GARNER CHARLES E. MERRIAM CHARLES A. BEARD

WILLIAM B. MUNRO Jesse S. Reeves JOHN A. FAIRLIE BENJAMIN F. SHAMEAUGH EDWARD S. CORWIN WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY ISIDOR LOEB WALTER J. SHEPARD Francis W. Coker ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE THOMAS REED POWELL CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA CHARLES GROVE HAINES ROBERT C. EROOKS FREDERIC A. OGG WILLIAM ANDERSON ROBERT E. CUSHMAN LEONARD D. WHITE JOHN M. GAUS WALTER F. DODD ARTHUR W. MACMAHON

HENRY R. SPENCER QUINCY WRIGHT JAMES K. POLLOCK PETER H. ODEGARD LUTHER H. GULICK PENDLETON HERRING RALPH J. BUNCHE CHARLES McKINLEY HAROLD D. LASSWELL E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER V. O. KEY, JR. R. TAYLOR COLE CARL B. SWISHER EMMETTE S REDFORD CHARLES S. HYNEMAN CARL J. FRIEDRICH C. HERMAN PRITCHETT DAVID B. TRUMAN GABRIEL A. ALMOND ROBERT A. DAHL MERLE FAINSON

^{*} Members of the Executive Committee, 1968-1969.

AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION 1969 SOVIET UNION AND EASTERN EUROPEAN TOUR SEMINAR PROGRAM

ITINERARY:

The Tour-Seminar will leave around the middle of July for a 35 day tour which will include: Budapest, Sophia, Bucharest, Moscow, Leningrad, Warsaw, Prague, and Berlin.

COST:

The cost to Association members under a group plan with a minimum of 25 participants will be under $1,600.00. Included in the fare will be round-trip tourist air transportation, first class hotel accommodations, three meals a day except in Berlin where only breakfast will be included, baggage handling, sightseeing, and airport and meeting transportation. (On the basis of past experience, participants can expect that the cost of this educational activity will be accepted as deductible expense on Federal tax return).

SEMINAR PROGRAM:

In cooperation with the governments of the nations on the itinerary and the relevant U.S. departments, the Association will arrange meetings with leading public officials, members of university faculties, U.S. Foreign Service Personnel, and representatives of the press.

For further information concerning this educational, research, and travel opportunity, please write Director, APSA 1969 Soviet Union and Eastern European Tour Seminar, The American Political Science Association, 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., 20036.

APSA SUMMER FLIGHTS TO EUROPE

FLIGHT A—Approximately June 10 to August 26, 1969

FLIGHT B—Approximately August 2 to September 1, 1969

For the tenth successive summer, the Association will provide air service to Europe for its members.

Flights will originate at New York International Airport and arrive on the continent of Europe. The cost per seat will be less than $275.00.

Persons wishing to make reservations now may write directly to the Association, in care of the Director, Summer Flight Programs, 1527 New Hampshire Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036

UNIVERSITY of PENNSYLVANIA PRESS

New

CYPRUS: Constitutionalism and Crisis Government

By Stanley Kyriakides with a Foreword by Roy C. Macridis

The political and constitutional questions surrounding the Cyprus problem are thoroughly and objectively examined in this new book. With emphasis on the contemporary period from the second World War to the present, this book will remain, according to Roy Macridis, "the most accurate and scholarly statement of the Cyprus constitutional question for many years to come."

240 pages $6.50

Just reprinted

THE KOREA KNOT, Revised Edition A Military-Political History

By Carl Berger

"Constitutes one of the most up-to-date, yet brief, accounts available . . . Scholarly and thoroughly readable."—Choice 225 pages $6.00

A bestseller

THE RIGHT WING IN FRANCE From 1815 to de Gaulle, Second Edition

By René Rémond and translated by James M. Laux

"Professor Rémond's lucid and thought-provoking analysis of the French right wing is of particular importance in the era of de Gaulle. American readers, their interest stimulated by French intransigence over NATO and the Common Market, will welcome this excellent translation of a book already internationally known."—Library Journal. 425 pages illus. $7.50

UNIVERSITY of PENNSYLVANIA PRESS
Philadelphia 19104

Harper Texts of Particular Interest.

Ready in April

PETER H. ODEGARD'S

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC

Its Government and Politics Second Edition

With HANS H. BAERWALD and WILLIAM C. HAVARD

Here is a rigorous, comprehensive description and analysis of institutions and political practices at all levels of American government. Without sacrificing the richness of the historical and comparative analysis characteristic of the first edition, the Second Edition has been thoroughly revised and reorganized, incorporating original research, both institutional and behavioral. The book discusses major functions of American government and the way in which policy is developed and executed to fulfill these functions. Theoretical and comparative material is introduced to show why the American system works as it does in the light of social and historical circumstances.

Designed to be the principal text for a full-year course, the text is organized so that certain parts may be selected for use in a one-semester or one-quarter course. Numerous photographs and charts, maps, graphs. To accompany the text: Handbook of American Government (for the student) and Instructor's Manual hoth by David Barney.

Text: $8.95 (tentative); Handbook: $3.95 (tentative)

Published

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

Readings and Documents, Second Edition PETER H. ODEGARD

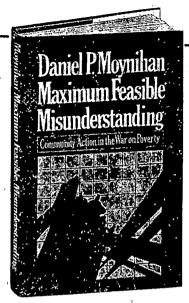

An authoritative and wide-ranging collection of readings which may accompany any standard text in American government, including THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC (described above). Headnotes give historical, constitutional, and political perspective to the documentary materials. 640 pp.; $5.50; paper

CHALLENGE AND DECISION Political Issues of Our Time, Second Edition REO M. CHRISTENSON

Up to date and forward looking, this presentation of the major domestic political issues facing this generation provides a detailed study of their genesis and legislative experience through the Eighty-ninth Congress. 306 pp.; $3.55; paper

Harper & Row, Publishers · 49 E. 33d St., New York

Coming in February

MAXIMUM FEASIBLE

MISUNDERSTANDING

Community Action in the War on Poverty By Daniel P. Moynihan, Harvard University

"Not in a long time have I been alternately as excited, moved, fascinated, and impressed—as well as edified—by any book.... This book is going to leave heavy impress—on the minds of other scholars, social scientists, civil servants, and a few other groups as well. It is marvellously written—swift but never hurried, meanings of often intricate situations never left murky, and above all a book with plot, that is, beginning, middle, and end."

-Robert A. Nisbet University of California, Riverside

Maximum Feasible Misunderstanding is a spirited yet serious account of the foundering of the Economic Opportunity Act's programs of community action. Professor Moynihan shows how a plan that called for the "maximum feasible participation" of the community resulted in maximum feasible misunderstanding for those directly concerned and seeks to explain what happened, rather than to blame those responsible. February, 1969 224 pages $4.50 tent.

THE FREE PRESS

A Division of The Macmillan Company 866 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

THE POLITICAL IMAGINATION IN LITERATURE

A Reader

Edited by Philip Green, Smith College, and

Michael Walzer, Harvard University

This stimulating reader supplements the standard materials of political science education with 61 selections that dramatically express the richness of political life and political thought. Included are the works of Agee, Babel, Blake, Brecht, Dickens, Diderot, Dostoevski, France, Giono, Goodman, Housman, James, Kafka, Kipling, Koestler, Maltz, Mann, Melville, Milton, Shakespeare, Sartre, Swift, Twain, Warren, Williams, Wright, Yeats, Zola, and others.

January, 1969

528 pages

paper, $4.95 tent.

URBAN GOVERNMENT

A Reader in Administration and Politics

Revised Edition

Edited by Edward C. Banfield, Harvard University

The revised edition of Urban Government reflects the social and political developments that have affected urban government since 1961. With 32 of its 68 selections newly added, the book presents an up-to-date picture of its field. Included are articles on Negro politics, reapportionment of local government, riots, and other areas of current importance.

January, 1969

800 pages

$9.95 tent.

SIMSOC (Simulated Society)

Participant's Manual

By William A. Gamson, University of Michigan

Simsoc, classroom tested at Indiana, Brandeis, Michigan, and the University of California at Los Angeles and Santa Barbara, is a unique game developed to make the social science concepts more vivid to students at the college level. Twenty or more players participate as citizens in a simulated society where situations occur in which the student must actively question the nature of the social order and examine the processes of social conflict and control. Simsoc is designed to be played without a computer.

February, 1969

160 pages (approx.)

paper, $3.95 tent.

SIMSOC (Simulated Society)

Instructor's Manual

ç6 pages

gratis

BUREAUCRATIC BEHAVIOR IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

An Analysis of Organizational Change

By Louis C. Gawthrop, State University of New York, Binghamton

The first theoretical analysis of bureaucratic behavior in the executive branch, this text examines its subject in terms of organizational responses to both internal and external change and systematically compares public and private bureaucracies. The author develops an analytical model which can be used to examine bureaucratic behavior in the executive branch of the federal government and presents a detailed analysis of key behavioral factors affecting organizations.

January, 1969

336 pages (approx.)

paper, $2.95 tent.

THE STUDY OF POLICY FORMATION

Edited by Raymond A. Bauer, Harvard University, and Kenneth J. Gergen, Swarthmore College Foreword by Robert C. Wood

This collection of nine empirically oriented, previously unpublished papers presents a synthesis of past approaches, a reference to contemporary techniques, and fresh ideas on both theoretical and empirical planes. The contributors show how developments in theories of decision-making, power structure, and formal organizations lend themselves to study, pointing out present limitations and signaling areas where additional knowledge is needed.

1968 400 pages $9.95

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS AND FOREIGN POLICY

Revised Edition

Edited by James N. Rosenau, Rutgers University

The revised edition of International Politics and Foreign Policy is a current and balanced collection of readings on international relations and is particularly informative regarding the structure of international systems, strategic theory, and the sources of foreign policy behavior. Fifty-five of its sixty-three selections are new to this edition and include five previously unpublished selections.

March, 1969

800 pages (approx.)

$9.95 tent.

POLITICAL PARTIES IN ACTION

The Battle of Barons Court

By Robert T. Holt and John E. Turner, both, University of Minnesota

A unique analysis of a political campaign from inside each competing party, this book is a study of two local parties as organizations mobilizing their resources to fight for a marginal parliamentary seat in London. Making use of interviews, photographs, and census, canvassing, and polling data, the authors analyze precampaign planning, the contrasting patterns of campaign organization, and party operations on polling day.

Just published

352 pages

$7.95

Coming in January-A New Free Press Paperback

POLITICAL SOCIALIZATION

A Study in the Psychology of Political Behavior By Herbert Hyman

With a new preface by the author

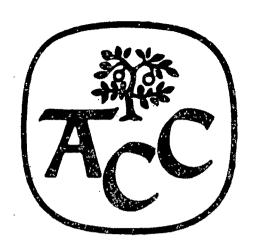

A comprehensive inventory of the psychology of political socialization, this book encompasses past research which treats political behavior as the product of learning and socialization. It includes an account of studies in which the idiosyncracies of political behavior do not fit into the learning-socialization pattern.

188 pages (approx.)

paper, $1.95 tent.

THE FREE PRESS

A Division of The Macmillan Company 866 Third Avenue, New York 10022

look for these books this spring:

• INTERNATIONAL LAW IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY American Society of International Law/in clothbound and paperback editions • STATISTICS IN POLITICAL AND BEHAVIORAL SCIENCE Dennis J. Palumbo, Brooklyn College of The City University of New York/with separate workbook • AP-PROACHES TO MEASUREMENT IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS: A Non-Evangelical Survey Edited by John E. Mueller, University of Rochester • POLICIES, DECISIONS AND ORGANIZATION Edited by Fremont J. Lyden, George A. Shipman, and Morton Kroll, all of the University of Washington • OGG AND RAY'S ESSENTIALS OF AMERICAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT, 10th Ed. and OGG AND RAY'S ESSENTIALS OF AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT, 10th Ed. William H. Young, The University of Wisconsin/with instructor's manual

Praeger paperbacks on International Affairs

THE FOREIGN POLICIES OF THE POWERS

Edited by F. S. NORTHEDGE

This ideal text for the student of modern politics provides a comparative analysis of the foreign policies of the U.S., the Soviet Union, China, Britain, France, West Germany, and India. The distinguished contributors, all of the London School of Economics, delineate the forces — political, social, economic, ideological, and strategic — that have made these foreign policies what they are today. January. 322 pp., bibliog., index. $2.95

TRENDS OF FEDERALISM IN THEORY AND PRACTICE CARL J. FRIEDRICH

In a definitive reconsideration of a controversial political arrangement, Harvard University's Eaton Professor of the Science of Government emphasizes the process of federalism. Following an analysis of the components of federalism, Dr. Friedrich presents eleven case studies that together show the full spectrum of vital federal systems. 208 pp., index. U-652/$2.50

THE ORIGINS OF SOCIALISM

GEORGE LICHTHEIM

The renowned author of Marxism traces socialist thought from its conception in the French revolutionary period, through the influence of the British Utopians and the philosophy of Hegel, to the classic formulation achieved by Karl Marx. "A brilliant analysis of the roots of anarchism, 'economism,' communitarianism, populism, and 'reformism,' to say nothing of Marxism proper . . . Indispensable to serious students."— Kirkus Service. ca. 310 pp., notes, bibliog., index.

U-661/$2.95

EXPANSION AND COEXISTENCE The History of Soviet Foreign Policy, 1917-67

ADAM B. ULAM

Harvard's distinguished political scientist Adam B. Ulam has written "the most comprehensive, balanced, and lucid account of the Soviet Union's relations with the outside world that has yet appeared in English."—EDWARD CRANKSHAW. "I found myself absorbed and fascinated. Not only and obviously is this a book of the first importance, but it is an admirably graceful piece of writing illuminated by flashes of wit and sardonic insight."

—JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH. 784 pp., index 61/8" x 91/4".

A Praeger Paperbound Text/$4.95

MIDDLE EAST POLITICS: THE MILITARY DIMENSION

J. C. HUREWITZ

J. C. Hurewitz, Professor of Government at Columbia University, examines the civil-military relationship in each of the eighteen countries stretching from Morocco to Pakistan. In so doing, he provides an informative and well-documented study of the interplay of domestic, regional, and international politics in the postwar Middle East. Published for the Council on Foreign Relations. 544 pp., bibliog., index.

U-660/$3.95

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publishers, 111 Fourth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10003

Politics and Government in the United States SECOND EDITION

EMMETTE S. REDFORD, University of Texas DAVID B. TRUMAN, Columbia University ALAN F. WESTIN, Columbia University ROBERT C. WOOD, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

This Second Edition of a highly successful introduction to American government represents a thorough revision in both content and format. While maintaining the consistently high level of analysis and sound scholarship that characterized the earlier edition, the authors have thoroughly revised each chapter to take into account the latest research in political science and recent political events. The text narrative is approximately 30% shorter than in the previous edition, but the scope of the book remains the same; no major substantive topics have been dropped. Instructor's Manual and Test Booklet available.

National, State, and Local Edition: 964 pages. $9.50 National Edition: 835 pages. $8.50

"A superb book! The organization and format, emphasizing political process, are outstanding. The opinions expressed in the boxed quotations give the student a valuable introduction to bases of conflict. The entire unit on the judiciary is excellent, as is the section on voters' decision."

-ALICE LE BEL, Santa Monica City College

The Chief Executive REVISED EDITION

LOUIS W. KOENIG, New York University

Widely acclaimed as a vivid, incisive analysis of the American Presidency, The Chief Executive is now available in a newly revised paper-bound textbook edition. This new edition brings the book up to date with the scholarship and events of the past four years, includes a new chapter on Presidential personality, and provides complete references for each chapter and an expanded bibliography.

Paperbound. 466 pages. $3.95

"Professor Koenig has a way of seeing a theme and illustrating it with just the right anecdote. The combination of sensitivity and sensibleness in his writing is rare among us since V. O. Key."

-JAMES D. BARBER, Yale University

Western Political Theory

FROM ITS ORIGINS TO THE PRESENT

LEE CAMERON McDONALD, Pomona College

This distinguished one-volume history of political theory offers a detailed analysis of the major theorists and schools of thought from Plato to the present. Professor McDonald concentrates on major figures, and his explanation of each man's point of view, complemented by substantial quotations from his writings, gives the student a first-hand acquaintance with the man's philosophy, his style, his approach to life, and the age in which he lived.

653 pages. $9.50

"I found Mr. McDonald's text to be all that it purported to be and more. Not only is its comprehensiveness impressive, but it is written in a sprightly and attractive manner, without that air of condescension too common to theory textbooks."

-LARRY PETERMAN, University of California, Davis

Political Patterns in Today's World Second Edition

D. W. BROGAN, Professor Emeritus, Cambridge University DOUGLAS V. VERNEY, York University

A brief, comparative introduction to politics and society, this textbook provides the student with an opportunity to evaluate the two basic political patterns in today's world—liberal democracy, as exemplified in the governments of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Sweden, and communism, as practiced in the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia, and China.

Paperbound. 278 pages. $2.95

"I like this book very much. It is intelligently written, informative, interesting, and yet comparatively brief—a hard combination to find these days. I think the countries selected are excellent choices, and the authors' treatment of differing political systems is very fair. The tables at the end of the book are quite useful."

-ROBERT W. LANGRAN, Villanova University

HARCOURT, BRACE & WORLD, INC.

New York • Chicago • San Francisco • Atlanta

Polity a new journal of political science

Published quarterly by the Northeastern Political Science Associations

Articles in the current issue include:

William T. Bluhm, Nation Building: The Case of Austria

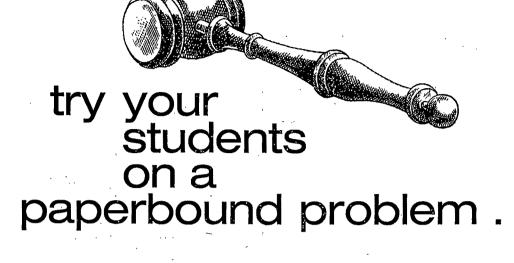

Reo M. Christenson, The Moral Imperative in Politics: Reflections on Auschwitz

Frank M. Bryan, The Metamorphosis of a Rural Legislature

Ronald O. Loveridge, The City Manager in Legislative Politics: A Collision of Role Conceptions James A. Riedel, An Academic Peanuts Gallery

Books reviews by Leo Weinstein, Gregor Sebba, Samuel Krislov & Douglas Hodgkin

POLITY Loren P. Beth, Managing Editor Thompson Tower, University of Massachusetts Amherst, Massachusetts 01002
Please enter my name for a one-year subscription to POLITY
NPSA member: $8 Other U.S.A.: $7 Foreign: $7.50 Student U.S.A.: $4 Foreign: $4.50
My check or money order for $is enclosed
NAME ADDRESS
ZIP CODE

FREE SPEECH AND POLITICAL PROTEST

Marvin Summers, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee 136 pages

THE REPRESENTATIVE: Trustee? Delegate? Partisan? Politico?

Neal Riemer, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee 116 pages $1.50

WESTERN EUROPE: What Path to Integration

Carol E. Baumann, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee 156 pages

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL EXPERIENCE: What is the Key?

Edward Handler, Babson Institute 1968 152 pages $1.75

LIBERALIZATION IN THE USSR: Facade or Reality?

D. Richard Little, Northern Illinois University 135 pages $1.75

THE CIA: Problems of Secrecy in a Democracy

Young Hum Kim, California Western University Available November 1968

From the growing list of Problems in Political Science you can order direct from D. C. HEATH AND COMPANY, 2700 North Richardt Avenue, Indianapolis, Indiana 46219

> For further information write Box P84 College Division

D. C. HEATH AND COMPANY

A Division of Raytheon Education Company RAYTHEON 285 Columbus Avenue • Boston, Massachusetts 02116

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

announcing

COOPERATION AND CONFLICT: Readings in American Federalism

Edited by Daniel J. Elazar, Temple University
R. Bruce Carroll, Middlebury College
E. Lester Levine, Florida State University
Douglas St. Angelo, Florida State University

This is a comprehensive anthology of materials dealing with the several aspects of American federalism. Federalism is treated as an element of political conflict. Under this conflict there has been and continues to be extensive intermingling of functioning among government levels. This shared federalism is viewed historically, theoretically, fiscally, administratively and politically.

It is oriented toward delineating empirical realities but in a manner that synthesizes theory and practice in a meaningful way. The book's underlying premise is that federal principles and processes so permeate the American system of government that an understanding of federalism is necessary for the study of American government.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Chapter 1. The American System as a Partnership

- 2. Basic Patterns of Partnership
- 3. The Views of the Policy Makers
- 4. The View from the States
- 5. The Grass Roots of American Federalism
- 6. The Dynamics of the Federal System

February 1969 c. 650 pages c. $9.00

The Loyola University Series in Modern Political Theory OPEN SYSTEMS: Arenas for Political Action

Henry S. Kariel, University of Hawaii

This is Professor Kariel's exciting analysis of the problem of closure in American society and institutions. Professor Kariel's argument is that "politics at its best (not all politics) is a kind of play, of agonistic exertion, of free and self delighting action."

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Introduction

Chapter 1. The Personality System

- 2. The Social System
- 3. The System of Political Inquiry
- 4. Political Science as Public Action

May 1969 c. 160 pages c. $3.50 paper

F. E. PEACOCK PUBLISHERS, INC.

Itasca, Illinois 60143

Just Published

VIETNAM:

Anatomy of a Conflict

Edited by Wesley R. Fishel, Michigan State University

Useful in courses in Politics of Southeast Asia or American Foreign Policy, this is a cogent, authoritative and balanced presentation of the Vietnam frustration. It contains 81 selections with various points of view. It sets forth background, history and contemporary analyses.

1968

879 pages

$5.95 paper

PERSPECTIVES ON PUBLIC MANAGEMENT: Cases and Learning Designs

Edited by Robert T. Golembiewski, University of Georgia

This unique approach to Public Administration contains 13 cases selected to illustrate some managerially-relevant process. Each case is preceded by a "learning design," i.e., suggested ways of using the case to highlight what is known about managerial processes and behavior.

1968

263 pages

592 pages

$4.95 paper

PUBLIC BUDGETING AND FINANCE: Readings in Theory and Practice

Edited by Robert T. Golembiewski

An extraordinarily comprehensive collection of readings (47) emphasizing behavioral materials relevant to budgeting as well as technical and institutional features.

FEDERALISM:

1968

$9.50

Infinite Variety in Theory and Practice

Edited by Valerie Earle, Georgetown University

In a seven essay presentation, the first three examine American federalism, the next three federalism in Canada and Australia, West Germany and Latin America. The concluding essay discusses the future of federalism. The essay contributors, in addition to Valerie Earle, are Alpheus Mason, George Carey, William S. Livingston, Karl H. Cerny, Harry Kantor and Henry Teune.

1968 241 pages $.

$3.75 paper

METROPOLIS IN CRISIS: Social and Political Perspectives

Edited by Jeffrey K. Hadden, Case Western Reserve University Louis H. Masotti, Case Western Reserve University Calvin J. Larson, Purdue University.

The 44 selections in this reader are organized into five parts.

Part I, The Challenge of Metropolis, is a brief introduction to the problems and prospects of urban life. Part II, From Mudhuts to Megalopolis, traces the historical development of cities and elaborates the process and consequences of urbanization.

Part III, Ideological Perspectives, delineates the way man thinks and feels about the city. Part IV, Dimensions of the Crisis, looks at specific urban problems: race, housing, poverty, education, crime, transportation, air pollution and finance.

Finally, Part V, Adaptation, Innovation and Reform, examines the ability of the urban community to organize itself to meet the urban crisis.

967 521

$8.00

F. E. PEACOCK PUBLISHERS, INC.

Itasca, Illinois 60143

New from Holt in 1969

AMERICAN POLITICS: A Systems Approach By Stephen V. Monsma, Calvin College

This brief introduction to American government uses systems analysis to integrate and analyze the key feasystems analysis to integrate and analyze the key features of American politics. Instructor's Manual / Study Guide. March 1969 / 416 pp. / $5.95 (tent.)

AMERICAN POLITICS: Research and Readings Edited by Stephen V. Monsma and Jack R. Van Der Slik, Southern Illinois University

The organizing concept of this reader is the political system model as it has been developed by a number of contemporary theorists, especially David Easton. A companion volume to Monsma's American Politics: A Systems Approach as well as to other introductory texts. May 1969 / 416 pp. / $4.95 paper (tent.)

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION: A Simulation With Readings

By Marvin G. Weinbaum and Louis H. Gold, both of the University of Illinois

These exercises are in the form of a competitive game where players act out roles in presidential primaries, bargaining and balloting at national conventions, and in the election of a president. March 1969 / 320 pp. / $3.95 paper (tent.)

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION, Fourth Edition By Marshall E. Dimock and Gladys Ogden Dimock

This introduction to aspects of public administration has been completely rewritten and refocused to develop a rounded and unified theory, to reflect current behavioral emphases, utilize comparative analyses, and investigate economic factors and policy-making decisions. April 1969 / 576 pp. / $8.95 (tent.)

CASEBOOK IN PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

By R. Joseph Novogrod, Long Island University, Brooklyn Center, Marshall E. Dimock and Gladys Ogden Dimock

This casebook relates principles of public administration to actual administrative situations at the city, state and federal levels of government by presenting problems and programs with which today's public officials must contend. Accompanies Dimock and Dimock: Public Administration, Fourth Edition plus other public administration texts. Spring 1969 / 352 pp. / $4.95 paper (tent.)

INTERNATIONAL POLITICAL ANALYSIS By David V. Edwards, The University of Texas

The author uses an open-ended approach to international politics to lead the student through the analysis required to develop and text theory to explain, predict, and recommend policy. Instructor's Manual / Casebooks. February 1969 / 416 pp. / $8.50 (tent.)

READINGS IN INTERNATIONAL POLITICAL ANALYSIS

Edited by David V. Edwards

Articles by political scientists and scholars in related disciplines focus on the problems and methods of theory-building in international politics. May be used in conjunction with the author's International Political Analysis or with other basic books in the field. April 1969 / 512 pp. / $5.95 paper (tent.)

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS DICTIONARY

By Jack C. Plano and Roy Olton, both of Western Michigan University

Drawn together in one convenient source are carefully selected terms, theories, concepts, and facts essential to a basic understanding of the contemporary setting of international politics. March 1969 / 320 pp. / $3.95 paper (tent.)

GREAT POLITICAL THINKERS. Fourth Edition Edited by William Ebenstein, University of California

Using readings from original sources, the author traces the evolution of political philosophy with an emphasis upon the relevance of the great political problems throughout history to problems of the twentieth century. Revised with rewritten, expanded introductory essays. March 1969 / 1056 pp. / $9.95 (tent.)

CONTEMPORARY POLITICAL THOUGHT Issues in Scope, Value, and Direction Edited by James A. Gould, University of South Florida, and Vincent V. Thursby, Florida State University

The articles in this book present opposing views on the central controversies in current political thought. February 1969 / 416 pp. / $4.95 paper (tent.)

Public Policy Studies in American Government Edgar Litt, General Editor

PUBLIC HOUSING: The Politics of Poverty By Leonard Freedman, University of California, Los Angeles. April 1969 / 224 pp. / $3.95 paper (tent.)

THE NEW POLITICS OF AMERICAN POLICY A Reader

Edited by Edgar Litt, University of Connecticut. April 1969 / 384 pp. / $4.95 paper (tent.)

THE VOCATIONAL UNIVERSITY Knowledge and Power in Higher Education By Edgar Litt. April 1969 / 224 pp. / $3.95 paper (tent.)

Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc. 383 Madison Avenue, New York 10017

Four new publications . . .

RESEARCH RESOURCES:

Annotated Guide to the Social Sciences

John Brown Mason, Editor

Volume 1—International Relations and Recent History: Indexes, Abstracts and Periodicals

Research Resources contains more than 1,268 titles, authoritatively annotated and cross-referenced, with an author index, an index of titles, and a list of American publishers. xviii, 244 pages. October 1968. L.C. 68-9685. $6.75, clothbound. $3.00, paperbound.

Volume 2—Official Publications: U.S. Government, United Nations, International Organizations, and Statistical Sources. To be published in 1969.

A GUIDE TO BOOKS ON SOUTHEAST ASIAN HISTORY (1961-1966) Gayle Morrison, editor

A long-needed critically annotated bibliography which up-dates bibliography of this area. Bibliography and Reference Series No. 8. 95 pages. November 1968. L.C. 68-56893. $4.00, paperbound.

LATIN AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT: A Selected Bibliography (1950-1967) Jerry L. Weaver, editor

Cites books, monographs and documents concerned with such problems as agrarian reform, socio-political development and rural development throughout Latin America. Bibliography and Reference Series No. 9. 90 pages. December 1968. L.C. 68-56894. $3.50, paperbound.

AMERICAN POLITICS AND ELECTIONS: Selected Abstracts of Periodical Literature (1964-1968) Lloyd Garrison, editor

A comprehensive selection of abstracts covering the historical development of the American political system and political parties. Personal names index. 44 pages. October 1968. L.C. 68-58982. $2.25, paperbound.

Twentieth Century Series

- No. 1 GERMAN NATIONAL SOCIALISM, 1919-1945. Martin Broszat. viii, 154 pages. 1966. L.C. 66-26137. $5.50, clothbound. $2.75, paperbound.
- No. 2 WE SURVIVED. Fourteen Histories of the Hidden and Hunted of Nazi Germany. Eric H. Boehm. xiii, 316 pages. 1966. L.C. 66-29776. $5.85, clothbound. $2.75, paperbound.
- No. 3 INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS RESEARCH. E. Raymond Platig. xiv, 211 pages. 1967. L.C. 67-22191. $6.50, clothbound. $3.75, paperbound.

Department AP

AMERICAN BIBLIOGRAPHICAL CENTER • CLIO PRESS Riviera Campus, 2010 Alameda Padre Serra

Santa Barbara, California 93103

Publisher of

HISTORICAL ABSTRACTS

AMERICA: HISTORY AND LIFE

Second Edition .

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS IN A REVOLUTIONARY AGE

W. W. KULSKI, Duke University

This thoroughly revised, completely reset edition of Professor Kulski's widely accepted text provides an up-to-date examination of every important aspect of relations between contemporary states—political, military, economic, ideological, legal and diplomatic.

742 Pages

$7.95

POLITICS AND THE INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM

Introductory Readings

Edited by ROBERT L. PFALTZGRAFF, Jr., University of Pennsylvania

The selections in this collection are representative of the thought of leading contemporary and traditional analysts, and reflect their diverse and sometimes conflicting viewpoints on the major problems and areas of concern to the student of international relations.

Paperbound

January 1969

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND ORGANIZATION

An Introductory Reader

Edited by RICHARD A. FALK, Princeton University, and WOLFRAM F. HANRIEDER, University of California, Santa Barbara

Fourteen selections together with the editors' commentaries provide students with an introduction to the important questions that bear on the character of contemporary international order. The distinctive features of a decentralized legal system are stressed.

346 Pages

Paperbound

$3.95

THESE LIBERTIES

Case Studies in Civil Rights

ROCCO J. TRESOLINI

Unlike many existing casebooks intended for advanced students and specialized audiences, this brief book—a virtual text in civil liberties—is designed for students at freshman and sophomore levels. Particular stress is placed on recent and emerging problems.

306 Pages

Paperbound

$2.25

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

COLLEGE DEPARTMENT

EAST WASHINGTON SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA, PA. 19105

New for 1969 ... from Macmillan

THE AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

By C. Peter Magrath, The University of Nebraska, Elmer E. Cornwell, Jr., Brown University, and Jay S. Goodman, Wheaton College

This excellent textbook has been written for the basic course in American Government. Conveying much of the fascination and excitement of politics, THE AMERICAN DEMOCRACY approaches intergovernmental politics, participation, and political parties "as they are"—live political processes. The text provides essential facts in combination with a great deal of feeling for how the American system of government and politics operates. It is the first textbook to incorporate case studies, to integrate the study of federal, state, and local governments, and to treat urban politics as a normal part of the political process. By blending the facts with analysis and interpretation, this volume examines the basic workings of the American system of government and politics. Tables and graphs convey the latest empirical data; detailed bibliographies focus on the most recent literature.

1969, approx. 768 pages, prob. $8.95

POLITICS, U.S.A.

Cases on the American Democratic Process, Third Edition

By Andrew M. Scott and Earle Wallace, both of the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill

In this new edition of the "case" approach to American politics almost all of the material is completely new. Many of the cases are vividly controversial, and demonstrate the nature and actual workings of government. A number of timely topics have been included in this new edition: The Urban Crisis, The Politics of Poverty, and The Politics of Violence. This edition incorporates material on the recent presidential campaign and election, as well as information on the Vietnam War and our Military and Foreign Policy. An important new feature is the series of discussion questions at the end of each chapter. As in the past, each chapter begins with a helpful introduction by the authors.

1969, approx. 576 pages, prob. $4.95

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

866 Third Avenue, New York, New York 10022 In Canada, write to Collier-Macmillan Canada, Ltd., 1125B Leslie Street, Don Mills, Ontario

World youth . . .

Know the establishment.

CONSTITUTIONS AND CONSTITUTIONALISM, Third Edition

Edited by William G. Andrews, Chairman, Department of Political Science, State University College, Brockport, New York. #1 New Perspectives in Political Science, William G. Andrews, General Editor. 1968, 224 pages, about $1.95 (paper).

MODERN GOVERNMENTS Third Edition

Walter D. Jacobs, University of Maryland; and the late Harold Zink. Van Nostrand Political Science Series. 1966, 768 pages, $10.95.

EUROPEAN POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

A Comparative Government Reader Second Edition

William G. Andrews. 1966, 608 pages, $4.95 (paper).

EUROPEAN POLITICS I

A Comparative Government Biennial

William G. Andrews. 1966, 245 pages, $2.50 (paper).

THIRD PARTY MOVEMENTS IN THE UNITED STATES

William B. Hesseltine, University of Wisconsin. Anvil Book #65, Louis L. Snyder, General Editor. 192 pages, $1.45 (paper).

THE DEMOCRATS 1789-1964

A Short History of a Popular Party

William N. Chambers, Washington University. Anvil Book #76. 192 pages, $1.75 (paper).

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

A Short History

Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland. Anvil Book #100. 1968, 192 pages, $1.75 (paper).

Send for your on-approval copies. Write College Department,

Cornell University Press

AGORA PAPERBACK EDITIONS

Classic works in political philosophy, under the general editorship of Allan Bloom

Considerations on the Causes of the Greatness of the Romans and Their Decline

By MONTESQUIEU. Translated with Notes and Introduction by DAVID LOWENTHAL. "This is a delightful book. David Lowenthal has rendered a service of real value in making available a new translation of Montesquieu's book on the Romans."—Western Political Quarterly. 225 pages. CP-74 $1.95

Politics and the Arts

Letter to M. d'Alembert on the Theatre

By JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU. Translated with Notes and Introduction by ALLAN BLOOM. "Bloom's systematic and thoughtful analysis of Rousseau's arguments and their intellectual background provides an illuminating way into the essay."—American Scholar. 158 pages. CP-71 $1.95

On Tyranny (Revised and Enlarged)

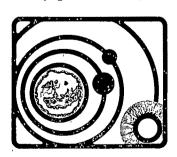

By LEO STRAUSS. This close textual analysis of Xenophon's Hiero, or Tyrannicus includes a dialogue between Strauss and Alexandre Kojève, Europe's leading Hegelian scholar.

240 pages. CP-73 $1.95

Alfarabi's Philosophy of Plato and Aristotle

Translated with an Introduction by MUHSIN MAHCI. This first English translation of the great first-century Arab philosopher contains penetrating commentaries on Aristotle and on the Platonic approach to politics.

158 pages. (Available in January.) CP-72 $1:95

Cornell University Press, ITHACA, NEW YORK 14850

We believe that students want and deserve an introduction to Political Science that demands a higher level of thinking than is evidenced in present texts. Such an introduction should give them an awareness of current research. It should have a point of view and not be limited to factual summaries, many of which are quickly outdated. It should be frank about matters in which we are ignorant, provide encouragement for students to formulate their own theories, and convey some of the excitement we political scientists experience in our own work. We believe such a text can be written and hope that our book accomplishes these objectives.

Joyce and William Mitchell

Coming January 20

The new introduction to Political Science that is written for today's student... and today's professor

POLITICAL ANALYSIS AND PUBLIC POLICY

An Introduction to Political Science

By Joyce M. & William C. Mitchell University of Oregon

For more information or examination copy, write:

RAND MCNALLY & COMPANY

The College Department P.O. BOX 7600 CHICAGO 60680

THE NATIONAL PRESS INC.

128 C Street N. E. Washington, D. C. 20002

- 1. LET THE SELLER BEWARE! by James Bishop Jr. and Henry Hubbard. Introduction by Betty Furness. A study of the frauds perpetrated on the American people by the "Business Establishment". NEWSWEEK writers Bishop and Hubbard have written a history and evaluation of American consumer protection. This movement is traced from the simple Jeffersonian ideal of an agrarian society where the buyer and seller were on equal terms, to the present industrial system where consumer control is limited. The recent exposes by Rachel Carson and Ralph Nader are studied in detail. Cloth $6.95.
- 2. YOU CAN FIGHT CITY HALL, by former Cit7 Attorney H. Jackson Daniel. A laymen's guide to the local political process. The former City Attorney of Webster Groves, Missouri, explains how city hall functions and the language it uses to communicate. The book gives the details of zoning, garbage collection, street maintenance, schools, permits, dogs, and other municipal headaches. A "primer" on local government. Cloth $4.95.
- 3. THE RIPON PAPERS, edited by Lee W. Huebner and Thomas E. Petri. Taking their inspiration from England's renowned Bow group and its name from Ripon, Wisconsin—the founding place of the Republican Party—this loosely knit association of business, academic, and professional men and women known as the "Ripon Society" represents the liberal wing of the G.O.P. The Ripon Society is a research and policy organization. Although it is not formally affiliated with the Republican party, informally, it seeks to be its conscience. Some of the topics of these papers are: "China 68", "The Negative Income Tax", "The Realities of Vietnam", and "The Myth of Bipartisanship". Cloth $6.95.
- 4. AMERICAN-EAST EUROPEAN TRADE—Controversy, Progress, Prospects. Edited by Phillip D. Grub and Karel Holbik. Professor Grub of George Washington University and Professor Holbik of Boston University are prominent teachers of international trade and have been members of trade missions to Eastern Europe. This book examines the continuing controversy concerning United States trade with the Soviet Bloc Nations from all viewpoints. The existing laws and legislative proposals from the legal, economic, and business areas are summarized. A projection of the future of U.S.-East European trade is stated. A comprehensive bibliography is included. Cloth $6.95. Paper $2.95.
- 5. THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF WORLD POWER, by Senator Gale McGee. Here at last, is an authoritative, scholarly presentation of the Johnson Administration's Vietnam commitment. Senator McGee believes in the "containment policy" and sees the issue as the question of stability and balance in Eastern Asia. His historical perspective is gleaned from his background as a professor of history and chairman of the Institute of International Affairs of the University of Wyoming. "This well-written book should be in all libraries that own books on the other side of the Vietnam question."—Library Journal. Cloth $6.95.
- 6. CROSSROADS, U.S.A., by Senator Harrison A. Williams, Jr. A pictorial essay of America's domestic scene. Senator Williams examines such questions as poverty, race, and civil disturbances which have had such a divisive effect on the American civilization and brought us to a "crossroads" in the course of our democratic form of government. Poignant photographs complement the text. Cloth $5.95.
- 7. WHERE ARE THE VOTERS? by Jerry W. Friedheim with research assistance and introduction by Richard Scammon. Proves by statistics and a perceptive text where American voters are located by age, occupation, race, sex, educatior, religion, and political preference. Gives professional advice on how to get the electorate to vote for your party or candidate. "Vote-finder" charts show how many votes a presidential candidate needs in each state and where he and his partisans can find them and how to get their votes. Cloth $6.95. Paper $2.95.
- 8. HOW TO RUN FOR PUBLIC OFFICE AND WIN! by Senator Hugh Scott. Millions of young Americans anticipate public service who, a generation or even a decade ago, might never have entertained such thoughts. Hugh Scott ran for and won election to the U.S. House of Representatives seven times before running for and winning election and reelection to the Senate. His book tells how to do it. Cloth $5.95. Paper $2.95.

COMPARATIVE POLITICS

notes and readings

Third Edition by ROY C. MACRIDIS, Brandeis University, and BERNARD E. BROWN, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York. This book introduces comparative political analysis, not the study of individual foreign countries; considers how systems function, how they differ. 676 pages / $6.95 text

EXPLANATION IN SOCIAL SCIENCE

a system paradigm

by EUGENE J. MEEHAN, University of Illinois. A new definition of "explanation" for the social scientist which is compatible with scientific practice, avoids conceptual difficulties of the familiar deductive paradigm, and is less constrictive.

139 pages, paperback / $1.95 text

INTERNATIONAL LAW

a text

Revised Edition by H. B. JACOBINI, Southern Illinois University. This text presents a comprehensive, brief, and readable account of the law of nations while emphasizing a political interpretation of law. Includes the law of peace, the law of war, and remnants of the law of neutrality.

471 pages / $8.50 text

PUBLIC OPINION AND PUBLIC POLICY

models of political linkage

by NORMAN R. LUTTBEG, Florida State University. The subject is "political linkage," the mechanism which allows political leaders to act in accordance with the wishes, desires, and demands of their public. Explores the balance between leadership discretion and citizenship participation in modern democracies.

480 pages, paperbound / $4.95 text

POLITICAL THEORY

a conceptual analysis

by JOSEPH S. MURPHY, Director, Peace Corps, Ethiopia. Not a chronological record of political thinkers, events, or institutions, this book is written from the stance of analytic philosophy and construes political theory as an activity whose purpose is the clarification of political concepts.

280 pages / $5.50 text

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE LEGAL SYSTEM

by JAY A. SIGLER, Rutgers, The State University. Covering every major aspect of the legal system, this book tries to relate it to the social system in the American context. A simple systems analysis is employed to show the flow of decision-making within the system.

256 pages / $5.50 text

POWER AND DISCONTENT by WILLIAM A. GAMSON, University of Michigan. In studying the phenomenon of "power," social scientists have split into two camps, which, this book suggests, are actually dual perspectives on the same relationship and process. After examining the relationship between authorities and potential partisans, the book tries to link them through the concept of political trust.

220 pages / $5.00 cloth and $3.25 paperbound text write for your 90-day examination copies

THE DORSEY

PRESS—homewood, illinois 60430

UNITED NATIONS / NATIONS UNIES / VEREINTE NATIONEN

Klaus Hüfner / Jens Naumann

Zwanzig Jahre Vereinte Nationen

Internationale Bibliographie 1945—1965

With an Introduction in English, French, and German

LV, 519 pp. 1968. Hardcover, $19.50 (Beiträge zur auswärtigen und internationalen Politik, Band 2) edited by

RICHARD LÖWENTHAL and GILBERT ZIEBURA
Otto-Suhr-Institut of the Freie Universität Berlin

This is the first attempt of a systematic presentation of books and articles on the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies. Among others, twenty political science journals from western and eastern countries were surveyed.

This bibliography includes five and a half thousand titles published in English, German and French.

It is divided into 61 sections which follow the outline of the Charta of the United Nations.

Messrs. Hüfner and Naumann have for years been associated with the Deutsche Gesellschaft für die Vereinten Nationen, Bonn. Presently they are research associates with the Institut für Bildungsforschung in der Max-Planck-Gesellschaft, Berlin.

Prospectus sent on request

Walter de Gruyter & Co. · Berlin 30

Coming Spring, 1969 for American Government courses —

American Public Policy: Documents and Essays

480 pages 6x9" $4.95 by Thomas R. Dye, University of Georgia

Provides students an opportunity to deal first-hand with resource materials on public policy—legislative acts, court decisions, statements and reports from the executive branch of government, and clear statements of alternative policy positions by national figures. Includes the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, the Report of the President's Commission on Civil Disorder, Engle vs. Vitale, the Geneva Agreements of 1954, the Report of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, the Testimony of Secretary of State, Dean Rusk, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and other primary source materials for public policy. Also provides clear and forceful statements of alternative policies—for example, the Black Power alternative from Stokeley Carmichael, the negative income tax proposal, a plan for federal-state revenue-sharing by Walter Heller, and the "Arrogance of Power" critique of U.S. foreign policy by Senator J. William Fulbright.

Each chapter begins with an introductory essay by the author which describes the development of American public policy and places each document and essay within the context of policy development. Areas covered include segregation in public schools; the Negro in American society; protest and public order; health, welfare, and poverty; housing and urban renewal; taxing and spending; business and labor; military affairs; and foreign policy.

Write Boyd Lane for review copies.

Charles E. Merrill Publishing Company

A Bell & Howell Company

1300 Alum Creek Drive

Columbus, Ohio 43216

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

original essays • relevant readings a fresh approach • controversial issues You'll find them all in an important new textbook on

AMERICAN POLITICAL THOUGHT

By KENNETH M. DOLBEARE, University of Wisconsin.

Part I of this book presents the origins and development of the liberal tradition. Part II, Power and Process in the American Political System: The Empiricists' Views, offers important selections by Andrew Hacker, Herbert McCloskey, V. O. Key, Jr., Robert Lane, Angus Campbell, Robert A. Dahl and others. Part III, Contemporary Prescriptions for America, features selections from controversial political thinkers such as Russell Kirk, Milton Friedman, Michael Harrington, Herbert Marcuse, Tom Hayden, Stokely Carmichael and Bayard Rustin. Due May 1969 Approx. 700 pages Prob. $9.95

Now-with a new Afterword on JFK

PRESIDENTIAL POWER

By RICHARD E. NEUSTADT, Harvard University.

The book that Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., in The New Leader, has called "the most brilliant and searching essay on the Presidency that we have had for a long time" has now been expanded to include an Afterword by the author on John F. Kennedy and his administration. This new material provides an additional dimension to Professor Neustadt's analysis. It will assure the continuation of Presidential Power's reputation as the definitive work on its subject for many years to come. 1968 In press. Paper: $2.95 Cloth: $4.95

Other important Wiley books to use are

INTERNATIONAL LAW: Current and Classic, by RICHARD N. SWIFT, New York University, about which Richard A. Falk writes, "It is an excellent piece of work, very carefully done, with precision and control." 1968 Approx. 598 pages $10.95

INTRODUCTION TO POLITICS: Essays and Readings, by NELSON P. GUILD, Frostburg State College; and KENNETH T. PALMER, Franklin and Marshall College. 1963 341 pages Paper: $4.95 Cloth: $7.95

CITY POLITICS AND PUBLIC POLICY, edited by JAMES Q. WILSON, Harvard University. 1968 300 pages $7.95

JOHN WILEY & SONS, Inc.

605 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10016

In Canada: John Wiley & Sons Canada Ltd.

POLITICAL GERMINATION

Korea

Democracy on Trial

By JOHN KIE-CHIANG CH. In this enlightening study of the politics and government of South Korea, the author evaluates the effect of democracy on the divided peninsula since 1945. He considers the administrations of Syngman Rhee and Chang Myŏn after the Korean War, analyzes the profound readjustments occasioned by the military coup d'état in 1961, assesses the present Third Republic under President Chung Hee Park, and appraises the possible future of Korean politics.

264 pages. $7.95

ELECTORAL EVOLUTION

The British Voter

An Atlas and Survey since 1885

By MICHAEL KINNEAR. Beginning with the first election in which the majority of adult males could vote, the tides of party fortunes and the voting behavior of various segments of the British population are analyzed in visual form in this fresh, comprehensive volume. Professor Kinnear pays special attention to the 1920's when, with the decline of the Liberal Party and the rise of Labor, British politics assumed its present form.

160 pages, 55 maps, 9x12. $12.50

REPUBLICANISM - COMMUNIST STYLE

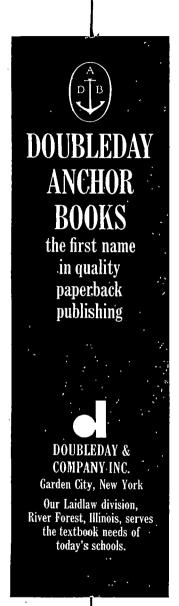

The New Jacobins

The French Communist Party and the Popular Front

By DANIEL R. BROWER. Putting recent events in France into better perspective, Mr. Brower takes a close look at the only other period in French history when the non-Communist left united with the Communist party. He studies the French Communist party during the 1930's, focusing on the party's role in the Popular Front and in the Communist International. Also discussed are the wave of sit-down strikes, Communist policy toward the Spanish Civil War, and Communist tactics in connection with the Popular Front cabinets.

296 pages, 13 photographs. $7.95

Cornell University Press ITHACA, NEW YORK 14850

AFRICA AND THE VICTORIANS

The Climax of Imperialism

Ronald Robinson and John Gallagher with Alice Denny. Since its original publication in 1961, this book has set the standard of scholarship and style for subsequent histories of Europe's imperial impulse. Covering the period from 1840 to 1900, the authors consider the official mind of Whitehall and Downing Street, the golden hopes of business in Africa, the anti-slavery and missionary movements, and the Kiplingesque ethic of imperial responsibility. Octavo format, $3.95

EQUALITY BY STATUTE

The Revolution in Civil Rights

Morroe Berger. A distinguished sociologist surveys all the major laws that have been passed in the field of civil rights from the Civil War to the present, tracing the relationship between law and prevailing social attitudes in this most sensitive of areas. $1.45

THE DEVELOPMENT OF POLITICAL ATTITUDES IN CHILDREN

Robert D. Hess and Judith V. Torney. Based on a study of 17,000 elementary school children in four major U. S. regions, this is the first large-scale analysis of how and when political attitudes are inculcated, and how the influences of family, peer groups, teacher attitudes, and religious membership affect the growth of such attitudes. $1.95

NATIONS BY DESIGN

Institution Building in Africa

Edited by Arnold Rivkin. Scholars from many nations and diverse disciplines discuss how to create and balance the mechanics of a modern government, economy, and a changing society in order to transform vestigial tribal cultures into societies that will survive them. Speaking from personal as well as academic experience, they analyze the roles of the army, the political hero, the economic planner, the traditional chief, and other institutions (old and new) in the evolution of African nations. An Anchor Original. $1.75

THE SOUTHEAST ASIAN WORLD

An Introductory Essay

Keith Buchanan. Topography, climate, soil, agriculture, migration, economics, and disease—all the factors that contribute to a cycle of poverty for Southeast Asians are analyzed by a prominent geographer, who spells out the political implications of these facts and analyzes how they affect the international relations of the region with the developed nations. $1.25

Little, Brown and Company College Division

JUST PUBLISHED!

Bureaucracy, Politics, and Public Policy

for your courses in Public Administration

Francis E. Rourke, Johns Hopkins University

This textbook presents a systematic analysis of the role of bureaucracy in making policy decisions. It traces the influence of executive agencies in the political system to two factors: (1) the ability of administrators to build strong public support for their policy goals and (2) the expertise of administrators which enables them to shape the policies of the public officials whom they serve.

paper

5% x 81/4

192 pages

$2,75

JUST PUBLISHED!

for your courses in Public Law and Civil Rights and Civil Liberties

Discrimination and Civil Rights

Cases, Text, and Materials

Norman Dorsen, Editor

"Publication of this book is an event to be welcomed by political scientists, particularly those who teach in the public law area. . . . The complex and emotion-laden problems of racial discrimination . . . are the central domestic ones faced by the United States in this last third of the twentieth century. Discrimination and Civil Rights is an ideal vehicle for examining them through the scholarly processes of the classroom."

from the Foreword

College Edition of Political and Civil Rights in the United States (Volume II) by Thomas I. Emerson, David Haber, and Norman Dorsen

paper

6 x

512 pages

$4.95 (tent.)

Little, Brown and Company College Division

NOW AVAILABLE!

for your courses in Comparative Government

Political Socialization

Richard E. Dawson, Washington University Kenneth Prewitt, University of Chicago

This comprehensive introduction to political socialization and its role in political life summarizes and integrates current research concerning the development of citizen values. The book focuses on the age and sequence in which political values and attitudes are acquired; the processes through which political learning takes place; and the agencies that perform political socialization.

paper

'5 x 8

240 pages

$2.95

for a complete course in Comparative Politics

Comparative Politics

A Developmental Approach

Gabriel A. Almond and G. Bingham Powell, Jr.

Politics in England Richard Rose

Politics in France Henry W. Ehrmann

Politics in Germany Lewis J. Edinger

Politics in the USSR Frederick C. Barghoorn other Country Studies and Analytic Studies are available

By James A. Stegenga An examination of UNFIGYP that assesses its efficiency as a military operation designed to mitigate civil conflict in an area in which communal violence has posed a threat to the peace of the world.

$6.25

The Politics of Intervention The Military Occupation of Cuba, 1906-1909

By Allan Reed Millett An account of President Theodore Roosevelt's takeover of the Cuban government that does much to reveal the larger dimensions of a question that continues to exercise our government today: Can temporary stability brought about by force that is not coupled with an intensive effort to bring about reform ever result in lasting peace? $6.50

Elite Images and Foreign Policy Outcomes A Study of Norway

By Philip M. Burgess A conclusive demonstration that an understanding of the "strategic image" held by any nation's governing elite, by which it selectively defines and evaluates the country's international position as a determinant of its foreign policy, constitutes a remarkably reliable basis for making valid predictions concerning future developments on the international scene. $6.25

Two Studies in Constitutional Interpretation

By Telford Taylor Essays on "Search, Seizure, and Surveillance" and "Free Trial and Free Press: First Fruits of the Warren Report" by the former chief prosecutor at the Nuremberg war crimes trials.

$7.00

The Changing Law of Nations

By Josef L. Kunz A distinguished member of the "Vienna School of International Law" examines the changes in the Law of Nations that have been produced by transformations in world conditions since 1914.

$15.00

Ohio State University Press

2070 Neil Avenue

Columbus 43210

THE STRATEGY OF WORLD ORDER

A Set of Materials edited by

RICHARD FALK, Princeton University, and SAUL MENDLOVITZ, Rufgers Law School

Vol. I: Toward a Theory of War Prevention Vol. III: The United Nations

Foreword by Harold D. Lasswell Foreword by Oscar Schachter

Vol. II: International Law
Foreword by Wolfgang Friedmann

Vol. IV: Disarmament and Economic Development

Foreword by J. David Singer

"Professors Falk and Mendlovitz have planned and executed a program designed to shape an academic discipline oriented toward the principal policy question of the epoch. It is entirely appropriate that such a program should spread among professional and graduate schools, and ultimately permeate college and pre-college years.

The tone is sternly professional. It is responsible, scholarly, scientific, predictive, inventive, and critical."

From the Foreword to Volume I by Harold D. Lasswell

Projected for 1968 publication: Volumes V and VI supported by The Carnegie Corporation.

Vol. V: Regionalism and World Order

Vol. VI: The Role of the Individual and World Order

Four volume set, paperbound $10.00; Hardcover $14.00; Volumes I and II, $2.50 each; Volumes III and IV $3.50 each. 2,296 pp.

WORLD LAW FUND 11 West 42nd Street, New York, N.Y. 10036

West Africa under Colonial Rule

by Michael Crowder

This book, essentially a comparative study of the impact of French and British colonial rule on West Africa, traces the origins of European interest in the area, examines the period of conquest and occupation, and delineates the social changes brought about during the seventy-five year period of colonial rule. This study will be the standard work on the rise and fall of colonialism in all the vast areas of the West African coast.

530 pages
$10.00

Russian Peasants and Soviet Power

by Moshe Lewin

The years 1928 and 1929 form a particularly significant period in Soviet history, one marked by tremendous forward thrust in industrialization, as well as by the mass collectivization of the peasantry. This study analyzes the problems of the period from the view of both the politician and the peasant.

556 pages $12.50

The Role of the Lawyer in the European Communities by André Donner

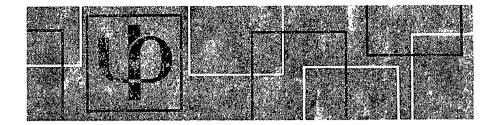

The author examines the problems posed for the lawyer by the creation of the European Communities—the European Coal and Steel Community, the European Economic Community, and Euratom—and describes the role that the legal profession, especially in its judicial function, continues to play in their solution.

100 pages $3.50

Northwestern University Press

1735 Benson Avenue

Evanston, Illinois 60201

CANADIAN PARTY PLATFORMS, 1867-1963

compiled by D. Owen Carrigan

This unique reference source will prove indispensable to the political researcher and student of Canadian history. The first comprehensive collection of Canadian election platforms to be published, it presents the issues and ideas critical to each campaign in the last century of Canadian politics. Prefacing the platforms for each campaign is a concise survey of significant developments preceding the election, plus a rundown of the political situation in Canada at that time.

363 pages. $11.95.

FROM GEOGRAPHY TO GEOTECHNICS

by Benton MacKaye
edited by Paul T. Bryant

Placed by Lewis Mumford in the same tradition with the works of Henry David Thoreau and George Perkins Marsh, the writings of Benton MacKaye—forester, conservationist, planner—need no introduction to those concerned about the effects of our urbanized and deteriorating environment on the quality of our lives. Mr. Bryant here assembles 13 landmark essays which crystallize the essence of MacKaye's thought and work. 192 pages. $5.95.

OUTLAWING THE SPOILS

A History of the Civil Service Reform Movement, 1865-1883

by Ari Hoogenboom

"We are indebted to Professor Hoogenboom for extending our understanding of the civil service reform movement and its relation to the political, social, and intellectual events of the time."—The American Political Science Review. "... an exhaustive and fascinating study... the definitive work on the long-term effort which ended in the adoption of the Pendleton Act of 1883."—Wisconsin Magazine of History. 306 pages. Paper only, $2.95.

International Relations: The World Community in Transition

Third Edition

Norman D. Palmer and Howard C. Perkins

A thorough revision of a basic undergraduate text, the third edition of International Relations takes into account latest developments in world affairs, and new approaches and methodology in the study of international relations. The organization follows that of the earlier edition, providing a comprehensive and balanced treatment of the major themes in international relations. The first half of the text examines the principles of international relations, and the second half focuses on contemporary (post-World War II) world politics, thus making it suitable for either a one-term or two-term course in international relations.

The third edition is profusely illustrated with new maps, charts, and cartoons, and the bibliographies and Appendix are unusually elaborate for a basic text.

About 720 pages

A January 1969 Publication

South Asia and United States Policy

Norman D. Palmer, University of Pennsylvania

332 pages

1966

paper $4.75

A Survey of United States-Latin American Relations

J. Lloyd Mecham, The University of Texas

487 pages

1965

$7.95

Communist China in World Politics

Harold C. Hinton, The George Washington University and

The Institute for Defense Analyses

527 pages 1966 $7.75

Houghton Mifflin Company

Boston / Atlanta / Dallas Geneva, III. / New York / Palo Alto

Political Order in Changing Societies

by Samuel P. Huntington

The major causes of violence and instability in the emerging countries of Asia, Africa, and Latin America, argues Mr. Huntington in this major contribution to modern political analysis, are to be found in the lag in the development of political institutions behind social and economic change. Focusing on ways of creating new, effective bases for political association, he offers valuable insights on age-old problems of political change in both Western and non-Western societies. $12.50

China in Revolution: The First Phase, 1900-1913

edited and with an Introduction by Mary Clabaugh Wright

"Great themes run through this book: local differentiation and societal integration, reform and revolution, innovation and renewal, conservatism and radicalism, tradition and modernity. All relate to the fascinating dialectic of Chinese history."—G. William Skinner. $15.00

The Hero and the Crowd in a Colonial Polity

by A. W. Singham

The unusual relationships that develop in a colony from the rivalry among the traditional, the charismatic, and the legal domination systems are examined in this study of a political leader—the "hero"—who emerges during the stage of terminal colonial rule. $10.00

Big Business in Japanese Politics

by Chitoshi Yanaga

Focusing on the crucial decade 1951-1960, the author makes the first systematic effort to show how the power of organized big business, unmatched by that of any other interest group in Japan, operates directly and indirectly in the political process. He clearly shows that the Japanese governing process is a joint effort of big business, party government, and administrative bureaucracy. $8.75

Yale University Press New Haven and London

RONALD

A HISTORY OF WESTERN POLITICAL THEORY

GERALD RUNKLE, Southern Illinois University, Edwardsville

A basic textbook for courses in political theory and political philosophy. Presents an objective, chronological account of the important political theories from the time of Plato to the present. Each theory is clearly expounded and analyzed, and quotations from original sources are documented and are from editions easily available to students. In order that the student may appreciate the significance of each theory, the author presents the context in which it was developed: political, economic, and social events; the intellectual quality of the period; and the philosophical basis of the theory itself. To encourage the student to make a meaningful evaluation of each theory, the author presents his own critical comment. Both contextual and critical sections are set off from the expository sections. 1968. 668 pp. $9.00

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

JOHN M. PFIFFNER, University of Southern California; and ROBERT PRESTHUS, York University, Toronto

The Fifth Edition of this famous text examines administration at all levels of government. It integrates descriptive-institutional materials of administrative science with behavioral analyses of administration in action. It analyzes such aspects as the historical and institutional framework, separation of powers, role of executives (particularly that of the modern specialist), and the problem of obtaining superior talent. Covers decision-making and the data-processing revolution, and incorporates recent research into group behavior, individual motivation, and leadership dynamics. 5th Ed., 1967. 567.pp. $8.00

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION

RUSSELL M. ROSS, University of Iowa; and KENNETH F. MILLSAP, Assistant City Manager, Iowa City, Iowa

This text provides a thorough treatment of the governmental activities of the 50 states and their local governmental units. Although predominant emphasis is on administrative aspects of state and local government, the book also presents material on the structure of governmental units below the national level. The role of countries, the position of the municipalities and special districts, and the peculiar problems of metropolitan areas are examined in detail. The importance of intergovernmental coordination is stressed, as is the growing relationship between the national and local governments. 1966. 705 pp., illus.

$8.50

ESTABLISHED 1900

-The Ronald Press Company_

79 Madison Avenue · New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

At the FACULTY OF SOCIAL SCIENCES

the chair of politicology is vacant.

The appointed ordinary will be entrusted with the giving of lectures to students of Politicology and Sociology.

Those who want to draw attention to possible candidates or those, who would like to come forward as such, are requested to address themselves, preferably with extensive elucidatory remarks, to

Head of the Faculty of Social Sciences, Bijleveldsingel 70, Nijmegen.

THE AUSTRALIAN NATIONAL UNIVERSITY

RESEARCH SCHOLARSHIPS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Applications are invited for scholarships in Political Science.

Applicants should be postgraduate students with capacity for research. Scholars will normally enroll for a Ph.D. degree, the course for which extends over three years. A scholarship is awarded initially for two years, subject to satisfactory progress, but normally will be extended for the whole period of the course.

The basic scholarship allowance is $A2,330 per annum. Married scholars with dependent children receive additional allowances. Fares to and from Canberra are paid.

Application forms and further particulars are available from the University. Applications should reach the University by 31 January, 30 April or 30 September in any year, although special consideration may be given to applications at other times. Scholarships may be taken up at any time after award, subject to agreement of the Head of the Department concerned.

C. G. Plowman

Academic Registrar

Box 4, P.O., CANBERRA. A.C.T. 2600. AUSTRALIA

October 1968

NEW and FORTHCOMING

MACROPOLITICS: Essays on the Philosophy and Science of Politics

by Morton Kaplan, University of Chicago.

A selection of essays by a pioneer in the application of systems theory to political analysis, Macropolitics develops the author's concern with the philosophical foundations of political science, and with the extension of philosophical principles into the realm of empirical analysis. 304 pp. $7.95.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF POLITICAL ATTITUDES IN CHILDREN

by Robert D. Hess, Stanford University, and Judith V. Torney, Illinois Institute of Technology.

"The book . . . will be a central study in this literature for the next decade, at least."—Harvard Educational Review.

Based on a study of 12,000 elementary school children, this book presents the most complete and accurate information ever gathered on the political attitudes acquired before high school and the process by which this political socialization occurs. 288 pp. $9.75.

THE POLITICS OF SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

by Robert Crain, University of Chicago.

This book is the first genuinely scientific analysis of the political process by which school systems have been and can be desegregated. Fifteen case studies of northern and southern schools are documented and analyzed with the local school board emerging as the primary factor behind the decisions regarding desegregation. 390 pp. $7.95.

THE LOGIC OF SOCIAL INQUIRY

by Scott Greer, Northwestern University.

A cogent examination of the rationale for social science from the perspective of the working social scientist, this book attempts to establish the fullest meaning of social science by exploring the roots of meaning in the basic philosophical processes of knowing, reasoning, and judging. 224 pp. $5.95. January.

THE CONCEPT OF COMMUNITY: Readings with Interpretations edited by David Minar, University of Washington, and Scott Greer, Northwestern University.

This collection of carefully selected readings explores the meaning and dimensions of the idea of community, with emphasis on community as an aspect of social organization and political life. Pages and price to be announced. April.

Forthcoming

LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

By THOMAS A. FLINN, Department of Political Science, Ohio State University

Based on the premise that policy-making by local government is determined by certain recurring actions and relations, this text introduces local government as systems.

The conceptual framework employed makes possible further exploration into other branches of political science, while concrete examples provide increased control of the material and suggest new directions for study.

A final section discusses the problems of local government in light of various contemporary proposals for reform and the increasing presence of the federal government.

The text is designed to be used in conjunction with other books in the American Government Series, as a supplement to a basic textbook, or as a core volume in advanced courses on local politics.

Ready spring, 1969, approx. 192 pages, softbound: $2.95, hardbound: $4.25.

THE SUPREME COURT AND PUBLIC POLICY

Edited by Martin M. Shapiro, University of California, Irvine

This group of readings presents the Supreme Court as a political institution, describing the range of influences which affect its decision-making processes.

It is the author's intent that "the mixture of reading material will suggest to the student that the justices are neither oracles of a true and eternally fixed law nor predetermined creatures of their psychological and social environment, but political men seeking to reach wise political decisions."

Concerned with today's issues and the specific problems and controversies of the present court, the text makes vital supplementary reading for the introductory American Government course.

Ready spring, 1969, 176 pages, $2.95

SCOTT, FORESMAN AND COMPANY College Division

Glenview, Illinois Atlanta Dallas Palo Alto Oakland, N.J.

ATHERTON PRESS

70 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10011

A NOTE FROM THE PUBLISHER ABOUT AN IMPORTANT NEW SERIES

THE ATHERTON CONTROVERSIES

We are proud to announce a new series of inexpensive textbooks, The Atherton Controversies, enabling college teachers to use a teaching technique reserved until now for those with few students and much leisure. Each volume in this series is devoted to a key controversial subject in political science and other fields, and is edited by a scholar intimately acquainted with the topic. The Editor's Introduction establishes the basis of argument and prepares the student for the conflicting viewpoints presented. Six or more authoritative articles follow, each stating a different view of the subject. By their juxtaposition these articles demonstrate to the student how an important issue is joined, how resolution is attempted, where the issue stands today, and how current thinking may affect future developments. We expect that The Atherton Controversies will provide a broad and stimulating basis for classroom discussion and student papers and a refreshing challenge to students as well as teachers. Your comments on the series are always welcome, and we will be glad to provide sixty-day examination copies on publication.

Charles D. Lieber

Available Winter 1968-69:

THE BIAS OF PLURALISM

WILLIAM E. CONNOLLY University of Massachusetts

BEHAVIORALISM IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

HEINZ EULAU Stanford University

REPRESENTATION

HANNA FENICHEL PITKIN University of California, Berkeley

Each volume $6.95; $2.95 paper (for classroom adoption only). Many other titles in preparation. Write publisher for complete list.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

An Introduction to Political Science

JOHN C. WAHLKE, The University of Iowa and ALEX N. DRAGNICH, Vanderbilt University, editors

Random House; 618 pages; $8.50

A widely acclaimed book for introductory courses in political science. "The most thorough introductory text I have yet seen. I particularly appreciate the inclusion of the section on transitional politics."—Ray A. Geigle, University of Washington "Excellent—successfully combines the country-by-country approach with the newer analytic approach to comparative politics."—Ole Holsti, Stanford University

THE FIFTY STATES AND THEIR LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

JAMES W. FESLER, Editor, Yale University, KARL A. BOSWORTH, University of Connecticut, DAYTON D. McKEAN, University of Colorado, HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Columbia University, ROBERT L. MORLAN, University of Redlands, ALLAN R. RICHARDS, Louisiana State University, VICTOR G. ROSENBLUM, Reed College, YORK WILLBERN, Indiana University

Knopf, 1967; 616 pages; $8.50

An analysis of the fifty American states and their local governments in the context of modern federalism.

"A refreshing approach to a subject many authors have stereotyped."—William J. Dunham, Seton Hall University

THE STATE LEGISLATURE Politics and Practice

Second Edition, Revised

MALCOLM E. JEWELL, University of Kentucky

Random House, March 1969; PS-37; about 160 pages; about $2.25 paperbound A thorough revision and updating of a wide-ranging survey of state legislatures and their role in American politics. New material includes chapters on reapportionment, legislators' roles, and legislative output.

CANDIDATES FOR OFFICE Beliefs and Strategies

JOHN W. KINGDON, University of Michigan

Random House, 1968; PS-59; 192 pages; $1.95 paperbound

This study probes candidates' beliefs about their constituencies and their channels of information, and the effects of these on the campaign strategies they choose.

THE RESPONSIBLE ELECTORATE

Rationality in Presidential Voting 1936-1960

V. O. KEY, JR., with the assistance of MILTON C. CUMMINGS, JR.

Vintage, 1968; V-468; 184 pages; $1.65 paperbound

A classic study which concludes that there is a responsible electorate in America.

THE GREAT SOCIETY READER

The Failure of American Liberalism

Edited by MARVIN E. GETTLEMAN and DAVID MERMELSTEIN

Vintage, 1967; V-406; 480 pages; $2.45 paperbound

Focuses on the assumptions, values, and aims of the Great Society.

For your professional library . .

FREUD

Political and Social Thought PAUL ROAZEN

Knopf, 1967; $6.95

International Relations texts of proven excellence . . .

WORLD POLITICS

Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged

A. F. K. ORGANSKI, The University of Michigan

Knopf, 1968; 544 pages; $8.50

The revision of this successful international relations text preserves the approach, structure, and lively, readable style that made the first edition so exciting. Professor Organski has reworked virtually every chapter and has added two completely new chapters on the process of national growth and the balance of terror.

POLITICS AMONG NATIONS

The Struggle for Power and Peace

Fourth Edition

HANS J. MORGENTHAU, University of Chicago

Knopf, 1967; 672 pages; $8.95

Professor Morgenthau's text remains what has been justly called "a landmark in American literature dealing with international politics." In this fourth edition particular attention is given to the United Nations, and to the issues of imperialism, prestige, nuclear war, alliances, and arms control.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS IN THE BIPOLAR WORLD

PETER J. FLIESS, University of Massachusetts
Random House, 1968; PS-55; 221 pages; $2,45 paperbound

THE BALANCE OF POWER IN THE INTERWAR YEARS, 1919-1939

WILLIAM J. NEWMAN, Boston University Random House, 1968; PS-60; 256 pages; $2.65 paperbound

WESTERN INTERESTS IN THE PACIFIC REALM

THOMAS R. ADAM, New York University Random House, 1967; 256 pages; $2.95 paperbound

In preparation—an important new work on modern nationalism

NATIONALISM AND ITS ALTERNATIVES

KARL W. DEUTSCH, Harvard University Knopf, Spring 1969; about 300 pages; about $5.95

RANDOM HOUSE, INC. ALFRED A. KNOPF, INC.

The College Department, 501 Madison Avenue, New York 10022

Military Organization and Society

Stanislaw Andreski

"Dr. Andreski has made an important contribution to sociology and a fortiori to social anthropology. . . . He has evidently done a vast amount of scholarly hard work, the thinking is original and sophisticated, and the exposition concise and lucid. As Professor Radcliffe-Brown says, this is a remarkable book."—Man

New, enlarged edition LC: 68-27161 260 pages cloth, $6.00; paper, $2.45

Black Scare

The Racist Response to Emancipation and Reconstruction

Forrest G. Wood

Other studies of race relations during the Civil War and Reconstruction have usually focused on the Negro and his painful adjustment to freedom, or on the radicals' use of him for political gain. Black Scare looks at the opposition; it is about white men, not Negroes, revealing what is best described as the first "white backlash" in American history.

LC: 68-26066 275 pages illustrations $5.95

Punjabi Century, 1857-1947

Prakash Tandon

With a Foreword by Maurice Zinkin

"There is no comparable evocation of India as it used to be, except Kipling's Kim. Kim is one of the world's great stories, but Mr. Tandon writes from the inside."

-Maurice Zinkin

"Delightful... a book alive with information and glowing images.... On the simple foundation of birth, marriage, and death, Mr. Tandon builds a clear picture of the caste system and the pattern of Hindu family behaviour."—Times Literary Supplement LC: 68-25959 272 pages cloth, $8.00; paper, $2.75

The Autobiography of an Unknown Indian

Nirad C. Chaudhuri

Because Mr. Chaudhuri has lived through great events and has observed them keenly, his book conveys a clear sense of what it means to grow up in an environment of social change. His unfailing sensitivity and the breadth of his interests enable the reader to appreciate many facets of Indian life and society that would otherwise remain unnoticed by even a careful foreign observer. His book, which has the makings of a latter-day classic, is an outstanding cultural history offering a unique view of life in Bengal and elsewhere in India during the first decades of this century.

LC: 68-25418 506 pages cloth, $8.00; paper, $2.95

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The Limits of the Criminal Sanction

Herbert L. Packer. Crime in the streets, marijuana in the schools, civil disobedience—these are aspects of what seems a breakdown of social control. The criminal sanction, the imposition of punishment for the violation of criminal statutes, constitutes our primary control over behavior defined as antisocial. But how do we decide whether certain kinds of conduct, such as prostitution and narcotics offenses, ought to be subjected to it? Should we attempt to limit is use? $8.95

Cubans in Exile

DISAFFECTION AND THE REVOLUTION

Richard R. Fagen, Richard A. Brody, and Thomas J. O'Leary. This work seeks to discover who the exiles are and why they left Cuba, and to analyze the general phenomenon of self-imposed exile. The authors show that disaffection from the Castro regime is essentially an ideological response: exile is shown to be mainly an individual response to personal experiences.

December. About $5.95

The American Occupation of Germany

POLITICS AND THE MILITARY, 1945-1949

John Gimbel. This study of American military government in Germany sharply contradicts the prevailing interpretation that American occupation policy and practice was unclear, vacillating, and contradictory. New material is presented on the origins of the Marshall Plan, the Bonn Government, and the Berlin Blockade. $8.75

The Japanese Communist Party 1922-1945

George M. Beckmann and Okubo Genji. The first detailed account of the founding and development of the Japanese Communist Party. Using Japanese materials that have only recently become accessible, the authors concentrate on the key period 1922-32, when the Party was at the peak of its influence. December. About $12.50

The Chinese Communist Movement

A Report of the U. S. War Department, July 1945

Edited by Lyman P. Van Slyke. This report, based on over 2,500 documents, is both a remarkably objective summary of the Communist movement during the Sino-Japanese War, and an invaluable source of specific military, political, and economic information about Communist-held areas in China during the period 1937-45.

Paper, $2.95; cloth, $7.50

Order from your bookstore, please

STANFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

ANNOUNCING THE MARKHAM POLITICAL SCIENCE SERIES

Aaron Wildaysky, Editor

A PRIMER OF POLITICAL ANALYSIS by Donald Strickland, Larry Wade and Ray Johnston with a foreword by Harold D. Lasswell

This brief paperback text is designed to introduce beginning students to the most advanced concepts of political science. The primer is written in ordinary language and is organized according to assumptions, definitions, theorems and proofs with heavy emphasis on deductive logic. Problems introducing the student to uses of data and research techniques are included.

published July 1968, $1.95 Paper Bound.

POLITICAL SCIENCE AND PUBLIC POLICY edited by Austin Ranney for the Social Science Research Council

A volume of original essays which explore the contributions the discipline of political science can make to the understanding of public policy content. Contributing authors are Austin Ranney, Vernon Van Dyke, Lewis A. Froman, Jr., Aaron Wildavsky, James W. Davis, Jr., Kenneth M. Dolbeare, Vincent Ostrom, Robert H. Salisbury, Lincoln P. Bloomfield, James N. Rosenau, Lucian Pye, Ralph K. Huitt and David B. Truman.

published September 1968, $5.95 Hard Cover.

ECONOMIC THEORIES OF INTERNATIONAL POLITICS edited by Bruce M. Russett

A collection of readings drawn from the literature of economics with extensive editorial comment by Professor Russett. The book clearly demonstrates the unique contribution economic analysis can make to the study of international politics. A valuable work for supplementary reading in courses on Contemporary Political Theory, Methodology, or a general course on International Politics.

published October 1968, $7.95 Hard Cover.

EMPIRICAL DEMOCRATIC THEORY edited by Charles F. Cnudde and Deane E. Neubauer

This volume brings together articles which demonstrate newly emerging theories of democratic politics based on the findings of empirical research. The editors' original contributions break significant new ground and help to define rigorously the nature of empirical democratic theory. Major topics include: Defining Democracy; Structures of Democratic Government; Prerequisites of Democracy; Leaders and Citizens; Policy Outcomes; Methodology and Future Research.

publication January 1969, $7.50 Hard Cover.

SIMULATION IN THE STUDY OF POLITICS edited by William D. Coplin

In this book Harold Guetzkow, John P. Crecine, Hayward R. Alker, Jr., Rufus P. Browning and others demonstrate how simulation can contribute to research on international relations, urban affairs, elections, political recruitment, organizational behavior and political development. Papers and comments by non-simulationists provide useful interpretation and evaluation for the researcher or student who may wish an overview of simulation as a tool for political analysis.

published November 1968, $10,95 Hard Cover.

PLANNING – PROGRAMMING – BUDGETING: A SYSTEMS APPROACH TO MANAGEMENT edited by Fremont J. Lyden and Ernest G. Miller

A collection of readings exploring the usefulness of Planning-Programming-Budgeting Systems in governmental decision making. The volume includes explanations of the essential nature of PPB and descriptions of applications of these systems at various levels of government. The editors' intention is "to provide a starting basis for an educated understanding of PPB and its implications in managerial as well as policy contexts."

published March 1968, $4.50 Paper Bound; $7.50 Hard Cover.

MARKHAM Publishing Company 863 North Dearborn, Chicago, Illinois 60610 from Bobbs-Merrill

a brilliant new theory of political parties

The Goldwater Coalition

Republican Strategies in 1964

by JOHN H. KESSEL, Arthur E. Braun, Professor of Political Science, Allegheny College

"Professor Kessel ably recaptures the problems and strategies of the '64 presidential campaign, and so far as I can judge he does so with complete accuracy as to detail."

-DENISON KITCHEL

". . . a definite contribution to the field. At certain places it is highly original and breaks new conceptual ground and provides important new analysis."

-GERALD POMPER, Rutgers University

384 pp.

$7.50 cloth

$4.75 paper

forthcoming in March . . .

a new look at the job of government relations

How Organizations Are Represented in Washington

by

LEWIS A. DEXTER,

Winner of the Woodrow Wilson Prize, 1963

CONTENTS

- It Is Not Just Lobbying: Government Relations and Washington Representation
 What This Book Is About and Whom It Is For
- 2. Who Is In Government Relations and Why
- Means and Channels of Government Relations
- 4. When the Job Is Chiefly Lobbying
- Helping and Seeking Help on Capitol Hill The Planning of Government Relations and Congressional Patterns in Favor-Handling

ca. 298 pp.

- 6. The Washington Representative and Clarification of Clients' Problems: "Guidance?"
 7. Influence . . . Information . . . Intelligence
- 7. Influence . . . Information . . . Intelligence What Government Relations Can Not and What It Can Provide
- 8. Characteristic Tensions Between Clients and Free Professionals Situations Where Washington Representaives and Their Employers Irritate Each Other
- 9. The Basic Public Service of Government Relations Programs
 Interpretation . . . Peacefulness . . . Towards

 Wider System of Representative Politics

Paper $3.75 Cloth $6.75

COLLEGE DIVISION

THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY, INC. A SUBSIDIARY OF HOWARE W. SAMS & CO., INC. 4300 WEST 62nd STREET • INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA 46268

Any reseller is free to charge whatever price it wishes for our books.

STUDIES IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

A new paperback series from The Washington Center of Foreign Policy Research of The Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies

JAPAN AND THE UNITED STATES IN ASIA

By Robert E. Osgood, George R. Packard III, and John H. Badgley

Presents three complementary views of Japan's emerging role as an Asian power and the consequences for United States interests. $1.95

CASTRO, THE KREMLIN, AND COMMUNISM IN LATIN AMERICA

By D. Bruce Jackson

Delineates the issues and trends in the Soviet-Cuban contest for domination of revolutionary movements in Latin America, with special reference to Venezuela. $2.45

NATION OR EMPIRE?: THE DEBATE OVER AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

By Robert W. Tucker -

Analyzes the background, development, and significance of the national debate over Vietnam and offers brilliant insights into the nature of American power and purpose. $2.75

WAR AND ORDER: REFLECTIONS ON VIETNAM AND HISTORY

By George Liska

Enlarges the historical and theoretical framework of the Vietnam debate and develops a reasoned case for the interventionist position. $2.45

Other titles in the series:

By Herbert S. Dinerstein	$1.45
IMPERIAL AMERICA: THE INTERNATIONAL POLITICS OF PRIMACY By George Liska	$2.25
CRISIS OVER RHODESIA: A SKEPTICAL VIEW By Charles Burton Marshall	$1.45
THE CHANGING STATUS OF GERMAN REUNIFICATION IN WESTERN DIPLO MACY, 1955-1966 By Charles R. Planck	$1.45
ALLIANCES AND THE THIRD WORLD By George Liska	$1.75
FIFTY YEARS OF SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY By Herbert S. Dinerstein	$1.95
CYPRUS BETWEEN EAST AND WEST	$2.25

THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS, Baltimore, Md. 21218

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

THE UN AND THE MIDDLE EAST CRISIS, 1967

ARTHUR LALL

In this book, Arthur Lall documents the role played by the United Nations in the Arab-Israeli conflict of 1967, and presents important suggestions toward resolving the situation between Israel and her Arab neighbors. Mr. Lall's analysis of the reasons behind the moves and countermoves of the various UN delegations is based largely on his intimate personal knowledge of the inner workings of the UN, gained during his tenure as Indian Ambassador to the United Nations.

$10.00

THE POLITICS OF MENTAL HEALTH: ORGANIZING COMMUNITY MENTAL HEALTH IN METROPOLITAN AREAS

ROBERT H. CONNERY, CHARLES H. BACKSTROM, DAVID R. DEENER, JULIAN R. FRIEDMAN, MORTON KROLL, ROBERT H. MARDEN, CLIFTON McCleskey, Peter Meekison, John A. Morgan, Jr.

This study presents the political and administrative problems in the community mental health program set up by the Federal government in 1963 and 1964. The book contains a summary of the program; a section on the mental health facilities and administrative structure in Houston, Seattle, New Orleans, Syracuse, Boston, and Minneapolis-St. Paul; and an analysis of the problems of coordination raised by the fragmentation of government in metropolitan areas. $10.00

THE WEB OF MODERN GREEK POLITICS

JANE PERRY CLARK CAREY and ANDREW GALBRAITH CAREY

In an attempt to find the reasons why modern Greece has so often been plagued by political turmoil, this book tells the story of modern Greek politics, from its nineteenth century beginnings through the recent military coup. Based not only on extensive research and numerous visits to Greece, but on the authors' conversations with Greeks from many different walks of life, the work explores the factors in the Greek background which have contributed to this lack of stability.

$6.95

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

440 West 110th Street New York, N. Y. 10025

COLUMBIA

COLUMBIA

Comparative Judicial Behavior:

CROSS-CULTURAL STUDIES IN POLITICAL DECISION-MAKING IN THE EAST AND WEST

Edited by GLENDON SCHUBERT, York University, Toronto; and DAVID J. DANEL-SKI, Yale University. The first to focus cross-culturally upon judicial decision-making, utilizing theories and methods developed in the behavioral sciences, this book presents original empirical studies by authors who are political scientists or lawyers or both. The volume includes selections on judicial behavior in Japan, Australia, Canada, India, Korea, and the Philippines.

Spring 1969

350 pp.

$7.50

The Impact of the Supreme Court Decisions: EMPIRICAL STUDIES

Edited by THEODORE L. BECKER, University of Hawaii. This volume presents a unique and often lively collection of modern studies on the impact of Supreme Court decisions upon the President and Congress, the lower courts, state and local government and politics (school officials, police, state legislatures, etc.), and public opinion.

Spring 1969

approx. 250 pp.

paper $2.25

In Defense of Sovereignty

Edited by W. J. STANKIEWICZ, University of British Columbia. This volume brings together eleven papers by leading jurists, philosophers, and political theorists on the concept of sovereignty. The anthology is conceived as a discussion in which the participants speak either for or against the concept; the editor appraises the 'debate' in his critical introductory essay. While bringing the most authoritative arguments into view, he also suggests a possible role of sovereignty in the light of the classical tradition.

Spring 1969

approx. 375 pp.

paper $2.50

Political Socialization

By KENNETH P. LANGTON, University of Michigan. Focusing mainly on the influence of different social agencies in the political socialization process, this book is empirical and interdisciplinary in orientation and cross-cultural in scope. The author examines family structure and politics; the relative influence of mothers versus fathers in the formation of political orientations among pre-adults; the school: formal environment; the peer group and school: the informal milieu; the relative influence of different agencies. This book is the first volume in the series, Studies in Behavioral Political Science, edited by Robert Presthus, York University, Toronto.

Spring 1969

approx. 200 pp.

tables, figures -

paper $1.95

WOXFORD WUNIVERSITY PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION AND DEMOCRACY SERIES

General Editor: ROSCOE C. MARTIN, Syracuse University

Democracy in the Administrative State

By EMMETTE'S. REDFORD, University of Texas. This book examines the possibilities for democracy in a society where the decisions affecting men's interests are made or carried out through public administrative institutions. Professor Redford first sets forth the basic tenets of democratic morality; then, discussing participation in the American political-administrative system, he presents a model of multidirectional influences on administration and proposes three levels of politics operating on it: micropolitics, subsystem politics, and macropolitics.

February 1969

approx. 250 pp.

cloth $4.75

paper $2.25

Democracy and the Public Service

By FREDERICK C. MOSHER, University of Virginia. "An excellent and incisive analysis of the American public service with occasional comparative data. It is well written, analytical, and objective. He raises the pertinent issues and assesses our progress in alleviating them. An excellent survey."—George S. Blair, Clarement Graduate School

1968

232 pp.

cloth $4.75

paper $2.25

Democratic Representation:

REAPPORTIONMENT IN LAW AND POLITICS

By ROBERT G. DIXON, The National Law Center, The George Washington University. "An imposing, comprehensive, scholarly, and exhaustive treatment of this knotty topic."—ALAN CLEM, University of South Dakota

1968

672 pp.

text edition $8.00

trade edition $12.50

OXFORD READINGS IN PHILOSOPHY SERIES

Political Philosophy

Edited by ANTHONY QUINTON, Oxford University. "A judicious collection of articles and book excerpts, mostly written by British scholars since World War II, and dealing with selected contemporary aspects of political philosophy. The author has provided an excellent introduction to the 200-page volume of reacings."—Roger H. Wells, MacMurray College

1967

198 pp.

paper $1.95

The Notion of the State:

AN INTRODUCTION TO POLITICAL THEORY

By ALEXANDER PASSERIN D'ENTRÈVES, University of Turin. "The treatment of the State deserves careful reading and general recommendation for students and scholars alike."—K. Y. Paul Tsai, Seton Hall University

1967

243 pp

cloth $5.60

paper $2.95

WOXFORD W UNIVERSITY W PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The Judicial Process:

AN INTRODUCTORY ANALYSIS OF THE GOURTS OF THE UNITED STATES, ENGLAND, AND FRANCE SECOND EDITION

By HENRY J. ABRAHAM, University of Pennsylvania

1968

510 pp.

paper $2.95

Freedom and the Court:

CIVIL RIGHTS AND LIBERTIES IN THE UNITED STATES By HENRY J. ABRAHAM 1967 345 pp. cloth $7.50 paper $2.75

Punishment and Responsibility

ESSAYS IN THE PHILOSOPHY OF LAW

By H. L. A. HART, Oxford University 1968 283 pp. cloth $5.75 paper $2.50

Anglo-American Criminal Justice

By DELMAR KARLEN, New York University; with GEOFFREY SAWYER, The Australian National University, and EDWARD M. WISE, Wayne State University 1968 255 pp. cloth $6.00 paper $1.95

Basic Documents in International Law

Edited by IAN BROWNLIE, Oxford University

1967 251 pp. cloth $4.00 paper $2.50

The Democratic Civilization

By LESLIE LIPSON, University of California, Berkeley

1964 632 pp. cloth $10.00 A Galaxy Book, GB 268, paper $2.95

The Real World of Democracy

By C. B. MACPHERSON, University of Toronto

1966

70 pp.

$2.40

The Nature and Function of International Organization

SECOND EDITION

By STEPHEN S. GOODSPEED, University of California, Santa Barbara 1967 745 pp. illus. $7.50

Documents in the History of the European Continent, 1815-1939

Edited by G. A. KERTESZ, Monash University (Australia)

Spring 1969

300 pp.

cloth $9.95 paper $4.95

Essays on the Making of the Constitution

Edited by LEONARD W. LEVY, Brandeis University

Spring 1969

300 pp.

paper $1.75

W OXFORD W UNIVERSITY W PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Democrat and Diplomat THE LIFE OF WILLIAM E. DODD

By ROBERT DALLEK, University of California, Los Angeles. "A warm, careful, readable portrait of a fine historian and significant public figure."—Frank Freidel, Harvard University. "I read Mr. Dallek's book with increasing interest and fascination. As biography, it is a work of art. As history, it is first-rate... particularly about his career as Ambassador to Germany."—Arthur S. Link, Princeton University

$8.50

Boss Cox's Cincinnati URBAN POLITICS IN THE PROGRESSIVE ERA

By ZANE L. MILLER, University of Cincinnati. "Zane Miller's study of Cincinnati is the clearest account we have of a revolution that transformed the nineteenth-century city into the twentieth-century urban center."—ROBERT WIEBE, Northwestern University. "An enlightening study of a city in transition and of its encounter with modern urban problems."

—OSCAR HANDLIN, Harvard University. 8 maps. (Urban Life in America series.) $7.50

"The Best Men" LIBERAL REFORMERS IN THE GILDED AGE

By JOHN G. SPROAT, Lake Forest College. "Mr. Sproat's solid, literate analysis helps greatly at last to place into perspective that long-puzzling shift from Radical to Liberal Republicanism."—HAROLD HYMAN, Rice University. "His dissection of the so-called liberal mind of the late 19th century is the fullest and most insightful that I know. . . . It throws light not only on the period directly discussed, but also on the problems of our own day."—John A. Garraty, Columbia University

$7.50

American Catholics and Social Reform THE NEW DEAL YEARS

By DAVID J. O'BRIEN, Loyola College, Montreal. "Mr. O'Brien's study deals with a significant period in recent American Catholic history; it covers the ground thoroughly and contains much useful information and judicious commentary. What makes it particularly valuable is that O'Brien brings to bear on the matters he discusses the perspective of the latest Catholic theological thinking and social criticism."—Philip Gleason, University of Notre Dame

$6.50

WOXFORD WUNIVERSITY WPRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Oxford University Press

The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights

By J. E. S. FAWCETT, All Souls College, Oxford. The European Convention on Human Rights has been in operation since 1954 and over 3,000 applications have been brought under it. This survey takes the Convention article by article and clause by clause, describing and analyzing the interpretation that has been given to them by the Convention bodies, and also by national courts in the countries in which the Convention is part of the domestic law.

$8.75

Food, Farming and the Common Market

By MICHAEL BUTTERWICK and EDMUND ROLFE, both of the Institute of Agrarian Affairs, Oxford. Agriculture is a major obstacle in Britain's Common Market negotiations as well as a source of some contention within the Community itself. In this timely and valuable study the authors consider all aspects of the subject. They compare postwar development in Britain to the development of each country of the E.E.C. since 1958. An analysis of Britain's unsuccessful 1961-63 negotiations accompanies speculation as to what form pending negotiations might take. $7.75

Arnim and Bismarck

By GEORGE O. KENT, Library of Congress. This study analyzes the status of the office of the chancellor and the foreign minister of the German Reich. It discusses how the outcome of the struggle between Arnim and Bismarck settled the personal fate of the protagonists and determined the course of German foreign and domestic policies for some time. The book is based on a wide range of hitherto little known documents in the archives of the German Foreign Ministry in Bonn. $5.95

Canada in World Affairs

VOLUME XII: 1961-1963

By PEYTON V. LYON, Carleton University, Ottawa. This is a well-documented account of Canada's exceptionally controversial foreign and defense policies during 1961-63. The volume presents an analysis of Canada's uneven responses to the Berlin and Cuban crises; the Government's reluctance to act on defense commitments, and the ensuing row between Ottawa and Washington; the election of 1963, the first to be fought principally over foreign or defense policy since 1917; the decline in Canada's ability to influence the conduct of other countries; Mr. Diefenbaker's growing resentment of the military establishment, Washington, and many of his cabinet colleagues; and finally, a discussion of his relations with President Kennedy.

W OXFORD W UNIVERSITY W PRESS

200 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Outstanding Books from The University of Chicago Press

The Origins of British Sociology: 1834-1914

An Essay with Selected Papers Philip Abrams

This book presents the development of a whole national school of sociology rather than the work of a single thinker. The material is diverse and shows a pattern of convergence and divergence between different strands of work. The introduction combines historical analysis with numerous short citations from representative works. Readings were selected from works which have been historically decisive or intellectually distinctive in the making of British sociology.

1968 LC: 68-54221 Details to be announced

Max Weber on Charisma and Institution Building

Selected Writings, Edited and with an Introduction by S. N. Eisenstadt

Max Weber's concept of charisma is of crucial importance for understanding the processes of institution building. The explication of the relations between charisma and institution building is perhaps the most important challenge Weber's work poses for modern sociology. The book relates charisma to the structure of social relations, institutionalization in the political sphere, the legal system, the economic sphere, the sphere of social stratification and the spheres of religion and culture.

1968 LC: 68-54221 350 pages Cloth $13.50 Paper $3.95

Roderick D. McKenzie on Human Ecology

Selected Writings, Edited and with an Introduction by Amos H. Hawley

Roderick McKenzie wrote the first definitive statements of human ecology in the years when sociology was casting off its preoccupation with reform issues and emerging as a mature social science possessing a distinctive body of theory. The ideas set forth in his early essays soon came to be regarded as immutable doctrine. The main divisions covered in the book are Human Ecology, The Local Community, Interregional Expansion and Inter-Racial Contacts, and Dominance and the Region.

1968 LC: 68-9728 Details to be announced

E. Franklin Frazier on Race Relations

Selected Papers

Edited and with an Introduction by G. Franklin Edwards

E. Franklin Frazier, a pioneer Negro sociologist, was the first to uncover the structure of the Negro family under segregation. His studies focused on the impact of urbanization, and he analyzed the emergence of the Negro middle class. Ultimately his concerns led him to a broad and comparative study of race relations in the United States and elsewhere throughout the world. The present volume is a selection from his theoretical works and other writings on the Negro and race relations. Heritage of Sociology Series.

October 1968 LC: 68-8586 320 pages Cloth $13.50 Paper, P324, $3.95

HERITAGE OF SOCIOLOGY SERIES MORRIS JANOWITZ, GENERAL EDITOR

The Soviet System of Government

Fourth Edition Revised John N. Hazard

The fourth edition of this book is a valuable guide to the nature of the Soviet system as it functions in practice and an indication of the direction in which it is moving on its fiftieth anniversary. The Soviet system, evolving from totalitarian "Stalinism" to a promised new "socialist democracy," is the Communists' chief instrument of change. Focal questions for this edition are: Is such change possible? Does the Soviet system differ qualitatively from authoritarian systems of the past or present?

1968 LC: 68-24557 288 pages Cloth $6.75 Paper $3.25

Justice on Trial

The Case of Louis D. Brandeis

A. L. Todd

Louis D. Brandeis was a man for the people in an age of monopolies, and the first Jew to be appointed to the Supreme Court. "In Justice on Trial Mr. Todd has provided an exciting and superlatively fair story of Brandeis' appointment... the four months of ugly opposition that it evoked in the smugger sections of Boston and Cambridge, and the victory for decency that emerged at last. From start to finish the episode crackles with drama, and the author recounts it superbly."—Edmond Cahn, Book Week.

1968 Paper, P321, $2.95

Fiscal Policy and Economic Development

A Primer on Fiscal Policy for the Emerging Countries Robert B. Bangs

For students of developing nations, and for administrators and advisors of such countries, this book examines the relation between governmental fiscal policy and economic development. This relationship is examined in countries at various stages of development, from less-developed societies to affluent ones. The book focuses on such practical matters as tax and expenditure policy, trade policy, giving and receiving fiscal advice, monetary policy, and development planning.

1968 LC: 68-27292 212 pages, $7.50

The American Partnership

Intergovernmental Co-operation in the Nineteenth-Century United States Daniel J. Elazar

Elazar challenges the theory that, until this century, the American governmental system was one of dual federalism. He presents considerable evidence that the pattern of American federalism—the American partnership—has been a constant one since the establishment of the Republic. By studying the activities of the American government in the nineteenth century, he shows that federal-state relations were already those of the co-operative federalism held to be a twentieth-century development.

1962 LC: 62-17132 358 pages, $6.95

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS, CHICAGO 60637

Outstanding Books from The University of Chicago Press

Double Jeopardy and the Federal System

Leonard G. Miller

Miller defends the constitutionality of successive prosecutions for the same offense by state and federal courts. His defense is based upon the legitimacy and necessity of the "two-sovereignities doctrine" in the American federal system. The possibility of multiple prosecution for the same offense is inherent in the federal system, and its constitutionality has continually been sustained at the same time that a body of rules to protect defendants has grown up.

1968 LC: 68-19095 136 pages, $9.75

Judicial Power and Reconstruction Politics

Stanley I. Kutler

This book offers a new perspective on the Supreme Court during the Reconstruction period. Focusing on the Court's institutional and political status, the author suggests that the congressional Republicans were not united and that, despite the furor over the Dred Scott decision, the Court exhibited a remarkable tenacity and toughness. Contrary to the conventional view, Kutler concludes that the period represented continuity in judicial development, rather than a setback, and thus formed a more meaningful backdrop for understanding the later character and uses of federal judicial power.

1968 LC: 68-16702 192 pages, $5.95

Organized Crime in Chicago

Second Edition John Landesco With a new Introduction by Mark Haller

John Landesco's study of organized crime in Chicago during the 1910's and 1920's is probably the best analysis yet written of the place of organized criminal activity in the social structure of an American city. This work has not been readily available since it was originally published as part of the Illinois Crime Survey. Now reissued separately, Landesco's book presents a vivid history of Chicago crime that will interest the scholar and the general public alike.

1968 LC: 68-24353 322 pages, $7.50

Violence and Modernization

Henry Bienen

Bienen reviews present scholarly knowledge about violence and discusses it in relation to modernization. He looks at ghetto violence, excluding racial violence; internal war, excluding guerilla warfare, counter-insurgency, and civil war; revolution; works dealing with the structure, typologies, and romance of violence; and totalitarianism. He concludes by suggesting areas for further study. Published for the Adlai Stevenson Institute of International Affairs by the University of Chicago Press.

1968 LC: 68-56012 112 pages Cloth $3.95 Pager $1.25

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS, CHICAGO 60637

Winner—1968 Woodrow Wilson Award

Parliament, Parties and Society in France 1946-1958

Duncan MacRae, Jr.

Duncan MacRae has won the 1968 Woodrow Wilson Foundation Award for this important case study in political sociology featuring an analysis of voting in the National Assembly of the Fourth French Republic in relation to party structure, constituency voting behavior, and social structure.

416 pp. $10.00

"[Professor MacRae] has immersed himself thoroughly in the literature on modern French politics and has distilled out the essence of that literature as it relates to his central quest—a search for the causes of cabinet instability. The result is about as readable and persuasive as this kind of monograph can be."

---Gordon Wright
---The Annals of the American Political and Social Science Association

New and forthcoming:

Studies in British Politics

Richard Rose, ed.

Now in paperback, this collection of articles is designed to portray the political behavior of the British public. Each of its five sections reflects a particular aspect of the influences on the British voter outside the formal machinery of government, and introductions and headnotes help place the selections in their proper social science contexts.

352 pp. $3.75

New Approaches to International Relations

Morton A. Kaplan, ed.

This volume, the product of the 1966 Conference of the Norman Wait Harris Memorial Foundation at the University of Chicago, contains definitive statements of the new approaches to international relations which political scientists have thus far recognized. Contributors: Kaplan, Wohlstetter, Golden, Kahn, Alker, Burns, Guetzkow, Galtung, North, Falk, Chi, Franke, and Reinken.

534 pp. $10.00

Political Change in Britain

The Factors Conditioning Electoral Choice

David E. Butler and Donald Stokes

May 1969

ST. MARTIN'S PRESS

College Department

175 Fifth Avenue

New York, New York 10010

Now Issues from PEGASUS

The United States and the Spread of Nuclear Weapons

By William B. Bader, Consultant to the U. S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee

In this critical assessment of the United States' policy toward the proliferation of nuclear weapons, William B. Bader reviews and analyzes the shifting attitudes that have shaped and re-shaped that policy. Contending that valid attitudes toward one country cannot be assumed to be equally valid for another, Mr. Bader analyzes the special circumstances of each nation that will govern its decision to go or not to go "nuclear", and concludes with recommendations on how the spread of nuclear weapons can be slowed and American security interests preserved. Texts of nuclear weapons treaties and agreements signed by the U.S. to date included. 176 pages. Clothbound, $6.00; Paperback, $1.95

The New Marxism

Soviet and East European Marxism Since 1956

By Richard T. De George, University of Kansas Since Khrushchev's 1956 speech against Stalin, significant changes have altered the political character of the Soviet-East European bloc. The New Marxism describes and evaluates the corresponding changes in Marxist and Marxist-Leninist theory, their relation to previous posi-tions, and the resultant divergencies they have helped to create among the East European Marxists. 176 pages. Clothbound, $6.00; Paperback, $1.95

Lenin on Politics and Revolution

Selected Writings

Edited and introduced by James E. Connor,

Columbia University
This superbly edited collection of Lenin's writings condenses into one volume the texts essential to an under-standing of his revolutionary political thought. Spanning thirty years in Lenin's career, these key writings, together with Connor's invaluable introductory material and notes, provide an excellent introduction to the mind and method of the great revolutionist. 388 pages. Clothbound, $7.95; Paperback, $2.95

The Politics of Religious Conflict

By Richard E. Morgan, Columbia University The bold new appeals for public funds by religious schools, hospitals and child care centers have dramatically rekindled a long sensitive issue in American politics: the proper relationship of church and state. This book surveys the contemporary issues and interest groups now triggering discord, and systematically analyzes why church-state conflicts arise, how, where and by whom they are carried on, and their consequences to the American political process as a whole. 160 pages. Clothbound, $5.95; Paperback, $1.95

A Conflict of Loyaltiès

The Case for Selective Conscientious Objection

Edited by James Finn, Editor of worldview Coes a young man have the same right to refuse to take part in a specific war that he has to refuse to take part in all wars? The Selective Service Law recognizes the rights or the general conscientious objector, but the principle of "selective conscientious objection" is nowhere accepted either politically or legally. The volume's editor and distinguished contributors-Michael Harrington, Arnold Kaufman, William V. O'Brien, Quentin L. Quade, Paul Ramsey, Everett E. Gendler, Jerome M. Segal, and Mulford Q. Sibley-explore the moral, philosophical, politicel and legal aspects of selective conscientious objection. 288 pages. Clothbound, $5.00; Paperback, $1.75

A Bentham Reader

Edited by Mary Peter Mack, Connecticut College The first comprehensive selection of Jeremy Bentham's works to be published since his liftime nearly a century and a half ago. Bentham's major ideas are presented and a nair ago, bentiam's major ideas are presented here through selections from his principal works—A F-agment on Government, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation, as well as from his writings on prison reform, psychology, the law of evidence and indirect legislation. Introduction and notes. 352 pages. Clothbound, $8.95; Paperback, $2.95

FORTHCOMING

Stalin and His Generals

Soviet Military Memoirs of World War II

Edited by Seweryn Bialer, Research Institute for Communist Affairs, Columbia University

This major new collection of excerpts from memoirs of key Soviet military men, diplomats and high ranking industrial managers gives the West the role of Stalin and his leaders in the conduct of World War II. 6E8 pages. Clothbound, $8.95

From War to War

The Arab-Israeli Confrontation, 1948-1967

By Nadav Safran, Harvard University

A balanced account of the forces and events that have shaped the conflict between Israel and its neighbors over the last twenty years and an analysis of the complex political issues at stake. 448 pages. Clothbound, $10.00; Paperback, $2.95

BACKLIST

Vietnam Triangle

Moscow, Peking, Hanoi

By Donald Zagoria, Research Institute on Modern Asia, Hunter College

"Zagoria underlines with academic skill and persuasive documentation why the United States is really fighting a residual shadow of international communism. . . . Few American experts are more qualified . . ."

-The Washington Post.

268 pages. Clothbound, $6.95; Paperback $1.75

The Politics of Poverty

By John C. Donovan, Bowdoin College

"Aighly recommended . . . helps us understand why the Nagro poor are angry."—Library Journal. 160 pages. Clothbound. $5.75; Paperback, $1.45

A DIVISION OF Western Publishing Company, Inc., 850 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

C BACKGROUND TEXTBOOKS

CO GUIDE TO CURREN

CQ GUIDE TO CURRENT AMERICAN-GOVERNMENT - SPRING 1969

—updated and published twice yearly, January and September, to provide factual information on recent significant developments in American Government.

NEW

U.S. DRAFT POLICY AND ITS IMPACT

PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATING CONVENTIONS - 1968

Revised and Updated . . .

LEGISLATORS AND THE LOBBYISTS

Fourth Edition . . .

REVOLUTION IN CIVIL RIGHTS

CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY SERVICE

1735 K Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006

COMMUNISM IN CHINA

Ideology in Flux

BENJAMIN I. SCHWARTZ

One of America's leading sinologists focuses on the ideas, attitudes, and policies of leading decision-making individuals and groups in Peking and in the Communist world. Mr. Schwartz has included articles written over a span of thirteen years, and a new introductory essay which reconsiders some of the concerns underlying the earlier articles. $5.95

SOCIAL CHANGE IN SOVIET RUSSIA

ALEX INKELES

In this collection of essays, representing more than twenty years of research, Mr. Inkeles covers a wide range of subjects with one primary purpose: to identify the main elements of the process of modernization in the Soviet social system. Russian Research Center Studies, 57. $12.50

THE RHETORIC OF EMPIRE

American China Policy, 1895-1901

This book is a reappraisal of America's China policy at the end of the nineteenth century in which the author examines the effects of the confrontation between the two countries and provides a fresh perspective on America's role in the Far East. Harvare

East Asian Series, 36. $7.50

MARILYN B. YOUNG

THE UNITED STATES AND THE FAR EASTERN CRISIS OF 1933-1938

From the Manchurian Incident Through the Initial Stage of the Undeclared Sino-Japanese War

Sino-Japanese war

"If our society adequately rewarded achievement in the literature of history Miss Borg should win a decoration."—Edgar Snow, Political Science Quarterly Winner of the 1965 Bancroft Prize. Harvard East Asian Series, 14. 2nd printing. $10.00

DOROTHY BORG

THE STRENGTH OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bundy here contends that our national government is dangerously weak. Attacking the common assumption that strong government is inconsistent with personal freedom, he calls for a new theory of government, reconciling strong political authority with widespread political participation. This book is Mr. Bundy's adaptation of his 1968 Godkin Lectures at Harvard. $3.75

VARIETIES OF POLICE BEHAVIOR

The Management of Law and Order in Eight Communities

Examining how the uniformed patrolmen in eight communities deal with common offenses, Mr. Wilson describes the problems that arise out of constraints imposed by law, politics, public opinion, and expectations of superiors. He isolates three "styles" of police behavior, and considers their relationship to local politics. Joint Center for Urban Studies. $6.50

THE METROPOLITAN ENIGMA

Inquiries into the Nature and Dimensions of America's "Urban Crisis" Revised Edition

This is an expanded version of a book that was first published in paperback in 1967 by the U. S. Chamber of Commerce. The contributors, selected by the Joint Center for Urban Studies and all distinguished experts in their fields, present a wide variety of incisive papers on today's urban problems. $7.75

PORTUGUESE AFRICA

"One of the most rewarding contributions to Africana in recent years."—American Historical Review. "Provides not only a comprehensive history of Portuguese rule in Africa but a dispassionate analysis of Portuguese colonial policy today and yesterday... well-written and timely."—Political Science Quarterly. 3rd printing. Illus. $7.50

In Canada/Saunders of Toronto, Ltd.

McGEORGE BUNDY

JAMES Q. WILSON

JAMES Q. WILSON, editor

JAMES DUFFY

Virginia: Bourbonism to Byrd, 1870-1925

By Allen W. Moger, Professor of History, Washington and Lee University. ix, 398 pp., illus., index. 63/4 x 93/4. L.C. 68-8538. $7.50

This general history of Virginia from its restoration to the Union in 1870 to the election of Harry Flood Byrd as governor in 1925 illuminates the tools and conceptions of government which originated during the impoverished and bitter years after the Civil War and which remained useful and vital well into the twentieth century.

Allen W. Moger's account provides thorough details of the Bourbon debt policy and the neglect of the new "free public schools" which brought William Mahone and his Readjuster party to control from 1879 to 1883. Mahone's policies forced a complete reorganization of the Conservative-Democratic party to "redeem" the state. The fight against "Mahoneism" gave birth to the Democratic organization—the strongest and most famous political group in Virginia's history.

Old Virginia Restored: An Interpretation of the Progressive Impulse, 1870-1930

By RAYMOND PULLEY, Assistant Professor of History, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. x, 210 pp., illus. 6 x 9. L.C. 68-8539. $6.75

As paradoxical as it may seem, the reforms undertaken in the Old Dominion during the progressive era returned the state to a political and social system as stable and resistant to innovation as any that had existed before the Civil War. In other words, the reform impulse sprang from the conserving or reactionary tendencies inherent in the culture of the Commonwealth rather than from a desire to reconcile the state to the march of modern America.

Read in conjunction with Harry Byrd and the Changing Face of Virginia Politics, 1945-1966, by J. Harvie Wilkinson III, Mr. Pulley's study illuminates the political history of the Old Dominion during the first two-thirds of the twentieth century.

Virginia in Our Century

New Printing with Supplementary Chapter

By. Jean Gottmann, Professor, School of Geography, Oxford University. Approx. 650 pp., illus., maps, graphs, index. 61/8 x 51/4. L.C. 68-8541. $7.50

The Press is pleased to announce the publication of a new printing with added material of Jean Gottmann's classic, now entitled Virginia in Our Century. The most comprehensive and the most popular account of the Old Dominion in our time, this book treats every aspect of the features and resources of the state and its people.

Virginia in Our Century will be welcomed by those interested in the study of history, geography, political science, and demography. The new material provides the best summary available of Virginia's current assets and attitudes.

University Press of Virginia

Charlottesville

KOREA: TIME, CHANGE, AND ADMINISTRATION

BY HAHN-BEEN LEE Korea's social transitions since 1945, along with her rapidly expanding economy, are here interrelated with the political and administrative measures taken during the period. The author has served his country in posts ranging from budget director to ambassador, and is now dean of the Graduate School of Public Administration at Seoul National University.

$9.00

THE INDIANIZED STATES OF SOUTHEAST ASIA

BY G. COEDES India's civilizing influence beyond the Ganges is one of the outstanding events in history and, although the peak of her influence was over by 1500, the date Coedes' classic study ends, India's heritage permeates the art, law, literature, religion, and politics of present-day Southeast Asia. A translation of Les Etats Hindouises d'Indochine et d'Indonesie, it is considered by contemporary historians as the major source for study of the area. $12.00

FIJI GOES TO THE POLLS

BY NORMAN MELLER AND JAMES M. ANTHONY Giant steps toward Fijian autonomy were taken in 1963 when men and women of the crown colony's three major ethnic groups—locally born Indians, indigenous Fijians, and economically entrenched Europeans—went to the polls for the first time as equals to elect their Legislative Council representatives. Fiji Goes to the Polls views in depth this crucial moment and, in a postscript, the 1965 constitutional amendments and the 1966 election changes are analyzed to determine their effectiveness in improving ethnic voting behavior. $5.50

VIET-NAM: POLITICS AND PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

BY NGHIEM DANG "Students of Vietnamese politics and administration, or statesmen aware of the necessity to give sociological depth to their study or decisions, will find Mr. Dang's detailed analysis of the administrative process at the provincial, district, village, and hamlet levels awe-inspiring."—Far Eastern Economic Review $10.00

THAILAND: THE MODERNIZATION OF A BUREAUCRATIC POLITY

BY FRED W. RIGGS The author here traces the processes of change that have taken place in Thai politics and administration from the mid-nineteenth to the midtwentieth century, then takes a close look at the contemporary Thai government as a bureaucratic polity. Taking the administration of the rice program as a focus, Riggs probes and dissects the cultural and social changes now taking place. $10.00

THE THAI BUREAUCRACY: INSTITUTIONAL CHANGE AND DEVELOPMENT

BY WILLIAM J. SIFFIN Complementing Riggs' study, Siffin here portrays in considerable historical depth the contemporary Thai bureaucracy as a social system and analyzes its development out of long-standing tradition, through a dramatic era of reform, into the present. $8.50

CULTURAL AND TECHNICAL INTERCHANGE THROUGH BOOKS

COMMUNIST CHINA

The Domestic Scene: 1949-1967

by

Peter Tang and Joan Maloney cloth, $10.00

Also Available:

C. Y. Cheng, Communist China's Economy, 1949-1962 cloth, $5.00

Mandarin Chinese Dictionary Series

Chinese-English

paper. $5.50 ea.

Chinese Language Textbook Series
Three Sets, Twelve Volumes

SETON HALL UNIVERSITY PRESS, SOUTH ORANGE, N. J.

"Here is a book that should be within easy reach of all who would understand one of the great enigmas of democratic government."—Hubert H. Humphrey

"... exquisitely researched...Dr. Lippincott has done his profession a real service."

-Robert C. Hartnett, America

". . . in every respect a major contribution."

-Arnold Brecht

"Excellently and clearly written, it will be profitably read by juniors, seniors and graduate students. Superb bibliography."

-CHOICE

DEMOCRACY'S DILEMMA

The Totalitarian Party in a Free Society

Benjamin Lippincott
University of Minnesota

Here is a provocative analysis of one of the most crucial problems facing free societies today—the presence of totalitarian groups striving for political power. In examining the views of leading 20th Century political thinkers, the author shows that this problem has been evaded rather than squarely confronted. Italy in the 20's, Germany in the 30's and post-war Czechoslovakia are examined as specific examples of the inability of Western democracies to cope with an internal totalitarian drive to power. The emergence of new groups advocating extra-legal techniques—including the use of force—makes this study of power and freedom increasingly relevant.

1965. 246 Pages. $6.50

The Ronald Press Company

79 Madison Avenue · New York, N.Y. 10016

new . . . timely

ASPECTS OF MODERN COMMUNISM

Edited by Richard F. Staar

This penetrating study of modern Communism was published for the Institute of International Studies of the University of South Carolina. It is based on the proceedings of a symposium held in Atlanta, Georgia, under the auspices of the Department of Political Science at Emory University.

Footnotes, 35 tables, 2 charts, Notes on Contributors, Index SBN 87249-136-6 LC 68-9362 448 pp.

$7.95

"JUNE 22, 1941": Soviet Historians and the German Invasion By Vladimir Petrov

This book contains a complete translation of JUNE 22, 1941, a controversial book by Russian historian A. M. Nekrich. The author presents a discerning and searching examination of the facts and issues involved in the relations between the Germany of Hitler and the Soviet Russia of Stalin.

Footnotes, Appendix

SBN 87249-134-X LC 68-9364 256

$5.95

CHINA AND THE WEST By Wolfgang Franke

$5.95

Available at better bookstores.

THE UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH CAROLINA PRESS

Columbia, South Carolina 29208

The reference shelf

1. YEARBOOK OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The annual editions of the Yearbook constitute the major reference work of the organization. They provide a year-by-year record of the multitude of activities which are dealt with in and through the United Nations. Twentieth edition: Yearbook of the United Nations 1966, fully indexed, 1226 pages.

Clothbound, $25.00.

2. EVERYMAN'S UNITED NATIONS

A basic history of the United Nations family from 1945 to 1965, presented accurately and without bias, which fulfils the needs of both the expert and the casual reader. Eighth edition, fully indexed, 634 pages.

Clothbound $6.00, paperbound $2.50.

3. UNITED NATIONS MONTHLY CHRONICLE

Designed for everyone learning or teaching about the United Nations, every issue of the Chronicle contains a complete record of the month, describing the proceedings, decisions and resolutions of the main UN organs and committees, articles by distinguished contributors, a picture section and notes of the month.

Annual subscription in USA and Canada $7.00.

UNITED NATIONS PUBLICATIONS, ROOM 1059, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10017

Forthcoming 1969!

REFORM AND REVOLUTION: Readings in Latin American Politics

Edited by ARPAD VON LAZAR, Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Tufts University; and ROBERT KAUFMAN, Rutgers, The State University. Selections by some of the most important analysts in the field focus upon the reformist and revolutionary approaches to the burning political, economic, and social issues confronting Latin America in her developmental steps toward modernization. Est. 352 pp. Paperbound. 1969.

New!/EUROPEAN POLITICAL PROCESSES: Essays and Readings

Edited by HENRY S. ALBINSKI, The Pennsylvania State University; and LAW-RENCE K. PETTIT, American Council on Education. Original essays and selected readings examine topics of paramount concern in Great Britain, Germany, France, and the Soviet Union, 448 pp. Paperbound, 1968.

READINGS IN COMPARATIVE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

Edited by NIMROD RAPHAELI, The Hebrew University. Countries are analyzed on a comparative basis which probes beneath the formal administrative organizations into the broader context of the social sciences: politics, sociology, economics, and anthropology, 490 pp. Paperbound.

BASIC ISSUES IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Edited by PETER A. TOMA, University of Arizona; and ANDREW GYORGY, George Washington University. Organized around 16 topics and emphasizing the scope and method of international relations, politics, organization, and law through concepts and clash of issues. 576 pp. Paperbound.

New!/APPROACHES TO THE STUDY OF PARTY ORGANIZATION

Edited by WILLIAM J. CROTTY, Northwestern University. New collection of 10 original and comprehensive readings which relates "the political party" to broader concerns and empirically investigates problem areas within party organization. 412 pp. Paperbound. 1968,

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

New!/STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT IN AMERICA, SECOND EDITION

By DANIEL R. GRANT, Vanderbilt University; and H. C. NIXON. Retaining a balance of traditional and behavioral approaches to the study of state and local government, the Second Edition increases emphasis on metropolitics and the problems of governing a metropolitan area. 596 pp. 1968.

POLITICAL PARTIES AND POLITICAL BEHAVIOR

Edited by WILLIAM J. CROTTY, Northwestern University; DONALD M. FREEMAN, University of Arizona; and DOUGLAS S. GATLIN, Florida Atlantic University. Designed to bring to the student's awareness the diversity of materials relevant to the understanding of political parties, this text makes available the most rewarding research yet undertaken in each area. 630 pp. Paperbound.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: Behavior and Controversy

Edited by LEWIS LIPSITZ, The University of North Carolina. Selected readings in the major substantive and institutional areas of American government. 678 pp. Paperbound.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE: From Burgess to Behavioralism

by ALBERT SOMIT, State University of New York at Buffalo; and JOSEPH TANENHAUS, University of Iowa. Describes how political scientists have viewed the scope and method of their field and analyzes the recurrent efforts to develop a "science of politics". 220 pp.

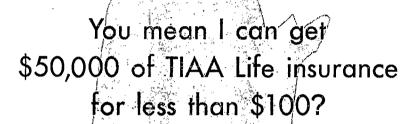

WORLD POLITICS: The Writings of Theorists and Practitioners, Classical and Modern

Edited by AREND LIJPHART, University of California, Berkeley. Classical and contemporary theorists in international relations and political practitioners who can speak authoritatively on world affairs provide perspective for the international relations and American foreign policy student. 448 pp. Paperbound.

New!/POLITICAL BEHAVIOR OF THE AMERICAN ELECTORATE

by WILLIAM H. FLANIGAN, University of Minnesota. The text relates the changing patterns of turn-out and partisan loyalty to social and economic factors and draws data from such sources as the four major national surveys of 1952, 1956, 1960, and 1964. 1968. 127 pp. Paperbound.

1868 ALLYN AND BACON, INC. 470 ATLANTIC AVE., BOSTON, MASS. 02210

That's what an Assistant Professor asked us when he heard about TIAA's low life insurance costs.

It's true. At his age 30 the annual premium for a 20-Year Home Protection policy providing $50,000 initial a mount of insurance is $159.00. The first-year dividend, based on our current dividend scale, is $61.00, making a net payment of $98,00. Dividends, of course, are not guaranteed.

The Home Protection plan is level premium Term insurance providing its largest amount of protection initially, reducing by schedule each year to recognize decreasing insurance needs. This is just one example of the many low-cost TIAA plans available. If you need more protection for your family, ask us to mail you a personal illustration with figures for a policy issued at your age. We'll also send the Life Insurance Guide describing other TIAA policies.

ELIGIBILITY

Eligibility to apply for this or other TIAA life insurance is limited to persons employed at the time of application by a college, university, private school, or other nonprofit educational or scientific institution that qualifies for TIAA eligibility.

	tiaa
TEACHERS INSURANCE AND ANNUTY ASSOCIATION 730 Third Avenue, New York, W. Y. 10017	e G
Please mail the new Life Insurance Guide ar	nd a personal illustration.
Name	YourDate of Birth
Address	ZIP.
Dependents', Ages
Nonprofit Employer college, university, or other	r educational or scientific institution

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS

ARC CLIO
ABC-CLIO	1472
Alldine Publishing Company	1493
Allyn & Bacon	1523
Appleton-Century-Crofts Atherton Press	1462
Atheritor Fress	1495
The Australian National University	1492
The Bobbs-Merrill Company	1502
University of California Press	1498
Catholic University of Nijmegen	1492
University of Chicago Press	1512
Columbia University Press	1504
Commentary	er II
Congressicnal Quarterly Cornell University Press	1515
Cornell University Press	1482
Walter de Gruyter, Inc.	1480
The Dorsey Press	1479
Doubleday & Company	1483
East-West Center Press	1519
The Free Press	1461
Harcourt, Brace & World	1465
Harper & Row	1458
Harvard University Press	1517
D. C. Heath & Company	1467
Holt, Rinehart & Winston	1471
Johns Hopkins University Press	1503
Houghton Mifflin Company	1489
University of Illinois Press
J. B. Lippincott Company	1473
Little, Brown & Company	1485
The Macmillan Company	1474
Markham Publishing Company	1501
University of Massachusetts Press	1466
Charles É. Merrill Books	1480
National Press	1478
Northwestern University Press	1487
Ohio State University Press	1486
Oxford University Press	1509
F. E. Peacock Publishers	1469
Pegasus	1514
University of Pennsylvania Press	1457
Frederick A. Praeger	1463
Frederick A. Praeger Prentice-Hall, Inc.	1092
Princeton University Press	er IV
Rand McNally Company	1477
Random House—Alfred A. Knopf	1497
The Royald Press	1520
St. Martin's Press	1513
Scott Foresman & Company	1494
University of South Carolina Press	1521
Seton Hall University Press	1520
Stanford University Press	1499
TIAA	1524
United Nations Publications	1521
D. Van Nostrand Company	1475
University Press of Virginia	1518
John Wiley & Sons	1481
World I aw Fund	1487
Yale University Press	1490
THE CHILDREN ATOMS THE CONTROL OF TH

Chemical Warfare

A Study in Restraints FREDERIC J. EROWN

The author investigates the nature of restraints—political, military, economic, and psychological—operative in varying degrees between 1919 and 1945, when U.S. chemical warfare policy was being formed. He offers the first critical analysis of the curious World War II phenomenon that a nation, in the midst of an unrestricted and vicious war, refrained from employing a weapon guaranteed to inflict massive casualties on the enemy. In the conclusion Major Brown relates his findings to contemporary conflicts.

$9.00

Mr. Justice Murphy

A Political Biography
J. WOODFORD HOWARD, JR.

This biography of the libertarian Supreme Court Justice casts new light on the politics of reform, America's colonial experience in Asia, the labor wars of the '30s, and the Roosevelt Administration; and presents new data on judicial decision-making in the '40s and the growth of civil liberties. It is based upon recently opened Murphy papers. Photographs and cartoons

$12.50

Communist Party Membership in the U.S.S.R., 1917-1967

T. H. RIGEY

In this comprehensive and latest statistical profile of the membership of the Communist party Professor Rigby analyzes the history of party recruitment and composition. Since the party makes vital contributions to the performance of several basic tasks within the Soviet political system, he interprets his data mainly in functional terms. Studies of the Russian Institute, Columbia University $15.00

New Princeton Paperbacks

NEUTRALIZATION AND WORLD POLITICS, by Cyril E. Black, Richard A. Falk, Klaus Knorr, and Oran Young. Published for the Center of International Studies, Princeton University $1.95

ZANZIBAR: BACKGROUND TO REVOLUTION, by Michael F. Lofchie

$2.95

MADISON'S "ADVICE TO MY COUNTRY." by Adrienne Koch

$2.95

Princeton University Press

Princeton, New Jersey 08540